PREFACE

TO THE

SECOND EDITION OF THE THIRD VOLUME.

IN preſenting the third volume of the enlarged edition of the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA to the public, ſomething may, perhaps, be expected from me in apology for its late appearance. Many circumſtances might be mentioned that have contributed to this event, and which, if related, would probably be judged of conſiderable moment; but I am unwilling to trouble the world with a detail of particulars which have myſelf for their object. A few things, however, muſt be ſaid to two or three anonymous letter-writers, who, under the ſignature of purchaſers, have aſſumed great conſequence, and have addreſſed me as if I had no other employment than that of being Editor of the Biographia, and as if no ſmall degree of perſonal advantage accrued from the work. It is proper to inform the Gentlemen referred to, that they are miſtaken in both theſe reſpects. I have profeſſional duties, connections, and engagements, which require ſerious attention; and as to the profit derived from the preſent undertaking, it is very trifling, compared with the time and labour which are ſpent upon it. I have no complaints to make upon this head; but it is an act of juſtice to my character to have it underſtood, that I have been influenced far more by public than by private conſiderations. If this had not been the caſe, the deſign would have been carried on with greater rapidity, and with a much greater degree of imperfection. It may farther be obſerved, that nearly one half of the volume now publiſhed conſiſts of freſh matter: And when it is reflected upon, that more than double the proportion of new lives hath fallen to my ſhare; that the additions to the old articles, which are very numerous, and, in many caſes, very large, are almoſt excluſively my own; that the previous reviſion and ſubſequent correction of the whole work come within my department; that no ſmall compaſs of reading is abſolutely neceſſary to the due execution of the undertaking; and that often the requiſite information cannot be obtained without a correſpondence by letters, and a variety of perſonal applications; it will, I hope, be allowed, if the Biographia alone be conſidered, that I have not acted the part of an undiligent man. I ſhall only add upon this ſubject, that there is good reaſon to believe, from ſome particular circumſtances, that the publication of the future volumes will be more ſpeedy, without any diminution of the attention with which they have hitherto been conducted.

In the minds of ſome perſons, the extent of freſh matter, and the variety of new articles, may appear to be carried too far.—On this point there will neceſſarily be a diverſity of ſentiments, according to the difference which ſubſiſts in the taſtes and judgments of men. But conſidering the preſent ſolicitude for Biographical knowledge, it ſeems better to err on the ſide of exceſs than of defect. There is one thing which may be ſuggeſted to ſuch as will be diſpoſed to think that certain articles might have been omitted. With reſpect to ſtateſmen, warriors, and characters of the like kind, none ſhould be introduced that have not been very diſtinguiſhed. But as a Hiſtory of Britiſh Literature, the Biographia ought to contain as much information, and include as great a variety of objects, as the nature of the deſign can admit. It is hence only that it can fully be known even to many of our own countrymen, and eſpecially to foreigners, what a number of valuable writers, in every department of ſcience and learning, the nation has produced. To extend in this reſpect the honour of Great-Britain as far as poſſible, both at home and abroad, is a deſirable undertaking.

There is one important article, which I have been obliged to defer to the concluſion of the letter C, where it will be introduced by way of Appendix, and that is CHATTERTON. From the many tracts which have already been publiſhed concerning this extraordinary youth, I was in hopes that the controverſy excited excited by him would have been ſo far ended, that I ſhould be able to give the hiſtory of it in the preſent volume. But this I found was by no means the caſe. My ingenious and learned friend, Mr. Herbert Croft, is writing an improved life of Chatterton; and he will accompany it with another edition of the Poems aſcribed to Rowley, which is expected to throw new and particular light on the ſubject. For this publication, therefore, I have determined to wait; that the Biographia may be as complete a depoſitory as poſſible of what ſhall have been advanced on one of the moſt curious literary queſtions which hath occurred in any age of the world. I requeſt permiſſion to add, that the view of the controverſy ſhall be conducted with impartiality and candour. If the apprehended force of evidence ſhould incline me to one ſide of the argument, my ſentiments ſhall be expreſſed with all the reſpect which is due to the able and worthy men from whom I may differ in opinion.

The obligations I am under to a number of Gentlemen are too various to be diſtinctly ſpecified in this place. Their names, where I am permitted to declare them, will occur under the articles which have been benefited by their communications. I cannot, however, omit to mention how greatly I am indebted to Edmund Calamy, Eſq; Dr. Johnſtone of Kidderminſter, Joſhua Steevens, Eſq; Mr. Canton, William Hayley, Eſq; the Reverend Dr. Thomas Campbell, and John Baynes, Eſq; of Lincoln's Inn. It will be ſeen, likewiſe, in the courſe of the work, either in this or the ſucceeding volumes, how much I continue to be obliged to moſt of the Gentlemen to whom I have formerly expreſſed my acknowledgments.

Two of the new lives are wholly written by two of my friends. The firſt comes from the Right Reverend the Biſhop of Dromore, who hath favoured me with the article of Cleiveland the Poet. This he was enabled to complete in a manner far ſuperior to what I could have done, as he is deſcended from the family, and fully informed of every circumſtance that relates to the author.

The account of Lord Clive I owe to the pen of my intimate and excellent friend, Henry Beaufoy, Eſq; repreſentative in the preſent parliament, for Great Yarmouth, in Norfolk. Knowing that, in the courſe of his hiſtorical, political, and commercial enquiries, in order to become an active and uſeful member of the legiſlature, he had paid a particular attention to the affairs of the Eaſt-Indies, and being myſelf very ignorant of the ſubject, I requeſted him to draw up an article, which required no ſmall acquaintance with the ſtate of things in that part of the world. With that obligingneſs of temper which marks Mr. Beaufoy's character, he inſtantly acceded to my requeſt; and he hath written Lord Clive's life with an authenticity of information, and a perſpicuity and elegance of expreſſion, which render it one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed ornaments of the preſent volume. For the materials of his Lordſhip's perſonal Hiſtory, particular thanks are due to the Reverend Mr. Archdeacon Clive and to Mr. Burman.

It is well known, that the plan of conducting the Biographia in the manner of Bayle's Hiſtorical Dictionary, whilſt it is attended with many advantages, is occaſionally ſubject to a few inconveniencies. One is, that the text is ſometimes too ſcanty, and the moſt important matters are thrown into the notes. This defect I have been ſolicitous to remedy, as far as the nature of the undertaking will permit. Accordingly, I have endeavoured to make the text as full as poſſible, that the articles may, in that reſpect, be read with the greater pleaſure. Regard being had to this circumſtance, the form of Bayle will be found, on the whole, beſt ſuited to a Work, in which accounts of books, extracts from authors, original letters, and critical diſcuſſions are frequently neceſſary.

I cannot conclude this Preface, without expreſſing my gratitude for the candid approbation with which the two preceding Volumes of the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA have been honoured, from many reſpectable perſons. To merit the continuance of an approbation ſo eſtimable, will be the object of my warmeſt ambition: And I ſhall be peculiarly happy to find, that the Third Volume doth not leſſen the favourable opinion which has been entertained of my honeſt endeavours to do impartial juſtice to Britiſh Worthies, of every rank and character, of every denomination and profeſſion.

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA

TO THE

First Volume of the Biographia Britannica.

ADDISON (Joseph), p. 63.

SINCE the publication of the ſecond volume of the Biographia, the world hath been favoured, among the reſt of the Engliſh Poets, with Dr. Johnſon's beautiful Life of Mr. Addiſon. In this life, as might be expected, we meet with only a few new facts: but, amongſt theſe, there is one, which, if true, doth by no means redound to Mr. Addiſon's reputation. "Steele, ſays Dr. Johnſon, whoſe imprudence of gene-"roſity, or vanity of profuſion, kept him always incurably neceſſitous, upon ſome "preſſing exigence, in an evil hour, borrowed an hundred pounds of his friend, pro-"bably without much purpoſe of repayment; but Addiſon, who ſeems to have had "other notions of a hundred pounds, grew impatient of delay, and reclaimed his loan "by an execution. Steele felt, with great ſenſibility, the obduracy of his creditor; "but with emotions of ſorrow rather than of anger (a)." It is much to be wiſhed, that Dr. Johnſon had produced his authority for this narration. It is very poſſible, that it may be only a ſtory the Doctor had ſomewhere heard in converſation, and which is entirely groundleſs: and this the preſent Editor is the rather inclined to believe, as he has been aſſured, by one of the moſt reſpectable characters in the kingdom, that the fact hath no foundation in truth. Mr. Potter, in a late publication, hath informed us, that he is told, by the beſt authority, that the ſtory is an abſolute falſehood (b). Another circumſtance, related by Dr. Johnſon, is more probable, and more ſuitable to Mr. Addiſon's character. When, at the acceſſion of the preſent reigning family, he was made Secretary to the Regency, he was required by his office to ſend notice to Hanover that the Queen was dead, and that the throne was vacant. "To do this would not "have been difficult to any man but Addiſon, who was ſo overwhelmed by the great-"neſs of the event, and ſo diſtracted by choice of expreſſion, that the Lords, who "could not wait for the niceties of criticiſm, called Mr. Southwell, a Clerk in the "Houſe, and ordered him to diſpatch the meſſage. Southwell readily told what was "neceſſary, in the common ſtyle of buſineſs, and valued himſelf upon having done "what was too hard for Addiſon (c)." We have obſerved with pleaſure, that Dr. Johnſon, in eſtimating Mr. Addiſon's character and merit, both as a Poet and a Proſe Writer, doth not materially differ from the ſentiments we had advanced, at large, concerning him, in our additions to his article.

(c) Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra, p. 357.

Our ingenious and worthy friend, Thomas Tyers, Eſq; in "An hiſtorical Eſſay on "Mr. Addiſon," printed, but not publiſhed, has mentioned ſome facts concerning him, with which we were not before acquainted. Theſe are, that he was laid out for dead, as ſoon as he was born: that, when he addreſſed his verſes on the Engliſh Poets to Henry Sacheverell, he courted that gentleman's ſiſter: that, whenever Jacob Tonſon came to him for the Spectator, Bayle's French Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary lay always open before him: that, upon his return to England, after his travels, he diſcharged ſome old debts he had contracted at Oxford, with the generoſity of good intereſt: that he was put into plentiful circumſtances, by the death of a brother in the Eaſt-Indies: that, having received encouragement from a married lady, of whom he had been formerly enamoured, he had the integrity to reſiſt the temptation: that he refuſed a gratification of a three hundred pounds Bank note, and afterwards of a diamond ring, of the ſame value, from a Major Dunbar, whom he had endeavoured to ſerve in Ireland, by his intereſt with Lord Sunderland: and that his daughter, by Lady Warwick, is ſtill alive, and unmarried; reſiding at Bilton, near Rugby, and poſſeſſing an income of more than twelve hundred a year (d).

(d) Hiſtorical Eſſay on Addiſon, p. 16. 18, 19. 21. 24. 27. 58. 63.

The following letter, lately publiſhed by Mr. Maty, and which probably relates to the caſe of Major Dunbar, reflects great honour on Mr. Addiſon's integrity:

"SIR, JUNE 26, 1715.

"I find there is a very ſtrong oppoſition formed againſt you; but I ſhall wait on my "Lord-Lieutenant this morning, and lay your caſe before him as advantageouſly as I "can, if he is not engaged in other company. I am afraid what you ſay of his Grace "does not portend you any good.

"And now, Sir, believe me, when I aſſure you I never did, nor ever will, on any "pretence whatſoever, take more than the ſtated and cuſtomary fees of my office. I "might keep the contrary practice concealed from the world, were I capable of it, but "I could not from myſelf: and I hope I ſhall always fear the reproaches of my own "heart more than thoſe of all mankind. In the mean time, if I can ſerve a gentleman "of merit, and ſuch a character as you bear in the world, the ſatisfaction I meet with "on ſuch an occaſion is always a ſufficient, and the only reward to,

"Sir, your moſt obedient, humble ſervant,

(e) Maty's new Review, for June, 1783, p. 520.

The anecdote which follows, was told to the Editor by Dr. William Watſon, ſenior, who had it from Dr. Birch. Addiſon and Mr. Temple Stanyan were very intimate. In the familiar converſations which paſſed between them, they were accuſtomed freely to diſpute each other's opinions. Upon ſome occaſion, Mr. Addiſon lent Stanyan five hundred pounds. After this, Mr. Stanyan behaved with a timid reſerve, deference, and reſpect; not converſing with the ſame freedom as formerly, or canvaſſing his friend's ſentiments. This gave great uneaſineſs to Mr. Addiſon. One day they happened to fall upon a ſubject, on which Mr. Stanyan had always been uſed ſtrenuouſly to oppoſe Addiſon's opinion. But, even upon this occaſion, he gave way to what his friend advanced, without interpoſing or defending his own view of the matter. This hurt Mr. Addiſon ſo much, that he ſaid to Mr. Stanyan, "Either contradict me, or pay me the "money."

In Mr. Macpherſon's "Original Papers," are two letters to Monſ. de Robethon, written officially to that gentleman by Mr. Addiſon, as Secretary to the Regency, at the acceſſion of King George the Firſt (f). There have, likewiſe, lately been publiſhed, in the Gentleman's Magazine, a few letters which he wrote to the young Earl of Warwick, and which are no otherwiſe of conſequence, than as they ſhew how well he could accommodate his ſtyle to the capacity of a child.

(f) Macpherſon's Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 652, 653, 654.

Mr. Addiſon's character as a Poet has been greatly depreciated by two modern writers, Mr. Robert Lloyd and Mr. Knox (g). Their cenſure, we think, is ſomewhat too indiſcriminate; and we have not hitherto ſeen ſufficient reaſon to retract the eſtimate we have formed of Addiſon's poetical merit.

(g) Lloyd's Poems, vol. ii. p. 14, 15. Knox's Eſſays, vol. ii. p. 143—145. Edition of 1782.

Mr. Hayley, in the notes to his admirable Eſſay on Epic Poetry, has expreſſed himſelf with a juſt indignation on the manner in which Biſhop Warburton has treated Mr. Addiſon. Speaking of that Prelate's want of refined ſenſibility, he ſays, "Perhaps it "may be found, that in proportion as authors have enjoyed the quality which I ſuppoſe "him to have wanted, they have been more or leſs diſtinguiſhed by the eaſe, the ele"gance, and the beauty of their language. Were I required to fortify this conjecture "by examples, I ſhould produce the names of Virgil and Racine, of Fenelon and Ad"diſon—that Addiſon, who, though inſulted by the Commentator on Pope, with the "names of an indifferent Poet and a worſe Critic, was, I think, as much ſuperior to "his inſulter in critical taſte, and in ſolidity of judgment, as he confeſſedly was in the "harmony of his ſtyle, and in all the finer graces of beautiful compoſition (h)."

(h) Hayley's Eſſay on Epic Poetry, p. 133, 134.

Mr. Addiſon naturally fell in Dr. Blair's way, in his excellent "Lectures on Rhetoric "and Belle Lettres." Accordingly, the Doctor hath, in ſeveral places, made remarks upon his compoſitions, with great propriety and judgment. Beſides this, he hath employed four lectures in a critical examination of Mr. Addiſon's ſtyle, in which he hath taken four numbers of the Spectator, being ſo many of the eſſays on the pleaſures of imagination, and hath diſcuſſed them ſentence by ſentence. The analyſis is particularly curious and inſtructive, and various inſtances are pointed out, in which the language is incorrect or defective, and might apparently be improved. But although it is poſſible to ſhew wherein Mr. Addiſon is capable of being amended, it does not hence follow that it would be eaſy to write with the ſame eaſe, elegance, and beauty. Indeed, no one can be more ſenſible of his excellencies than Dr. Blair, who hath beſtowed upon him repeated teſtimonies of applauſe (i). When Addiſon hath been examined with the greateſt nicety, we ſhall ſtill agree with Dr. Warton, that the ſweetneſs and purity of his ſtyle contribute to make him the firſt of our Proſe-writers; and that the Pleaſures of Imagination, the Eſſay on the Georgics, and his laſt papers in the Spectator and Guardian, are models of language (k).

(i) Blair's Lectures, vol. ii. p. 408—474.

We cannot omit the beautiful character which hath been given of Addiſon by Dr. Beattie. "He who underſtood," ſays this ingenious author, "better than any other "writer, (k) Warton on the Writings and Genius of Pope, vol. ii. p. 265.

" writer, the nature and province of true humour, is Addiſon. Let thoſe, therefore, " who wiſh to be fully inſtructed in this matter, ſtudy him; and learn the theory from " his practice. In his mirth, there is nothing profane or impertinent. He is perfectly " ſerious, where he ought to be ſo: and his ſmiles, like thoſe of innocence, though ir- " reſiſtibly captivating, are ever inoffenſive. He is not, ſome think, a profound Phi- " loſopher; for he is always clear and harmonious, rational, manly, and intereſting. " But if writing be good, in proportion as it is uſeful; and if its nobleſt uſe be, to im- " prove the heart, refine the taſte, and ſweeten the temper, Addiſon is of all uninſpired " authors, at leaſt in proſe, the beſt, and the moſt delightful (l)."

ÆLFRED, or ALFRED, p. 84.

Mr. Pennant, in his " Tour in Wales," has greatly celebrated Ethefleda, the daughter of Alfred. She was married to Ethelred, Earl of Mercia; but, on the birth of her firſt child, ſhe ſeparated herſelf from her huſband, and, for the reſt of her days, like an Amazon of old, determined on a life of chaſtity, and devoted herſelf to deeds of arms. She kept on the beſt terms with her huſband, and they united together in all acts of munificence and piety. They reſtored cities, founded abbies, and removed to more ſuitable places the bones of long-departed Saints. After the death of her huſband, in 912, ſhe aſſumed the government of the Mercian Earldom, took upon her the command of the army, and became ſo celebrated for her valour, that the effeminate titles of Lady and Queen being thought unworthy of her, ſhe received in addition thoſe of LORD and KING. This heroine appears to have been worthy of ſo great an eulogium; for her abilities and activity were perpetually exerted in the ſervice of her country. Death put an end to her glorious courſe, at Tamworth, in 922, whence her body was tranſlated to Glouceſter. Her loſs was regretted by the whole kingdom, and by none ſo ſenſibly as by her brother Edward; for ſhe was as uſeful to that wiſe Prince in the cabinet as in the field (a).

(a) Tour in Wales, p. 122—124.

AGARD (ARTHUR), p. 93.

In the " Collection of curious Diſcourſes, written by eminent Antiquaries," publiſhed in two volumes octavo, 1771, are no leſs than twenty eſſays, by Mr. Agard. Some of them were never printed before; and they all of them evince, that he had a juſt title to the character of an able and diligent Antiquary.

AINSWORTH (ROBERT), p. 103.

A few farther particulars, concerning Robert Ainſworth, may be ſeen in Nichols's Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer. Beſides his Theſaurus, the ninth edition of which hath lately been reprinted, he wrote a tract on the moſt natural and eaſy way of inſtitution; a deſcription, in Latin, of Mr. John Kemp's collection; and two diſſertations, in the ſame language, on ſubjects of antiquity. The full titles of theſe pieces are given in the valuable work juſt mentioned (a).

(a) Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 108—112.

AKENSIDE (MARK), p. 107.

The Rev. John Brand, M. A. lately elected one of the Secretaries to the Society of Antiquaries, informs us, in his " Obſervations on popular Antiquities," that a halt, which Dr. Akenſide had in his gait, was occaſioned by the falling of a cleaver from his father's ſtall upon him, when he was a boy. " This," ſays Mr. Brand, " muſt have been " a perpetual remembrance of his humble origin (a)."

(a) Obſervations on popular Antiquities, p. 113, 114. note.

In 1761, Mr. Thomas Hollis purchaſed a bed which once belonged to Milton, and on which he died. This bed Mr. Hollis ſent as a preſent to Dr. Akenſide, with the following card. " An Engliſh gentleman is deſirous of having the honour to preſent a " bed, which once belonged to John Milton, and on which he died; and if the Doctor's " genius, believing himſelf obliged, and having ſlept in that bed, ſhould prompt him " to write an Ode to the memory of John Milton, and the aſſertor of Britiſh liberty, " that gentleman would think himſelf abundantly recompenſed." The Doctor, we are told, ſeemed wonderfully delighted with this bed, and had it put up in his houſe; but we do not find that he took any other notice of Mr. Hollis's benefaction and requeſt (b).

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA

Dr. Johnſon heard Mr. Dodſley relate, that when the copy of "The Pleaſures of "Imagination" was offered him, the price demanded for it, which was an hundred and twenty pounds, being ſuch as he was not inclined to give precipitately, he carried the work to Pope, who, having looked into it, adviſed him not to make a niggardly offer; for "this was no every day writer (c)."

(c) Lives of the Engliſh Poets, vol. iv. p. 436, 437. Octavo edition.

Concerning Dr. Akenſide's diſcourſe on the Dyſentery, our great Poetical Biographer obſerves, that it was conſidered as a very conſpicuous ſpecimen of Latinity; which entitled him to the ſame height of place among the Scholars, as he poſſeſſed before among the Wits (d).

On Akenſide's Odes, Dr. Johnſon, who in general is not favourable to our Lyric Poets, hath, we think, been ſomewhat too ſevere. In matters of taſte, there will always be a diverſity of opinion; and we ſee no reaſon to retract what we have advanced in our article. We have not aſſigned a high rank of merit to Dr. Akenſide, as a writer of Odes; and, indeed, if he had imbibed the notion aſcribed to him by Mr. Maſon (e), that "Poetry was only true eloquence in metre," ſo falſe an idea could not fail to have a bad effect on his later compoſitions. Dr. Warton, with whom the Editor is always proud to agree, calls our author a didactic Poet, who has happily indulged himſelf in bolder flights of enthuſiaſm, ſupported by a more figurative ſtyle, than was uſed by Pope; and, after producing a paſſage from "The Pleaſures of Imagination," adds, "we have here a ſtriking "example of that poetic ſpirit, that harmonious and varied verſification, and that ſtrength "of imagery, which conſpire to excite our admiration of this beautiful poem (f)."

(f) On the Writings and Genius of Pope, vol. ii. p. 148, 149.

Dr. Akenſide is believed to have written, in Dodſley's Muſeum, the "Table of "modern Fame;" at which, ſays Dr. Warton, the gueſts are introduced and ranged with that taſte and judgment which are peculiar to the author (g).

(g) Ibid. p. 53.

In the Appendix to the Memoirs of Mr. Hollis, are two letters, extracted from the Public Advertiſer, relative to Dr. Akenſide's Ode to Thomas Edwards, Eſq; and to his ſuppoſed reflections upon the Clergy, in a paſſage in the "Pleaſures of Imagination (h)." Among Dr. Birch's papers in the Britiſh Muſeum, are ſeveral letters written to him by Dr. Akenſide.

ALLESTRY (JACOB), p. 150.

Several of Mr. Jacob Alleſtry's poetical performances, together with a ſhort account of his life, are inſerted in the third volume of Mr. Nichols's ſelect Collection of Poems.

ANDREWS (LANCELOT), p. 188.

It appears, from Mr. Ayſcough's Catalogue, that there are ſome Manuſcripts of Biſhop Andrews in the Britiſh Muſeum; and, among the reſt, "A Diſcourſe againſt ſecond Marriage, after Sentence of Divorce with a former Match, the Parties then living;" written in 1601 (a).

ANSELM, p. 215.

In the Hiſtory of the Abbey of Bec, not long ſince publiſhed, ſome farther mention is made of this great prelate.

ANTHONY (FRANCIS) p. 225.

Though Dr. Anthony is called by our predeceſſor a very learned phyſician and chemiſt, he was, in fact, an empiric; but an empiric of a higher rank and greater abilities than are common to that claſs of men. His works are at preſent, we appprehend, in no kind of eſtimation. Extraordinary effects have been aſcribed to his preparations; and he found means to engage the patronage of ſeveral perſons of rank, and the good opinion of the people at large. "It is certain, ſays Mr. Aikin, that later empirics, with more "abſurd pretenſions, and much leſs merit to ſupport them, have been alike victorious "over good ſenſe and modeſty; ſo that we need not be ſurprized at the triumph Dr. "Anthony obtained, in ſeeing his reputation, practice, and emoluments arrive at a "great height (a)."

ARBUTHNOT (JOHN), p. 243.

In the poſſeſſion of the Miſs Arbuthnots, are a large number of letters, written to Dr. Arbuthnot by the Duke of Shrewſbury, the Lords Oxford, Peterborough, Mar, and Bolingbroke; by Pope, Swift, Parnell, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Boerhaave and others; and by the Earl of Chesterfield, when he first sustained a public character at the Hague. Some of these letters will probably hereafter see the light. It is manifest, from the whole correspondence, that Dr. Arbuthnot was in great favour with Queen Anne; that he employed himself in doing good offices for his friends with her Majesty, and indeed with all the world; that he was much depended upon in his profession; that he was upon the highest footing with the first writers of that elegant age, both for his wit and his learning; and that, if possible, he was still more esteemed by them all for his exemplary and amiable virtues. Extracts from some of these letters, with which the Editor was favoured by the late Dr. William Hunter, in whom the Biographia Britannica has lost an ardent friend, will occur in future articles.

Dr. Johnson and Dr. Warton have given very honourable testimonies to Arbuthnot's merit. "It is to be regretted, says Dr. Johnson, that either honour or pleasure should "have been missed by Arbuthnot; a man estimable for his learning, amiable for his "life, and venerable for his piety." The Doctor adds, that he "was a man of great "comprehension, skilful in his profession, versed in the sciences, acquainted with ancient "literature, and able to animate his mass of knowledge by a bright and active imagi-"nation; a scholar with great brilliancy of wit; a wit, who, in the crowd of life, retain-"ed and discovered a noble ardour of religious zeal (a)." Dr. Warton is large in our Author's praise; and, among other things, besides observing that he was a man of consummate probity, integrity, and sweetness of temper, says, that he had infinitely more learning than Pope or Swift, and as much wit and humour as either of them (b).

Dr. Arbuthnot is supposed to have written an anonymous work of merit, entitled "A Sermon preached to the People at the Mercat-cross of Edinburgh, on the subject "of the Union, 1706." The late ingenious William Duncombe, Esq; who did not know that the Doctor was the Author of it, re-published it, with a preface (c).

Of Arbuthnot Dr. Beattie says, that he undoubtedly possessed more wit and learning, as well as virtue, than any other writer of his time, Addison excepted (d).

ASCHAM (ROGER), p. 289.

Dr. Jortin takes notice, that Erasmus, who could not endure even the smell of fish, and had a most Lutheran stomach, was resembled in this respect by Roger Ascham. Accordingly, when he resided at Cambridge, he applied, in a long letter, to Archbishop Cranmer, for leave to be dispensed with as to abstinence from flesh meats, in Lent and on fast days; and that prelate granted him a dispensation (a).

ASCOUGH (WILLIAM), p. 289.

The name of this prelate is spelled Aiscough in the register book of the bishoprick of Salisbury. He was not slain at Edington in Lincolnshire, as is asserted in the article; but at his own house, at Edington in Wiltshire. Edington is a village at the end of Salisbury Plain, in the old road from that city, by way of Steeple Ashton, to Bath (a).

ASGILL (JOHN), p. 295.

Besides the publications of Mr. Asgill, mentioned in his article, he is said to have written, in 1717, a tract entitled, "A Question upon Divorce." He opposed marrying again; but whether he was against all second marriages, or only against marriages after divorce, we are not acquainted. After quoting many passages from the Gospels, he concludes, "That the laws ecclesiastic, or the canon laws, not allowing adultery to be a lawful cause for dissolving the bond of matrimony, and setting the conjugal pair at large to marry any other, are consonant to the law divine, as expounded by Christ himself (a).

ATTERBURY (FRANCIS), p. 348.

Mr. Nichols has lately published, in three volumes, octavo, "The Epistolary Correspondence, Visitation Charges, Speeches, and Miscellanies of the Right Reverend Francis Atterbury, D. D. Lord Bishop of Rochester;" with historical notes. The greater part of these volumes is entirely new, and what is not new is either reprinted with greater accuracy, or with the advantage of farther illustration. The letters have different degrees of value, and consequently were not equally deserving of the public eye. Those which relate to the illness and death of Mrs. Morice, and the diary of her journey and voyage from Westminster to Bourdeaux and Toulouse are peculiarly inte-reſting and affecting. Were we to point out all the circumſtances that might be ſelected from this publication, or to recite the teſtimonies to Dr. Atterbury's merit, chiefly as a writer, accumulated by Mr. Nichols, we ſhould be carried beyond the compaſs which muſt neceſſarily be aſſigned to this department of our undertaking. Upon the whole, the Biſhop's character, as a private man, appears to have derived conſiderable benefit from the volumes in queſtion. His Letters to Sir Jonathan Trelawny diſplay his gratitude and reſpect to that prelate, even when he himſelf had attained his higheſt ſtation in the Church. His paternal affection and conduct to his daughter were beautifully amiable; and his correſpondence with Dr. Wall and Biſhop Potter fully proves his belief in, and his zeal for the honour of the Chriſtian Revelation. Indeed, there ſeems to have been juſt cauſe for one of the lines of Pope, which Mr. Nichols has adopted as his motto:

How pleaſing Atterbury's ſofter hour!

As to his public character, it ſtands as it did before, and can never admit of a juſt vindication. "The turbulent and imperious temper of this haughty prelate, ſays Dr. "Warton, was long felt and remembered in the college over which he preſided. It "was with difficulty Queen Anne was perſuaded to make him a Biſhop; which ſhe did "at laſt, on the repeated importunities of Lord Harcourt——. After her deceaſe, "Atterbury vehemently urged his friends to proclaim the Pretender; and on their re-"fuſal, upbraided them for their timidity, with many oaths; for he was accuſtomed to "ſwear, on any ſtrong provocation (a)."

(a) Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, vol. ii. p. 432, 433.

Dr. Blair, who has examined a diſcourſe of Biſhop Atterbury's in the ſame critical manner in which he has done ſome numbers of the Spectator, ſays of him, that he is deſervedly accounted one of our moſt eloquent writers of ſermons. "At the ſame "time adds the Doctor, he is more diſtinguiſhed for elegance and purity of expreſſion, "than for profoundneſs of thought; his ſtyle, though ſometimes careleſs, is, upon the "whole, neat and chaſte; and more beautiful than that of moſt writers of Sermons. "In his ſentiments he is not only rational, but pious and devotional, which is a great "excellency (b)." Dr. Warton thinks that Atterbury was, on the whole, rather a man of ability than a genius; and that he writes more with elegance and correctneſs, than with any force of thinking or reaſoning (c).

We had nearly forgotten to mention, that the Latin verſes in note [A], which are given as a ſpecimen of Atterbury's tranſlation of Dryden's Abſalom and Architophel, were, by a miſtake of our predeceſſor, into which he was led by following Stackhouſe, taken from Coward's verſion of that poem. It appears, likewiſe, that the verſion of Cato's ſoliloquy, ſuppoſed to have been Atterbury's, was by Dr. Bland (d).

BAKER (THOMAS), p. 525.

In the memoirs of the life and writings of Mr. Baker, very recently publiſhed by Mr. Maſters, from the papers of Dr. Zachary Grey, there are ſeveral particulars concerning him, with which we were not acquainted when this article was compoſed. The Sir George Baker, whom we mentioned as having exerted himſelf in the defence of Newcaſtle againſt the Scots, was not the uncle of our learned antiquary, as we had been informed, but his grandfather. His father was George Baker, Eſq; of Crook, in the pariſh of Lancheſter; and his mother was Margaret, a daughter of Thomas Forſter, of Edderſton in the county of Northumberland. He had his grammatical education at the Free School of Durham, under the care of Mr. Batterſby; was admitted of St. John's College, on the 13th of June, 1674; and matriculated on the 9th of July following. He took his firſt degree in 1677, and proceeded Maſter of Arts in 1681. From Biſhop Compton he received Deacon's Orders, on the 20th of December, 1685, and was ſoon after ordained prieſt, at Bugden, by Dr. Thomas Barlow, Biſhop of Lincoln. In 1689, being then Bachelor of Divinity, he was appointed one of the Univerſity preachers. When Dr. Thomas Watſon was promoted to the Biſhopric of St. David's, Mr. Baker was invited by him to be his Chaplain; but he declined the offer, probably from an expectation of his being taken into the family of Lord Crew, Biſhop of Durham, in the ſame capacity. This event accordingly happened, and in June, 1687, he was collated by his patron to the Rectory of Long Newton. It was ſuppoſed, by many in his Lordſhip's family, that the Biſhop intended to confer upon Mr. Baker the Rectory of Sedgefield, with the Prebend called the Golden Prebend, the beſt in the Church of Durham. Theſe preferments, however, if they were intended for him, he loſt by his integrity. By refuſing to read King James's declaration for liberty of conſcience, he diſpleaſed Lord Crew ſo much, that he was obliged to quit his connection with that prelate. Not long after, in conſequence of his not being able to take the oaths enjoined at the Revolution, he was laid under the neceſſity of reſigning his living of Long Newton, which he did with great chearfulneſs, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1690. From this time his life was ſpent at St. John's College, Cambridge, after, as well as before, his ejection from his Fellowſhip, in 1716 (a).

(a) Maſters's Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Rev. Thomas Baker, B. D. p. 1—9.

Notwithſtanding the difference of political ſentiments, Biſhop Kennet had ſuch a regard for Mr. Baker, that he reſerved ſome of his beſt preferments for him, and would not give give them even to his own ſon, till the other had modeſtly declined them (b). Archbiſhop Wake, having received ſome aſſiſtance from our learned Nonjuror, in writing his State of the Church, after the work was completed, wrote to him a letter of thanks; and as a teſtimony of his ſenſe of the ſervice he had done him, offered to accept of his recommendation of a friend to a benefice worth two hundred pounds a year, then vacant. Mr. Baker waved the offer; and politely requeſted that his Grace's favour might be to himſelf, by a preſent of a copy of the aforeſaid work, with his Grace's corrections and additions in his own hand-writing. With this requeſt the Archbiſhop complied (c).

(c) Ibid. p. 55, 56.

Mr. Baker was remarkably communicative to gentlemen who were engaged in literary undertakings. Many proofs are produced by Mr. Maſters, of the aſſiſtance which he gave to the learned men of his time, and of their grateful acknowledgments on that account. A variety of letters, likewiſe, written by Mr. Baker to his friends, and by his friends to him, are inſerted in Mr. Maſters's Memoirs. They were proper to make a part of the publication, though but few of them are in themſelves very intereſting. Of Mr. Baker's death, who was carried off by a paralytic ſtroke, Mr. Maſters hath given a very minute and particular account, in a number of extracts of letters, written upon that occaſion. The character of our Antiquary is drawn at large, and juſtly placed in a very advantageous light.

It muſt ever be reflected upon with regret, that Mr. Baker ſhould have ſpent a long life in collecting materials, when he ought to have been employed in erecting and finiſhing his grand Temple of Fame, to the honour of the Univerſity of Cambridge. The tranſcribing of papers, which, with ſo much loſs of time, he took upon himſelf, might have been aſſigned to any common amanuenſis. As his Hiſtory of St. John's College was completed by him, the publication of it could not fail of being acceptable to the literary world.

Mr. Maſters is wholly miſtaken in ſuppoſing that the materials of our article were drawn from the ſource he hath mentioned. They were ſolely taken from the authorities to which we have regularly referred. If, therefore, any one has committed a treſpaſs on Mr. Maſters's literary property, we have not, in the leaſt degree, been partakers of the ſpoil. At the ſame time, we think very lightly of the criminality of the gentleman with whom Mr. Maſters is ſo angry in his preface. The chief fault ſeems to have been the not acknowledging from whom the communications were, in a great meaſure, originally derived. As to mere dates and facts, they ought to be deemed matters of common right, and of which every author ſhould be at liberty to make uſe. It is the compoſition, it is the arrangement, it is the writing upon a large or narrow ſcale, it is the liberality and ſtrength of ſentiment and reflection—theſe are the things which diſcriminate one Biographer from another. Mr. Nichols and myſelf have readily tranſmitted our articles to each other, previouſly to their publication; and a friendly communication of materials hath taken place between the preſent Editor and the ingenious and judicious continuator of the Britiſh Biography.

In another reſpect Mr. Maſters has done us injuſtice, and that is, in charging us with being diſpoſed to lower Mr. Baker in the opinion of the world (d). We had no ſuch intention, but entertain a due value for his writings. The character we gave of his "Reflections on Learning," at the end of note [A], in the article, was the reſult of mature deliberation and judgment. This character was drawn up the Editor, and there are few books in the Engliſh language with which he is better acquainted. That he might be well founded in his opinion, he read the work over again with attention, before the note was written.

It would have been a recommendation of Mr. Maſters's life of Mr. Baker, if, after being poſſeſſed of the materials of it for a number of years, he had delivered them to the world with greater advantage in point of arrangement, and in a ſuperior ſtyle of compoſition. However, we are thankful for the information he hath given us, and do not wiſh to treat him with diſreſpect. We ſhall find occaſion to avail ourſelves of his labours, and eſpecially of his Hiſtory of Corpus Chriſti, or Bene't College, which will rank him among the learned and uſeful Biographers of this country.

Mr. Maſters hath never met with the leaſt hint of Mr. Prior's having given the profits of his Fellowſhip to Mr. Baker, and, therefore, cannot imagine that Dr. Goddard could be well informed in that matter (e).

The catalogue of Mr. Baker's manuſcript collections, inſerted at the end of Mr. Maſters's Memoirs, is more complete than that which hath appeared in the Biographia.

BAKER (HENRY), p. 528.

In the addenda to this article, prefixed to our ſecond volume, ſpeaking of Mr. David Erſkine Baker, we have ſaid that his ſecond wife was the daughter of Mr. Clendon, a Reverend Empiric. The fact was, that ſhe was his only wife (a).

BALE (JOHN), p. 534.

Mr. Thomas Warton, in the third volume of his hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, hath taken notice of Bale's Scriptural Interludes, and hath given a particular account of one of them, entitled "The Comedy of the three Laws." It is commonly ſuppoſed to be a myſtery, and merely doctrinal; but it is a ſatirical play againſt Popery, and perhaps the firſt of the kind in our language. With regard to Bale's Interludes in general, Mr. Warton obſerves, "What ſhall we think of the ſtate, I will not ſay of the ſtage, but of "common ſenſe, when theſe deplorable Dramas could be endured? Of an age, when the "Bible was profaned and ridiculed from a principle of piety? But the faſhion of acting "myſteries appears to have expired with this writer (a)."

BALEY (WALTER), p. 548.

With reſpect to Baley's Treatiſe of the Preſervation of the Eye-ſight, Mr. Aikin remarks, that "it is a compilation chiefly from the ancients; and with a few good "rules, contains many fanciful and idle notions concerning the iuvantia and lædentia of "the eyes, with extraordinary recommendations of the herb eye-bright (a)."

BANCROFT (RICHARD), p. 582.

In the firſt volume of the Nugæ Antiquæ, p. 11—16. is a character of this prelate, by Sir John Harrington.

BANISTER (JOHN), p. 583.

Mr. Aikin hath given the characters of the different works of Dr. Baniſter, from which it appears that he was a phyſician of diſtinguiſhed learning and judgment, regard being had to the time in which he lived. He was for ſome time in the ſervice of the Earl of Warwick (a).

BARCLAY (JOHN), 589.

It is not true, as is aſſerted in note [B], of this article, that the firſt Engliſh Tranſlation of Barclay's Argenis was publiſhed in 1628, by Sir Robert Le Grys. The firſt tranſlation of this work that appeared in our own country, was in 1625, quarto, by Kingſmill Long, Gent. The verſes are the ſame as in the ſubſequent tranſlation by Le Grys, and conſequently are May's (a).

Mr. Mortimer, in his Student's Pocket Dictionary, referring to Niceron for his authority, ſays, that John Barclay was born at Paris.

BARRINGTON (JOHN SHUTE), Lord Viſcount, p. 628.

Mr. Shute, when a Student at Utrecht, beſides his "Oratio de Studio Philoſophiæ conjungendo cum Studio Juris civilis," publiſhed three other academical exerciſes. Theſe were, 1. "Exercitatio Phyſica, de Ventis." Utrecht, 1696, quarto. 2. Diſſertatio Philoſophica, de Theocratiâ morali." Utrecht, 1697. 3. "Diſſertatio Philoſophica Inauguralis, de Theocratiâ civili." Utrecht, 1697. The ſecond of theſe tracts has been cited, with great commendation, by two eminent writers on the civil law, Cocceius and Heineccius (a).

In 1722, was printed, but not publiſhed till the year 1732, "The Lord Viſcount Barrington's Caſe in Relation to the Harburgh Company, and the Harburgh Lottery." quarto. There is an advertiſement prefixed, dated May 12, 1732, containing a ſhort apology for the work's not having appeared before. To this tract is added, and ſaid, in the title page, to be printed in 1723, "A Speech upon the Queſtion, that the Project called the Harburgh Lottery is an infamous and fraudulent Undertaking, whereby ſeveral unwary Perſons have been drawn in to their great Loſs: and that the Manner of carrying it on has been a manifeſt Violation of the Laws of this Kingdom." Theſe two pieces are curious, concur with the account in the note [E], and offer many important conſiderations in Lord Barrington's Vindication (b).

BARROW (ISAAC), p. 638.

Some manuſcript letters of Dr. Barrow's are preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum (a). This is the caſe, more or leſs, with regard to ſeveral other perſons, where we have not thought the matter of conſequence enough to be particularly noticed.

BARRY (LODOWICK), p. 648.

Our predeceſſor has been guilty of a great miſtake in aſſerting, that, in Barry's "Ram Alley," the Plot of Will. Smallſhanks decoying the Widow Taffeta into Marriage, is taken from the Engliſh Rogue. The play of the "Ram Alley, or merry Tricks," was publiſhed above fifty years before the "Engliſh Rogue" appeared. Killegrew's "Parſon's Wedding," againſt which the ſame charge is brought, preceded the "Engliſh Rogue" ten or twelve years. The "Ram Alley" has been republiſhed in the fifth volume of the late edition of "A ſelect Collection of old Plays (a).

BASKERVILLE (JOHN), p. 672.

Once, when Mr. Baſkerville was in France, he was offered by the French King apartments in the Louvre for himſelf and all his apparatus, and every kind of encouragement, if he would bring over and exerciſe his printing at Paris. This he refuſed, becauſe he would not deprive his own country of the credit of the art (a). It is well known that Mr. Baſkerville's types have, ſince his death, been ſold to France; and that the ſplendid edition of Voltaire's works, now carrying on in that country, is to be printed from them.

For a more particular account of Dr. Gliſſon than is given in our note, and for an eſtimate of his medical writings, the merit of which appears to have been eminent, we refer our Readers to Mr. Aikin's "Biographical Memoirs of Medicine in Great-Britain, p. 326—338.

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA

TO THE SECOND

Volume of the Biographia Britannica.

BATHURST (ALLEN), Earl Bathurſt, p. 10.

MR. Daines Barrington, in his account of little Crotch, having obſerved that the connexions of muſical ſounds not only ſeem to make an earlier, but a more laſting impreſſion on us than what we hear by the medium of words, mentions Lord Bathurſt as a proof of this, and the fact was related to him by the Earl himſelf. "As his Lordſhip "had much frequented the Opera in the time of Queen Anne, Frederic, Prince of "Wales, wanted him to ſing a favourite air of Nicolini; which he could not at that inſtant recollect, as it had been performed not leſs than forty years before. Some time "afterwards his Lordſhip dreamed that Nicolini ſung part of the air to him, and when "he awoke he remembered the whole ſong, repeating it from hour to hour till he had "waited on his Royal Highneſs, before it had eſcaped his memory." Lord Bathurſt, when eighty-ſeven, ſung throughout, to Mr. Barrington, another air of Nicolini's, and imitated that performer's peculiar exertions, though his Lordſhip could not probably have heard the ſong for more than threeſcore years. This, as Mr. Barrington juſtly remarks, affords a ſtrong inſtance of the muſical memory being very perfect, even in that late ſtage of life (a).

(a) Barrington's Miſcellanies, p. 322, 323.

BAXTER (ANDREW), p. 27.

A Treatiſe of Mr. Andrew Baxter's, on the natural Immortality of the Soul, hath lately been publiſhed by our ingenious and learned friend, the Rev. Dr. Duncan, Rector of South-Warmborough, Hants. We need not ſay, that Mr. Baxter's ſentiments upon the ſubject are very different from thoſe which have lately been advanced by Dr. Prieſtley.

BAYLY (LEWIS), p. 27.

BEATON (DAVID), p. 56.

Among the remains of the Caſtle of St. Andrew's, "the window is ſhewn," ſays Mr. Pennant, "out of which it is pretended that Cardinal Beaton leaned to glut his eyes with "the cruel martyrdom of George Wiſhart, who was burnt on a ſpot beneath. This is "one of thoſe relations, whoſe verity we ſhould doubt, and heartily wiſh there was no "truth in it; and, on enquiry, we may conſole ourſelves that this is founded on puritanical bigotry, and invented out of hatred to a perſecutor ſufficiently deteſtable on "other accounts (a)."

(a) Pennant's Tour in Scotland, Part 2d, p. 193.

Notwithſtanding Mr. Pennant's remark, we ſtill continue of opinion, that the fact is not inconſiſtent either with the Cardinal's character or the general ſpirit of the times.

Though Beaton merited his death, it is candidly admitted, in the following lines, by his enemy, the Hiſtorian and Poet, Sir David Lindſay, that the manner of it was indefenſible:

"As for this Cardinal, I grant,
"He was a man we might well want:
"God will forgive it ſoon.
"But of a truth the ſooth to ſay,
"Altho' the loon be well away,
"The fact was foully done (b)."

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA, &c.

BEAUMONT (LEWIS), p. 86.

In Noble's "Account of the Durham Coins," ſome notice is taken of Biſhop Beaumont. Not having the book at hand, we can only here refer to it in general.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER, p. 100.

It appears, from Cockayne's Poems, that Maſſinger was employed in completing the unfiniſhed Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher (a).

Mr. Davies, in his dramatic miſcellanies, has drawn the character of theſe Poets; and, whilſt he does juſtice to their excellencies, ſhews wherein they differ from, and are excelled by Shakſpeare. Out of the fifty-four dramatic pieces written by Beaumont and Fletcher, two only, "The Chances," and the "Rule a Wife and have a Wife" have kept permanent poſſeſſion of the ſtage (b).

BEK (ANTHONY), p. 149.

In Noble's "Account of the Biſhops of Durham and their Coins," particular notice is taken of this prelate.

BENBOW (JOHN), p. 167.

In the thirty-ninth volume of the Gentleman's Magazine, there is a narration of various circumſtances, relative to the life of William Benbow, the younger ſon of the Admiral. Had not this account unfortunately eſcaped our attention, we ſhould have been able to correct Dr. Campbell's miſtake concerning the importance of Mr. John Benbow's "Complete Deſcription of the South Part of the Iſland of Madagaſcar." Inſtead of being the large and very comprehenſive book which the Doctor ſuppoſed, it was no other than a journal, of the ſame nature with thoſe that are kept by every ſea officer. The moſt curious and intereſting part of it, was the hiſtory of his conduct with reſpect to the black King, his Queen and ſon, as is related in note [A], of John Bembow's article. This journal was accidentally burnt, in 1714, in a fire which happened at the lodgings of Mr. William Benbow, near Aldgate. The loſs of it is believed to be well ſupplied by Drury's Deſcription of Madagaſcar. With regard to Mr. William Benbow, we muſt refer to the Magazine above-mentioned, for the particulars concerning him. He was for ſome time a Clerk in the Navy-Office; was a man of a ſingular turn of mind; and had a talent at writing Epitaphs, in Latin and Engliſh, both of a grave and a facetious nature. Theſe, which were very numerous, are underſtood to have been very different in point of execution and value (a).

BENEDICT, Abbot of Peterborough, p. 171.

This Abbot wrote a Hiſtory of Henry the Second and Richard the Firſt, which was publiſhed by Thomas Hearne, in 1735, in two volumes, octavo. The hiſtory begins at the year 1170, and ends at 1192 (a).

BENSON (GEORGE), p. 208.

In note [N], a ſcheme is mentioned, which Dr. Benſon had formed; of printing a cheap edition of Biſhop Hoadly's "Plain Account of the Nature and End of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper," in order to render it more generally uſeful. The deſign was actually carried into execution, under the Doctor's immediate direction. As the book was principally intended for the benefit of the Diſſenters, thoſe parts of it were left out in which the good Biſhop endeavours to reconcile his ſentiments with the Liturgy of the Church of England. In 1772, was publiſhed an Abridgment of the "Plain Account," entitled "The rational Chriſtian's Aſſiſtant to the worthy receiving of the Lord's Supper," price four-pence; and a ſecond edition followed, in 1774. The Editor was our much valued friend, the Rev. Dr. Diſney.

BENTLEY (RICHARD), p. 247.

By the favour of two ingenious and learned correſpondents, the Rev. Mr. Duncombe, and John Baynes, Eſq; we are enabled to correct and improve our additions to this article. When Dr. Bentley, who was originally of St. John's College, was appointed Maſter of Trinity, the adjoining College, he applied to himſelf a paſſage in the Pſalms, "By the Help of my God I have leaped over the wall (a)."

(a) From Mr. Duncombe.

The Doctor was ſuſpended for contempt, by the Vice-chancellor, on the 3d of October, 1718. The Vice-chancellor held three courts after the ſuſpenſion, to give him an opportunity of appearing. Theſe were on the 7th, 9th, and 15th of the ſame month. On the 17th the grace of degradation paſſed. The mandamus for reſtoring Dr. Bentley was granted on the 7th of February, 1723-4, and not in 1728, as is mentioned in his article. The following is a copy of the grace for the reſtitution of him to his degrees.

"Placeat vobis, ut, juxta Tenorem Mandati modo lecti, R. B. reſtituatur ad omnes "& ſingulos Gradus Academicos, à quibus dejectus fuit & excluſus, una cum omnibus "Franchiſis, Privilegiis & Commoditatibus eaſdem ſpectantibus & concernentibus." Lect. & conceſſ. 26 Mart. 1724.

From the above it appears that the Anecdote of the Vice-chancellor's reprimanding the Cryer, mentioned in p. 247, muſt be wrong in point of date (b).

(b) From Mr. Baynes.

It is related that Dr. Green, Biſhop of Ely, being preſent in the Court of King's Bench when the extent of his viſitatorial power over the Maſter of Trinity College was argued before Sir Robert Raymond, and the Counſel on the part of the Viſitor having contended for his power in ſome extraordinary caſes, Sir Robert turned to the Biſhop, and ſaid: "Would your Lordſhip wiſh to have ſo great an extent of your viſitatorial "power confirmed? I confeſs, my Lord, I ſhould be unwilling to truſt myſelf with ſo "unlimited a power in my hands, in the like caſe (c)."

(c) From another reſpectable correſpondent.

In juſtice to Mr. John Walker, we muſt obſerve, that he was not the Walker ſatirized in the lines quoted from Mr. Pope. It was Dr. Richard Walker, who was Vice-maſter of Trinity College, and who was called Dr. Bentley's Zany. He was well known by the name of Frog Walker, and was not diſtinguiſhed for his learning. By his laſt will, he was the founder of the Phyſic Garden at Cambridge. The reaſon why Dr. Bentley always took care to be on good terms with the Vice-maſter is ſaid to have been, that the latter would never execute the proceſs of the Biſhop of Ely, as Viſitor, againſt Dr. Bentley. With regard to Mr. John Walker, who uſed to be called Clariſſimus Walker, a name which was ſaid to have been given him by Dr. Bentley, he became afterwards Chaplain to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Dean of Bocking in Eſſex (d).

(d) From Mr. Baynes.

Though Dr. Richard Walker was not remarkable for his literature, he was an amiable man, and much eſteemed in his College. He was fifty, and Dr. Bentley ſeventy years of age, when they both began to ſmoke, which they did in their own defence, all the reſt of the ſeniors being ſmokers. In time Dr. Walker became ſo fond of the practice, that (like Aldrich and Barrow) he was ſeldom ſeen without a pipe in his mouth.

A foreign nobleman once viſiting the Univerſity, Dr. Bentley received him in great ſtate, and, the Vice-maſter ſitting by his ſide, began his addreſs to the foreigner in theſe words, "Ego ſum Magiſter hujus Collegii, & hic eſt Vice-Magiſter meus!" To this, among other things, the gueſt replied, that he did not doubt but as that gentleman was ſecond to him in ſtation, he was alſo ſecond to him only in learning. The Vice-maſter anſwered, "Spero equidem (e)."

(e) From Mr. Duncombe, who knew Dr. Richard Walker well, and has had letters from him.

It is ſaid, that Thomas Bentley, the Doctor's nephew, was ſo offended at Mr. Pope's treatment of his uncle, that he ſent the Bard a challenge. This the Poet communicated to ſome of his military friends; two or three of whom (his perſon pleading his excuſe) took up the gauntlet, and inſiſted upon Thomas Bentley's fighting one of them, or making a ſubmiſſion, the latter of which he preferred.

Dr. Bentley's youngeſt daughter, afterwards Mrs. Cumberland, was the Phebe on whom Byron wrote his celebrated Paſtoral Ballad (f).

(f) From the ſame communication.

For ſome farther particulars and ſtrictures relative to Dr. Bentley, we refer to the Gentleman's Magazine, for 1779, p. 442, 443. 545—548. 640; and to the ſame work, for the year 1780, p. 221.

Mr. Pope, ſays Dr. Warton, had imbibed from Swift, an inveterate and unreaſonable averſion and contempt for Bentley; whoſe admirable Boyle's Lectures, Remarks on Collins, Emendations of Menander and Callimachus, and Tully's Tuſculan Diſputations; whoſe edition of Horace, and, above all, Diſſertation on the Epiſtles of Phalaris, (in which he gained the moſt complete victory over a whole army of Wits) all of them exhibit the moſt ſtriking marks of accurate and extenſive erudition, and a vigorous and acute underſtanding (g).

BERKELEY (GEORGE) p. 262.

Mr. Duncombe, by the permiſſion of Mrs. Berkeley, the worthy relict of the Biſhop of Cloyne, has favoured us with that Lady's remarks on his article, and with ſome freſh anecdotes concerning him. Theſe we ſhall take notice of, in the order in which they were delivered.

Biographia, vol. ii. p. 249. It is not true, as the Biographer aſſerts, that Dr. Berkeley was much addicted to the reading of romances. On the contrary, he did very ſtrongly, and at all times, diſlike them, regarding them as no better than fooleries.

Ibid. The Biſhop, ſays Mrs. Berkeley, "purſued Mr. Locke's own mode of reaſoning: and by it has demonſtrated, that the primary qualities of matter being as mutable as the ſecondary qualities, both alike deſerve to be rejected. And if matter be poſſeſſed neither of primary nor of ſecondary qualities, the Biſhop aſks, 'Of what does it conſiſt?' He puſhes Mr. Locke's argument home, and no farther than truth and experiment lead." We ſhall not enter into a controverſy with this ingenious Lady, on ſo abſtruſe a ſubject.

Ibid. Dr. Berkeley never ſpoke or thought highly of the learning or abilities of Sir Richard Steele. He believed the Knight to be a man of uncommon good-nature, and more witty in converſation than any perſon he had ever ſeen.

P. 253. The Biſhop never dined but once at the houſe of Mrs. Vanhomrigh, and that was only by chance. This, too, Mrs. Berkeley has often heard him ſay, was the firſt and the laſt time of his life in which he ever ſaw Vaneſſa.

Ibid. All Dr. Swift's letters to this Lady tended greatly to her honour. Dr. Berkeley diſapproved extremely of the publication of "Cadenus and Vaneſſa;" which ſtep, however, was reſolved upon, and executed, by Mr. Marſhall, the other executor. Dr. Delany ſaid, that this publication put an end to poor Stella's life. Mr. Duncombe remarks, that the writer of the Biſhop of Cloyne's life doth not ſeem to have known that Vaneſſa's letters have been publiſhed.

P. 254. Dr. Berkeley did not rely ſolely on the favourable diſpoſition of King George the Firſt for the ſucceſs of his plan. Having been ſtrongly recommended by many common friends, and eſpecially by the firſt Earl of Egmont, to Sir Robert Walpole, he requeſted that Miniſter only not to oppoſe his project. This requeſt Sir Robert granted in a very cordial manner, declaring that nothing ſhould induce him to violate the promiſed neutrality. This engagement being obtained, the projector found means, by himſelf, or by ſome friend or acquaintance, to apply to every Member of the Houſe of Commons, recommending his plan as one which the King favoured, and which the Miniſter did not wiſh to impede. The ſucceſs of theſe applications was ſuch, that Admiral Vernon gave the only diſſenting vote in the Lower Houſe, upon the occaſion. Lord Townſhend, aſtoniſhed at the ſucceſs of Dr. Berkeley's manœuvre, expoſtulated with Sir Robert Walpole on his paſſive conduct. Sir Robert replied, that he really thought the preamble of the bill would have enſured its rejection with the Engliſh Commons, and that under the conduct of a leſs dextrous manager this muſt have been the caſe.

Ibid. Twenty thouſand pounds was the ſum promiſed for founding St. Paul's College in Bermuda. Dean Berkeley was an excellent architect, and he had completed elegant plans of his projected town, as well as of his ſeminary. The laſt edifice was to have occupied the center of a large circus; and this circus was to have conſiſted of the houſes of the Fellows, to each of which in front a ſpacious garden was allotted. Beyond this academical circus was another, compoſed of houſes for gentlemen, many of which houſes had been actually beſpoken, and the Dean had been requeſted to ſuperintend the building of them. Beyond this circus was one more, which was calculated for the reception of ſhops and artificers. Dr. Berkeley diſliked the cuſtom of burying in Churches; for which reaſon a Cypreſs Walk, called, "The Walk of Death," was to be ſolemnly appropriated to the ſole purpoſe of interment. There monumental urns or obeliſks might be erected.

P. 255. The mention of Dr. Berkeley's uſefulneſs as a clergyman, during his reſidence in America, is by no means ſufficiently expreſſive and full. When he was not employed as an itinerant preacher, which buſineſs could not be diſcharged in the winter, he preached every Sunday at Newport, where was the neareſt Epiſcopal Church. To that Church he gave an organ. When the ſeaſon and his health permitted, he viſited the Continent, not only in its outward ſkirts, but penetrated far into its receſſes. The ſame generous deſire of advancing the beſt intereſts of mankind which induced him to croſs the Atlantic, did uniformly actuate him whilſt America was the ſcene of his miniſtry. The Miſſionaries from the Engliſh Society, who reſided within about a hundred miles of Rhode-Iſland, agreed among themſelves to hold a ſort of Synod at Dr. Berkeley's houſe there, twice in a year, in order to enjoy the advantages of his advice and exhortations. Four of these meetings were accordingly held. One of the principal points which the Doctor then pressed upon his fellow-labourers, was the absolute necessity of conciliating, by all innocent means, the affection of their hearers, and also of their dissenting neighbours. His own example, indeed, very eminently enforced his precepts upon this head; for it is scarcely possible to conceive a conduct more uniformly kind, tender, beneficent, and liberal than his was. He seemed to have only one wish in his heart, which was to alleviate misery, and to diffuse happiness. Finding, at length, that the fear of offending the Dissenters at home, and of inclining the Colonies to assert independency, had determined the Minister to make any use, rather than the best use, of the money destined for, and promised to St. Paul's College, the Dean of Derry took a reluctant leave of a country, where the name of Berkeley is justly revered more than that of any European whatever. At his departure, he gave a farm of a hundred acres, which lay round his house, and his house itself, as a benefaction to Yale and Harvard Colleges: and the value of that land, then not insignificant because cultivated, is now pretty considerable. He gave, of his own property, to one of these Colleges, and to several Missionaries, books to the amount of five hundred pounds. To the other College he made a large donation of books purchased by others, and trusted to his disposal.

P. 256. It was from a hope of advancing the interest of his College, that Dr. Berkeley submitted to the drudgery (for such he esteemed it) of bearing a part in the fruitless weekly debates with Clarke and Hoadly, in the presence of the Princess Catherine.

P. 258. Bishop Berkeley never had any idea of Cloyne as a beautiful situation. He declared to Mrs. Berkeley, soon after he was advanced to the Prelacy, that his resolution was never to change his see; because, as he afterwards confessed to the Archbishop of Tuam, and the late Earl of Shannon, he had very early in life got the world under his feet, and he hoped to trample on it to his latest moment. These two warm friends had been pressing him to think of a translation: but he did not love episcopal translations. He thought that they were sometimes really hurtful to individuals, and that they often gave, though unjustly, a handle to suspect of mean views, an order to which that holy and humble man was himself an honour, and to which it may be said, without adulation, that he would have been an honour in any age of the Church. Humble and unaspiring as was the Bishop of Cloyne, the Earl of Chesterfield sought him out; and when, as a tribute to exalted merit, that nobleman offered to him the see of Clogher, where he was told he might immediately receive fines to the amount of ten thousand pounds, he consulted Mrs. Berkeley, as having a family, and, with her full approbation, not only declined the Bishopric of Clogher, but the offer which accompanied that proposal, of any other translation which might become feasible during Lord Chesterfield's administration. The Primacy was vacated before the expiration of that period. On that occasion, the Bishop said to Mrs. Berkeley, "I desire to add one more to the list "of Churchmen, who are evidently dead to ambition and avarice." Just before his embarkation for America, Queen Caroline endeavoured to stagger his resolution, by the offer of an English Mitre; but, in reply, he assured her Majesty, that he chose rather to be President of St. Paul's College, than Primate of all England.

Ibid. The Bishop was summoned out of the world, whilst Mrs. Berkeley was reading to him the lesson in the burial-service, taken from the xvth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians. On this most sublime chapter he was commenting, when his heavenly spirit soared aloft to his kindred souls.

Ibid. The writer of the article is mistaken as to the hour of the Bishop's rising, and with respect to his concert. Unless for a short time, and to keep off a lethargy, he never did rise at four o'clock in the morning, but generally at six or seven. To exclude cards, which through life he despised and disliked in no small degree, he usually had a concert after tea. As to authors, Plato and Hooker were two of his principal favourites.—So far Mrs. Berkeley.

On the authority of Dr. George Berkeley, the Bishop's son, we are enabled to confirm the facts mentioned in the additional note, p. 259, concerning the Chaplainship and Degree; and on the same authority we are assured, that his father did not write, and never read through, the "Adventures of Signor Gaudentio di Lucca." Upon this head, the Editor of the Biographia must record himself as having exhibited an instance of the folly of building facts upon the foundation of conjectural reasonings. Having heard the book ascribed to Bishop Berkeley, and seen it mentioned as his in Catalogues of Libraries, I read over the work again under this impression, and fancied that I perceived internal arguments of its having been written by our excellent prelate. I was even pleased with the apprehended ingenuity of my discoveries. But the whole was a mistake, which, whilst it will be a warning to myself, may furnish an instructive lesson to others. At the same time I do not retract the character which I have given of the "Adventures of Signor Gaudentio di Lucca." Whoever was the author of that performance, it does credit to his abilities and to his heart.

Dr. Warton hath paid a juſt tribute to the great ingenuity and worth of Biſhop Berkeley, in his Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope. Speaking of the Biſhop's "Siris," the Doctor obſerves, that many a vulgar Critic has ſneered at it for beginning at Tar and ending with the Trinity; incapable of obſerving the great art with which the tranſitions in that book are finely made, where each paragraph depends upon and ariſes out of the preceding, and gradually and imperceptibly leads on the reader, from common objects to more remote, from matter to ſpirit, from earth to heaven (a).

One of the Guardians written by Dr. Berkeley, was Number 69 (b). It is an encomium upon the Archbiſhop of Cambray's "Demonſtration of the Exiſtence, Wiſdom, "and Omnipotence of God," and a tranſlation of the Act of Devotion with which that book ends.

(b) Gentleman's Magazine for 1780, p. 125.

There has very lately been publiſhed a ſecond edition of "Memoirs of George Berkeley, D.D." being the ſame with our article by Dr. Stock. To theſe Memoirs are added ſix letters which Dr. Berkeley wrote from Italy, and a great number of extracts from letters ſent by him to Thomas Prior, Eſq; of Dublin. Theſe laſt ſerve to mark the progreſs of the Bermuda project, and of the Author's hopes and fears on that intereſting occaſion.

A handſome Edition of all Biſhop Berkeley's works, printed at Dublin, in two volumes quarto, has juſt been announced to the public.

BETTERTON (THOMAS), p. 297.

In Mr. Davies's "Dramatic Miſcellanies," frequent mention is made of Mr. Betterton, and always in terms of the higheſt applauſe. Mr. Davies has alſo conſecrated a whole chapter to the memory of the abilities and character of this great actor. As the work now mentioned cannot fail to be in the hands of the admirers of dramatic poetry and lovers of theatrical hiſtory, we ſhall chiefly content ourſelves with adverting to a few circumſtances in which the author has corrected ſome miſtakes of our learned predeceſſor.

According to what may be deemed the well founded teſtimony of Southern, which is followed in the Biographia, Mr. Betterton was born in 1635. But Downs places his birth three years later; "which, ſays Mr. Davies, ſeems a little ſurpriſing, as the "Roſcius Anglicanus" was publiſhed in the life-time of Betterton, who muſt have con-"verſed with the author almoſt continually from 1662 to 1706, the date of his nar-"rative (a)."

The marriage of Mr. Betterton with Mrs. Saunderſon is fixed, by Dr. Campbell, to the year 1670. But the exact time is very uncertain. From Downs, it appears, that the Villain, a Tragedy, and Shakſpeare's Henry the Eighth, were revived, at the Duke's Theatre, before the Plague of London, in 1665; and the name of Mrs. Betterton is placed to Belmont, in the Villain, and to Queen Catherine, in Henry the Eighth. The marriage, therefore, muſt have taken place five years ſooner than the time ſettled in the Biographia (b). We beg leave to ſuggeſt to Mr. Davies, whether the name of Mrs. Betterton's being annexed to Belmont, a man's part, muſt not have been a mere literal error.

(b) Ibid. p. 386.

The union of the two companies is ſuſpected, in the article, not to have taken effect till 1686. But Mr. Davies, by looking on the date of the firſt edition of Dryden's and Lee's Duke of Guiſe, which was printed in 1683, finds, from the title page and the dramatis perſonæ, that Betterton and Company were then in poſſeſſion of the King's Theatre (c).

(c) Ibid. p. 389.

Mr. Davies thinks that Powel the Player, who is mentioned in note [I], is treated with too much contempt. This Actor had abilities, but, by putting too much confidence in them, and by indulging to idleneſs and intemperance, he was prevented from riſing to a greater degree of perfection in his poſſeſſion. In note [K], Mrs. Montford and Mrs. Verbruggen are mentioned as two different Actreſſes, whereas they were the ſame perſon. Mrs. Montford, by her ſecond marriage, became Mrs. Verbruggen (d).

(d) Ibid. p. 394, 395.

Though the time of Mrs. Betterton's death cannot abſolutely be ſettled, it has been ſuppoſed that ſhe lived no more than ſix months after her huſband. But Mr. Davies has proved, that ſhe was living thirteen months after that event: for, on the 4th of June, 1711, at the particular deſire of ſeveral Ladies of quality, the Comedy called "The Man of Mode, or Sir Foplin Flutter," was acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane, for her benefit (e).

(e) Ibid. p. 398.

Mr. Pope, when very young, was ſo charmed with Betterton, and Betterton with him, that, at the requeſt of the latter, the good old man ſat to him for his picture, which he drew in oil. This curioſity is ſtill to be ſeen in Kenwood, in the poſſeſſion of Lord Mansfield (f).

(f) P. 400, 401.

We

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA

We cannot forbear mentioning a circumſtance which diſplays, in a very ſtriking light, Mr. Betterton's excellence in theatrical repreſentation. When he performed Hamlet, his countenance, which was naturally ruddy and ſanguine, when he came to the ſcene of the third act where the ghoſt appears, through the violent and ſudden emotion of amazement and horror, turned, inſtantly, on the ſight of his father's ſpirit, as pale as his neckcloth; and, at the ſame time, his whole body ſeemed to be affected with a tremor inexpreſſible; ſo that, had his father's ghoſt actually riſen before him, he could not have been ſeized with more real agonies. This was felt ſo ſtrongly by the ſpectators, that the blood ſeemed, likewiſe, to ſhudder in their veins; and they, in ſome meaſure, partook of the aſtoniſhment and horror with which they ſaw this excellent Actor affected (g). (g) Ibid. p. 57, 58.

Another fact, to the ſame purpoſe, occurs in the Richardſoniana. The firſt time that Booth attempted the ghoſt, when Betterton acted Hamlet, Betterton's look at him ſtruck him with a dread and horror, which diſconcerted him to ſuch a degree, that he could not ſpeak his part (b). (b) Richardſoniana, p. 77, 78.

BINGHAM (JOSEPH), p. 315.

Mr. Bingham's works were tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed at Hall, in Germany, in eleven volumes, quarto, in the year 1751.

BIRCH (THOMAS), p. 323.

From a paper with which we have been favoured by the Rev. Mr. Briſted, Rector of St. Peter's and St. Mary's Weſtoutrit, Lewes, in Suſſex, we learn, that Birch made but a ſmall proficiency in the firſt ſchool to which he had been ſent. After he had been there ſix or ſeven years, Mr. Claridge, the learned Clergyman who turned Quaker, examined him, and found him very deficient; but, at the ſame time, thought, from the boy's manner of anſwering, that he did not want parts or diligence. Accordingly, he was committed to the care of Mr. Welby, and under this new Tutor his progreſs was great. Mr. Welby was afterwards elected maſter of the Grammar School at Lewes, and thither Mr. Birch accompanied him as his Uſher. This happened about the year 1726.

We were miſtaken in aſſerting, that Mr. Birch muſt have entered into the Church ſo early as in 1728. He was ordained Deacon by the Biſhop of Saliſbury (Dr. Hoadly), at King-Street Chapel, Jan. 17, 1730, and Prieſt by the ſame prelate, Dec. 21, 1731, as appears by his letters of orders. He could not, therefore, be Curate to his wife's father, when he married. The death of Mrs. Birch was owing, in part, to a conſumption, though the dreadful criſis was brought on by child-bearing. It was at the time of Mr. Birch's being ordained Prieſt, that he was preſented to the Rectory of Siddington St. Mary, and the Vicarage of Siddington St. Peter (a). (a) Ayſcough's Catalogue of the Manuſcripts preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, hitherto undeſcribed. Preface, p. v.

We expreſſed ourſelves inaccurately, in mentioning, ſeveral times, that Dr. Birch was inducted to his different livings. The proper term is inſtituted. In eccleſiaſtical language, the Dioceſan collates, when the preferment is in his own gift, or inſtitutes on the preſentation of any other Patron. Induction is, in the former caſe, the ſecond, and in the latter the third ſtep in the proceſs of taking poſſeſſion (b). (b) From the information of Dr. Diſney.

Dr. Birch, in his office of Secretary to the Royal Society, was ſucceeded by Dr. Maty, and not by Dr. Morton.

In the marginal note, p. 323, for Grenſco's read Greaves's.

To the Catalogue of Dr. Birch's publications, the following muſt be added. "Profeſſor Greaves's miſcellaneous Works," in two volumes, octavo, 1737. Dr. Cudworth's "Intellectual Syſtem, (improved from the Latin edition of Moſheim;) his diſcourſe on the true notion of the Lord's Supper, and two Sermons, with an account of his life and writings; in two volumes, quarto, 1743. An edition of Spenſer's "Fairy Queen," in three volumes, quarto, 1751, with prints from deſigns, by Kent. "Letters between "Col. Robert Hammond, Governor of the Iſle of Wight, and the Committee of Lords "and Commons at Derby-Houſe, General Fairfax, Lieut. General Cromwell, Commiſſary "General Ireton, &c. relating to King Charles the Firſt, while he was confined in "Cariſbrooke-Caſtle in that Iſland. Now firſt publiſhed. To which is prefixed a "Letter from John Aſhburnham, Eſq; to a Friend, concerning his Deportment towards "the King, in his Attendance on his Majeſty at Hampton-Court, and in the Iſle of Wight." octavo, 1764. Dr. Birch's laſt Eſſay, "The Life of Dr. Ward," which was finiſhed but a week before his death, was publiſhed by Dr. Maty, in 1766 (c). (c) Nichols's Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 116, 117.

Mr. Ayſcough has extracted, from a ſmall pocket-book belonging to Dr. Birch, the following memoranda of ſome pieces written by him, of which he was not before known to be the author. 1726. "A Latin Tranſlation of Hughes's Ode to the Creator." 1727. "Verſes on the General Hiſtory of Printing." Publiſhing the General

History of Printing. Collections for Smedley's View. 1728. "Abelard to Philotas." 1732. Began the General History. 1739. "Account of Alga." Published in the Works of the Learned for July. "Account of Milton." Published in the Works of the Learned. 1741. Wrote the Letter of Cleander to Smerdis, in the Athenian Letters. 1742. Wrote an Account of Orr's Sermon, in the Works of the Learned. 1743. Wrote the Preface to Boyle's Works. 1760. By a letter from Dr. Stonhouse, it appears that Dr. Birch was the author of the Life of the Rev. Mr. James Hervey, which is prefixed to that gentleman's writings. He was employed, likewise, in correcting a great number of publications, and among the rest Murden's State Papers. At the time of the Doctor's death, he had prepared for the press a collection of letters, to which he had given the title of "Historical Letters, written in the Reigns of James the First and "Charles the First, containing a Detail of the public Transactions and Events in "Great-Britain during that Period; with a Variety of Particulars not mentioned by "our Historians. Now first published from the Originals in the British Museum, "Paper-office, and private Collections." Mr. Ayscough proposes to undertake the publication of these letters, provided he meets with such an encouragement as shall reimburse him for his expence (e). We hope that the specimens of this work, which have lately been given in Mr. Maty's Review, will recommend it to the protection of the lovers of history.

Anthony Bacon's papers were not chiefly transcribed from the Lambeth library, as was mentioned in page 323, but, for the most part, from other collections.

In a late splendid and ingenious publication, we have met with a passage concerning Dr. Birch, which has struck us with surprise. "Dr. Birch, says the writer, was said to "be a dextrous man, prepared to sail with every wind; but as his temptation to trim "had not commenced in 1738, he wrote the life of Milton, without any mixture of "that aldermanly discretion which disposed him afterwards to serve the times with more "deliberation (f)." Upon what this severe insinuation is grounded we are not able to say. In none of our enquiries concerning Dr. Birch, have we found reason to impeach the sincerity or uniformity of his regard for the cause of civil and religious liberty.

From the inaccuracy with which Blackmore, in his poems, has pronounced the ancient names of nations or places, Dr. Johnson has inferred, that the thirteen years he spent at the University, seem to have passed with very little attention to the business of the place (a). A strong testimony, however, to his diligence, whilst at Edmund-Hall, has lately been produced, in the Gentleman's Magazine, from Turner's "Book of "Providence." "Dr. Richard Blackmore, says Turner, my contemporary and colleague "(fellow-collegian) at Oxon, now living, and one of the College in London, was, in "his first years, one of the most eager and diligent students I ever knew; sitting up "at his book till twelve, one, two, and sometimes three o'clock in the morning, and "then lying down only upon his chairs till prayer-time, till his health broke, and he "was constrained, by necessity, to retire into the country, to repair himself by "physic (b)."

(b) Gent. Mag. for 1781, p. 460.

Besides the works mentioned in the article, Sir Richard Blackmore wrote "A true and impartial History of the Conspiracy against King William, of glorious Memory, in the year 1695 (c)."

(c) Lives of the Poets, ubi supra, p. 90.

Dr. Johnson has added to the number of those liberal-minded men who have endeavoured to rescue Sir Richard Blackmore's name from the contempt with which it has been treated, and to do justice to his abilities, as well as to his virtue. To his "Creation" the Doctor hath given high praise, and has drawn the character of it with singular precision and elegance (d). As to Sir Richard's other poems, nothing, we suppose, can preserve them from oblivion.

BLACKWELL (THOMAS), p. 343.

Lord Kaims, speaking of the wonderful perfection to which Homer arrived, at a period when arts were far short of maturity, says, "An author of genius has endea-"voured to account for this extraordinary phenomenon; and I willingly acknowledge, "that he has exerted much industry, as well as invention; but in my apprehension, "without giving much satisfaction (a)." Dr. Beattie, however, thinks more favourably of Dr. Blackwell's work (b).

BLOOD (THOMAS), p. 317.

An ingenious Critic, in the Gentleman's Magazine, has expreſſed his ſurpriſe, that, in our additions to this article, we ſhould have omitted the following famous epigram:

" When daring Blood, his rent to have regained,
" Upon the Engliſh diadem diſtrained,
" He choſe the caſſock, ſurcingle, and gown,
" The fitteſt garb for him that ſteals a crown:
" But his lay-pity underneath prevailed,
" And while he ſpar'd the keeper's life he fail'd.
" With the Prieſt's veſtments had he but put on " The Prelate's cruelty, the crown had gone (a)."

BOLTON (EDMUND), p. 400.

Mr. Warton, in his Hiſtory of Poetry, calls Edmund Bolton " that ſenſible old Engliſh Critic;" and hath given, from his " Hypercritica," a curious extract, as a ſpecimen of the manner in which he hath deſcribed the ſtyle of our moſt noted Poets before the year 1600. The ſame diſtinguiſhed author has added a learned note concerning Mr. Bolton's writings (a).

(a) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, vol. iii. p. 275—279.

BOOTH (BARTON), 421.

The name of Booth frequently occurs, and in terms of high applauſe, in the three volumes of Mr. Davies's " Dramatic Miſcellanies." To the abilities of the Actor he added a very amiable character; and whilſt he was a manager of the Theatre, he mixed in the ſociety of the reſt of the players, took part in their intereſts, and was valued and beloved by them as their companion. When Harper remonſtrated to him, that Shepherd's income was larger than his by twenty ſhillings a week, though he preſumed, he ſaid, that his own induſtry and variety of buſineſs were not inferior to other's, Booth replied, " Suppoſe, now, Harper, we ſhould make you both equal, by reducing his " ſalary to yours?"—" By no means, anſwered Harper, I would not injure Mr. Shep- " herd for the world; I would only, by your favour, Sir, honeſtly ſerve myſelf."—The manager ſaid no more; but on pay-day, Harper found his weekly allowance increaſed by an addition of twenty ſhillings (a).

A ſhort account of Booth is, likewiſe, given by Mr. Davies, in his Life of Garrick (b).

In 1745, was publiſhed, " Boulter's Monument: A panegyrical Poem, ſacred to the Memory of the late Archbiſhop of Armagh." Price 3s (a). The Archbiſhop's own excellent character has erected for him a far more durable monument than this Poem could raiſe; which, whatever its merit might be, has ſunk into oblivion.

BOW-

TO THE SECOND VOLUME.

BOWYER (WILLIAM), p. 448.

Since the article was printed, Mr. Nichols has publiſhed, in quarto, "Biographical and Literary Anecdotes of William Bowyer, Printer, F.S.A. and of many of his learned Friends." To this work, which contains a moſt valuable treaſure of information, under the head of Biography, we refer for every farther particular that might be collected, relative to Mr. Bowyer.

BOYD (ROBERT), p. 455.

James, late Earl of Errol, was alſo hereditary Lord High Conſtable of Scotland, and walked as ſuch at the coronation of his preſent Majeſty, in 1761 (a).

(a) Gent. Mag. for 1780, p. 125.

BOYLE (RICHARD), Earl of Cork, p. 471.

Agreeably to what may be deemed the beſt authority, that of the Earl himſelf, in his "True Remembrances," his birth is fixed to the third of October, 1566. But the Earl alſo ſays, that his father, "Roger Boyle," and his mother, "Joan Naylor," were married in Canterbury, on the 16th of October, in the eighth year of Queen Elizabeth; which as that Princeſs came to the Crown in November, 1558, muſt alſo be in 1556. This, at firſt ſight, ſeems ſtrange, as, according to his Lordſhip's own account, his parents muſt have been married a fortnight after he, their ſecond ſon, was born. But, according to the following authentic certificate, the Earl has unluckily miſtaken two years in the date of his father's marriage: viz.

"Marriages, 1564.

"Roger Boyle and Joane Naylor, 31 Day July."

"This is a true copy of the regiſter belonging to the pariſh of St. Paul's, in the "city of Canterbury,

"Feb. 1, 1780. "J. Airſon, Vicar."

The legitimacy, therefore, of the Earl is fully eſtabliſhed, ſuppoſing him to have been born at the time he has mentioned (a).

(a) Gent. Mag. for 1780, p. 124.

In page 459, for Sir Richard Manwood, read Sir Roger Manwood, Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Some anecdotes concerning Sir Roger Manwood and his family, are in the hands of Mr. Boys of Sandwich, which, by the favour of that gentleman, we hope, in a proper place, to introduce to the public.

In page 464, our predeceſſor has ſaid, that the great Earl of Cork had intereſt enough to obtain that the poſt of Lord High Treaſurer of Ireland ſhould be made hereditary in his family. It has not, however, continued in the male-line of the Houſe of Boyle. It is certain, that, on the death of the laſt Earl of Burlington, in 1753, this great office was conferred, by his late Majeſty, on the then Marquis of Hartington, who was not of the Boyle family; and it is now enjoyed by his ſon, the preſent Duke of Devonſhire, who deſcends from a female branch. His Grace, in right of his mother, enjoys, alſo, the Barony of Clifford, by which title her anceſtor, Charles, the ſon of the firſt Earl of Burlington, was called up by writ to the Houſe of Peers (b).

BOYLE (ROBERT), p. 516.

It is mentioned, in the article, p. 495, that after Mr. Robert Boyle quitted Eton, his father carried him to Stalbridge, in Dorſetſhire. This Manor came into the poſſeſſion of the great Earl of Cork, by grant of King James the Firſt, upon the attainder of Lord Audeley. The Earl, at his deceaſe, left it to his ſon Robert. The Manſion-Houſe is a large ſtone building, which is ſtill in good repair. It ſtands in the center of a rich and luxuriant Park, and commands an extenſive proſpect of the fertile vale of Blackmore. Here Mr. Boyle reſided for ſome years; and it has always been a tradition, that his earlieſt experiments in natural philoſophy and chemiſtry were made in this place. A room is ſhewn to ſtrangers, which he is ſaid to have appropriated for theſe uſes. The Rev. Mr. John Douch, his Tutor, was a native of Dorſetſhire, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. In 1621, he was inſtituted to the Rectory of Stalbridge, from which he was ejected by the parliamentary Commiſſioners, in 1649. Upon this occaſion, occaſion, Mr. Douch, his wife, and children were expoſed to ſevere and cruel hardſhips. He lived to the time of the Reſtoration, and was re-poſſeſſed of his living. The advowſon of the Rectory of Stalbridge was afterwards purchaſed by Archbiſhop Teniſon, who gave it to Bene't College, Cambridge (a).

BOYLE (CHARLES), Earl of Orrery, p. 519.

At the beginning of the ſecond volume of Atterbury's "Epiſtolary Correſpondence, Viſitation Charges, Speeches, and Miſcellanies," lately publiſhed by Mr. Nichols, are eight Letters written to his famous Tutor, by Mr. Charles Boyle, whilſt he was a Student at Chriſt-church. Theſe diſplay his abilities, and his ſtudious turn of mind, to good advantage. From a Letter of Atterbury's to Mr. Boyle, written in 1698, it appears that the former laid the deſign of the celebrated book in anſwer to Bentley's Diſſertation, wrote above half of it, reviewed a good part of the reſt, and tranſcribed the whole (a).

(a) Epiſtolary Correſpondence, &c. vol. ii. p. 1—22.

In the Index to the ſecond volume of the Supplement to Swift's Works, we are informed, upon the authority of Dr. Johnſon, that the inſtrument called the Orrery was firſt invented by Mr. Rowley, a Mathematician born at Litchfield. Mr. Rowley gave it the name of his Patron's Title.

BOYSE (JOHN), Earl of Cork and Orrery, p. 527.

The diſſenſions between Charles Earl of Orrery and his ſon Lord Boyle, together with its fatal conſequence, originated, it is believed, from a refuſal of the latter to ſuffer his wife to ſit at table with his father's miſtreſs. Upon this occaſion, old Southern ſaid, "What will not the devil and a whore make a man do?"

In Number 161, of the World, written by John, Earl of Cork and Orrery, the noble author painted from the life his own ſon, Charles Lord Dungarvan. This young Nobleman, with a good-nature bordering upon weakneſs, happening to fall in among the Philiſtines of Party at Oxford, his conſtitution was ruined by liquor, and his decay and death were the conſequence. He was otherwiſe entirely free from vicious inclinations.

Among many bon mots of Hamilton Boyle, Mr. Duncombe recollects the following: his father once wondering why the Iriſh Peers are allowed to walk at royal funerals, but not at weddings, his ſon (then Lord Dungarvan) replied, that neither could he conceive the reaſon, unleſs it were that the Iriſh Peers were expected to howl.

It muſt be regretted, that the Earl of Cork and Orrery, in his laſt illneſs, burnt many manuſcripts, and among them the continuation of his letters from Italy, on account of their not being corrected and fairly tranſcribed. It is apprehended that his Florentine Hiſtory underwent the ſame fate (a).

(a) From the communications of Mr. Duncombe.

The verſes quoted, p. 524, were from an imitation of Horace, Ode 9. Book IV. by Mr. Duncombe.

In the fourth volume of Mr. Walpole's "Anecdotes of Painting in England," may be found ſeveral curious and entertaining particulars relative to the laſt Earl of Burlington, and his fine taſte in architecture and gardening.

BOYSE (SAMUEL), p. 537.

Several of Mr. Boyſe's poetical productions are publiſhed, in different parts of Mr. Nichols's ſelect Collection of Poems.

BRINDLEY (JAMES), p. 602.

BROWN (ROBERT), p. 621.

Mr. Brown is ſaid, p. 617, to have been preferred to the Rectory of a Church in Northamptonſhire. This living was Achurch, near Thrapſton, in that county. Dr. Chambers, the late worthy Rector of the ſame place, informed his friend Dr. Diſney of this circumſtance, and ſhewed him the ſtone in the Pariſh Church which covered the grave of Brown.

A ſhort communication of Mr. Maſters's, concerning Robert Brown, has unfortunately been miſlaid.

BROWNE (SIMON), p. 647.

An additional letter, written by Mr. Browne, when he was under his extraordinary frenzy, is too curious to be omitted. It has been communicated to us by our friend, the Rev. Mr. Emans of Coventry.

Letter from Mr. Simon Browne to his Friend Mr. Billingſley.

"SIR,

"You went away without Collins, which I have therefore ſent after you. You may "profit by him: I cannot ſo much as wiſh to profit by that, or any thing elſe, and am too "thoroughly deſtroyed to have advantage from your or any one's compaſſion or prayers. "For which reaſon I think Mr. Leveſly may ſpare himſelf the pains of a trip hither, if he "comes to the bath. If he has any thing to communicate relating to my affairs in the "city, you will, I ſuppoſe, ſee him, and may, if you pleaſe, communicate it at ſecond "hand. But if he has the melancholy curioſity to ſee a wretch, all body, without ſo much "as the remembrance of the ruins of that mind that was once a tenant in it, and ſhould "come over, I would requeſt if I could, that when he ſees me it may be with no com-"pany out of the neighbourhood; that if he be not ſtruck with conviction of my caſe upon "view, and God ſhall ſtill have left me the power of ſpeech, I may at laſt convince him "that my caſe has not been a deluſion of fancy, but the moſt tremendous reality, and "that the thinking being that was in me is by a conſumption continual of five years "duration now wholly periſhed, and come to NOTHING."

BROWNE (ISAAC HAWKINS), p. 653.

In p. 647, the "Profeſſor of Poetry," at Cambridge, is mentioned. But we are informed that, properly ſpeaking, there is no ſuch Profeſſor at that Univerſity. The cenſor of the verſes ſpoken of muſt probably be underſtood.

The Proſe Tranſlation of Mr. Browne's Poem, "Animi Immortalitate," was by his friend, Mr. Highmore, the painter.

In p. 652, for "Though Mr. Browne was not bred to a Profeſſion," read "Though Mr. Browne was bred to a Profeſſion."

When the late Dr. Henry Goddard, a learned and able Phyſician, who practiſed at York, was an Undergraduate at St. John's College, in Cambridge, his room was immediately above that of Mr. Baker, the famous antiquary, who, being ancient and infirm, was eaſily diſturbed and affected by any unuſual noiſe in the neighbouring apartments. On this account, Goddard, who was a very ſober regular perſon, had his room matted, that he might not incommode the worthy old Gentleman. One night however, having invited ſome of his friends, among whom was Mr. Browne, to ſpend the evening with him, the chearfulneſs of the converſation (notwithſtanding Mr. Goddard's frequent remonſtrances) put them off their guard, and in the end brought up Mr. Baker, to ſue for peace. Upon opening the door, appeared a tall meagre figure in a black gown, a night-cap, over which was a broad brimed hat, on his head, and a twinkling taper in his hand. Without giving the apparition time to ſpeak, Browne ſtarted up, and repeated from Shakſpeare,

"Angels and miniſters of grace defend us!
"Be thou a ſpirit of health, or goblin damn'd,
"Bring with thee airs from heaven, or blaſts from hell,
"Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
"Thou com'ſt in ſuch a queſtionable ſhape,
"That I will ſpeak to thee."———

This, which in other circumſtances would have appeared a cruel inſult, was really no more than an enthuſiaſtic impulſe, neither the effect of intoxication, nor of a ſpirit of malignity. Accordingly, it was readily excuſed by the good old man, after a genteel apology, from Mr. Browne in perſon, was made the next morning.

The following anecdote, which was related by Mr. James Cloſe, a reſpectable Solicitor of Lincoln's-Inn, is of more conſequence, and highly honourable to Mr. Browne. During the time that Mr. Browne attended the Chancery Bar, the merits of a cauſe were argued before the Lord-Chancellor Hardwicke, the deciſion of which depended upon aſcertaining the rights and obligations of gavel-kind. The Counſel, employed on each ſide, having rather perplexed than thrown light upon the ſubject, the Lord-Chancellor ſaid, "There ſits a gentleman, (meaning Mr. Browne) who, I believe, "knows more of the matter than any of us;" at the ſame time requeſting him to favour the Court with his ſentiments on the caſe in queſtion. Mr. Browne, having firſt modeſtly excuſed himſelf, was prevailed upon to comply with the Chancellor's motion, and ſpoke for an hour on the riſe and tenure of gavel-kind, with great learning, accuracy, and preciſion, and with a particular application to the matter in hand. The Chancellor thanked him much for the information himſelf and the audience had received, and expreſſed his concern that he had not the pleaſure of hearing him oftener upon other ſubjects (a).

(a) From the communications of an eminent dignitary of the Church of England.

In the ſixth volume of Mr. Nichols's ſelect Collection of Poems, are two poetical pieces of Mr. Browne's, not publiſhed in his works, and three epigrams by him, never before printed (b).

BROWN (JOHN), p. 674.

By the favour of the Rev. Dr. Balguy, we are enabled to correct ſome inaccuracies in this article.

Brown was admitted of St. John's College, Cambridge, on the 8th of May, 1732, but was not matriculated till at the time we have mentioned. His tutor was not Tonſtall, (it ſhould have been Tunſtall) but Wrigley. The former was only employed as an aſſiſtant, and did not become tutor himſelf, till many years after. Mr. Wrigley, who was tutor to Dr. Balguy, as well as to Brown, was reputed a Jacobite. However that may have been, he was a zealous advocate for the divine authority both of Kings and Biſhops, and a zealous oppoſer of Mr. Locke. Fortunately he was an indolent man, and took no great care to inſtil his own ſentiments into the minds of his pupils. It was in January, 1735-6, that Mr. Brown took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He was, indeed, "Wrangler," at the taking of that degree; but he was not at the head of the liſt. The moderator, Rutherforth, gave the preference to a pupil of his own; one much inferior to Brown: but Brown himſelf was by no means equal to ſome others of the ſame year. In p. 660, the name of "Oſbaldeſton" is wrong ſpelt. It was Oſbaldiſton. The information given us, that Dr. Brown's "Principles of Chriſtian Legiſlation" were nearly completed, was erroneous. The work may more properly be ſaid to have been but juſt begun. The plan, which was immenſe, could not have taken leſs than twenty volumes. The firſt volume he ſhewed to Dr. Balguy, and conſulted him about the farther progreſs of the deſign. Dr. Balguy took much pains to perſuade Dr. Brown to read, before he went on to write. Even without reading, he muſt have been very expeditious, if he had finiſhed the work in ſeven years. The plan was really a curioſity, and, if we had obtained it, would have well deſerved to have been printed.

The impromptu to Dr. Brown, in p. 658, is ſaid to have been written by Mr. John Sharp, then Fellow of Corpus-Chriſti College, Cambridge, afterwards Doctor in Divinity, and Rector of St. Mary Abchurch, London (a).

(a) From Mr. Duncombe's communications.

In Mr. Davies's Life of Garrick, are ſome ſtrictures on Dr. Brown's "Barbaroſſa" and "Athelſtan;" an account of the manner in which theſe tragedies were received by the public; and obſervations on his character and writings in general. Mr. Davies concludes the chapter relative to Dr. Brown, with ſaying, that he had a ſoul full of gratitude, and that his honour and integrity were unqueſtioned by all who knew him (b).

(b) Life of David Garrick, Eſq; vol. i. p. 197—206.

A curious letter, concerning the character of Dr. Brown, which originally appeared in the St. James's Chronicle, is preſerved in the Memoirs of Thomas Hollis, Eſq; p. 714—717.

In p. 655, agreeably to what was generally regarded as an undoubted fact, we aſſerted, that Dr. Brown had the principal hand in Mr. Charles Aviſon's Eſſay on Muſical Expreſſion. But we are now informed, from the united teſtimonies of Robert Page, Eſq; of Newcaſtle-upon-Tyne, of a worthy and learned Clergyman in that neighbourhood, and of another of the ſame deſcription at Carliſle, that this was not the caſe. Mr. Aviſon did, indeed, ſend his manuſcript to Dr. Brown, who made ſome corrections in the ſtyle, and recommended ſome alteration in the order and diſpoſition of the parts, but could in no ſenſe be conſidered as the writer of the work. There are few authors who do not ſubject their compoſitions to the criticiſm of their friends, before they ſuffer them to appear in public. This was all that was done by Mr. Aviſon, with regard to his Eſſay on Muſical Expreſſion.

Mr. Charles Aviſon was the ſon of a Muſician at Newcaſtle. Such was his early paſſion for muſic, that, when he was only eight years of age, fearing to be refuſed admittance to a morning Concert, he entered the Hall on the preceding evening, and hid himſelf among the benches; being contented to paſs the whole night in that diſagreeable ſituation, that he might enjoy, on the next day, the pleaſure he expected. He afterwards travelled with an Engliſh Gentleman, and during this excurſion diligently attended the lectures and performances of the moſt famous Profeſſors, to which he joined a critical examination of every thing that had been written on the ſcience of muſic. By theſe means he cultivated the happy diſpoſitions with which nature had bleſſed him. But his peculiar attention was directed to the works of thoſe great maſters in harmony, who have flouriſhed during the laſt eighty years, and whoſe beauties of ſtyle he has, with ſo much ſkill and taſte, tranſplanted into his own compoſitions. That he was no ſervile copier, even of thoſe models he moſt admired, evidently appears from the many improvements he has introduced into his own Concertos. Finding that the fugues even of the greateſt maſters, were apt to hang too much upon the ear, and to weary the attention, he has happily corrected this, by occaſionally introducing lively and animated ſolo paſſages, attended with the moſt graceful accompanyments. By theſe accompanyments, the ear is prepared to receive with double pleaſure the united ſounds of the grand counter points which follow them. As a performer, Mr. Aviſon exemplified, on his favourite inſtrument, the harpſicord, all the elegance and effect of the rules he has left us. Chaſte, flowing, and pathetic, his performance was an uniform repreſentation of the feelings of his own tender mind. Even when he gave a looſe to his fancy in the playing of voluntaries, his ſtrains were never diſgraced by thoſe baſtard embelliſhments, under which many capital maſters ſtrive to hide their want of taſte and ſentiment. The habitual ſerenity of Mr. Aviſon's mind pervaded his every performance, and no true judge ever ſaw him riſe from his harpſicord without regret. In private life he was moſt amiable. His good breeding was the reſult of elegant feelings, and of boundleſs benevolence. An affectionate huſband, a tender parent, a ſteady friend, without gall, as without guile, he was moſt beloved by thoſe who knew him beſt, and ſuch was his general deportment, that it captivated the hearts of all about him.

Mr. Aviſon did not underſtand the learned languages, but had a competent knowledge of French and Italian, and was extremely well read in the admired Engliſh Authors. His talents as a writer, and his abilities as compoſer, were ſuch as rendered him fully equal to the propriety of diction, and to thoſe truly juſt and elegant ſtrictures upon the principles of muſical expreſſion with which his work abounds. The paſſage from Polybius, quoted in his Eſſay, was taken from a French tranſlation.

Mr. Aviſon died in 1770, being ſixty years of age. He had a numerous family, three of whom ſurvived him; but only one of his children is now living, and that is his youngeſt ſon, who is an Organiſt at Newcaſtle.

The above character has chiefly been taken from a letter written to Mr. Page by Mr. Callander, a Gentleman of faſhion and fortune, at Craigforth, near Edinburgh, who was Mr. Aviſon's intimate friend, and who was for ſome time engaged in a deſign of writing an "Account of the Lives and Works of the moſt eminent Profeſſors of Muſic, "from the Age of Paleſtrina to the year 1750."

We ſhall here, once for all, take notice, that manuſcript letters, by ſeveral of the Browns, whoſe articles have occurred in our work, are preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum.

BUCHANAN (GEORGE), p. 688.

In Dr. Gilbert Stuart's Hiſtory of Scotland, Buchanan frequently occurs, and an elaborate character of him is there drawn by that able writer. This character is, in ſeveral reſpects, greatly to Buchanan's diſadvantage; and Dr. Stuart even goes ſo far as to charge him with being the forger of the famous letters of Queen Mary to Bothwel, which have occaſioned ſo much controverſy among the Scottiſh Antiquaries (a). It cannot comport with the nature of theſe Addenda, to enter into ſo nice and difficult a queſtion.

(a) Hiſtory of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 242—246.

In Mr. Hollis's Memoirs, are ſome diſcuſſions and facts relative to Buchanan, and eſpecially to his book "De Jure Regni apud Scotos," together with the characters of him, at full length, which are given by Burnet, Thuanus, and Spotſwood (b).

The Abbé de Mably hath lately applauded in high terms the excellence of Buchanan as an Hiſtorian (c).

(c) Dialogues concerning the Manner of writing Hiſtory, p. 97, 98.

BUDGELL (EUSTACE), p. 693.

The only numbers, in the "Guardian," that appear to have been written by Mr. Budgell, are 24 and 31 (a).

(a) Gent. Mag. for 1780, p. 125.

The epitaph aſcribed to Budgell, in note [B], is in Camden's Remains. It was written for Queen Elizabeth, to whom alone the title of the firſt maid on earth could properly be applied. We are indebted to the Right Rev. the Biſhop of Dromore for pointing out to us this miſtake.

We

We find, likewiſe, that the epigram on the bad Dancers was not the production of Mr. Budgell, but of Mr. George Jeffreys, who hath reclaimed it, in the preface to his works (b).

(b) Gent. Mag. for 1779, p. 599.

BULL (GEORGE), p. 708.

The learned writings of Biſhop Bull, in defence of the Doctrine of the Trinity, have lately excited freſh attention, upon account of the controverſy occaſioned by Dr. Prieſtley; and, accordingly, the demand for them has increaſed to ſuch a degree, as to produce a conſiderable advance in the price for which they are ſold.

Moſt eminent PERSONS

GREAT-BRITAIN, and IRELAND,

From the earlieſt Ages, to the preſent Times.

BULLEYN (WILLIAM), a learned Phyſician and Botaniſt in the reigns of King Edward VI. Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. He was born in the former part of King Henry the VIIIth's reign, and, as himſelf informs us, in the Iſle of Ely (a). He was nearly related, as he alſo ſays, to the principal family, or chief houſe, at Blaxhall in Suffolk (b). Whether he was any ways a-kin to Sir William Bulleyn who was Sheriff of that county and Norfolk, in the fifteenth of Henry VII. and grandfather to Queen Anne Bullen, we might better reſolve, if we could find that his arms agreed with theirs; which were Argent, a Chevron Gules, inter Three Bulls Heads couped Sabel, armed Gules (c). He was bred up, it ſeems, at the univerſity of Cambridge. However, he might lay ſome foundation of learning in arts at Oxford, as Anthony Wood ſays; though he knew not, through the imperfection of their records in thoſe times, whether he took any degree in that univerſity; but adds, that applying his mind to the ſtudy of Phyſic, he took his degrees in this ſcience elſewhere, became famous therein, and was a member of the College of Phyſicians at London. Thus much, with the titles of his books, is all the perſonal hiſtory which that author has recorded of him, excepting, what is erroneous, that he flouriſhed, or was alive, above ten years after his death (d). But this ſhort and unſatisfactory account might have been much enlarged and improved by the inſpection only of our author's works. For therein it appears, that he had been a traveller over ſeveral parts of Germany, Scotland, and eſpecially England; throughout which he was well acquainted with the natures of the people, and the products of the ſoil, eſpecially vegetables; which qualified him to deſcribe their virtues ſo well, and to employ them ſo ſucceſsfully as he did, in the reſtoration of health. In or before Queen Mary's reign, he ſeems to have been much converſant about the city of Norwich, where he made ſome remarks upon ſeveral natural productions of that place. He appears, likewiſe, to have reſided a longer time at Blaxhall in Suffolk, where he alſo made ſeveral of the like obſervations. But he removed afterwards into the North: and where he is ſpeaking of the ſalt that is made in England, he mentions, among other places, the Shiles by Tinmouth-caſtle; where he had a property in the ſalt-pans which were upon that water; as, at Blith in Northumberland, alſo had Sir John Delaval; a patron whom he deſcribes to have been of great worſhip and hoſpitality there, for many years; a patron, who was far from making any ill uſe of his ſalt; who never powdered his neighbours, tenants, or others dependent upon him, with extortion, or oppreſſion; but, on the contrary, ſo extenſively ſprinkled his generous virtues among them, that the kindly ſeaſoning would preſerve his good name freſh and ſweet in remembrance, as our author promiſes, when his book, by which even it is preſerved, or tranſmitted to poſterity, would, as he fancied, though too humbly, of it, be rotten (e). But afterwards, he appears to have been more permanently ſettled at Durham; and here he made alſo other obſervations, as he had done in the counties before mentioned; upon ſome of the products he treats of, which were either remarkable for their plenty, excellency, or other qualities; a few whereof may not be unacceptable in a note apart [A], as

[A] A few whereof may not be unacceptable in a note apart.] Among thoſe natural products, whereon Dr. Bulleyn made ſuch obſervations in the counties aforeſaid, it may not be unuſeful to repeat what he has noted in his chapter of Milk; where after having diſtinguiſhed, in what caſes and diſtempers, that ſoft and nutritious liquor, ſo natural to the conſtitutions of man and beaſt, may be improperly and with evil effects uſed; he adds, that nevertheleſs we ſee what a goodly ſupport milk is in a commonwealth, and the feeders thereon, to be people of a good temperament and complexion; as in Wales, Suffolk, Eſſex, and eſpecially about Alſten Moor, among the mountains in the Biſhopric, where there is little tillage, and ſo much bringing up of cattle, that in this country, ſome time belonging to Sir Thomas, the Baron of Hilton, the people are all chiefly nouriſhed with milk, and uſe little of any other drink (1). In the ſame work, our author makes an obſervation out of other counties, upon the preſervation of their flocks, by the virtues of the herb Tormentile, where he aſſerts, that the ſheep which feed thereon, ſhall never die of the rot; that he has ſeen it proved in ſundry places in Norfolk; and at Blaxhall in Suffolk, upon a ſheep-walk in the ſaid town, where they lived many years without rotting, through the virtues of this herb; and ſays, that the ſhepherds alſo had obſerved the ſame (2). There are, likewiſe, diſperſed up and down his works, ſome little remarks on the plenty and perfection of ſome native fruits, and other vegetable products of our country in his time, which, being before planting and gardening lent their more artful hands to the improvement of them, might contribute to illuſtrate the natural fertility of our ſoil and climate, and be very materially inſtanced, not only to remove ſome diſparaging reflections which have been made upon them, but excite our gratitude for the ſame, and alſo our induſtry to multiply and meliorate this national bleſſing. It is not unlikely, indeed, that commerce may have increaſed the variety of thoſe vegetables, which are of great convenience to us; as it has alſo introduced a variety of ſuperfluities, and even things we might be contented with of our own growth. But for a late ingenious author to ſay, that, Without the benefit of commerce, what a barren, uncomfortable ſpot of earth falls to our ſhare! looks more like the ſophiſtry of ſome French merchant, or other mercenary ſtranger; at leaſt as if it proceeded more from the dictates of a private domeſtic intereſt in foreign importations, than the public ſpirit of an ingenuous countryman, who was any thing of an hortulan antiquary, and well read in our Natural Hiſtorians, Herbaliſts, and Writers of huſbandry and gardening, or in common experience itſelf. The circulation of money, the profits of exchange; the conſumption of our own manufactures, and, indeed, the gratification of our luxury and extravagance, with our thirſt after variety and novelty, and to adopt or naturalize things in faſhion or requeſt in other countries, might yield juſter motives for the ſupport of commerce, than the defects of our ſun and ſoil (3). But this author found it alſo neceſſary to imply, that by the aſſiſtance of art and the planter, our fruits (all truly of foreign extraction) may be kept from degenerating into the traſh of our country. And yet, when very little art in that planting was uſed among us, at leaſt that is deſcended to our knowledge, we had ſurely better fruits of our own growth, than hips and haws, acorns and pignuts, at all times; or Julius Cæſar would never have ſaid of our iſland, apparently with regard to our vegetable varieties, and the perfection they were in, that excepting the beech and the fir tree; in other things, that is, in its natural furniture or productions, it was like France (4). And this is again well ſupported by the frequent mention in William of Malmſbury and others of our moſt ancient Hiſtorians, of the many vineyards we had in greater number and excellence, ſo many hundred years ſince, than we have now over many parts of the kingdom; in ſome whereof, the tythe of wine was a very conſiderable article, as Camden has collected out of thoſe writers; and it is affirmed, we have ſtill upon record, ſome treaty of peace between France and England, in which it is ſtipulated, that we ſhould root up our vineyards, and be their cuſtomers for all our wine. If ſuch extirpation of the Engliſh vineyards was not owing to this, it might be to the falling of Gaſcony into the hands of the Engliſh, whence wine was imported cheaper and better than we could make it. So might the improvement of our vintages be diſcouraged, for the employment of our navigation; and the name of vineyards remain in many places, which produce none of their fruit: yet were there very good grapes kept growing in many parts, as Dr. Bullein has particularly noted in Suffolk (5); though indeed our great neglect of planting and gardening, at ſeveral times and places in general; and of early publiſhing our experiments, obſervations, and improvements therein, are to be cenſured more than any inclemencies of our climate, which is ſo willing to maintain what our ſoil produces, that it has in ſome places worn the ſame youthful face of fertility for ages together, without any other art than that of nature herſelf: and the camomile, that has flouriſhed for two hundred years upon Brentford-Green (†), without any planter's care, may ſufficiently evidence how little the vigour of vegetation degenerates, or that of our ſun and ſoil decays. But after all, the confeſſed want of induſtry aforeſaid, will appear to have, among other cauſes, as foreign wars, civil wars, &c. been greatly promoted, even by commerce itſelf; which, for its own intereſt, has taken the advantage to ſupply us, with what we needed not, for the ſake of our money; and to diſcourage us, by ſuch arguments, from ſupplying ourſelves with what we wanted, only at the expence of our labour. Hence came our own vegetables to be ſo much neglected; hence ſo many ſhip-loads of fruits from abroad; and Billings-gate our beſt orchard for even thoſe fruits, which then grew in our gardens, fields, and hedges; as the caſe is, in ſome meaſure, to this day: and hence, that we had no Engliſh Herbal publiſhed, till near the middle of King Henry VIIIth's reign, and that but a tranſlation, full of faults and miſtakes (‡). Nay, the firſt publiſher of an original Herbal, in our tongue, Dr. William Turner, informs us, that Botany, or the knowledge of ſimpling, was fallen into ſuch neglect, that about the ſame time in that King's reign, or but few years after, he found not a phyſician in the Univerſity of Cambridge, who could inform him of the Greek, Latin, or Engliſh names of any plants he produced (*), as he gathered them to compile his firſt Latin ſkeleton of the ſaid Engliſh Herbal; and yet this was not owing to the ſcarcity of our plants and fruits, but rather to the variety of them, and the little regard that was paid to them. Foreigners might well take advantage of ſuch neglect, and conſequently ſuch ignorance; though this indolence of ours, and their ſeductions to it, were never ſo univerſally prevalent, but that we have had ſpirits, which in many parts of the kingdom for ages paſt, have, by their ſkill and expence in the enrichment of their country, demonſtrated the generous fertility of their lands, in the returns they made them for their labour. It might be excuſable enough in a Frenchman to diſſuade our countrymen from planting of hops, with an air of friendly concern, that our country would not produce them; but thoſe who have read in our author, Dr. Bulleyn, and others, in what perfection they flouriſhed here before that Frenchman was born, will look upon his concern as a kind of farcical friendſhip; and it might have juſtified the title of his book (6), if he could thereby have abridged our planters and our revenue of the great benefit they receive from them. It was above fifty years ſince affirmed by a Staffordſhire Phyſician, that they have advanced land to the profit of ſometimes an hundred pounds an acre (7). It has alſo as what may contribute to illuſtrate, in ſome particulars, the Natural Hiſtories of thoſe places. In that city, he practiſed with great reputation, and among others of the moſt eminent alſo been of late publickly ſet forth, that but four years laſt paſt, the produce of the duty on hops, was no leſs than ſixty-five thouſand two hundred eighteen pounds, twelve ſhillings and five pence: and that the laſt year, in which the Duke of Cumberland ſhone like another ſun in Great Britain, our hop-countries produced no leſs than 120,000 bags: yet we muſt have foreign commerce for their hops too, though the importation of the great quantities that have been damaged, rotten, dried to, and mingled with duſt, ſand, and other ſoil, which made two parts in three of foreign hops formerly imported, has been long ſince complained of (8): and ſeeing alſo, we ſo often want not ſufficient of our own growth; which, as Dr. Bulleyn obſerves, was in his time as good as any in the world (9). It might be for that reaſon of ſuch damaged importations, perhaps, that there was a petition preſented in Parliament againſt them, as a wicked weed, ſo long ago as in the reign of King Henry VI. (10); or if it was for any pernicious property conceived in them, or the injudicious uſe of them, they have ſince been ſo ſucceſsfully propagated and uſed, and we have had ſo much better improvement of their culture from the ingenious author, who firſt wrote thereof among us (11), and from the Botaniſts, who have diſtinguiſhed their virtues, that they have out-grown all their accuſations, and been adjudged wholeſome. That petition will ſhew, that the uſe of them came in long before the Reformation, let that comical author, Dr. William King, ſay what he will about hops not being to be put into an Engliſhman's drink before hereſy came in (12): wherein he might be miſled by an erroneous, or miſquoted rhyme in the addition made to Stow's Chronicle by his Editor, Edmond Howes, where he ſays,

> Turkies, carps, hops, pick'rel, and beer,
> Came into England all in a year (13).

Every one of theſe particulars, even not excepting perhaps that of hops and beer, might be confuted, if it were here expedient to enlarge upon thoſe topics. The like conceit ſeems to have been too ſtrictly entertained of our cherries; that we had none tolerable among us, till Richard Harris, fruiterer to King Henry VIII. brought over from Flanders, about that part of his Majeſty's reign before mentioned, the ſhoots or grafts of a better kind, and planted them here alſo at Tenham in Kent; from which plantation they are called Kentiſh cherries (14): but we may compute from our author, Dr. Bulleyn, again, that there grew great plenty of good cherries at Ketreinham, near Norwich, about the ſame time theſe Flemiſh cherries came to ſuch perfection in Kent. The ſame fruiterer brought over ſome different ſpecies of other fruits, as alſo did Mr. Maſcall of Plumſted, in Suſſex, as we are informed by a name-ſake of his (15): whence came our firſt Kentiſh pippins, and other plantations of thoſe pippins elſewhere, as alſo ſome pears perhaps; but we ought not to infer from thence, that we had no good apples and pears till that time, ſince we have it again from Dr. Bulleyn, that we had a pear of our own growth, in and about the city of Norwich, called the Black-Friars pear, that was very delicious, pleaſant, and profitable to hot ſtomachs; and he produces the judgment of a right worſhipful Phyſician of the ſame city, Dr. Manfield, that thoſe pears, without all compariſon, were the beſt that grew in any place of England (16). But as a proof of the great propenſity there is in the moſt barren, ſtony, and unpromiſing parts of our ſoil, to the vegetation of plants, and their bringing forth fruit in great plenty and perfection, even without care or culture, there is an extraordinary inſtance in the Orford peaſe; and Dr. Bulleyn ſeems to have been the firſt author who obſerved and recorded it, at leaſt who deſcribed this remarkable example of fertility, from his own ſight and knowledge of it. He ſays, that in the year 1555, at that town in Suffolk, between the haven and the main ſea, where never plough came, nor natural earth was, but ſtones only, infinite thouſands of ſhip-loads; there did peaſe grow, whoſe roots were more than two fathom long; and the peſcods grew in cluſters, like the chats or keys of aſh trees; bigger than fitches, and leſs than field peaſe; very ſweet to eat of, and ſatisfied many of the poor dwelling thereabouts, who would otherwiſe have periſhed for hunger; the ſcarcity of bread being that year ſo great, that many were driven to make much of acorns; and they laboured under the ſickneſs of a ſtranger fever beſides, than was ever heard of there. Now, ſays the Doctor, whether theſe peaſe and providence of God, came through ſhipwreck, with much miſery, or elſe by much miracle, I am not able to determine; but ſown they were not by man's hands, nor like other peaſe (17). This ſtrange event is repeated in ſeveral authors; and among the writers of our chronicles, John Stowe confirms the ſame. He ſays, it happened in Auguſt that year, and that the place by the ſea-ſide, all of hard ſtones and pebbles, was called a ſhelf, lying between Orford and Alborough, where never graſs grew, nor any earth was ſeen. He computes the crop that was gathered, to have been above an hundred quarters, and yet there remained, ſome ripe, and ſome bloſſoming, as many more. He ſays farther, that the Biſhop of Norwich, the Lord Willoughby, and great numbers beſide, went to behold this fruitful harveſt of the hard rocky ſtones, which lay for the ſpace of three yards under their roots; which were alſo ſweet (18), as, we read before, their fruit was. Dr. Bulleyn, in another part of the treatiſe aforeſaid, ſpeaks again of peaſe at Orford, that grow on the ſtones without ſowing (19), as if they grew oftener than once, or every year in ſuch manner; and indeed ſo it has been explained to me, by ſome inhabitants of that neighbourhood, that ſome remains of that great crop are ſtill produced there annually in their ſeaſon; however true the tradition may be, of ſome rigorous Lord, who endeavoured to deſtroy, and thereby deprive the poor of them. In this caſe they might ſow themſelves, as many fruits do; and ſo the peaſe on the Shelf at Orford, may almoſt contend for antiquity with the camomile on the Green at Brentford. But as for their firſt appearance there, in the year aforeſaid, if we are to look no higher than reaſon for the cauſe, that which it might moſt probably ſpring from, as Dr. Bulleyn has hinted, may be a ſhipwreck. Their being unlike other peaſe, ſtrengthens this ſuggeſtion; as that they might be of ſome foreign kind, unſeen in theſe parts before: but then this might have been remembered by the neighbours, and the Doctor might have told us more expreſsly, there lately had been ſuch a wreck upon that ſhore. As for the length of the ſtalks, that might be owing to the diſtance of the owzy bottom, or other lodging and rooting-places, down between the pebbles and cliffs of the ragged ſhelves, through which ſome ſand and ſoil, that had been thrown up by the tides, were waſhed and ſunk; which ſtones, beſides other benefits, ſupplying the chief uſe of earth, ſupported the ſtems for that length, up through the ſpaces and cavities between them, into the air; to which they muſt aſpire, as well by their own diſpoſition to germinate and fructify, as by the attractive power of the ſun, whoſe kindly and natural warmth thoſe looſe ſtones were more aptly diſpoſed to receive and communicate, than ſtove-walls may be to forward and fertilize, by their artificial heat, the more chilly and tender plants that are raiſed againſt them: as in ſeveral parts of France, and other foreign countries, the vines will grow ſo fruitfully out of ſuch ſloping banks of ſtones as ſhall appear more conducive to their fertility, than the ſhallow and hungry ſoil they are rooted in. Not only the more hardy and common vegetables of our own growth, have thus ſometimes flouriſhed in the moſt rude and uncultivated places, without any human labour of ſowing or planting; but, it is certain, that in our ſoil, however our weather may ſometimes be inconſtant and unfavourable, many more profitable exotics might, with ordinary care, be naturalized, than have been, and to better purpoſe; to the enrichment as well as ornament of our country, and as well in greater plenty as variety, if the ſpirit of importing and propagating them had been continued with the ſame vigour as it was begun. For when, after its long ſleep in the bed of ignorance, Botany began to revive, ſhoot forth its flouriſhing leaves, and diſplay its fruitful products in the works of the learned; when it came to inſtruct us in the vegetable eminent inhabitants, was in great favour with Sir Thomas Hilton, Knight, Baron of Hilton, who was Captain of Tinmouth-caſtle under King Philip and Queen Mary. We gather farther from his printed works, that he performed ſome notable cures in that family, particularly on the Baron's Lady, whom he recovered of a dangerous tympany, with a bread which he directed to be made of anniſeeds and ſome other herbs (f). He alſo proved the virtues of dittany in curing the ſame diſeaſe at Tinmouth-caſtle, where plenty of it grew on the rocks (g): probably upon the ſame Lady, at leaſt ſome other perſon in her family; and many other medicines he mentions, which, by his own knowledge and experience, proved ſucceſsful in the relief of human maladies [B]. treaſures of foreign nations as well as our own; when navigation invited our adventurous Argonauts to make diſcoveries in the New World, and eſtabliſh a communication between it and the Old, to the enlargement of the Britiſh glory as well as its dominions; and when our great men at home began to delight in more elegant buildings, and to adorn them around with the neweſt improvements of planting and gardening, which is recorded to have been in the latter part of Queen Elizabeth's reign; then were the ſaid diſcoverers of remote regions, as alſo our embaſſadors in foreign courts, beſides phyſicians, botaniſts, and other ingenious men ſkilled in this branch of Natural Philoſophy, induced, for the emolument of their country, as well as merchants and others, for their own, to import ſuch ſeeds, roots, fruits, and plants, as would furniſh thoſe curious perſons who encouraged them thereto, with various opportunities and occaſions of enlarging their experience in the fertility of this land: among whom, none of thoſe who ſolicited the ſaid importations, were more laudably aſſiduous, or more happily gratified, than the great Lord Burghley; though many others, our worthy navigators, travellers, and learned men, ſhould alſo be remembered, for their own honour, and that of this kingdom, who firſt embelliſhed the ſame with ſuch vegetable improvements; as well as thoſe patriots who excited them to the ſame; if it were proper in this place to carry the argument to its deſerved extent. By this means, and the arts of huſbandry and gardening, our vegetable productions were multiplied; many rare plants became natives of our ſoil, which are of ſovereign virtue in phyſic; many roots, greens, and pulſe, increaſed the variety of our food; and many trees no leſs diverſified our groves and gardens: Some, beneficial for the celerity of their growth; ſome, for the value of their timber; ſome, for the beauty of their flowers; ſome, for the magnificence of their ſhade; and others, for the excellence of their fruit; inſomuch that we had then, in that Queen's time, of our indigenous ſtores and importations together, beſides apricots, peaches, and others of the more elegant flavour, as we have elſewhere obſerved, no leſs than fourteen or fifteen different kinds of cherries; no leſs than threeſcore different kinds of plums, as many ſorts of pears, exceeding good; and apples of ſuch various kinds, as it was then thought impoſſible to deſcribe them all. So favourable was our ſun and ſoil in thoſe days, how indifferently ſoever they have been thought of in ours, when all thoſe, and many other fruits, with their different ſpecies, flouriſh in much greater variety. Mr. John Gerard, the famous botaniſt, whoſe indefatigable labour is no leſs to be commended, for increaſing the vegetable riches of this iſland, by rearing and naturalizing whatever plants were wanting in it, and he could procure from abroad, that would be beneficial to his countrymen, than for deſcribing them and their virtues ſo excellently as he has done in his Herbal (20), under the patronage and encouragement of the Lord Burghley aforeſaid. This man, moſt famous in his time for the knowledge and love of plants, had a large phyſic-garden near his houſe in Holbourn, wherein he raiſed near eleven hundred different herbs, ſhrubs, and trees, of foreign as well as domeſtic growth; as may be ſeen in the catalogue he publiſhed of them two years after the Herbal aforeſaid, which he dedicated in Latin to another of his patrons, Sir Walter Raleigh (21). Therein it may appear, that our ground would produce other fruits beſides hips and haws, acorns and pignuts. Yet commerce was ſtill ſo very obliging, that it condeſcended, at that time, to carry on a traffic even of pot-herbs, for the ſupply of our anceſtors tables, and would bring them home to their markets and doors, rather than give them the trouble of raiſing them in their gardens. For we are told, by a perſon of good knowledge in huſbandry, that in Queen Elizabeth's reign we had not only our garden wares from Holland (ſuch as cabbages, cauliflowers, &c.), but alſo cherries from Flanders, apples from France, ſaffron and licorice from Spain, and hops from the Low Countries; whereas now, ſays he, it is known, that licorice, ſaffron, cherries, apples, pears, hops, and cabbages of England, are the beſt in the world (22): And he imputes it to our ill huſbandry, that we have quinces from Flanders, ſmall nuts from Spain, prunes and walnuts from France, almonds from Italy, and cheſnuts from Portugal (23). Nay, we may gather from the ſame author, that, but twenty years before his writing theſe particulars, a famous town, which he names in the margin Graveſend, had not ſo much as a meſs of peaſe but what they were forced to ſend twenty miles for, even to London; though perhaps they ought to have been at the pains, ſince they would uſe none at home in raiſing them, to have gone as far as Orford for them.

[B] Which, by his own knowledge and experience, proved ſucceſsful in the relief of human maladies.] Beſides thoſe medicines he uſed to cure the Lady Hilton, and probably others, of a tympany, as before mentioned, our Doctor has ingenuouſly communicated ſeveral others, with which he no leſs effectually reſtored many patients; among which, we ſhall briefly point at ſome of the moſt remarkable. And theſe are, his clyſter to ſtop the bloody-flux; with which, he ſays, under the perſon or character of Health, 'Aſſure yourſelf I have helped many, and hin-'dered none that have uſed it; for I myſelf have 'oftentimes proved it, even ſo do you.' The particulars of the herbs, and other ingredients uſed in it, being too long to recite here, we muſt refer to, as alſo Dr. Manfield's clyſter for the cholic, mentioned in the ſame leaf (24). In his diſcourſe of eye-waters, he recommends ſome, which, in the ſame character, he ſays alſo, he had proved himſelf to have helped many; eſpecially one, which he tranſcribes from Euonimus; who, he ſays, was equal to any that ever practiſed diſtillation (25). In his treatiſe of the French diſeaſe, he fairly diſcloſes his own regimen, wherewith he cured many of it by his guaiacum-drink, and the diet here preſcribed; for the knowledge and management of which, he ſays, few men were to be compared to Thomas Glandfield, a ſkilful ſurgeon of London (26). With this diſcourſe ſhould be read, what he has ſaid in another of his books, as well upon the miſuſage, as the beſt manner of uſing the wood or raſpings of Guaiacum, in that diſeaſe (27), which, in thoſe days, was more common than is generally apprehended, as the antiquity of the ſaid diſeaſe has ſince been found more remote than the learned in our author's days ſuppoſed (28); and it never was more riſe among the Indians or Neapolitans, nor in France or Spain, than it was in the Doctor's time, or ſoon after, in England. An eminent ſurgeon publiſhed a tract not long after our author's death, wherein he affirms, that in the Hoſpital of St. Bartholomew in London, alone, there had been cured of this diſeaſe by himſelf, and three others, within five years, to the number at leaſt of one thouſand or more; and a little farther he ſays, 'It ſel-'dom happened, in that ſingle hoſpital, while I 'ſerved there, for the ſpace of nine or ten years, 'but that among every twenty diſeaſed perſons who 'were taken in, ten of them had the pocks (29).' But to return to our author; who, deſcribing a tabes, or corruption of humours, which begins with a continual rhume, and apoſthumates or putrifies the lungs, till it deſtroys the patient by a conſumption, he preſcribes a pill, made of the ſeeds and juice of ſage, with ſpicknard, ginger, long pepper, and old aſter, taking that Knight aforesaid, he, in the Epistle prefixed, dedicates his book above made use of, intitled, The Government of Health, in the last year of Queen Mary's reign. In this Epistle he ingenuously sets forth the honour of physicians, and the praise of health; and in the book he refers to another of his writing, upon Healthful Medicines (b), which he finished the year after the former; but the manuscript copy of it, with many others of his books, &c. which made a good part of his library, perished unfortunately by shipwreck. The author upon this came patiently to London, with intention to have recompiled the said work, but was very injuriously, for a considerable time, obstructed in it: for it was not long after he arrived at that city, in the year 1560, before he found himself, to his great surprise and affliction, most falsely and wrongfully charged, by Mr. William Hilton of Bidick, with having murdered his brother, our author's worthy patron, the Baron aforesaid; who really died, among his own friends, of a malignant fever. Yet the innocent Doctor was publicly arraigned for the same before the Duke of Norfolk; and the most diligent injustice was used to bring him to a shameful death, that his adversary might, with the covetous Ahab, through false witness and perjury, obtain, by the counsel of Jezabel, a vineyard with the price of blood. But all the shame and scandal fell upon the prosecutor's own head. His malice and cruelty were by justice exposed and rejected; and the Doctor was, though not without much vexation and expence, very honourably acquitted. Yet did not that wicked enemy of his give over his bloody persecution; but basely hired some ruffians to assassinate him, with whom also others were drawn in as accomplices, who were of genteel extraction. One R. Bellises of Yarrow, in particular, in the aforesaid bishopric, did most ungratefully attempt the life of this learned man, to whose skill he had, not long before, been indebted for his own life. But this also proving ineffectual, the said William Hilton arrested Dr. Bulleyn in an action for debt, and confined him in prison for a long time (i), where he wrote a great part of those Medicinal Treatises, which are to this day extant. Herein he frequently complains, that the vigilant molestations of his implacable enemies both hindered him from publishing more of his writings, and from completing those he had already published for the good of his country. But these indignities grieved him the less, coming from him who was a stranger to him, seeing he had persecuted the Lady Hilton, his own brother's wife, whose shame, loss, and blood, he had also sought, though she had redeemed much of his lands from loss, by the great sums of money she had lent him; 'and when this man, says the Doctor, should have thankfully repaid 'that Lady her money, then he gratified her as he did me (k).' Here the Doctor exclaims against the most odious and deforming vice of ingratitude, as he has elsewhere more copiously done, in other parts of his work (l); shewing how, in spite of great titles, long pedigrees, and coats of arms, it degrades, defaces, and defiles all gentility with the blackest obloquy, scandal, and contempt. Thus, triumphant innocence having raised a monument of infamy over tyrannical guilt, he leaves his defeated and despised enemy, with the character of being profitable to few, and noisome to himself; a lover of few, and flatterer of many; a vessel of ignorance, full of ingratitude; and unnatural, even to his own children, by wasting that in law which should be reserved for their relief: and he concludes, with recommending this cataplasm to his mortified conscience. Notwithstanding these cruel interruptions, he found means to set forth such of his compositions as gained him the character of a learned, experienced, and able physician. Throughout the same he also appears a man of piety and probity; and though he lived in the times of Popery, he was no way tainted with its principles. He was very intimate with the works of the ancient physicians and naturalists, both Greek, Roman, and Arabian; and, at the same time, was very fruitful in many modern examples of his own experience, of which we have given a little taste in the last note: and he was, above all, commendable, not only for the generous disposition, very exemplary in our age, of commemorating so candidly several persons of distinction, who had done good among their friends and neighbours with their private or family receipts, but also for celebrating many of those contemporaries who were eminent in his own profession;

taking every morning and evening an ounce; drinking sage water after it: and adds, 'This is the best 'pill that ever I did know, and it helped me in a 'great sickness (of that kind) in Suffolk, where some 'time I dwelled (30).' In another place he says, he has often proved that the roots of calamus aromaticus sodden in wine, and drank, has cured the white morphew (31). And somewhat farther, speaking of the dazie, and its virtues, called in Latin bellis, he more particularly informs us how he cured R. Bellisis, before spoken of, with it, among other medicines, of a palsey and a quartern, who yet sought afterwards divers ways to murder him, most ungratefully joining with ruffians for that bloody purpose (32). In the next leaf he relates how he recovered Sir Richard Alie, a Knight famous for his skill in military architecture, and especially for constructing the impregnable walls of Berwick, and other eminent buildings; to whom the Doctor administered relief, when other purgations would not work, and eased him of that choler adust, or melancholy humour, which annoyed him, with a decoction of sena, white ginger, and flowers of bugloss, in the whey of goats milk (33). Farther: where he is treating of the quality of cresses, he informs us of a Suffolk gentleman, who was an officer in the army, that was cured of a weakness in the seminal vessels, or involuntary wasting of nature, by an infusion of that herb in wine (34). Under his chapter of spurge, we have an account how the Lord Wharton was near being poisoned by quid pro quo, an ignorant servant, in the absence of the cook, procuring mercury sublimated at the apothecary's shop, instead of the herb mercury, and put it into the broth which his Lordship eat, and would have lost his life by it, if the poison had not been speedily discharged by proper emetics (35). And in his chapter of gums, &c. he says, that with a tent of bacon dipped in tar, he had oftentimes healed the fistula (36).

of both which, for their gratification who may be curious in hiſtorical enquiries after the promoters and practitioners of medicinal ſcience in thoſe times, a ſhort recital is here annexed [C]. Thus we have drawn together what Dr. Bulleyn has written of others and of himſelf, as far as he thought fit to acquaint us with his own perſonal hiſtory. His farther character as an author, beyond what we have already obſerved upon it, might, if it were needful, be drawn from a more deliberate examination of his Writings; which, becauſe ſome account may be expected of them, we ſhall here remit to another note [D]; all but one tract, the laſt we have met with of our author's publiſhing; which,

[C] Of both which, &c. a ſhort recital is here annexed.] Of the firſt, or thoſe gentlemen and ladies who thus humanely relieved the infirmities of their neighbours, Dr. Bulleyn has theſe words: 'Many 'good men and women within this realm have divers 'medicines for the cancre, and help their neighbours 'who are in peril, and are not only poor and needy, 'having no money to ſpend in chirurgery, but ſome 'dwell where no chirurgeons be near at hand: In 'ſuch caſes, many good gentlemen and ladies have 'done no ſmall pleaſure to poor people; as that ex-'cellent Knight, and worthy learned man, Sir Tho-'mas Eliot, whoſe works be immortal; Sir Philip 'Parris of Cambridge, whoſe cures deſerve praiſe; 'Sir William Gaſcogne of Yorkſhire, that helped 'many ſore eyes: and the Lady Tailor of Hunting-'donſhire, and the Lady Dorrel of Kent, had many 'precious medicines to comfort the ſight, and to heal 'wounds withal, and were well ſeen in herbs. The 'Commonwealth hath great want of them, and of 'their medicines; which, if they had come to my 'hands, they ſhould not have been written on the 'backſide of my book. Among all other, there was 'a Knight, a man of great worſhip, a godly, hurt-'leſs gentleman, who is departed this life, his name 'was Sir Anthony Hevenyngham (37). This gen-'tleman learned a water to kill a cancre, of his own 'mother, which he uſed all his life, to the great help 'of many men, women, and children. He had alſo 'a ſalve for ſundry green wounds, but becauſe I have 'not the copy thereof, I will make report but only 'of that water which I am ſure he uſed; and it is 'not much unlike a water for the cancre which An-'dreas Furnerius, the Frenchman, did make, of 'great virtue, &c. (38)' And of the modern phy-ſicians, ſuch eſpecially who had advanced the worthy art of chirurgery, among the worthy fraternity of chi-rurgeons in London, by their lectures in anatomy, he commends 'the learned Dr. John Kaius, his reveal-'ing to the ſaid fraternity the hidden jewels and pre-'cious treaſures of Galen; ſhewing himſelf to be the 'ſecond Linacre, whoſe ſteps he followeth. Who 'ſhall forget, adds he, the moſt worthy Dr. William 'Turner? whoſe learned acts I leave to the witty 'commendations, and immortal praiſe, of Conradus 'Geſnerus: yet his book of herbs will always grow 'green, and never wither, as long as Dioſcorides is 'had in mind among us mortal wights (*). In the 'noble ſtate of Knights among the Engliſh or Britiſh 'nation, which of them did ever in race give a trip, 'out-run, or win the victory of Sir Thomas Eliot, 'Knight? who hath planted ſuch fruitful trees, &c. 'that his grafts do grow in each place in this our 'commonwealth; and his Caſtle of Health cannot de-'cay. Thomas Faire (or Phayer), Doctor of Phyſic, 'is not dead, but is transformed and changed into a 'new nature, immortal. He hath left a piece of 'dark earth behind him, and is gone over Lethe's 'flood, forgetting this world; and with pleaſure 'ſpendeth his time among the heavenly Muſes, under 'the two-topped Hill of Parnaſſus. Full well he 'knew Pliny, who taught the goodneſs of clean 'creatures, and alſo the peſtiferous venom of deadly 'melancholy ſerpents, and their preſent remedy by 'the virtue of herbs of ſundry kinds. Dr. Andrew 'Borde wrote alſo well of phyſic to profit the com-'monwealth withal. This man declared, how that 'he was in a great city where he did ſee three helliſh 'tragedies; the one was Nullus Ordo, the ſecond was 'Stridor Dentium, the third was Horror Inhabitans; 'and yet this Borde was a bird of this neſt or cage, 'called Rome, whereof he maketh this report (39). 'I will not forget Maſter Thomas Paguinellus, or 'Paynel, who hath played the good ſervant to the 'commonwealth, in tranſlating good books of phy-'ſic. Dr. William Kunningham hath well travailed, 'like a good ſoldier, againſt the ignorant enemy; 'ſetting forth the commendation, praiſe, and profit 'of aſtronomy, coſmography, and geography, &c. '(40). How well was he ſeen in tongues, learned 'in arts and ſciences, natural and moral; a father 'in phyſic; whoſe learning gave liberty to the igno-'rant, with his Whetſtone of Wit, and Caſtle of 'Knowledge? and, finally, giving place to ſliding 'nature, died himſelf in bondage or priſon; by 'which death he was delivered and made free, and 'yet liveth in the happy land, among the laureat 'learned: his name was Dr. Record; with many 'others, which I muſt give place to time: for their 'virtues be not unknown in phyſic and chirurgery, 'although I name them not. Yet if you do further 'delight, without diſdain, to know the names of 'them who have been excellent in the worthy arts of 'chirurgery, phyſic, &c. I will declare their names 'in order as I have noted and known.' He then gives us a liſt of above an hundred and twenty anci-ents and moderns, foreigners as well as natives, who profeſſed the ſaid arts; among which, there are about thirty Engliſhmen; the chief of whom, not already named, are, Bartholmæus, who wrote De Proprieta-tibus Rerum; Dr. Barclay; Dr. Butts; Dr. Cle-mens; Dr. Chambers; Dr. Caldwell, of Oxford; Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge; Mr. Edmunds, ſur-geon, of York; and Mr. Gale, of London; Dr. Hector, of Cambridge; Dr. Robert Huyck, the Queen's Phyſician; Dr. Freer, of Cambridge; John Porter, of Norwich; Dr. Langton, and Dr. Larkin, both of Cambridge; Dr. Maſters; Robert Balthrop, ſurgeon; Dr. Simon Ludford, of Oxford; Thomas Colfe, apothecary; Dr. Wendy, of Cambridge; and Vicars, or Vicary, the ſurgeon, of London (41).

(41) Dr. Bul-leyn's Dialogue be-tween Sore-neſs and Chi-rurgery, fol. 4.

[D] His writings —— we ſhall here remit to another note.] Our author's book of Healthful Medicines, we have before ſpoken of, and obſerved, by what acci-dent the public was deprived of it. Whether it was written in the form of a dialogue, as the reſt of his pieces are, which we have ſeen, is not now to be re-ſolved. To what has been above ſaid of his book, intitled The Government of Health, we may add, that it was firſt printed in 8*vo*, 1548, according to An-thony Wood, with a wooden cut of the author pre-fixed, repreſenting his face in profile, with a long beard. An imperfect copy of one edition, had been the property of Mr. William Beckett, formerly a ſur-geon of note in London, who, to qualify himſelf for the laudable labour he had undertaken, of reviving our old phyſicians, a work long neglected, and which he, to the regret of the curious, left unfiniſhed, had made himſelf eminently acquainted with their lives and writings. By the dates written, by Mr. Beckett, at the end of this book, it appears that the ſaid edi-tion was printed in 1559. There was a later edition ſtill, after the author's death, part of which was bound up with this book, to complete it; in which, the title runs thus:—The Government of Health; a Treatiſe written by William Bullein, for the eſpeciall good and healthful Preſervation of Man's Bodie from all noyſome Diſeaſes, proceeding from the Exceſs of evill Diet, and other Infirmities of Nature: Full of excellent Medicenes and wiſe Counſels, for Conſervation of Health in Men, Women, and Children: both pleaſant and pro-fitable to the induſtrious Reader. London: Printed by Valentine Sims, in Adling-ſtreet, at the White Swan, near Bainard's Caſtle, 8*vo*, 1595. After the dedi-cation to Baron Hilton, as before obſerved, there are ſome Engliſh verſes of the author's, in praiſe of tem-perance and ſobriety, and on the ill conſequences of gluttony and drunkenneſs. At the end of them are two rhiming lines in Latin, to the ſame purpoſe, as follow:

Eſſe cupis ſanus? ſit tibi parca manus;
Pone gulæ metas, ut ſit tibi longa etas.

Which

which, to do juſtice to its contents, might ſwell that note too much, if it were involved in the catalogue of his other writings: for, as it contains many remarkable particulars, which,

Which may be rendered thus:

If for health you are thinking, be not often drinking;
If you'd live long quiet, be ſparing in diet.

The work contains an account of the nature and properties of all ſimples uſed in food, and how to prevent or deſtroy thoſe diſtempers to which the body of man is incident. In the 43d page of the former, and the 17th leaf of the laſt edition, there is an anatomical figure of a man with the twelve cœleſtial ſigns, and ſeven planets about him, directed to the ſeveral parts of the body over which they are conceived to preſide; which is copied from Jerom of Brunſwick's Anatomy, as Mr. Beckett has in a note at bottom obſerved. The work is interſperſed here and there with ſome other ſpecimens of our author's poetry, and ſome wholſome reflections or admonitions for the conduct of life. Among which, thoſe that would perſuade mankind to a regard of that ſagacity and forecaſt, they are commonly moſt apt to neglect, and which many parts of the brute creation have more prudence to practiſe, cannot be too much inculcated; nor any exhortations be more ſeaſonably enforced at all times, than thoſe he makes to all men, while they are in the health and vigor of their younger days, to provide againſt the infirmities of age; where ſpeaking of that luſty ſtate and flower of our lives, from the twenty-fifth to the thirty-fifth thereof, he ſays, 'It is the beſt time for mankind to travel in, 'with godly exerciſe in ſcience, art, and profitable 'travels in his vocation; putting in practice the vir-'tues which he hath learned in youth; for this is 'the ſummer part of life, wherein all goodly fruits 'did flouriſh in every good occupation: this is the 'very harveſt, to gather precious corn, and fruit of 'their labours, againſt the cold ſtorms and cloudy 'days of their aged winter, wherein the body ſhall 'be weak, and the eyes ſight decay, and the hands 'tremble; and therefore it is not comely to ſee the 'ſtate of age without reſt, which, in the time of 'youth, did honeſtly travel; for there is a grace 'given to many creatures, unreaſonable, both beaſts 'and fowls, to make proviſion before-hand: What 'is then to be required of men, reaſonable?' as he farther inſtances, in certain verſes there added (42). But ſome former reader of them perceiving the good ſenſe in thoſe lines, and regretting the infirmities of old age in them, which they admoniſh us to provide againſt, has endeavoured to re-inveſt them in a more modern dreſs; and theſe are the words as they are written in the margin of the ſaid copy.

(42) The Government of Health, p. 30.

The bird, in ſpring, her artful neſt will build;
The ant, with grain, in autumn ſtore her cell;
The ſquirrel's dray, with nuts, 'gainſt winter's fill'd;
Theſe, tho' irrational, their wants foretel!
Then ſhou'd not man, with reaſon on his ſide, E'er he grows old, for age infirm provide?

C. S.

No leſs regard has our author had to youth than old age: and as his admonitions could not be more ſeaſonable in his days than they are in ours, ſo of no leſs general importance are his judicious enforcements of that indiſpenſable duty in all parents, of reſtraining their children in time, by education, from all indirect or diſcreditable courſes, and training them in thoſe that will make them ſerviceable members of a commonwealth; to the neglect of which is owing all the greateſt evils of a kingdom: for, ſays he, very emphatically, 'Parents have no ſmall charge com-'mitted unto them, that muſt give account to God 'how they have brought up their children; and they 'who in theſe years do ſpare correction, truly be 'grievous enemies unto their children, and at laſt 'ſhall be recompenſed with ſhame, when they ſhall 'ſee misfortune and wretchedneſs fall upon the fruits 'of their own ſeed. For men have ſmall profit of 'their corn, that is choked and overcome with thiſtles, 'bryars, and brakes, which were not weeded in 'time; much leſs of their children, who have re-'ceived neither correction nor honeſt learning in due 'ſeaſon. If the keepers of gardens be careful over 'their late ſown ſeeds and tender herbs, which are 'in danger to be deſtroyed of every froſt; what ſhould 'good fathers and mothers do for their children, 'whoſe tender and youthful years be carried away 'and overcome of every foo'iſh fantaſy (43)?' There is another treatiſe aſcribed to Dr. Bulleyn, in the firſt printed catalogue of our old books (44), and out of that, by Anthony Wood, intitled, A Regimen againſt the Pleuriſy, 8vo, London, 1562 (45); but this, not having ſeen, we cannot ſay any thing more of it. It is much that it was not involved, as The Government of Health in ſome part is, in the collection of his works which was publiſhed the ſame year. This is intitled, Bulleyn's Bulwarke of Defence againſt all Sickneſs, Sorenes, and Woundes, that dooe daily aſſaulte Mankinde: which Bulwarke is kept with Hillarius the Gardiner, Health the Phiſician, with their Chyrurgian, to help the wounded Soldiors. Gathered and practiſed from the moſte worthie Learned, bothe old and newe, to the great Comforte of Mankinde. Doen by Willyam Bulleyn, and ended this Marche, Anno Salutis, 1562, folio. Imprinted at London by John Kyngſton. On the back of the title-page are the arms of Henry Cary, Baron of Hunſdon, Knight of the Garter, printed from a wooden cut; to which Lord our author dedicates the volume, and calls it his Bulwark, or little Fort, againſt the bodily Evils of Soreneſs and Sickneſs; 'and though there may be many, ſays he, ma-'licious enough and cankered of mind, who with 'ſlander and diſdain may lay their batteries againſt 'this fort, I ſhall be ever able to repulſe them, 'through your Lordſhip's aid; for it neither wants 'ſtrength of ordnance, proviſion of victuals, nor po-'licy of the moſt worthy Captains and good Soldiers, 'as Hypocrates, Galen, Dioſcorides, &c. (46)' This volume conſiſts of, 1. The Book of Compounds, with a table of their names, and the apothecaries rules or terms. 2. The Book of the Uſe of ſick Men and Medicines; before which is prefixed a wooden print of an old man, in a fur gown, and a flat bonnet, his purſe or ſcrip by his ſide, ſupporting himſelf on his ſtaff, and a death's head at his feet, with four verſes at bottom. Theſe are both compoſed in dialogues, between Sickneſs and Health; with an Index at the end. Then follows, 3. The Book of Simples, being an herbal, in the form of a dialogue, between Marcellus and Hillarius; at the end of which are the wooden cuts of ſome plants, and of ſome limbecks or ſtills; and after theſe, an index to this part. The laſt treatiſe in the book is, 4. A Dialogue between Soreneſs and Surgery; concerning apoſthumations and wounds, with their cauſes and cures. This tract has three wooden cuts in it; one repreſenting a man's body on the fore part, full of ſores and ſwellings; the other, in like manner, behind: the third is alſo a human figure, in which the veins are ſeen, directed to, and named, which are to be opened in phlebotomy; and at the end is an index alſo, as to the reſt. Seventeen years after theſe pieces were thus publiſhed, or three years after the author's death, there was a ſecond impreſſion of them, with ſome few corrections and improvements (47); but there is no addition of the author's tracts before mentioned, or that treatiſe of his, which is the ſubject of the next note, and was publiſhed, in two or three editions, between the firſt publication and the laſt, of that collection. But there is prefixed to the ſaid laſt edition, a copy of commendatory verſes, by Thomas Newton, an eminent phyſician, and author of Cheſter; in which it plainly appears that Dr. Bulleyn was then dead, and therefore confirms us in what we before obſerved, as a miſtake in Anthony Wood. In the library of a phyſician, ſome years ago deceaſed, there was a copy of this volume, in a blank leaf of which were ſome other commendatory verſes upon it, written with a pen; which, becauſe they ſeem not to have been publiſhed, we ſhall here, as the greater rarity, preſent to our reader.

So old a writer, and withal ſo good!
Believe me, Bulleyn, thou had'ſt ne'er withſtood
The teeth of Time, with ſuch a youthful look,
Had not good med'cines thus preſerv'd thy book.

Here we have cypreſs wood, and cedar oil,

To purge the Critics, and confound the Quacks.

which, by reaſon of its great ſcarcity, have been long buried and forgotten, we have been perſuaded to revive a particular extract of them: and as they comprehend a variety of intelligence, that may be uſeful or agreeable to the curious, theſe are the reaſons this tract is reſerved to appear laſt by itſelf [E]. All that we have met with farther of Dr.

Thus Bulleyn's BULWARK well deſerves the name,
Both for the reader's health, and writer's fame.

All we have here more to obſerve is, that the Doctor's brother, Richard Bulleyn the Divine, above in the text mentioned, who died on the 16th of October 1563, was alſo well ſkilled in ſome branches of phyſic; having left behind him a treatiſe called The whole Regimen of the Stone, as the Doctor informs us, where he has given a ſpecimen of his brother's practice in that diſeaſe (*), with the ſyrup, electuary, pills, plaiſter, and clyſter, he preſcribed in the ſame; and alſo promiſed to oblige the public with the work complete: but that he did ſo, is not as yet come to our knowledge.

[E] To appear laſt by itſelf.] This long neglected and unknown treatiſe, is intitled, A Dialogue both pleaſaunte and pietifull; wherein is a goodlie Regiment againſt the Fever Peſtilence; with a Conſolation and Comfort againſt Death. By William Bulleyn. Printed octavo, 1564. It was again newly corrected by the author, and imprinted at London, by John Kyngſton, 8*vo*, 1569 (48). This dialogue is dedicated by the author, to his friend Edward Barret, of Belhouſe in Eſſex, Eſq; at whoſe ſaid ſeat part of it was written, and the Epiſtle Dedicatory to him is dated the twelfth of March 1564. There are twelve interlocutors in the whole diſcourſe, which conſiſts of much variety. Their names ſpecified in Latin, according to their characters, are, the Poor Beggar; the Citizen and his Wife; the Rich Man Antonio, and his Servant; the Phyſician and Apothecary; the Miſer, Double Dealer, Lying Traveller, Death, and the Divine. From theſe we learn, in general, the diſpoſitions and demeanour of various conditions in life, when any adverſity draws near a city, eſpecially that of the peſtilence. The author has briefly deſcribed, in the perſon of the beggar, our needy brother's poverty, calling upon the mercileſs rich, who are wholly entrenched in the thorny embraces of their treaſures, and entangled in ſweet-briers of the world: ſhewing with all, how the ſickneſs of the wealthy is the health of the poor; how the loſs of the one is the luck of the other; who, when they themſelves become naked, are clothed againſt their wills; death only being able to render thoſe poſſeſſions of the covetous beneficial by diſperſion, which monopoly had made a nuiſance; like the muckhills that are a burthen to the land, and offenſive to the inhabitants thereof, till their heaps are caſt abroad to the profit of many: which is a compariſon, by the way, that, with a little variation of words, has been admired in ſucceeding authors, though Dr. Bulleyn has never been quoted for it. Thus, by neglecting our old writers, we are led to the injuſtice of conferring that reſpect which is due to their ſentiments, upon thoſe who are more modern (49). As the drift of this dialogue is to run out of one remarkable character, deſcription, or ſtory, into another, they cannot all be ſo equally intereſting at this diſtance of time, as to require a coherent and proportionable epitome. We ſhall therefore only point at the moſt capital or conſiderable of them, and ſuch as are moſt entertaining in themſelves, or moſt applicable and likely to illuſtrate others; above all, ſuch as will beſt diſplay the knowledge and genius of the author. Among theſe, one of the moſt conſpicuous objects is that fine column, which one of the correſpondents takes notice of, in the delightful garden of Antonio the rich nobleman, which was eighteen feet high, and eight ſquare, adorned with compartments of curious maſonry; in which, the Muſes were repreſented ſitting under Parnaſſus, and not only ſeveral of the ancient poets, under green trees, with laurel garlands beſet with roſes on their heads, and golden pens in their hands; but, near them, the moſt famous alſo of our Engliſh poets; who were, to range them here more correſpondently with the order of time, than they were carved on theſe entablatures, firſt of all, 'witty CHAUCER, who ſat in a chair of gold, 'covered with roſes, writing proſe and rhyme, accom-'panied with the ſpirits of many kings, knights, 'and fair ladies, whom he pleaſantly beſprinkled 'with the ſweet water of the well, conſecrated to 'the Muſes, named Aganippe. And as his heavenly 'ſpirit commended his dear Brigham (50), for the 'worthy intombing of his bones in the long ſleeping 'chamber of moſt famous kings; ſo in tragedy he 'bewailed the ſudden reſurrection of many a noble-'man before their time, in the ſpoiling of epitaphs, 'whereby many have loſt their inheritance, &c.' To this deſcription are annexed ſome verſes of that poet's, lamenting the ſame. 'Near alſo ſat old moral 'GOWER, with pleaſant pen in hand, commending 'honeſt love, without luſt; and pleaſure, without 'pride; holineſs in the Clergy, without hypocriſy; 'no tyranny in rulers, no falſhood in lawyers, no 'uſury in merchants, no rebellion in the commons; 'and unity among kingdoms, &c. There appeared 'alſo, lamenting LIDGATE, lurking among the 'lillies, with his bald ſconce, and a garland of wil-'lows about it. Booted he was, after St. Bennet's 'guiſe; and a black ſtammel robe, with a monſtrous 'hood hanging backward; his body ſtooping for-'ward, bewailing every ſtate, with the ſpirit of pro-'vidence; foreſeeing the falls of wicked men, and 'the ſlippery ſeats of Princes; the ebbing and flow-'ing, the riſing and falling of men in authority; 'how virtue advances the ſimple, and vice over-'throws the moſt noble of the world. SKELTON ſat 'in the corner of a pillar, with a froſty bitten face, 'frowning; and ſcarcely yet cooled of the hot burn-'ing choler, kindled againſt the cankred Cardinal 'Wolſey; writing many a ſharp diſticon, with 'bloody pen, againſt him; which he ſent, through 'the infernal rivers Styx, Phlegeton, and Acheron, 'by the ferryman of hell, called Charon, to the ſaid 'Cardinal. Then BARCLAY, in a hooping ruſſet 'long coat, with a pretty hood in his neck, and fine 'knots upon his girdle, after Francis's tricks. He 'was born beyond the cold river of Tweed. He lodged 'upon a ſweet bed of camomile, under the cinnamon 'tree: about him, many ſhepherds and ſheep, with 'pleaſant pipes, greatly abhorring the life of cour-'tiers, citizens, uſurers, and bankrupts, &c. whoſe 'old days are miſerable; and the ſtate of ſhepherds 'and country people, he accounted moſt happy and 'ſure (51).' There are verſes ſuitable to theſe characters, cited at the end of every one, as of the firſt; which for their good ſenſe deſerve to be recited, and therefore are not omitted here, ſo much for any little roughneſs in their cadence, which might appear to mere modern readers, or a few antiquated words in them, as that our account of Dr. Bulleyn's work may not be thought too much amplified with digreſſion. But before we proceed to ſome few other obſervable paſſages in this book of his, we muſt here obſerve, of the laſt mentioned poet, Alexander Barclay, that there is an expreſſion in this character of him, which very luckily reconciles the diſpute in many hiſtorians about his birth-place; who muſt no longer entitle Devonſhire (52) or Somerſetſhire (53) to the ſame, ſeeing our author, a contemporary, who lived in, and long upon, the borders of Scotland, ſays, as above, he was born in that kingdom: and as much indeed might have been, in a great meaſure, gathered from an attentive peruſal of this poet himſelf: among other places, where he makes a digreſſion in praiſe of James the Fourth of that kingdom, and a preference of him, before all other Chriſtian Princes, to be the leader of an holy war; not doubting of peace to Chriſtianity, and conqueſt of the Turk's dominions, if the Engliſh lion would come to a firm and faithful union of his wiſdom and riches, with the Scotch unicorne's might and hardineſs (54). Before we leave this poet, we ſhall only admoniſh our reader, that he is not to be taken for either of the Alexander Barclays, grandfather or grandſon, of Mathers in Scotland, who both lived near enough in time to be miſtaken by an unwary reader, or one ſuperficially verſed in the chronology of his ſtory, for him; and the rather in that the former of them was a man of a poetical genius, as may appear in a ſcarce tract, which, commemorating that line of the Barclays, was written by a deſcendant thereof, though but few copies were printed of it, for the

Dr. Bulleyn, is, that he died on the ſeventh day of January 1576 (m), and that he was buried in the ſame grave, and under the ſame tomb, with his brother Richard the Divine, the private ſatisfaction of the ſaid family, and none ever publiſhed (55). But to go on with the contents of our book, and that part more expreſsly promiſed in the title, A Regimen in the Plague; which we are led to by the conference of Antonius the Rich Man, and his Phyſician; and here we have the cauſes and ſigns thereof, with directions as to air, diet, phyſic, &c. in many preſcriptions from the moſt learned authors, for about ſixteen leaves; which yet is not above a ſeventh part of the whole book. Throughout the ſame, though that regimen does not appear to have been written upon any particular occaſion, in other parts of the dialogue it does; and there is a letter at the end, written by the author to Mr. Francis Barlow, who then lay expiring under this ſickneſs, paſt all hopes of recovery. Therefore he preſcribes to him, and to another of his acquaintance, Mr. Ambroſe Barnes, rather like a Divine than a Phyſician; recommending a contented reſignation of this frail being to that perfect and omnipotent Being who did but lend it; who offers no wrong in reſuming his own, nor any new hardſhip in that change of life to which all our forefathers have before paſſed; and to which, in this pilgrimage, though our plagues may be great, they are not ſo great as our deſerts of them; all our ſorrows, and all our ſufferings, not ſo great as our ſins: concluding in theſe words, 'If the time 'had not been ſo much ſpent, and the venom ſo 'dangerous, and the parts ſo weak and feeble, I 'would have cauſed you to have been let blood, and 'given you pills contra peſtem, with cordials accordingly, by God's grace, if that would have done 'you any good; but take this cordial in good part, '&c. (56)' Hence, being directed to the hiſtory of thoſe times, we may conclude that this inſtance of thoſe patients, and indeed our author's book itſelf, were the effect of that great plague which was brought into this realm by the Engliſh army, who were called home from Newhaven in France, of which they had been in poſſeſſion near a twelvemonth, under Ambroſe Dudley, Earl of Warwick; having been more unmercifully beſieged there by this diſeaſe, than by the enemy; and with this contagious peſtilence, at their return in 1563, but a year before our author firſt publiſhed this book above, they ſo infected their own country, that, as our beſt hiſtorians have recorded, above twenty-one thouſand five hundred perſons died thereof in London only (57). And ſo epidemically that infection raged in this city, that there was but one ſtreet in it which eſcaped it; the name of which, with the reaſon of its ſaid happy exemption, having been tranſmitted to us by another phyſician, who lived at that time, and being worthy of obſervation, we ſhall give it in his own words, as follows: 'Here 'a great queſtion ariſeth, Whether ſweet ſmells correct the peſtilent air, or rather be as a guide to 'bring it the ſooner into our hearts? to determine 'which queſtion, I call all the dwellers in Bucklerſbury in London to give their ſentence; which only 'ſtreet, by reaſon that it is wholly repleniſhed with 'phyſic, drugs, and ſpicery, and was daily perfumed in the time of the plague, with pounding of 'ſpices, melting of gums, and making perfumes for 'others, eſcaped that great plague brought from 'Newhaven, whereof there died ſo many, that 'ſcarce any houſe was left unviſited (58).' But now to purſue our dialogue, there follows a long confabulation between the citizen and his wife; who with Roger their ſervant, like multitudes of others, are all flying the city upon the melancholy and dreadful proſpects of that deſtructive viſitation every where about it; and as they travel along, they entertain one another with a great diverſity of topics. When they come to Barnet, which was Roger's birth-place, the Heath reminds him of a ſtory he had received from his parents, concerning his grandfather, who was a leader of a band of tall men, under the Earl of Warwick, againſt King Edward IV., in that bloody battle which was fought there, on Palm-Sunday 1471; when many thouſands were ſlain on that ſpot of ground (59), and the ſaid Earl among them. But conſcience or fear prevailing upon the grandfather of this Roger (60), the night before the battle, he ſtole from the Earl's camp, and hid himſelf in a great hollow oak: where he lived for a month upon the acorns and nuts which had been laid up in ſtore there by the ſquirrels; and in his ſallet, or head-piece, preſerved the rain water for his drink, till at length he eſcaped without danger; in memory whereof, or his more martial atchievements, his harneſs was worn upon St. George's back, in their church, many a cold winter after: and it is here noted, that this piece of ſecret hiſtory was not to be found in the Chronicles (61). A little farther, on occaſion of ſome diſcourſe they have upon the ungenerous and ungrateful treatment which the open-hearted and needy ſo often meet with in the world, from the crafty and more covetous part thereof, Roger relates them a fable in a very humorous and diverting manner. It is called Jack Drake's Medicine, being a cure for treacherous ingratitude. It is too long to repeat here with all its circumſtances, and would loſe much of its beauty without them. The ſubject of it ſets forth the peril which the water fowls led the land fowls into, by decoying them to a voyage, and the revenge of the land fowls upon their aquatic deceivers (62). The title ſeems not to be derived ſo much from the name of thoſe birds which are partly concerned in the action, as from ſome man, who was famous for ſetting the ſtory forth in all its agreeable colours: if ſo, it might be denominated from that very John Drake, the ſhoemaker of Norwich in the time of King Henry VIII., and in Dr. Bulleyn's time, whoſe humour to be of the gentleman's cut in his clothes, was well purged by Sir Philip Calthrop, as Camden has pleaſantly rehearſed (63). Our author, a little farther, puts a ſtory into Roger's mouth, which one would believe he muſt have lived in our age to have ſo much as dreamed of. But as it has been always a well-known practice of the Papiſts, to raiſe themſelves profit by forging of miracles, and they never fail of finding objects fit for their purpoſe; ſo they then procured one that anſwered their ends, in the perſon of a bold girl, born at Harborough, the daughter of one Booker, who was a butcher in that town; and this woman, to the great alarm or aſtoniſhment of the world at the ſudden inconſtancy or inconſiſtency of human nature, was delivered of a cat; not of a kitten, as other cats are; but without any ſpace of time which it muſt need in the world to grow ſuch, a full grown, old cat, at this its firſt pretended birth, that had bacon found in the belly of it (64). Might we not here be apt to fancy, that the tutors of Mary Toft, of Godalmin in Surry, had been reading this ſtory, and made improvements of it upon her; who, at that town, was, in the year 1726, brought-to-bed of ſeventeen rabbits, with great fame and ſucceſs. But ſhe muſt needs keep kindling on, for the continuance of that livelihood ſhe was thereby promiſed, without any other labour; and we know not what a fruitful warren ſhe might have proved, through the careful aſſiſtance of her ſurgeon, Mr. Howard of Guilford, and Monſ. St. Andre, the King's anatomiſt, with the reſt of the body learned in the profound art of midwifery, Sir Richard Manningham, Dr. Douglaſs, Dr. Mowbray, Mr. Limborch, &c. if ſhe had not, by ſecretly purchaſing a rabbit at London, when ſhe was removed to Lacy's bagnio in Leiceſterfields, and obſtinately denying it before the Juſtice, procured herſelf ſuch cloſer commitment to cuſtody there, and more vigilant attendance, as quite ſmothered the project. That Juſtice of the Peace, Sir Thomas Clarges, by his ſeaſonable ſeverity, proved the beſt doctor of them all, as one of them confeſſed; for he delivered her even of the impoſture, drove away her unnatural births, and reſtored the woman to a due conſiſtence with, or conſideration of, herſelf: ſo that after her confeſſions, Mary Toft was a rabbit-breeder no more; but the renown of her anomalous productions will remain, as long as the works (65) of her hiſtorians, poets, and engravers, ſhall endure. As for the remainder of our dialogue, there is ſtill much variety in it; among which we ſhall only obſerve, that the entertainment which our author found for his travellers aforeſaid, when they got to their inn at Barnet, while their dinner was dreſſing, was, in all vine, who died thirteen years before, and wherein John Fox, the Martyrologiſt, was alſo interred eleven years after him, in the pariſh church of St. Giles, Cripplegate. There is an inſcription on the ſaid tomb, with ſome Latin verſes in praiſe of them, in all probability, more elegant than that which was ſerved up at their table. For there they were diverted in the parlour with ſome curious and ſignificant mottos or inſcriptions; not ſuch as are uſually written upon the windows and walls of publick-houſes in our times, but, as the mode then was in great men's houſes, conſiſting of noble maxims, and inſtructive precepts or admonitions, for the amendment of the heart, and the prudent conduct of life; ſuch as might be called golden ſentences, as well for the luſtre of their ingenuity, and weight of their ſenſe, as that they were here written in letters of gold. Among them, the citizen explains to his wife, for they are written in Latin, one which alludes with great propriety not only to any particular inn, but to all the paſſengers and pilgrims through this univerſal inn; on which account it may not be improperly here remembered: Melius eſt claudus in via, quam curſor præter viam (66). Which may be engliſhed thus:

> Better a cripple, halting the right way,
> Than a ſwift courier be, that runs aſtray.

But the pictures with which not only the pannels of that room, but the very borders of them, were, by our author's ingenuity, adorned, being more numerous, attracted a greater ſhare of their attention. And here again there is great ſcope to admire the delicacy and fertility of his fancy in the choice of them. For they were not ſuch as ſome of our modern connoiſſeurs have thought the moſt ornamental; and in the purchaſe of which, to manifeſt the fullneſs of their purſes, they have expoſed the emptineſs of their heads, by ſurrounding themſelves with the moſt booriſh, butcherly, and barbarous objects, even the moſt vulgar and obſcene, yet ſuch as have no invention to atone for the time and money miſ-ſpent upon them; no deſign deeper than the deſignations, no meaning beyond the bare figures. His pictures improve the art, and extend the uſe of painting: they are rhetorical in their very ſilence; have ſome ſoul, as well as body, in them: They all contain ſome ſcheme, ſome moral or political concluſion: They are emblematical pictures, alluſive to ſomething more important than what is outwardly repreſented; and are paintings to direct the underſtanding, as well as divert the eyes, ſetting before them devices of perpetual precaution. Thus, in his covetous Shepherd, who is ſheering his ſheep till he wounds them, and cannot be content with their fleeces, but muſt have their fleſh and blood, he has ſignificantly painted forth the griping landlord, that ruins his tenants, and, in effect, himſelf. Thus, in his attendance upon another wounded body, from which he bruſhes off, with his branch of roſemary, the full-fed flies, and only thereby makes room for a ſwarm of freſh hungry ones, he diſplays in a no leſs lively manner, what kind of œconomy it often is, in a government, to be ſhifting and changing of officers in places of profit: And thus in his figure of the fool mounted up in a tree, who is lopping off the very arm of it which ſupports him, is judiciouſly decyphered the condition of all traitors againſt their country, children againſt their parents and relations, ſervants againſt their maſters, poor againſt the rich, tenants againſt their lords, and all others againſt thoſe on whom they have their dependance in this world, and will yet ſeek their detriment, though at the price of their own deſtruction. There are but two pictures, in the whole number, that are particularly perſonal: One is, the firſt among them, of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Eſſex, whom our author compares to a wood-cutter, who, had he not been prevented by death, would have utterly eradicated Popery in the Foreſt of Antichriſt: And the laſt is a repreſentation of many perſons walking, as it were, in one path and one pace, two by two, in portraiture, who were divided, and at variance, in life; expreſſing the great power that is in painting, like death itſelf, to level high and low, good and bad, without diſtinction, in that amicable contraſt; being able, by its art, to reconcile antipathies, and couple in peace together perſons, as well as things, which nature had made disjunctives. For here, in this workmanly and well-handled piece, as our author calls it, of which he names even the artiſt, William Boſwell, living in Pater-noſter-row, were very oppoſitely paired Chriſt and Satan; St. Peter, and Simon Magus; Paul, and Alexander the copperſmith; Becket, and Tracy; Martin Luther, and the Pope; Œcolampadius, and Biſhop Fiſher; Sir Thomas More, and John Frith; Biſhop Cranmer, and Gardiner; Bonner, and Bartlet Green; Galen, and Gregory Wiſdom; Avicen, and George Salthouſe; Solomon, and Will. Somers; the Cock, and the Lion; the Wolf, and the Lamb (67); and ſo he makes an end. After this entertainment, the citizen and his wife are diverted at dinner with the ſurpriſing adventures and rodomontades of a correſpondent mentioned in this dialogue, named Mendax, or the Lying Traveller; ſatirically expoſing the impoſitions with which men of that character are wont to deceive their countrymen; a vice then in faſhion, when ſo many voyagers returned from the new diſcoveries in America. But his encomiums on many parts of the government, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, of this great city of London, which he diſguiſes by the metonomy of ſpelling the word only backwards, as ſome other words muſt be read in this book, with his reflections on the vices and vanities, manners and faſhions of the nation in general, are, from beginning to end, totally ironical, and highly conſiſtent with the character that diſplays them (68). After they parted from this companion, the citizen and his wife proceed on their journey, ſtill farther from the infection in the ſaid metropolis, as they think; but they approached nearer to it. For, after a terrible tempeſt of thunder, lightning, and rain, Death appears armed with his three fatal darts, famine, war, and peſtilence; and, after a ſerious parley with the citizen, who could by no means avert him with bribery, ſtruck him mortally with the laſt of theſe weapons. Upon this, he bewails his condition with great lamentation, and makes his beſt way to the houſe of Theologus the Divine, from whom having received the beſt ſpiritual adminiſtrations, he parts with his life in peace, and the parſon ends with a prayer ſuitable to the occaſion. O.

 [It is obſerved by the learned Writer of the 'Anecdotes of Britiſh Topography,' that the Authors of the Biographia Britannica have almoſt reſcued Dr. Bulleyn from oblivion (69). The merit of the article is, indeed, very conſiderable in this reſpect; as well as on account of the curious view which it affords of the fruits that were known amongſt us, and the ancient ſtate of horticulture in England. But though Mr. Oldys is entitled to no ſmall degree of praiſe for bringing ſo much knowledge to light, the manner in which he drew up the life of Dr. Bulleyn, ſo far as relates to ſtyle and compoſition, was remarkably uncouth, and ſcarcely grammatical. We have endeavoured, therefore, to correct the moſt glaring improprieties in our induſtrious predeceſſor's language.

(69) Anecdotes of Britiſh Topography, p. 60. firſt edition.

Some of the medicinal preſcriptions, mentioned in note [B], are, we apprehend, very little, if at all, in uſe at preſent.

The great improvements which have been made in the knowledge of botany, the cultivation of fruit-trees, and the general practice of gardening, ſince Dr. Bulleyn's time, and eſpecially of late years, will be conſidered in ſome future articles.

It is the ingenious Mr. Aikin's opinion, that the writings of our phyſician deſerve notice, rather on account of the information they contain relative to the ſtate of medicine in general in this country, than from any original obſervations or improvements ſuggeſted by their author; who appears to have been a man of more reading, than judgment or genius (70).

The ſame gentleman obſerves, that the general idea of the work, deſcribed in note [E], in which the dialogue ariſes from a number of perſons retiring from the danger of the plague, is obviouſly imitated from the Decameron of Boccace; but that Dr. Bulleyn, with much more propriety, hath made their diſcourſe chiefly turn upon moral and religious ſubjects (71).] K.

which they are expreſſed to be men famous for their learning and piety: and it is particularly ſaid of Dr. Bulleyn, that he was always ready to accommodate the poor, as well as the rich, with medicines for the relief of their diſtempers.

BUNYAN (JOHN), the celebrated author of the Pilgrim's Progreſs (a), was born at Elſtow, within a mile of Bedford, in the year 1628. His extraction was very mean, his father being a tinker. His parents gave him an education ſuitable to their condition, bringing him up to write and read: but his natural diſpoſition led him to all manner of wickedneſs, particularly curſing and ſwearing; in which courſe of iniquity he continued, not without ſome extraordinary checks [A], till, through a gradual progreſs in the reformation of his life [B], he arrived at an high degree of that piety, which prevailed in thoſe times (b). He became a ſoldier in the Parliament's army, and, in 1645, was preſent at the ſiege of Leiceſter; where being drawn out to ſtand centinel, and another ſoldier of his company deſiring to take his place, he conſented, and thereby probably eſcaped being ſhot through the head with a muſket ball, which took off his comrade. About the year 1655, he was admitted a member of a Baptiſt congregation at Bedford; and being, ſoon after the Reſtoration, convicted at the ſeſſions of holding unlawful aſſemblies and conventicles, he was ſentenced to perpetual baniſhment, and committed to priſon [C]; where, though the ſentence of baniſhment was never executed upon him, he was confined twelve years and a half (c). In the laſt year of his impriſonment, the Paſtor of the congregation at Bedford dying, he was unanimouſly choſen to ſupply his place, the twelfth of December 1671 (d). He was indebted to the compaſſion and intereſt of Dr. Barlow, Biſhop of Lincoln, for his enlargement (e); after which he travelled into ſeveral parts of England to viſit and confirm the brethren, which procured him the epithet of Biſhop Bunyan. In King James IId's reign, when that Prince's declaration for liberty of conſcience came abroad, Mr. Bunyan, by the voluntary contributions of his followers, built a public meeting-houſe at Bedford, and preached conſtantly to large congregations. He likewiſe frequently came to London, and viſited the congregations of Nonconformiſts there (f). He died in London of a fever [D], the thirty-firſt of Auguſt 1688, aged 60 (g), and was buried in the new burying-place, near the Artillery-ground. He had, by his wife Elizabeth, four children; one of whom, named Mary, was blind: his wife did not long ſurvive him, but died in 1692 (h). We ſhall give his character in the words of the Continuator of his Life [E]. His works are collected together in two volumes in folio, London 1736, 1737.

[A] He met with ſome extraordinary checks in the courſe of his iniquity.] Particularly, one day he was at play with his companions, we are told (1), he heard a ſudden voice from Heaven, ſaying, Wilt thou leave thy ſins, and go to Heaven; or have thy ſins, and go to hell? which put him into ſuch a conſternation, that he immediately left his ſport, and looking up to Heaven, he thought he ſaw the Lord Jeſus looking down upon him, and threatening him with ſome grievous puniſhment for his ungodly practices. Another time, as he was in a vehement fit of curſing and ſwearing, a woman, who was herſelf a notorious ſinner, reproved him ſeverely, telling him, he was able to ſpoil all the youth in the town, if they came but into his company. This reproof, from ſuch a perſon, filled him with a ſecret ſhame, and made him reſolve to refrain from that abominable practice (2).

[B] A gradual progreſs in the reformation of his life.] He was induced to ſet about reading the Scriptures by the accidental converſation of a poor man, with whom he diſcourſed about religion. But, it ſeems, he was yet unacquainted with the corruption and depravity of his own nature, and the neceſſity of the merits of Chriſt to ſave him, till, by chance, he met with four poor women at Bedford, who were diſcourſing about the things of God, particularly the New Birth. Bunyan was ſo mightily affected with the diſcourſe of theſe good women, that he took all opportunities of converſing with them, till at length he became as knowing in thoſe matters as his inſtructors. But the devil, not willing ſo eaſily to quit his hold, ſtrove, by divers temptations, to extinguiſh the grace of God in his heart, ſuggeſting to him particularly, that he wanted faith, and never could have any, as not being of the Elect. This put him upon conſidering how to make trial of this matter; and he reſolved to attempt the working a miracle, as the ſureſt teſt of his faith. Accordingly, as he was one day going between Elſtow and Bedford, he was about to ſay to ſome puddles that were in the horſe-path, Be dry: but juſt as he was going to ſpeak, ſome ſecret impulſe prevailed with him not to put his faith upon that trial. After much perplexity, all his doubts were at laſt ſatisfied by that paſſage of St. Luke, chap. xiv. ver. 22, 23. Compel them to come in, that my houſe may be full — AND YET THERE IS ROOM (3).

(3) Account, &c. ib. p. 10, 11. And Grace abounding, &c. p. 6—10.

[C] He was committed to priſon.] There were, beſides, in the priſon, above ſixty diſſenters, taken at a religious Meeting at Kaiſtoe in Bedfordſhire; among whom were two eminent teachers, Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Dun. Mr. Bunyan employed part of his time in preaching to, and praying with, his fellow-priſoners; and part in making tagged laces (a trade he had learned ſince his confinement), for the ſupport of himſelf and his family (4).

(4) Account, &c. ib. p. 12. And Grace abounding, &c. p. 40.

[D] He died in London of a fever.] He was ſent for, from thence, by a young gentleman, a neighbour of his in the country, to be the inſtrument of making up a breach between him and his father. Mr. Bunyan, having happily effected that charitable work, on his return to London was overtaken by exceſſive rains; and coming to his lodgings on Snow-hill, very wet, he fell ſick of a fever, which put a period to his life (5).

(5) Account, &c. ibid.

[E] His character in the words of the Continuator of his Life.] 'He appeared in countenance to be of 'a ſtern and rough temper; but in his converſation 'mild and affable; not given to loquacity, or much 'diſcourſe in company, unleſs ſome urgent occaſion 'required it; obſerving never to boaſt of himſelf or 'his parts, but rather ſeem low in his own eyes, and 'ſubmit himſelf to the judgment of others; abhorring lying and ſwearing; being juſt in all that lay 'in his power to his word; not ſeeming to revenge 'injuries, loving to reconcile differences, and making friendſhip with all: he had a ſharp quick eye; 'accompliſhed with an excellent diſcerning of perſons, being of good judgment, and quick wit. As 'for his perſon, he was tall of ſtature; ſtrong-boned, 'though not corpulent; ſomewhat of a ruddy face, 'with ſparkling eyes; wearing his hair on his upper 'lip, after the old Britiſh faſhion; his hair reddiſh, 'but in his latter days time had ſprinkled it with 'grey; his noſe well-ſet, but not declining or bending, and his mouth moderately large; his forehead 'ſomething high, and his habit always plain and 'modeſt (6).

 [It

 [It appears that Bunyan, though very vicious at an early period of life, yet had even then very ſtrong impreſſions of religion; and perhaps his theological ſyſtem, which led him to conſider all mankind as naturally prone to wickedneſs, has occaſioned him to ſpeak even of his own criminal conduct in terms of exaggeration. His father brought him up to his own occupation, which he ſeems to have exerciſed for ſome years, travelling about the country for that purpoſe, particularly in the neighbourhood of Bedford (b). At the time of his marriage, he was in a ſtate of extreme poverty [F]. He was much under the influence of enthuſiaſm [G]; but his piety was ſincere; and, during the greater part of his life, his moral character ſeems to have been unexceptionable: notwithſtanding which, many calumnies were thrown out againſt him [H], of which he complains in very ſtrong terms (i). It muſt, indeed, be acknowledged, that he was extremely bigotted, and very cenſorious againſt thoſe who oppoſed the Calviniſtical doctrines, to which he was vehemently attached. The long and ſevere impriſonment which he underwent [I], merely for endeavouring to propagate his religious tenets, was a flagrant violation of juſtice and humanity. He ſeems in general, as a preacher, to have ſpoken with much fluency, though on ſome occaſions not without conſiderable heſitation [K]. It is ſaid, that the learned Dr. John Owen attended his ſermons, and countenanced his miniſterial labours (k). He was certainly a man of genius, and might have made a great figure in the literary world, if he had received the advantages of a liberal education. We are told, that, during his confinement, his library conſiſted only

 [[F] At the time of his marriage, he was in a ſtate of extreme poverty.] He ſays, 'I changed my 'condition into a married ſtate; and my mercy was, 'to light upon a wife whoſe father was counted godly. 'This woman and I, though we came together as 'poor as poor might be (not having ſo much houſe-'hold ſtuff as a diſh or ſpoon betwixt us both), yet 'this ſhe had for her part, The Plain Man's Path-way 'to Heaven, and The Practice of Piety, which her father 'had left her when he died. In theſe two books I 'would ſometimes read with her, wherein I alſo 'found ſome things that were ſomewhat pleaſing to 'me (7).'

(7) Grace abounding, &c. ubi ſupra, p. 17.

[G] He was much under the influence of enthuſiaſm.] He ſometimes imagined that he ſaw viſions, and that voices were addreſſed to him from heaven (8). At certain ſeaſons, he ſays, the devil 'would not let him 'eat his food at quiet (9);' and at other times he was taken with great tremblings and agitations for whole days together (10).

(8) Ibid. p. 26. 34, 35. 56.

(9) Ibid. p. 44.

(10) Ibid. p. 49.

[H] Many calumnies were thrown out againſt him.] He ſays, 'What the devil could deviſe, and his in-'ſtruments invent, was whirled up and down the 'country againſt me, thinking, that by that means 'they ſhould make my miniſtry to be abandoned. It 'began therefore to be rumoured up and down among 'the people, that I was a witch, a jeſuit, a high-'wayman, and the like. To all which, I ſhall only 'ſay, God knows that I am innocent.'—'But that 'which was reported with the boldeſt confidence, 'was, that I had my miſſes, my whores, my baſtards, 'yea, two wives at once, and the like. Now, theſe 'ſlanders, with the other, I glory in, becauſe but 'ſlanders, fooliſh or knaviſh lies, and falſehoods caſt 'upon me by the devil and his ſeed. And ſhould I 'not be dealt with thus wickedly by the world, I 'ſhould want one ſign of a ſaint, and a child of God, 'Matt. v. 10, 11.'—'My foes have miſſed their 'mark in this their ſhooting at me. I am not the 'man. I wiſh that they themſelves be guiltleſs. If 'all the fornicators and adulterers in England were 'hanged up by the neck till they be dead, John Bun-'yan, the object of their envy, would be ſtill alive, 'and well. I know not whether there be ſuch a 'thing as a woman breathing under the copes of hea-'ven, but by their apparel, their children, or by 'common fame, except my wife. And in this I ad-'mire the wiſdom of God, that he made me ſhy of 'women from my firſt converſion until now. Thoſe 'know, and can alſo bear me witneſs, with whom I 'have been moſt intimately concerned, that it is a 'rare thing to ſee me carry it pleaſant towards a 'woman: the common ſalutation of women I abhor; 'it is odious to me in whomſoever I ſee it. Their 'company alone I cannot away with. I ſeldom ſo 'much as touch a woman's hand: for I think theſe 'things are not ſo becoming me. When I have ſeen 'good men ſalute thoſe women that they have viſited, 'or that have viſited them, I have at times made my 'objection againſt it; and when they have anſwered, 'that it was but a piece of civility, I have told them 'it is not a comely ſight. Some indeed have urged 'the holy kiſs. But then I have aſked, why they 'made baulks? why they did ſalute the moſt hand-'ſome, and let the ill-favoured go? Thus, how lau-'dable ſoever ſuch things may have been in the eyes 'of others, they have been unſeemly in my ſight '(11).'

(11) Grace abounding, &c. ubi ſupra, p. 83, 84, 85.

[I] The long and ſevere impriſonment which he underwent.] A relation of this impriſonment, written by himſelf, was firſt publiſhed in 1765, from whence it appears, that the proceedings againſt him were extremely ſcandalous; and he would probably have obtained relief, if a proper application had been made to the ſuperior courts. His wife addreſſed herſelf to the judges on his behalf at the aſſizes; but the juſtices did all they could to prejudice the judges againſt him. Sir Matthew Hale was one of the judges preſent. He appears to have known nothing of Bunyan, but ſeemed deſirous of affording him ſome relief, if the matter had come judicially before him. He adviſed his wife to procure a writ of error: but Bunyan, and his friends, were either too poor, or too little acquainted with ſuch matters, to take the neceſſary ſteps to procure his enlargement.

It was at Bedford quarter-ſeſſions, in 1660, that he was tried; and the indictment ſtated, that 'John 'Bunyan, of the town of Bedford, labourer, had 'deviliſhly and perniciouſly abſtained from coming to 'church to hear divine ſervice, and was a common 'upholder of ſeveral unlawful meetings and conven-'ticles, to the great diſturbance and diſtraction of the 'good ſubjects of this kingdom, contrary to the laws 'of our Sovereign Lord the King, &c. (12)' All that John Bunyan had been guilty of, though it was alleged to be thus deviliſh and pernicious, and ſo wickedly calculated to diſturb and diſtract the good people of England, was merely worſhipping God according to the dictates of his own conſcience, and endeavouring to propagate his own religious opinions. But even the facts ſtated in this ridiculous indictment were not proved: no witneſſes were produced againſt him; but ſome words which came from him, in the courſe of a converſation with the juſtices, were taken for a conviction, and recorded (13).

(12) Relation of the Impriſonment of Mr. John Bunyan, p. 19.

(13) Ibid. p. 27.

He endured his impriſonment with great patience, and was perfectly reſigned to his ſituation. It appears, that when he was committed, he had been married almoſt two years to a ſecond wife (14).

(14) Ibid. p. 45.

[K] On ſome occaſions not without conſiderable heſitation.] This we learn from himſelf. 'Sometimes,' ſays he, 'when I have been preaching, I have been 'violently aſſaulted with thoughts of blaſphemy, and 'ſtrongly tempted to ſpeak the words with my mouth 'before the congregation. I have alſo, at ſome 'times, even when I have begun to ſpeak the word 'with much clearneſs, evidence, and liberty of 'ſpeech, yet been, before the end of that opportu-'nity, ſo blinded, and ſo eſtranged from the things 'I have been ſpeaking, and have been alſo ſo ſtrait-'ened in my ſpeech, as to utterance before the people, 'that I have been as if I had not known or remem-'bered what I have been about; or as if my head 'had been in a bag all the time of my exerciſe (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 81.

of the Bible, and the Book of Martyrs (l). Mr. Granger ſays, that 'when he arrived 'at the ſixtieth year of his age, which was the period of his life, he had written books 'equal to the number of his years: but as many of theſe are on ſimilar ſubjects, they 'are very much alike. His maſter-piece is his Pilgrim's Progreſs [L], one of the 'moſt popular, and, I may add, one of the moſt ingenious books in the Engliſh lan-'guage (m).' The ſame author alſo obſerves, that 'Bunyan, who has been mentioned 'among the leaſt and loweſt of our writers, and even ridiculed as a driveller by thoſe 'who have never read him, deſerves a much higher rank than is commonly imagined. 'His Pilgrim's Progreſs gives us a clear and diſtinct idea of Calviniſtical divinity. The 'allegory is admirably carried on, and the characters juſtly drawn, and uniformly ſup-'ported (n). The author's original and poetic genius ſhines through the coarſeneſs and 'vulgarity of his language, and intimates, that if he had been a maſter of numbers, he 'might have compoſed a poem worthy of Spenſer himſelf. As this opinion may be 'deemed paradoxical, I ſhall venture to name two perſons of eminence of the ſame ſen-'timents; one, the late Mr. Merrick, of Reading (o); the other Dr. Roberts, now 'Fellow of Eton-college (p). A new edition of Bunyan's works [M], more complete than any of the preceding, with copper-plates, and a recommendatory preface by Mr. George Whitefield, was publiſhed in two volumes, folio, in 1767.] T.

[L] His maſter-piece is his Pilgrim's Progreſs.] This work has paſſed through upwards of fifty editions, and been tranſlated into various languages. It is obſerved in Mr. Oldys's MSS. that the Pilgrim's Progreſs was 'ſo acceptable to the common people, by reaſon of 'the amuſing and parabolical manner of its compoſure, by way of viſion: a method he was thought 'to have ſuch an extraordinary knack in, that ſome 'thought there were communications made to him 'in dreams, and that he firſt really dreamt over the 'matter contained in ſuch of his writings. This no-'tion was not a little propagated by his picture before 'ſome of thoſe books, which is repreſented in a ſleep-'ing poſture.' Mr. Oldys alſo gives it as the obſervation of the anonymous author of a diſcourſe concerning Ridicule and Irony in Writing, printed in 8vo. in 1729, that 'Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progreſs had 'infinitely outdone the Tale of a Tub; which, per-'haps, had not made one convert to infidelity: where-'as the Pilgrim's Progreſs had converted many ſin-'ners to Chriſt.'

[M] Edition of Bunyan's Works.] We ſhall here give the titles of the moſt conſiderable pieces of our author contained in this collection.

 ['The Pilgrim's Progreſs, and Robinſon 'Cruſoe, great favourites of the vulgar, are com-'poſed, ſays Lord Kaims, in a ſtyle enlivened, like 'that of Homer, by a proper mixture of the drama-'tic and narrative; and upon that account chiefly 'have been tranſlated into ſeveral European lan-'guages (17).' The obſervation is juſt. A mixture of the dramatic and narrative is admirably adapted to give vivacity to compoſition, and is extremely ſuitable to men who have not learned to abſtract and generalize their ideas. It is a mode of writing that naturally and particularly prevails in the early periods of ſociety; to which circumſtance it is owing that we have ſo much of it in Homer, and that it abounds ſo greatly in the ſacred writings. Bunyan, who had read but few books, excepting thoſe of the Old and New Teſtament, would hence eaſily fall into it; and Defoe might adopt it from his knowledge of human nature and from judgment, as well as from his intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures.

(17) Sketches of the Hiſtory of Man, Vol. i. p. 250, 251. Note. 2d edition.

Though we entirely agree with Mr. Granger, in condemning the ridicule which has been caſt upon John Bunyan, and in thinking that he deſerves a much higher rank, as a writer, than is commonly imagined; we have, nevertheleſs, ſome doubt whether the encomium beſtowed upon his genius by that worthy Biographer, and which is authoriſed by the reſpectable names of Mr. Merrick and Dr. Roberts, be not carried rather too far. Bunyan had certainly a fine invention; and both the allegory of his Pilgrim's Progreſs, and the characters introduced in it, are, according to his own theological ideas, excellently ſupported. But ſtill, whether he would ever have been capable of riſing to a production worthy of Spenſer, may reaſonably be queſtioned. There is ſuch a poverty in the ſpecimens he hath given of verſification, not only with regard to numbers but to fancy, that, with the beſt advantages of education, he would ſcarcely have attained to complete poetical compoſition. He had the invention, but not the other natural qualifications which are neceſſary to conſtitute a great poet. If his genius had intended him to be any thing more than a poet in proſe, it would probably, like Shakſpeare's, have broken through every difficulty of birth and ſtation. We advance, however, theſe ſentiments with due deference to the opinions of ſuch able judges as Mr. Merrick and Dr. Roberts.] K.

 [BURGH (JAMES), a worthy and ingenious moral and political writer, in the preſent century, was born at Madderty, in Perthſhire, North Britain, in the latter latter end of the year 1714. His grammatical education he received at the ſchool of the place which gave him birth, where he diſcovered ſuch a quickneſs and facility in imbibing literary inſtruction, that his maſter uſed to ſay, that his ſcholar would ſoon acquire all the knowledge which it was in his power to communicate. In due time young Burgh was removed to the Univerſity of St. Andrews, with a view of becoming a Clergyman in the church of Scotland; but he did not continue long at the College, being obliged to leave it on account of a bad ſtate of health (a). This circumſtance inducing him to lay aſide the thoughts of the clerical profeſſion, he was adviſed by his friends to enter into trade, in the linen way; which he was enabled to do with the greater proſpect of advantage, as he had lately obtained a handſome fortune, by the death of his eldeſt brother. In buſineſs, however, he was not at all ſucceſsful; for, by giving injudicious credit, he was ſoon deprived of his property. Not long after this misfortune, he came to England, where his firſt employment was to correct the preſs for an eminent printer in London; and at his leiſure hours he made indexes. After being engaged about a year in this way, which could not be very agreeable to a man of Mr. Burgh's abilities and ſpirit, he removed to Great Marlow, in Buckinghamſhire, as an aſſiſtant at the free Grammar ſchool of that town; and whilſt he continued in this ſituation, the ſchool is ſaid to have been conſiderably increaſed. During his reſidence at Marlow, he met with only one gentleman who was ſuited to his own turn of mind. With that gentleman, who was a man of piety, and of extenſive reading in divinity, though no claſſical ſcholar, he contracted a particular friendſhip (b). At Marlow it was that Mr. Burgh firſt commenced author, by writing a pamphlet, intitled, 'Britain's Remembrancer,' and which was publiſhed, if we miſtake not, a little after the beginning of the rebellion, in 1745. This tract contained an enumeration of the national bleſſings and deliverances which Great Britain had received; with pathetic exhortations to a right improvement of them, by a ſuitable courſe of piety and virtue. It appeared without Mr. Burgh's name, as was the caſe with his works in general, and was ſo much read and applauded by perſons of a religious temper, that it went through five editions in little more than two years. Mr. Barker, at that time one of the moſt eminent Miniſters among the Proteſtant Diſſenters in London, ſpoke highly of it, in a ſermon preached at Salter's Hall; and publicly thanked the unknown author, for ſo ſeaſonable and uſeful a performance.

Mr. Burgh being of a ſociable diſpoſition, and not meeting, at Marlow, with company which was ſuited to his liberal taſte, he quitted that place, and engaged himſelf as an aſſiſtant to Mr. Kenroſs at Enfield. Here he remained only one year; for, at the end of that term, Mr. Kenroſs very generouſly told him, that he ought no longer to loſe his time, by continuing in the capacity of an aſſiſtant; that it would be adviſeable for him to open a boarding-ſchool for himſelf; and that, if he ſtood in need of it, he would aſſiſt him with money for that purpoſe. Accordingly, in 1747, Mr. Burgh commenced maſter of an academy, at Stoke Newington, in Middleſex; and in that year he wrote 'Thoughts on Education;' a tract which we remember to have read with pleaſure when it was publiſhed, though we do not at preſent recollect the particular train of ſentiments by which it is diſcriminated from other performances on the ſame ſubject. The next production of his pen was 'An Hymn to the Creator of the World;' to which was added, in proſe, an Idea of the Creator, from his works. A ſecond edition, in octavo, was printed in 1750. After Mr. Burgh had continued at Stoke Newington three years, his houſe not being large enough to contain the number of ſcholars that were offered to him, he removed to a more commodious one at Newington Green (c). Here, for nineteen years, he carried on his ſchool with great reputation and ſucceſs, many young perſons having been trained up by him to knowledge and virtue. Few maſters, we believe, ever exiſted, who have been animated with a more ardent ſolicitude for forming the morals as well as the underſtandings of their ſcholars. In 1751, Mr. Burgh married Mrs. Harding, a widow Lady, and a woman of excellent ſenſe and character, who zealouſly concurred with him in promoting all his laudable and uſeful undertakings. In the ſame year, at the requeſt of Dr. Stephen Hales, and Dr. Hayter, Biſhop of Norwich, he publiſhed a ſmall piece, in 12mo, intitled, 'A Warning to Dram Drinkers.' Our Author's next publication was his great work, intitled, 'The Dignity of human 'Nature; or, a brief Account of the certain and eſtabliſhed Means for attaining the 'true End of our Exiſtence.' This treatiſe appeared in 1754, in one volume quarto, and hath ſince been reprinted in two volumes octavo. It is divided into four books, in which the Author treats diſtinctly concerning prudence, knowledge, virtue, and revealed religion; and makes a great number of important obſervations under each of theſe heads. In 1762, Mr. Burgh publiſhed, in octavo, 'The Art of Speaking;' conſiſting, firſt, of an Eſſay, in which are given rules for expreſſing properly the principal paſſions and humours, that occur in reading, or in public elocution; and ſecondly, of leſſons taken from the ancients and moderns, exhibiting a variety of matter for practice. The Eſſay is chiefly compiled from Cicero, Quintilian, and other rhetorical writers. In the leſſons, the emphatical words are printed in Italics, and marginal notes are added, to ſhew the various paſſions, in the ſeveral examples, as they change from one to another. It is evident, from an inſpection of this work, that it muſt have coſt our Author no ſmall degree of labour. It hath gone through three editions, and has been uſed as a ſchool-book; but we apprehend that it is now conſiderably ſuperſeded by Dr. Enfield's Speaker.

Speaker. The late Sir Francis Blake Delaval, who had ſtudied the ſubject of elocution, and who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the private acting of ſeveral plays, in conjunction with ſome other perſons of faſhion, had ſo high an opinion of Mr. Burgh's performance, that he ſolicited, on that account, an interview with him. Our Author's next appearance in the literary world was in 1766, in the publication of the firſt volume, in 12mo, of 'Crito, or Eſſays on various Subjects.' To this volume is prefixed a dedication, not deſtitute of humour, 'To the Right Rev. Father (of three years old) his Royal 'Highneſs Frederic Biſhop of Oſnaburgh.' The Eſſays are three in number: the firſt is of a political nature; the ſecond is on the difficulty and importance of education, and contains many pertinent remarks, tending to ſhew, that Monſ. Rouſſeau's propoſals on this head are improper, ineffectual, or impracticable; and the third is upon the origin of evil. In this Eſſay, Mr. Burgh has collected together, and arranged, though with but little regard to order, the ſentiments of many writers, both ancient and modern, on the ſubject, and endeavoured to ſhew the inconſiſtency of their reaſonings. His own opinion is, that the natural and moral evil which prevails in the world, is the effect of the hoſtility of powerful, malignant, ſpiritual beings; and that chriſtianity is the deliverance of the human ſpecies from this peculiar and adventitious diſtreſs, as an enſlaved nation is, by a patriotic hero, delivered from tyranny (d). In 1767 came out the ſecond volume of Crito, with a long dedication (which is replete with ſhrewd and ſatirical obſervations, chiefly of a political kind) to the good people of Britain of the twentieth century. The reſt of the volume contains another Eſſay on the origin of evil, and the rationale of chriſtianity, and a poſtſcript, conſiſting of farther explanations of the ſubjects before conſidered, and of detached remarks on various matters. If our Author hath not ſucceeded in removing the difficulties which relate to the introduction of evil into the world, and to the œconomy of the goſpel (and that he hath not ſucceeded in the ſolution of theſe queſtions, we are clearly of opinion), it may be urged in his favour, that he is in the ſame caſe with many other ingenious philoſophers and divines. We cannot, however, help adding, that his ſcheme appears to us to be peculiarly fanciful and groundleſs.

(d) Crito, Vol. i. p. 279, 280.

Mr. Burgh having, for many years, led a very laborious life, and having acquired, alſo, a competent, though not a large fortune (for his mind was always far raiſed above pecuniary views), he determined to retire from buſineſs. In embracing this reſolution, it was by no means his intention to be unemployed. What he had particularly in contemplation, was, to complete his Political Diſquiſitions, for which he had, during ten years, been collecting ſuitable materials. Upon quitting his ſchool at Newington Green, which was in 1771, he ſettled in a houſe at Colebrooke Row, Iſlington, where he continued till his deceaſe. He had not been long in his new ſituation, before he became convinced (of what was only ſuſpected before) that he had a ſtone in his bladder. With this dreadful malady he was deeply afflicted the four latter years of his life; and for the two laſt of theſe years his pain was exquiſite. Nevertheleſs, to the aſtoniſhment of all who were witneſſes of the miſery he endured, he went on with his Political Diſquiſitions. The two firſt volumes were publiſhed in 1774, and the third volume in 1775. Their title is, 'Political Diſquiſitions: or, an Enquiry into public Errors, Defects, and Abuſes. Illuſtrated by, and eſtabliſhed upon, Facts and Remarks extracted 'from a Variety of Authors ancient and modern. Calculated to draw the timely Attention of Government and People to a due Conſideration of the Neceſſity, and the 'Means, of reforming thoſe Errors, Defects, and Abuſes; of reſtoring the Conſtitution, and ſaving the State.' The firſt volume relates to government in general, and to parliament in particular; the ſecond treats of places and penſions, the taxation of the Colonies, and the army; and the third conſiders manners. It was our Author's intention to have extended his Diſquiſitions to ſome other ſubjects, if he had not been prevented by the violence of his diſeaſe, the tortures of which he bore with uncommon patience and reſignation, and from which he was happily releaſed, on the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, 1775, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age. Beſides the publications already mentioned, and a variety of manuſcripts which he left behind him, he wrote, in 1753 and 1754, ſome letters in the General Evening Poſt, called 'The Free Enquirer;' and in 1770, a number of papers, intitled, 'The Conſtitutionaliſt,' in the Gazetteer; which were intended to recommend Annual Parliaments, Adequate Repreſentation, and a Place Bill. About the ſame time, he alſo publiſhed another periodical paper in the Gazetteer, under the title of 'The Coloniſt's Advocate;' which was written againſt the meaſures of Government with reſpect to the Colonies. He printed, likewiſe, for the ſole uſe of his pupils, 'Directions, prudential, moral, religious, and ſcientific;' which were pirated by a bookſeller, and ſold under the title of 'Youth's friendly Monitor.'

With regard to Mr. Burgh's character, we ſpeak from a long perſonal knowledge of him, when we ſay, that he was a man of great piety, integrity, and benevolence. He had a warmth of heart which engaged him to enter ardently into the proſecution of any valuable deſign; and his temper was communicative and chearful. Whilſt his health permitted it, he had great pleaſure in attending a weekly ſociety of ſome friends to knowledge, virtue, and liberty, among whom were ſeveral perſons of no ſmall note in the philoſophical and literary world. He had once the honour of being introduced to his preſent Majeſty, when Prince of Wales, and to the late Princeſs Dowager of Wales, from whom whom he met with a moſt gracious reception, and with whom he had much diſcourſe on the ſubject of education, and other important topics [A]. In his compoſitions, our Author paid greater regard to ſtrength than elegance; and he deſpiſed, perhaps unjuſtly, that nice attention to arrangement of language, which ſome writers think deſirable; and which is indeed deſirable, when thereby the force and vigour of ſtyle are not obſtructed. Of Mr. Burgh's works, his two capital ones, 'The Dignity of human Nature,' and 'The Political Diſquiſitions,' promiſe the moſt laſting utility. The former will ever deſerve to be put into the hands of young people, as being excellently calculated to inſtil into their minds the principles of knowledge, prudence, virtue and piety; and the latter will convey much political information even to thoſe who may not be animated by the ſame enthuſiaſm of public ſpirit, and the ſame ardour for reformation of abuſes with which the worthy author was inſpired.] K.

[A] On the ſubject of education and other important topics.] The following paſſage, in the ſecond volume of Crito, will ſerve, perhaps, to illuſtrate, in ſome degree, the nature of Mr. Burgh's interview with the Princeſs Dowager of Wales; and will, at the ſame time, ſhew the ardour of his mind in forming ſchemes for the public advantage.

'About twelve or fourteen years ago, when the 'works of Lord Bolingbroke were publiſhed, ſome 'gentlemen of the deiſtical communion became, on 'a ſudden, ſo elated with the ſucceſs they expected 'to their cauſe from the bold attacks made by that 'nobleman on the authority of Scripture (in demo-'liſhing which he ſeemed diſpoſed to overthrow the 'whole credit of hiſtory), that they began publicly to 'exult over all thoſe, who were leſs ſtruck with his 'lordſhip's arguments, than themſelves; crying out, "Where is your Bible now?" I was not, for my 'part, much more moved by this victoryleſs triumph, 'than the admirers of Shakeſpeare were, when the 'Scotch critic bawled out in the pit, after the repre-'ſentation of the tragedy of Douglaſs, "Whare's aw "yeer Shaukſpeers noo, lauds?"

'I had occaſion, about the ſame time, to write to 'Dr. Hales; and, mentioning the then late publi-'cation, I propoſed to his conſideration, whether it 'might not be uſeful to have ſome public enquiry 'made by able writers into the points his lordſhip 'had chiefly dwelt on: For that ſilence on the ſide of 'thoſe whoſe belief of Scripture was not ſhaken, 'would look ſuſpicious of a conſciouſneſs, that their 'cauſe was indefenſible. The good doctor entered 'warmly into this view. Many circular letters were 'written; printed plans handed about; and meet-'ings held, at which biſhops, and eminent perſons 'of the laity aſſiſted; and printers and bookſellers 'attended. My hope was, to have got a Grand Aſ-'ſociation formed, conſiſting of perſons conſpicuous 'for their characters and ſtations, who could eaſily 'have procured the aſſiſtance of all the able pens in 'the three kingdoms for carrying on a periodical 'publication in ſupport of virtue and truth; and had 'it in their power to give a general turn to the ſenti-'ments and manners of twenty millions of people. 'The perſons of rank, who ſeemed to me moſt ſin-'cerely deſirous of promoting this deſign, were an 'illuſtrious female character, and a noble lord, who 'at that time preſided over the education of a young 'family of ſupreme dignity. Theſe two eminent 'perſons have, ſince, been treated by ſome among 'us in a manner particularly genteel. I cannot ſay, 'however, that I have eſteemed them the leſs for 'their ſeeming deſirous of promoting a ſcheme, 'which, in my humble opinion, might have an-'ſwered ends as valuable, as thoſe, which were the 'objects of the famous Minority-aſſociation.

'I had likewiſe conceived the idea of another work 'to be carried on under the ſame umbrage, viz. a 'complete Syſtem of political knowledge, drawn from 'hiſtory and biography, ancient and modern, from 'the beſt political writings of all ages and countries, 'with whatever could be obtained by ſearching re-'cords, memoirs, ſtate-papers, negotiations, law-'books, codes, ancient and modern, obſervations of 'travellers, treatiſes on government, commerce, and 'all manner of ſubjects connected with them, &c. 'the whole to be digeſted in the brieſeſt manner 'under heads, and printed, or, if not, at leaſt 'written out fair into volumes, for the uſe of the 'then H—r appar—t (whom God preſerve!) that, 'in all caſes of difficulty, he might have ſomewhat 'more certain to depend on, than the precarious and 'contradictory counſels of men, who might be them-'ſelves miſtaken, or might be intereſted to deceive 'him (1).'

BURNET (THOMAS), in Latin Burnetius, Doctor of Laws, an eminent Divine, and very learned writer at the latter end of the laſt century, was by birth a Scotchman (a), and was admitted of Clare-Hall in Cambridge in June 1651, under the tuition of Mr. John Tillotſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In 1654, upon the removal of the learned Dr. Cudworth from the Maſterſhip of Clare-Hall to that of Chriſt-College, Mr. Burnet tranſplanted himſelf to the ſame college, and in 1657 was choſen Fellow of that houſe. The year following he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and, in 1661, was choſen Senior Proctor of the Univerſity (b). In 1685, he was elected into the Maſterſhip of the Charter-Houſe in London (c), and ſoon after entered into Holy Orders (d). In this ſtation he boldly withſtood an attempt of King James II. to impoſe one Andrew Popham, a Papiſt, as a penſioner upon the foundation of that houſe. In 1680, he firſt publiſhed his Telluris Theoria Sacra [A]. After the Revolution,

[A] His Telluris Theoria Sacra.] The whole title is; Telluris Theoria Sacra, Orbis Noſtri Originem et Mutationes Generales, quas aut jam ſubiit, aut olim ſubiturus eſt, complectens. It was publiſhed in quarto, and conſiſted at firſt of but two books, viz. Lib. I. De Diluvio et Diſſolutione Terræ. Lib. II. De Tellure Primigenia et De Paradiſo. In 1689, the author publiſhed the two remaining books in 4*to*, viz. Lib. III. De Conflagratione Mundi. Lib. IV. De Novis Cœlis et Nova Terra, ac De Beato Seculo, ſive De Mundo Renovato, et Rerum omnium Conſummatione. And at the ſame time a ſecond edition was publiſhed of the two firſt books. The firſt volume of the Theoria is dedicated to the Earl of Wiltſhire; and we learn from the dedication, that a conſiderable part of it was written by our author, during his travels abroad, in company with that nobleman. Cum hujus Tractatus partem non exiguam peregrè agens conſcripſerim, tibi comes et ſocius itineris, Vir nobiliſſime, &c. (1) The two laſt books are dedicated to his Grace James Duke of Ormond. In the preface to the firſt volume, the author briefly unfolds his deſign; which is, he tells us, 'To draw up a ſacred theory of the 'earth, in which, beginning from the primæval 'chaos and origin of all things, he will follow na-'ture in all her motions and changes, to the con-'ſummation of all things.' Telluris Theoriam Sacram inſtruere decrevimus, in quâ à primævo Chao, teneriſque rerum principiis ſumpto exordio, omnes Naturæ motus et renovationes ad earundem rerum ſupremum exitum proſequemur. 'This theory, the author adds, 'may be called ſacred, becauſe it does not reſpect 'the

' the common phyſiology of the earth, but the greater ' changes, and the revolutions of our natural world ; ' ſuch as are taken notice of in the Sacred Writings, ' and are truly the hinges upon which the diſpenſa- ' tions of providence, with reſpect to this earth, ' turn.' Hanc Theoriam Sacram appello, cum Telluris Phyſiologiam communem non reſpiciat ; ſed majores mundi noſtri viciſſitudines, quarum meminit Sacra Scriptura, et quæ Providentiæ Divinæ circa Terram ſunt veluti cardines. This performance was ſo univerſally admired, that, upon its great ſucceſs in Latin, and the encouragement of King Charles II., the author publiſhed an edition in Engliſh, intitled, The Sacred Theory of the Earth, containing an Account of the Original of the Earth, and of all the general Changes which it hath already undergone, or is to undergo, till the Conſummation of all Things. In two Volumes. The two firſt Books concerning the Deluge, and concerning Paradiſe : the two laſt Books concerning the burning of the World, and concerning the New Heavens and New Earth. With a Review of the Theory, and of its Proofs ; eſpecially in reference to Scripture. The ſixth edition is of the year 1726 : To which is added, The Author's Defence of the Work, from the Exceptions of Mr. Warren, and the Examination of Mr. Keil. Dr. Burnet dedicated the firſt volume of the Engliſh Theory to King Charles II. and the ſecond to Queen Mary. As to this Engliſh edition, he tells us, in the preface to the firſt volume, ' it is the ſame in ſubſtance with the Latin,' though he confeſſes, ' it is not ſo properly a tranſlation, as a ' new compoſition upon the ſame ground, there being ' ſeveral additional chapters in it, and ſeveral new- ' moulded.' The author of The Spectator, No. 146, ſpeaks in raptures of Dr. Burnet's Theory, and quotes a very ſhining paſſage out of it. I will tranſcribe what he ſays, together with the citation, and will ſubjoin to it the Latin, that the reader may have at once a ſpecimen of the ſublimity of our author's genius, and of his ſtyle in both languages. ' Oh, how ' glorious, ſays Mr. Spectator, is the old age of that ' great man, who has ſpent his time in ſuch contem- ' plations, as have made this Being, what only it ' ſhould be, an education for Heaven ! He has, according to the lights of reaſon and revelation, which ' ſeemed to him cleareſt, traced the ſteps of Omnipotence : He has, with a celeſtial ambition, as far ' as is conſiſtent with humility and devotion, examined the ways of Providence, from the Creation ' to the diſſolution of the world. How pleaſing muſt ' have been the ſpeculation, to obſerve nature and ' providence move together ; the phyſical and moral ' world, march the ſame pace ; to obſerve Paradiſe ' and eternal ſpring, the ſeat of innocence ; troubled ' ſeaſons and angry ſkies, the portion of wickedneſs ' and vice. When this admirable author has reviewed all that is paſſed, or is to come, which relates to the habitable world, and run through the ' whole fate of it, How could a guardian angel, that ' had attended it through all its courſes or changes, ' ſpeak more emphatically at the end of his charge, ' than does our author, when he makes, as it were, ' a funeral oration over this globe, looking to the ' point where it ſtood ?'

" Let us, if you pleaſe, to take leave of this ſub- " ject, reflect, upon this occaſion, on the vanity and " tranſient glory of this habitable world ; how, by the " force of one element breaking looſe upon the reſt, " all the varieties of nature, all the works of art, all " the labours of men, are reduced to nothing ; all " that we admired and adored before, as great and " magnificent, is obliterated and vaniſhed ; and an- " other form and face of things, plain, ſimple, and " every where the ſame, overſpreads the whole earth. " Where are now the great empires of the earth, and " their great imperial cities ? Their pillars, trophies, " and monuments of glory ? Shew me where they " ſtood ; read the inſcription ; tell me the victor's " name. What remains, what impreſſions, what " difference or diſtinction do you ſee in this maſs of " fire ? Rome itſelf, eternal Rome, the great city, the " empreſs of the world, whoſe domination and ſuper- " ſtition, ancient and modern, make a great part of " the hiſtory of this earth ; What is become of her " now ? She laid her foundations deep, and her pa- " laces were ſtrong and ſumptuous : She glorified her- " ſelf, and lived deliciouſly, and ſaid in her heart, I ſit " a Queen, and ſhall ſee no ſorrow. But her hour is " come ; ſhe is wiped away from the face of the " earth, and buried in perpetual oblivion. But it is " not cities only, and the works of men's hands ; but " the everlaſting hills, the mountains, and rocks of " the earth, are melted as wax before the ſun, and " their place is no where to be found. Here ſtood the " Alps, a prodigious range of ſtone, the load of the " earth, that covered many countries, and reached " their arms from the Ocean to the Black Sea ; this " huge maſs of ſtone is ſoftened and diſſolved, as a " tender cloud into rain. Here ſtood the African " mountains, and Atlas with his top above the " clouds. There was frozen Caucaſus and Taurus, " and Imaus, and the mountains of Aſia : and yon- " der, towards the north, ſtood the Riphæan hills, " cloathed in ice and ſnow. All theſe are vaniſhed, " dropt away as the ſnow upon their heads, and " ſwallowed up in a red ſea of fire. Great and mar- " vellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty ; juſt and " true are thy ways, thou King of Saints. Hallelujah. " Rev. xv. 3 (2)."

But Dr. Burnet's Theory, ingenious as it is, was attacked by ſome writers as unphiloſophical; among whom the principal were, Mr. Eraſmus Warren, Rector of Worlington in Suffolk; and Mr. John Keil, of Baliol College in Oxford. The former of theſe publiſhed at London, in 1690, Geologia, or a Diſcourſe concerning the Earth before the Deluge; wherein the Form and Properties aſcribed to it, in a book intitled The Theory of the Earth, are excepted againſt, and it is made appear, that the Diſſolution of the Earth was not the Cauſe of the univerſal Flood. Alſo a new Explication of that Flood is attempted. Dr. Burnet wrote a reply to this, intitled, An Anſwer to the Exceptions made by Mr. Eraſmus Warren, againſt The Sacred Theory of the Earth. London, 1690, in folio, in which he follows the Excepter chapter by chapter. Mr. Warren rejoined, and Dr. Burnet replied, in A Short Conſideration of Mr. Eraſmus Warren's Defence of his Exceptions againſt the Theory of the Earth. In a Letter to a Friend. Mr. Keil publiſhed, in 1698, An Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth, dedicated to Dr. Mander, Maſter of Baliol College. To this Dr. Burnet replied, in ſome Reflexions upon the Theory of the Earth, occaſioned by a late Examination of it. In a Letter to a Friend (5). There were ſome other pieces written againſt the Theory; particularly, Some Animadverſions upon a Book, intitled, The Theory of the Earth, by Herbert (Crofts) Lord Biſhop of Hereford. London, 1685, 8*vo*. Dr. Burnet reflects with great ſeverity upon this piece, in the concluſion of his Anſwer to the Exceptions, &c. (6), where he ſays, 'Some inconſiderate minds make every departure from the Letter, let the matter or cauſe be what it will, to be an affront to Scripture: and there, where we have the greateſt liberty, I mean in things that relate to the natural world, they have no more indulgence or moderation, than if it was an intrenchment upon the Articles of Faith. In this particular, I cannot excuſe the preſent Animadverter: yet I muſt needs ſay, he is a very Saint in compariſon of another Animadverter who hath wrote upon the ſame ſubject, but neither like a gentleman, nor like a Chriſtian. And ſuch writings anſwer themſelves.' Conſiderations on the Theory of the Earth, by John Beaumont, jun. a pamphlet in 4*to*. London, 1693. A. Lovell's Summary of Heads, in Anſwer to Dr. Burnet. London, 1696, in 4to. The Abyſſinian Philoſophy confuted; or, Telluris Theoria, neither ſacred nor agreeable to Reaſon, by Robert St. Clair. London, 1697, in 12*mo*. In this the author pretends, that Dr. Burnet's hypotheſis is not a new one, but was formerly received among the Abyſſinian Philoſophers. The late Mr. Flamſtead, the King's Aſtronomer, ſpeaking to our author with great warmth on the ſubject of his Theory, ſaid he would prove, and make him know, that there went more to the making the world than a fine turned period (7). And the ſame Aſtronomer declared, that he was able to overthrow Dr. Burnet's Theory in one ſheet of paper (8).

[B] His Archæologiæ Philoſophicæ.] The title is, Archæologiæ Philoſophicæ; ſive Doctrina Antiqua de Rerum Originibus; i. e. 'An Enquiry into the Doctrine of the ancient Philoſophers concerning the Original of the World.' In two books. The ſecond edition is in 8*vo*, London 1733. It is dedicated to King William. In the Preface, the author tells us, 'His deſign is to enquire into the opinions of the ancients concerning the nature of things, in order to vindicate and give antiquity its due praiſe, and to ſhew, that neither were our anceſtors dunces, nor was wiſdom or true philoſophy born with us.' Sententias veterum de rerum natura potiſſimum inquirimus: idque in laudem et vindicias Antiquitatis; ut neque fungos fuiſſe majores noſtros, neque nobiſcum natam eſſe ſapientiam, oſtendamus. At the end of the Preface, Dr. Burnet acquaints us, he had deſigned to draw up a Theory of the viſible Creation, both animate and inanimate, celeſtial and terreſtrial, but was diverted from his purpoſe by the conſideration of his advanced age, and the approach of death. To the ſecond edition are added two letters, intitled, Ad virum clariſſimum, A. B. circa nuper editum de Archæologiis Philoſophicis Libellum, Authoris Epiſtolæ Duæ. Mr. Keil, in his Examination of Dr. Burnet's Reflections upon the Theory of the Earth, and Frederic Spanheim, in his Controverſiarum de Religione, &c. Elenchus Hiſtorico-Theologicus, have animadverted upon the Archæologiæ.

[C] His De Fide et Officiis Chriſtianorum.] The ſecond edition is in 8*vo*, London 1733. In the Preface, the Editor gives us a little hiſtory of this, and the other poſthumous tract (9). It ſeems it was uſual with Dr. Burnet, before he publiſhed any thing in Latin, to have two or three copies, and no more, printed off; which he kept by him for ſome time, in order to reviſe at leiſure what he had written currente calamo, and ſometimes, when he thought proper, to be communicated to his particular friends for their opinions. Theſe copies were always interleaved, for the convenience of writing any obſervations or improvements in the oppoſite page. One of theſe proof-copies (as they may be called) of the tract De Fide et Officiis, &c. having been clandeſtinely obtained during the author's lifetime, there appeared a ſurreptitious edition; in which the Editor had thrown the Doctor's manuſcript remarks into the text, very injudiciouſly, and ſometimes in very improper places; which Dr. Burnet hearing, he ordered his bookſeller to buy up the whole impreſſion at any price. Much the ſame fate attended the tract De Statu Mortuorum, &c. a proof-copy of which, having privately got into other hands, was, after the author's death, publicly ſold, among other books, at an auction. The purchaſer, a very learned gentleman (the Editor does not ſay who), having peruſed it, was ſo highly pleaſed with it, that he procured a few copies of it to be printed at his own expence: but the greateſt care was taken to prevent the publication of it, and thoſe who had the liberty of perufing the book were obliged, in honour, not to ſuffer it to be tranſcribed, or committed to the preſs. But, notwithſtanding all this caution, a ſurreptitious edition of this book was printed in Holland: and thus the public being in poſſeſſion of both treatiſes, Mr. Wilkinſon, in whoſe hands the original manuſcripts were, was perſuaded to publiſh correct editions of both. As to the tract De Fide et Officiis Chriſtianorum, it is but a part of a larger deſign; for the whole work was by the author intitled, Tractatus de claris et obſcuris in Doctrina Chriſtiana: then follows, Pars Prior, in qua agitur de iis quæ ſpectant ad vitam hodiernam, ſive, De Fide et Officiis Chriſtianorum; i. e. 'A Treatiſe of what 'is plain, and what is obſcure, in the Chriſtian 'Doctrine: Part the firſt, treating of thoſe things 'which reſpect this life, or, of the Faith and Practice 'of Chriſtians.' There was found among our author's manuſcripts a Preface, intended probably for this work, conſiſting of no leſs than twenty-nine folio pages; an extract of which the Editor has given us. There were likewiſe found three additional chapters, numbered thus, X^mum, XI^mum, and XII^mum; with the following titles: 10. De Religione Romano Pontificia; imprimis, De dogmate Tranſubſtantiationis; i. e. 'Of the Roman Catholic Religion, and, firſt, of the 'Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation.' 11. De Inquiſitione Romana; i. e. 'Of the Romiſh Inquiſition. 12. De aliis dogmatibus Eccleſiæ Romano Pontificiæ, et de celebrata Infallibilitate; i. e. 'Of other Doctrines of 'the Romiſh Church, and of its boaſted Infallibi-'lity.' To all which are added, Duo Dialegi de Rebus Judaicis; i. e. 'Two Dialogues concerning the 'Jewiſh Affairs.' But though, in the opinion of the Editor, theſe pieces are by no means unworthy of Dr. Burnet's pen, yet, the preſent book having received its FINIS from the author's own hand, he thought it beſt to proceed no farther.

[D] His De Statu Mortuorum et Reſurgentium.] That is, Of the State and Condition of departed Souls before, at, and after the Reſurrection. The hiſtory of the publication of this piece is already given. The ſecond edition is in 8*vo*, London 1733. There is added to it an Appendix, De futura Judæorum Reſtauratione; i. e. 'Of the future Reſtauration of the 'Jews.' It had been ſeparately printed by the author himſelf, and thence eſcaped piratical hands. But it being evident, from the beginning of this little tract, that it was deſigned by the author as a part of, or rather Appendix to, this book, the Editor thought fit to publiſh it, from the author's own manuſcript, together with this book. B.

 [Dr. Thomas Burnet was ſo ingenious a man, ſo diſtinguiſhed a ſcholar, and ſo polite a writer, that it is matter of regret that Biographers have not been able to collect a more circumſtantial account of his life. It has commonly been ſuppoſed, upon the authority only of an expreſſion of Anthony a Wood, which was evidently thrown out at random, that the Doctor was a Scotſman by birth; but we learn, from better information, that he was born at Croft, in Yorkſhire (10). His firſt education was at the free-ſchool of North-Alverton in that county; and his grammatical maſter, Mr. Thomas Smelt, uſed to propoſe him as an example to the reſt of his ſcholars (11). Beſides travelling with the Earl of Wiltſhire, our author was governor to Charles Duke of Bolton, and to James Earl of Oſſory, afterwards Duke of Ormond, and grandſon of James, firſt Duke of Ormond. It was by the intereſt of the Duke laſt mentioned that he was choſen maſter of the Charter-houſe; and when it was objected to Dr. Burnet, by ſome of the biſhops, who were electors, that he wore a lay-habit, it was urged by the Duke in his behalf, that he poſſeſſed thoſe more eſſential qualifications of manners and converſation, which were in all reſpects ſuitable to the clerical character. In his oppoſition to the admiſſion of Andrew Popham, he was ſo vigorouſly ſupported by the other governors, excepting the Lord Chancellor Jefferys, that King James deſiſted from purſuing the affair (12). Our author, in the dedication of his Archæologiæ Philoſophicæ, hath drawn King William's character with great ſtrength and elegance; and, from the favour of that prince, united with the patronage of Archbiſhop Tillotſon, he would probably have riſen high in the church, had not the ſin of heterodoxy lain ſo heavy upon him, that it produced againſt him a combination of the ſuperior clergy, too powerful to be reſiſted. He had not only called in queſtion the literal hiſtory of the fall, but had written an imaginary Dialogue between Eve and the Serpent, which gave peculiar offence. Of the imprudence of this Dialogue he himſelf became afterwards ſenſible; for, in a letter to a Dutch bookſeller, he deſired that it might be ſuppreſſed, in a new edition of the Archæologiæ, which was printing in Holland (13). It is omitted, likewiſe, in the edition of that work which appeared in 1733; ſo that, from the ſcarceneſs of the original book, it hath been read by few perſons who are now living.

With reſpect to Dr. Burnet's grand performance, 'The ſacred Theory of the Earth,' it hath long been conſidered as founded on erroneous and falſe principles. It may, and it deſerves to be admired as a beautiful philoſophical romance; but it can never be juſtly regarded as exhibiting a true ſyſtem of nature. However, on its firſt appearance, many perſons were ſeduced by the invention and ingenuity diſplayed in it, and by the elegance of its compoſition. Bayle, who was, indeed, no great adept in natural philoſophy, entertained a very high opinion of the Telluris Theoria Sacra. In a letter to Mr. L'Enfant (Let. 109, p. 415), he ſpeaks of it as a work which was peculiarly to his taſte, and of the author as a profound genius. He thinks, that, by adopting its principles and materials, a perſon might make as agreeable a book as Monſ. Fontenelle's Plurality of Worlds, and earneſtly recommends the undertaking to Mr. L'Enfant. But that learned gentleman knew better how to employ his time. An account of the deluge and the conflagration would not have been a ſubject ſo entertaining as the Plurality of Worlds (14). Dr. Blackwell, having ſhewn how ingeniouſly Dr. Burnet hath turned Heſiod's Genealogy of the Gods into a regular hiſtory of the creation, expreſſes himſelf in the following terms: 'I find it impoſſible for 'me to keep pace with this great genius, while he 'profeſſes his full and firm belief of the theory of the 'creation, as he has deſcribed it. His memory I 'highly honour, and admire the ſtrength of his 'fancy, and compaſs of his manly, well-digeſted 'learning; but cannot accompany him throughout 'his amuſing plan, for reaſons that imply too many 'premiſes, and would require too ſevere a diſcuſſion. '——But if theſe beautiful ſketches awake your curioſity to ſtudy the Sacred Theory of the Earth, 'and you ſhould then wiſh to know its weak ſides, 'you will find objections againſt its orthodoxy in a 'Dutch divine, Leidecker's Commentary on the 'Moſaic Account of the Creation; and the inconſiſtency of ſo fine a ſcheme plainly demonſtrated by 'no leſs a mathematician than the learned Mr. 'Keil (15).'

Dr. Wallace, the ingenious author of 'Various 'Proſpects of Mankind, Nature, and Providence (16),' hath made ſome obſervations, both on Burnet's Theory, and on Keil's Examination of it, which deſerve to be tranſcribed. 'Though,' ſays he, 'by the help 'of reaſon and experience, we are able to ſee many 'pregnant proofs of wiſdom and goodneſs in the 'frame of nature, from which we moſt juſtly conclude, that good is greatly predominant; yet the 'relations and uſes of many of its parts, and the 'ends of the great Creator in many of its operations, 'are not fully underſtood. In general, our knowledge of theſe operations is ſo imperfect, that in 'none of them can it be ſaid, without the height of 'raſhneſs, that nature has erred. Such knowledge '(undoubtedly) is too wonderful for us; it is too 'high; we cannot attain unto it. Numbers of examples may be brought, of the errors of philoſophers in ſubjects of this intricate nature. But what 'happened to the pious and learned author of "The "Sacred Theory of the Earth," ſeems moſt directly 'to our purpoſe. From what philoſopher could 'more have been expected? This worthy gentleman 'had united the character of the philoſopher to that 'of

'of the divine. He had carefully examined both 'nature and ſacred writ, with an uncommon free-'dom; he ranſacked the ſtores of ancient learning: 'yet all this could not prevent him from falling into 'palpable miſtakes concerning the preſent ſtructure 'of our globe; and from fancying, without reaſon, 'that he had found out many defects in its preſent 'conſtitution.

'In this light did he conſider the miſ-ſhapen rocks 'and mountains, the irregular courſes of the rivers, 'the large extent of the ſurface of the ſeas, the 'change of ſeaſons, and the inequality of the days 'and nights, occaſioned by the oblique inclination 'of the axis of the earth to the ecliptic. Imagining 'theſe to be blemiſhes, he conceived that the earth 'could not have been framed originally by God, in 'its preſent form. He diſcarded both the ſcorching 'heats of ſummer, and chilling colds of winter, as 'pernicious; and, with the poets, imagined a per-'petual ſpring. He repreſented a ſmooth and re-'gular ſurface, ſtretching every way over the whole 'earth, without any ſeas, or any inequalities what-'ſoever, to form the moſt beautiful and convenient 'figure. This he fancied to have been the original 'and paradiſaical form; but that the primitive earth 'periſhing at the deluge, out of this mighty maſs of 'waters, emerged the preſent earth like a wreck, 'with the obliquity of its axis to the ecliptic, and 'with all the irregularities and inequalities of its 'miſ-ſhapen ſurface. All this he ſet off in a moſt in-'genious manner, and with ſuch appearances of rea-'ſon, as might ſeem plauſible, even to readers who 'could not be called inattentive.

'But his beautiful theory is nothing but an agree-'able romance: the preſent form and ſtructure of 'the earth is preferable, in all reſpects, to what this 'ingenious author imagined to have been the origi-'nal and paradiſaical. This is made abundantly 'evident by Dr. Keil (though ſomewhat too roughly), 'in his Examination of this Theory. This cele-'brated mathematician has clearly proved, that the 'inequalities on the ſurface of the earth, ariſing 'from the vaſt ranges of the mountains; that the 'largeneſs of the ſurface of the ſeas; that the obli-'quity of the axis of the earth to the plane of the 'ecliptic, are mighty advantages to mankind: that 'what Dr. Burnet calls a paradiſaical ſtate of the 'globe, would have been extremely uncomfortable, 'and muſt have rendered the greateſt part of the 'earth barren: that the large ſurface of the ſea, and 'the huge tracts of the mountains, are neceſſary for 'forming the rivers, and producing a ſufficient quan-'tity of rain; and that if the axis of the earth were 'perpendicular to the plane of the ecliptic, we 'could not have thoſe proper degrees of heat and 'cold which are neceſſary to raiſe up vegetables, and 'to bring them to perfection; and particularly, that 'all thoſe tracts of the earth which lie within 45 'degrees of latitude, would have more heat than 'they have at preſent; which would be hurtful, in-'ſtead of being an advantage; while all the tracts 'beyond 45 degrees of latitude would have been 'deprived of ſeveral degrees of heat, which they 'enjoy at preſent. All this is finely illuſtrated by 'that acute mathematician. So different are the 'conjectures, even of the moſt ingenious men, from 'the real truth of things, when by a proper method 'we are able to unfold the wiſe deſigns of nature.

'Dr. Burnet's intentions were pious and generous, 'his ſyſtem was ingenious, his book was written in 'an animated and eloquent ſtyle, his deſcriptions of 'nature were ſublime, his opinions were illuſtrated 'by many entertaining quotations from antiquity. 'Yet all this was not ſufficient to prevent bitter cen-'ſures. Even Dr. Keil himſelf, in his Examina-'tion, treats him with too much ſeverity, and aſ-'ſumes an air of too great ſuperiority; neither ſhew-'ing the moderation of a philoſopher accuſtomed to 'indulge himſelf and others in uncommon ſpecula-'tions, nor that mercy and gentleneſs which are ſo 'graceful when one has a good cauſe, and is far ſu-'perior to his antagoniſt in the knowledge of his 'ſubject (17).'

(17) Various Proſpects, p. 282—286.

A ſhort abſtract of 'The Sacred Theory of the 'Earth' may be ſeen in the ſeventh volume, p. 73—77, of Dr. Towers's Britiſh Biography.

Dr. Burnet's treatiſe De Fide et Officiis, is a valuable compend of Chriſtian doctrine and duty. It is written with great liberality of ſpirit, and the Doctor lays the principal ſtreſs, not upon matters of doubtful diſputation, but upon ſubjects of real and eſſential importance. In this encomium, we do not mean to expreſs our approbation of every ſentiment which may have been advanced by the ingenious writer. An Engliſh tranſlation of this work has been publiſhed; and a French tranſlation of it was printed at Amſterdam, in 12*mo*, in 1729. Our author, in his treatiſe De Statu Mortuorum et Reſurgentium, hath given greater ſcope to his fancy. With a boldneſs which would be more offenſive at the time in which he lived, than perhaps it would be in the preſent age, he hath attacked the doctrine of the eternity of hell torments, and contended for the final ſalvation of the whole human race. There is ſomething ſo humane in this laſt idea, and it is ſo conſonant to our natural apprehenſions of the merciful Parent of the Univerſe, that we have no right to be diſpleaſed with thoſe divines who have been willing to embrace it. However, unleſs, upon a ſtrict and impartial inquiry, it ſhould be found agreeable to truth, it ought not to be admitted. There is a middle ſcheme, that has been adopted by ſeveral eminent writers, as more agreeable to Scripture; which is, that the incorrigibly wicked ſhall, at length, be wholly deſtroyed. Mr. Hobbes, to whom many authors have been more indebted than has commonly been known, hath advanced this opinion (18); and the ſame opinion, if we miſtake not, hath been entertained by ſuch great ſcriptural critics as Mr. Locke, Biſhop Law, and Dr. John Taylor. It hath, likewiſe, been ſtrenuouſly and ingeniouſly maintained by the Rev. Mr. Samuel Bourn, of Norwich (19). Dr. Burnet was ſo apprehenſive leſt his notions concerning the temporary duration of future puniſhments ſhould be made an ill uſe of by the bulk of mankind, that, in a note to his work, De Statu Mortuorum et Reſurgentium, he earneſtly proteſted againſt its being tranſlated. Dennis, however, contrary to the proteſtation of the author, not only ventured to publiſh a tranſlation of the treatiſe, but, with great fidelity, not to ſay effrontery, rendered the note into Engliſh, and inſerted it at the bottom of the page.

Beſides the publications already mentioned, Dr. Burnet wrote, without his name, three ſmall tracts in oppoſition to Mr. Locke. The firſt was intitled, 'Remarks upon an Eſſay concerning Human Un-'derſtanding, in a Letter addreſſed to the Author,' London, 1697, in quarto. Mr. Locke having animadverted upon this piece, with ſome ſeverity, at the end of his Reply to Biſhop Stillingfleet, it was followed, in the ſame year, by 'Second Remarks, &c. 'being a Vindication of the Firſt Remarks, againſt 'the Anſwer of Mr. Locke, &c.' 'Third Re-'marks, &c.' came out in 1699 *. Theſe three tracts were all of them anſwered by Mrs. Catherine Trotter, afterwards Mrs. Cockburn, in her 'Defence 'of Mr. Locke's Eſſay concerning Human Under-'ſtanding,' publiſhed in 1702, and ſince reprinted in Dr. Birch's edition of that admirable lady's works (20).

* It was not known who was the writer of theſe pieces till after Dr. Burnet's deceaſe.

Dr. Thomas Burnet's Latin, as well as his Engliſh ſtyle, is remarkably perſpicuous, elegant, and beautiful. K.]

BURNET (GILBERT), Biſhop of Saliſbury, and an eminent writer in the reigns of King William, Queen Anne, and the beginning of King George I., was born at Edinburgh, the 18th of September, 1643 (a). He received the firſt rudiments of his education from his father [A]; under whoſe care he made ſo quick a progreſs, that, at (a) Life of the Author, by his ſon Thomas Burnet, Eſq; ſubjoined to the Biſhop's Hiſt. of his own Times, in two volumes, fol. Lond. 1724 and 1734, Vol. ii. p. 672.

[A] His father.] He was the younger brother of a family very conſiderable for its antiquity as well as intereſt, in the ſhire of Aberdeen; and was bred to the Civil Law, which he ſtudied for ſeven years in France. His exceſſive modeſty ſo far depreſſed his abilities, that he never made a ſhining figure at the bar, at ten years of age, he perfectly underſtood the Latin tongue; at which time he was ſent to the college of Aberdeen, where he acquired the Greek, and went through the uſual courſe of Ariſtotelian Logic and Philoſophy, with uncommon applauſe. He was ſcarcely fourteen when he commenced Maſter of Arts, and then applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Civil Law; but, after a year's diligent application to that ſcience, he changed his reſolution, and turned his thoughts wholly to the ſtudy of Divinity (b) [B]. At eighteen years of age, he was put upon his trial as a Probationer or Expectant Preacher [C]; and, at the ſame time, was offered the preſentation to a very good benefice, by his couſin-german Sir Alexander Burnet: but, thinking himſelf too young for the cure of ſouls (*), he modeſtly declined that offer (c). His education, thus happily begun, was finiſhed by the converſation and advice of the moſt eminent Scotch Divines (d) [D]. In 1663, about two years after his father's death, he came into England, where he firſt viſited the two Univerſities [E]; and, after a ſhort ſtay of about ſix months, he returned to Scotland, where he declined accepting the living of Saltoun, offered him by Sir Robert Fletcher of that place, reſolving to travel for ſome months beyond ſea (e). In 1664, our author went over into Holland; where, after he had ſeen what was remarkable in the Seven Provinces, he reſided for ſome time at Amſterdam; from whence paſſing through the Netherlands into France, he made ſome ſtay at Paris [F]. Towards the end of the year, he returned into Scotland, taking London in bar, though he was univerſally eſteemed to be a man of judgment and knowledge in his profeſſion. He was remarkably generous in his practice, never taking a fee from the poor, nor from a clergyman, when he ſued in the right of his church; and beſtowing great part of his profits in acts of charity and friendſhip. In the year 1637, when the troubles in Scotland were breaking out, he was ſo diſguſted at the conduct of the governing Biſhops there, whom he cenſured with great freedom, and was, at the ſame time, ſo remarkable for his ſtrict and exemplary life, that he was generally called a Puritan. But when he ſaw, that, inſtead of reforming abuſes in the Epiſcopal Order, the order itſelf was ſtruck at, he adhered to it with great zeal and conſtancy; as he did to the rights of the Crown, not once complying with that party which afterwards prevailed in both nations. For though he agreed with Barclay and Grotius (with the latter of whom he had been intimately acquainted) as to their notions of reſiſtance where the laws are broken through by a limited Sovereign, yet he did not think that was then the caſe in Scotland. He married the ſiſter of the famous Sir Archibald Johnſtoun, called Lord Warriſtoun; who, during the Civil Wars, was at the head of the Preſbyterian party, and ſo zealouſly attached to that intereſt, that neither friendſhip nor alliance could diſpoſe him to ſhew favour to thoſe who refuſed the Solemn League and Covenant. Our author's father, perſiſting in this refuſal, was obliged, at three ſeveral times, to quit the kingdom; and, when his return was afterwards connived at, as his principles would not permit him to renew the practice of the law, much leſs to accept the preferments in it offered him by Oliver Cromwell, he retired to his own eſtate in the country, where he lived till the Reſtoration, when he was made one of the Lords of the Seſſion. His wife, our author's mother, was very eminent for her piety and virtue, and a warm zealot for the Preſbyterian diſcipline, in which way ſhe had been very ſtrictly educated (1).

[B] He turned his thoughts wholly to the ſtudy of Divinity.] He went through the Old and New Teſtament, with the beſt commentators on both: he read the moſt noted controverſial writers in Divinity, particularly Bellarmine and Chamier, in oppoſition to each other; and he peruſed ſome of the moſt received ſyſtems of School Divinity, but was ſoon diſguſted at the ſubtlety and jargon of thoſe writers. In his hours of amuſement, he ran through many volumes of hiſtory; and his application to theſe ſtudies ſeldom fell ſhort of fourteen hours in a day (2).

(2) Ib. p. 673.

[C] He was put upon his trial as a Probationer, or Expectant Preacher.] A Probationer, we are told (3), is one who, after having paſſed examination, is at liberty to preach whereſoever he is deſired, but has no particular church to which he is attendant. This is the firſt ſtep, in Scotland, towards admiſſion into orders, and was practiſed both under the Preſbyterian and Epiſcopal Government. The Probationers are firſt appointed to preach practically on a text aſſigned them; next, critically upon another, the ſenſe of which is controverted; and then a mixed ſermon, of criticiſm upon the text, and practical inferences from it. After this, the examiners allot to each a head of Divinity, on which they are to make a Latin oration, and give out theſes upon it, which they undertake to defend in public. Then an Hebrew pſalm, and a portion of the Greek Teſtament, are given them, to render into Engliſh extempore. Laſt of all comes the queſtionary trial, in which every miniſter of the diſtrict is at liberty to put ſuch queſtions to the perſon under examination, as occur to him, out of the Scripture, or body of Divinity. Before any one can be admitted to this, he muſt produce a teſtimonial of his good life from the miniſter of the pariſh where he lives; and if, during his trial, which laſts three months, any ſcandal can be proved upon him, he is laid aſide as unfit for the Church.

[D] His education was finiſhed by the converſation and advice of the moſt eminent Scotch Divines.] Among theſe was Mr. Nairn, miniſter of the Abbey-church at Edinburgh; an admired Preacher of that country, remarkable for accuracy of ſtyle, as well as ſtrength of reaſoning, and ſublimity of thought. This gentleman led our author into a new courſe of reading, by recommending to his peruſal Smith's Select Diſcourſes, Dr. More's Works, and the writings of Plato and his followers; but eſpecially Hooker's Eccleſiaſtical Polity. Another of his intimates was Biſhop Leightoun, one of thoſe who, in 1662, had been conſecrated at Weſtminſter; by whoſe advice he became converſant with all the primitive writers, going through the Apologies, and other treatiſes of the Fathers of the three firſt centuries; and Binnius's Collection of Councils, down to the ſecond Council of Nice. A third eminent Divine, with whom our author contracted an intimacy, was Mr. Charteris, a man of great learning, not only in his own profeſſion, but in Hiſtory, Geography, and the Mathematical Sciences (4).

(4) Ib. p. 675, 676.

[E] He came into England, where he firſt viſited the two Univerſities.] At Cambridge, he had an opportunity of ſeeing, and converſing with, men of the greateſt abilities, and particularly Dr. Cudworth, Dr. Pearſon, Dr. Burnet, author of the Sacred Theory, and Dr. Henry More, one of whoſe ſayings, in relation to rites and ceremonies, then made a great impreſſion on him: None of theſe, ſaid he, are bad enough to make men bad, and I am ſure none of them are good enough to make men good. At Oxford our author was much careſſed, on account of his ready knowledge of the Councils and Fathers, eſpecially by Dr. Fell, and Dr. Pocock, that great maſter of Oriental learning. He was much improved there, in his Mathematics and Natural Philoſophy, by the inſtructions of Dr. Wallis, who likewiſe gave him a letter of recommendation to the learned and pious Mr. Boyle at London. Upon his arrival there, he was introduced to all the moſt noted Divines, as Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Patrick, Lloyd, Whitchcot, and Wilkins; and, among others of the laity, to Sir Robert Murray (5).

(5) Ib. p. 676.

[F] He reſided at Amſterdam, and afterwards at Paris.] At the former of theſe places, by the help of a learned Rabbi, he perfected himſelf in the Hebrew language. He likewiſe became acquainted with in the way; where he was introduced, by the Preſident Sir Robert Murray, to be a Member of the Royal Society (f). In 1665, he was ordained a Prieſt by the Biſhop of Edinburgh, and preſented by Sir Robert Fletcher to the living of Saltoun, which had been kept vacant during his abſence. He ſoon gained the affections of his whole pariſh [G], not excepting the Preſbyterians, though he was the only clergyman in Scotland that made uſe of the prayers in the Liturgy of the Church of England (g). The ſame year, he drew up a memorial of the abuſes of the Scotch Biſhops [H]; which expoſed him to the reſentments of that order: whereupon, reſolving to confine himſelf to ſtudy, and the duties of his function, he fell into ſuch a retired and abſtemious courſe of life, as greatly impaired his health (h). About 1668, the government of Scotland being in the hands of moderate men, of whom the principal was Sir Robert Murray, our author was frequently ſent for and conſulted by them (i); and it was through his advice that ſome of the more moderate Preſbyterians were put into the vacant churches; a ſtep which he himſelf has ſince condemned as indiſcreet (k). In 1669, our author was made Profeſſor of Divinity at Glaſgow [I]; in which ſtation he continued with the leading men of the different perſuaſions tolerated in that country; as the Arminians, the Lutherans, the Unitarians, the Browniſts, the Anabaptiſts, and the Papiſts: amongſt each of whom he uſed frequently to declare, he had met with men of ſuch real piety and virtue, that there he became fixed in a ſtrong principle of univerſal charity, and an invincible abhorrence of all ſeverities on account of religious diſſenſions. At Paris he converſed with the two famous miniſters of Charenton, Daillé and Morus; the former renowned for his learning and judgment, the other for his bright parts and eloquence. His ſtay in France was the longer, on account of the great freedom and kindneſs with which he was treated by the Lord Holles, then Ambaſſador at the French court (6).

(6) Ib. p. 677.

[G] He ſoon gained the affections of the whole pariſh.] During the five years he remained at Saltoun, he preached twice every Sunday, and once more on one of the week-days: he catechized three times a-week, ſo as to examine every pariſhioner, old or young, three times in the compaſs of a year: he went round the pariſh from houſe to houſe, inſtructing, reproving, or comforting them, as occaſion required: the ſick he viſited twice a-day: he adminiſtered the Sacrament four times a-year, and perſonally inſtructed all ſuch as gave notice of their intention to receive it. All that remained above his own neceſſary ſubſiſtence (in which he was very frugal) he gave away in charity. A particular inſtance of his generoſity that way, a perſon * (who then lived with him, and afterwards was in his ſervice at Saliſbury) uſed to recount: one of his pariſhioners had been in execution for debt, and applied to our author for ſome ſmall relief; who inquired of him, how much would again ſet him up in his trade: the man named the ſum, and he as readily called to his ſervant to pay it him: 'Sir,' ſaid he, 'it is all we have in the houſe.' 'Well, 'well,' ſaid our author, 'pay it this poor man; 'you do not know the pleaſure there is in making a 'man glad (7).' This may be a proper place to mention our author's practice of preaching extempore, which he learned from the celebrated Mr. Nairn, miniſter of the Abbey-church at Edinburgh. He attained to an eaſe in it chiefly by allotting many hours of the day to meditation upon all ſorts of ſubjects, and by accuſtoming himſelf, at thoſe times, to ſpeak his thoughts aloud, ſtudying always to render his expreſſions correct. The life-writer gives us here two remarkable inſtances, in relation to his preaching without book. In 1691, when the Sees, vacant by the deprivation of the Nonjuring Biſhops, were filled up, Biſhop Williams was appointed to preach one of the Conſecration-ſermons at Bow-church; but being detained by ſome accident, the Clerk had twice ſet the pſalm, and ſtill the preacher did not appear; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury deſired our author, then Biſhop of Sarum, to ſupply his place; which he readily did, to the general ſatisfaction of all preſent. In 1705, he was appointed to preach the Thankſgiving-ſermon before the Queen at St. Paul's; and as it was the only diſcourſe he had ever written before-hand, it was the only time that he was ever at a pauſe in preaching, which on that occaſion laſted above a minute (8).

* This was a ſtory commonly well known at Saliſbury, and which the life-writer learned from one Mr. Waſtefield, of that place.

[H] He drew up a memorial of the abuſes of the Scotch Biſhops.] We ſhall give the reader the hiſtory of this affair in Biſhop Burnet's own words. 'I obſerved, ſays he (9), the deportment of our Biſhops 'was in all points ſo different from what became 'their function, that I had a more than ordinary 'zeal kindled within me upon it. They were not 'only furious againſt all that ſtood out againſt them, 'but were very remiſs in all the parts of their function. 'Some did not live within their dioceſe; and thoſe 'who did, ſeemed to take no care of them. They 'ſhewed no zeal againſt vice: the moſt eminently 'wicked in the country were their particular confi-'dents. They took no pains to keep their clergy 'ſtrictly to rules, and to their duty. On the con-'trary, there was a levity, and a carnal way of living, 'about them, that very much ſcandalized me.— 'Upon all this, I took up a reſolution of drawing up 'a memorial of the grievances we lay under by the 'ill conduct of our Biſhops. I reſolved, that no other 'perſon beſides myſelf ſhould have a ſhare in any 'trouble it might bring on me: ſo I communicated 'it to none. This made it not to be in all the parts 'of it ſo well digeſted, as it otherwiſe might have 'been; and I was then but three-and-twenty. I 'laid my foundation in the conſtitution of the Pri-'mitive Church; and ſhewed how they had departed 'from it, by their neglecting their dioceſe, meddling 'ſo much in ſecular affairs, raiſing their families out 'of the revenues of the Church, and, above all, by 'their violent proſecuting of thoſe who differed from 'them. Of this I writ out ſome copies, and ſigned 'them, and ſent them to all the Biſhops of my ac-'quaintance. Sharp (*) was much alarmed at it, 'and fancied I was ſet on to it by ſome of the Lord 'Lauderdale's friends. I was called before the 'Biſhops, and treated with great ſeverity. Sharp 'called it a libel. I ſaid, I had ſet my name to it, 'ſo it could not be a libel. He charged me with the 'preſumption of offering to teach my ſuperiors. I 'ſaid, ſuch things had been not only done, but juſti-'fied in all ages. He charged me for reflecting on 'the King's putting them on his counſels. I ſaid, 'I found no fault with the King for calling them to 'his counſels; but with them for going out of that 'which was their proper province, and for giving ill 'counſel. Then he charged me for reflecting on 'ſome ſeverities, which, he ſaid, was a reproaching 'public courts, and a cenſuring the laws. I ſaid, 'laws might be made in terrorem, not always fit to 'be executed; but I only complained of clergymen's 'preſſing the rigorous execution of them, and going 'often beyond what the law dictated. He broke 'out into a great vehemence; and propoſed to the 'Biſhops, that I ſhould be ſummarily deprived, 'and excommunicated: but none of them would 'agree to that. By this management of his, the 'thing grew public. What I had ventured on was 'variouſly cenſured; but the greater part approved 'of it. Lord Lauderdale and all his friends were 'delighted with it; and he gave the King an ac-'count of it, who was not ill pleaſed at it. Great 'pains was taken to make me aſk pardon, but to no 'purpoſe. So Sharp let the thing fall.'

(*) Archbiſhop of St. Andrews.

[I] He was made Profeſſor of Divinity at Glaſgow.] This was owing to a caſual acquaintance with the Regent of that Univerſity, at Hamilton, the ſeat of the Ducheſs of Hamilton, who had invited our author thither. He was, at firſt, in ſuſpenſe what reſolution continued four years and a half, expoſed, through his principles of moderation, to the ill-will both of the Epiſcopal and Preſbyterian parties (l). The ſame year, he publiſhed his Modeſt and Free Conference between a Conformiſt and a Nonconformiſt [K]. About this time he was entruſted, by the Ducheſs of Hamilton, with the peruſal of, and putting in order, all the papers relating to her father's and uncle's miniſtry; which put him upon compiling Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton (m), and occaſioned his being invited to London, to receive farther information, concerning the tranſactions of thoſe times, by the Earl of Lauderdale; between whom and Duke Hamilton he managed and concluded a reconciliation (n). During his ſtay in London, he was offered a Scotch Biſhopric, which he refuſed (o). Soon after his return to Glaſgow, he married the Lady Margaret Kennedy [L], daughter of the Earl of Caſſilis. In 1672, he publiſhed his Vindication of the Authority, Conſtitution, and Laws, of the Church and State of Scotland [M]; which was thought, at that juncture, ſuch a public ſervice, that he was again courted to accept of a biſhopric, with a promiſe of the next vacant archbiſhopric; but he perſiſted in his refuſal of that dignity (p). In 1673, he took another journey to London [N]; where, at the expreſs nomination of the King, after hearing him preach, he was ſworn one of his Majeſty's Chaplains in Ordinary. He became likewiſe in high favour with his Majeſty and the Duke of York (q) [O]. At his return to Edinburgh, finding ſolution to take: his friends earneſtly perſuaded him to accept the offer, and his pariſhioners at Saltoun, for whom he had a moſt tender regard, being no leſs anxious to retain him. At length the authority of Archbiſhop Leighton prevailed, and he accepted the Divinity Chair. As his principal care, in this new ſtation, was to form juſt and true notions in the Students of Divinity, he laid down a plan for that purpoſe. On Mondays, he made each of the Students, in their turn, explain a head of Divinity in Latin, and propound ſuch theſes from it as he was to defend againſt the reſt of the Scholars; and this exerciſe concluded with our Profeſſor's deciſion of the point in a Latin Oration. On Tueſdays, he gave them a Prelection in the ſame language, wherein he propoſed, in the courſe of eight years, to have gone through a complete Syſtem of Divinity. On Wedneſdays, he read them a Lecture, for above an hour, by way of a Critical Commentary on St. Matthew's Goſpel; which he finiſhed before he quitted the chair. On Thurſdays, the exerciſe was alternate: one Thurſday, he expounded a Hebrew Pſalm, comparing it with the Septuagint, the Vulgar, and the Engliſh verſion; and the next Thurſday, he explained ſome portion of the Ritual and Conſtitution of the Primitive Church, making the Apoſtolical Canons his text, and reducing every article of practice under the head of one or other of thoſe Canons. On Fridays, he made each of his Scholars, in courſe, preach a ſhort Sermon upon ſome text he aſſigned; and, when it was ended, he obſerved upon any thing that was defective or amiſs in the handling of the ſubject. This was the labour of the mornings: in the evenings, after prayer, he every day read them ſome parcel of Scripture, on which he made a ſhort diſcourſe; and, when that was over, he examined into the progreſs of their ſeveral ſtudies. All this he performed during the whole time the ſchools were open; and, in order to acquit himſelf with credit, he was obliged to ſtudy hard from four till ten in the morning; the reſt of the day being of neceſſity allotted, either to the care of his pupils, or to hearing the complaints of the Clergy, who, finding he had an intereſt with men in power, were not ſparing in their applications to him (10).

[K] His Modeſt and Free Conference between a Conformiſt and a Nonconformiſt.] It conſiſts of ſeven Dialogues; and was generally applauded by all but the zealots of either party, who were very angry with the performance. It met with no anſwer in Scotland: but one from abroad was ſent over, which our author's enemies received with great acclamations; though it was judiciouſly obſerved, that no more pains were needful for refuting the Anſwer, but the reading over the Dialogues (11).

[L] He married the Lady Margaret Kennedy.] She was a lady of diſtinguiſhed piety and knowledge: her own ſentiments indeed inclined ſtrongly towards the Preſbyterians, with whom ſhe was in high credit and eſteem; yet was ſhe far from entering into the rigid and narrow zeal of ſome of their leaders. As there was ſome diſparity in their ages, that it might remain paſt diſpute that this match was wholly owing to inclination, not to avarice or ambition, the day before their marriage, our author delivered the Lady a deed, whereby he renounced all pretenſion to her fortune, which was very conſiderable, and muſt otherwiſe have fallen into his hands, ſhe herſelf having no intention to ſecure it (12).

[M] His Vindication of the Authority, Conſtitution, and Laws of the Church and State of Scotland.] This piece is a defence of the royal prerogatives of the crown of Scotland, and the eſtabliſhment of Epiſcopacy in that kingdom, againſt the principles of Buchanan and his followers. It is dedicated to the Duke of Lauderdale. The author being afterwards reproached for repreſenting the character of Duke Lauderdale very differently from what he had done in that dedication (13), replied (14), 'that the book 'was wrote when the Duke was the King's Commiſ'ſioner in Scotland, and dedicated to him at his own 'requeſt; and that if what happened a year and a 'half after that, had given him other thoughts of 'that Miniſter of State, it was no proof that he 'wrote diſingenuouſly at that time.'

[N] He took another journey to London.] The avowed deſign of this journey was, in order to procure a licence for publiſhing his Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton: but, it ſeems, he had farther views; for, we are told (15), he went with a full reſolution of withdrawing himſelf from farther meddling in matters of State. He ſaw that Popery was, at bottom, the prevailing intereſt at Court, and that the Sacramental Teſt, whereby the Duke of York, the Lord Clifford, and other Papiſts in employment, had been excluded, was a mere artifice of King Charles to obtain money for carrying on the war that ſummer with Holland. He ſuſpected that the deſigns of the Court were both corrupt and deſperate. He therefore uſed all the freedom he decently could with the Duke and Ducheſs of Lauderdale: he pointed out to them the errors of their management in Scotland, and the ill effects it would have, both upon themſelves and the whole nation: but he found no diſpoſition in them to rectify their meaſures.

[O] He was in high favour with the King and the Duke of York.] Duke Lauderdale introduced him to the King, and propoſed the licenſing his Memoirs, &c. The King read ſome parts of them himſelf, and expreſſed his approbation of them; and ordered that they ſhould be licenſed by the Secretary Coventry. He had, afterwards, a long private audience of the King, in which he took all the freedom with him, that he thought became his profeſſion. 'He run me 'into a long diſcourſe, ſays he (16), about the au'thority of the Church, which he thought we made 'much of in our diſputes with the Diſſenters, and 'then took it all away when we dealt with the Pa'piſts. I ſaw plainly what he aimed at in this; and 'I quickly convinced him, that there was a great 'difference between an authority of government in 'things indifferent, and a pretence to infallibility. 'He complained heavily of the Biſhops, for neglect'ing the true concerns of the Church, and following 'Courts ſo much, and being engaged in parties. I 'went through ſome other things with relation to 'his courſe of life, and entered into many particu'lars with much freedom. He bore all very well, 'and finding the animoſities between the Dukes of Hamilton and Lauderdale revived, he retired to his ſtation at Glaſgow; but was obliged the next year to return to Court, to juſtify himſelf againſt the accuſations of Duke Lauderdale, who had repreſented him as the cauſe and inſtrument of all the oppoſition the meaſures of the Court had met with in the Scotch Parliament. Thus he loſt the favour of the Court [P]; and, to avoid putting himſelf into the hands of his enemies, he reſigned the Profeſſor's chair at Glaſgow, and reſolved to ſettle in London, being now about thirty years of age (r). Soon after, he was offered the living of St. Giles's Cripplegate, which he declined accepting [Q]. In 1675, our author, at the recommendation of Lord Holles, and notwithſtanding the interpoſition of the Court againſt him, was appointed Preacher at the Rolls Chapel by Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, Maſter of the Rolls (s). The ſame year, he was examined before the Houſe of Commons in relation to Duke Lauderdale [R], whoſe conduct the Parliament was then inquiring into (t). He was ſoon after choſen Lecturer of St. Clement's, and became a very popular preacher (u). In 1676, he publiſhed his Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton (w); and the ſame year, An Account of a Conference between himſelf, Dr. Stillingfleet, and Coleman [S]. About this time, the apprehenſions and thanked me for it: ſome things he freely condemned, ſuch as living with another man's wife: other things he excuſed, and thought God would not damn a man for a little irregular pleaſure. He ſeemed to take all I had ſaid very kindly; and during my ſtay at Court, he uſed me in ſo particular a manner, that I was conſidered as a man growing into a high degree of favour.' Our author was introduced to the Duke of York by the Earl of Ancram, who had a mind to engage him to give his Highneſs an account of the affairs of Scotland. 'But I avoided that, ſays he (17), and very bluntly entered into much diſcourſe with him about matters of religion. He ſaid ſome of the common things, of the neceſſity of having but one Church; otherwiſe we ſaw what ſwarms of ſects did riſe up on our revolt from Rome, and theſe had raiſed many rebellions, and the ſhedding much blood: and he named both his father's death, and his great-grandmother's, Mary Queen of Scots. He alſo turned to ſome paſſages in Heylyn's Hiſtory of the Reformation, which he had lying by him: and the paſſages were marked, to ſhew upon what motives and principles men were led into the changes that were then made. I enlarged upon all theſe particulars, and ſhewed him the progreſs that ignorance and ſuperſtition had made in many dark ages, and how much bloodſhed was occaſioned by the Papal pretenſions, for all which, the opinion of infallibility was a ſource never to be exhauſted.——The Duke, upon this converſation, expreſſed ſuch a liking to me, that he ordered me to come often to him.' Afterwards our author ſays (18), 'I told him (the Duke) it was a thing he could never anſwer to God nor the world, that, being born and baptized in our Church, and having his father's laſt orders to continue ſtedfaſt in it, he had ſuffered himſelf to be ſeduced, and, as it were, ſtolen out of it; hearing only one ſide, without offering his ſcruples to our Divines, or hearing what they had to ſay in anſwer to them.' Our author made no other uſe of the high favour ſhewn him by the Duke, than the introducing to him Dr. Stillingfleet, and afterwards propoſing a conference, to be held in his Royal Highneſs's preſence, between them two, and the chief of the Romiſh Prieſts: to which the Duke of York would not conſent (19).

[P] He loſt the favour of the Court.] On his arrival at London, the King received him very coldly, and ordered his name to be ſtruck out of the liſt of Chaplains: yet, at the Duke of York's entreaty, his Majeſty admitted him to offer what he thought proper in his juſtification. He thereupon gave his Majeſty ſuch a clear and ſatisfactory account of his conduct, appealing for the truth of all his aſſertions to Duke Hamilton, that in the end the King ſeemed convinced of his innocence, and ordered him home to Glaſgow. But the Duke of York diſſuaded him from returning thither, till his peace ſhould be entirely made; aſſuring him, that otherwiſe he would be clapped up in priſon, and perhaps detained there as long as the ſame intereſt laſted at Court. His Royal Highneſs likewiſe uſed his utmoſt endeavours to have reconciled him with Duke Lauderdale; but found it impracticable, the latter inſiſting that our author ſhould abandon his beſt friends, and diſcover all the ſecrets he had hitherto been in; and the other as firmly perſiſting in his adherence to thoſe who had ſhewn him friendſhip, or repoſed a confidence in him (20).

[Q] He declined accepting the living of St. Giles's Cripplegate.] It was in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, who had expreſſed ſome inclination to beſtow it upon Dr. Fowler, afterwards Biſhop of Glouceſter; but being made acquainted with the circumſtances of our author, and the hardſhips he had undergone, they ſent him an offer of the benefice: he thanked them for the favour, but ſaid, that, as he had been informed of their intention of conferring it upon ſo worthy a Divine, he did not think himſelf at liberty to take it (21).

[R] He was examined before the Houſe of Commons, in relation to Duke Lauderdale.] Let us hear his own account of this affair. 'The Houſe of Commons, ſays he (22), fell upon Duke Lauderdale; and thoſe who knew what had paſſed between him and me, moved that I ſhould be examined before a committee. I was brought before them.——I was examined concerning his deſign of arming the Iriſh Papiſts. I ſaid, I, as well as others, had heard him ſay, he wiſhed the Preſbyterians in Scotland would rebel, that he might bring over the Iriſh Papiſts to cut their throats. I was next examined concerning the deſign of bringing a Scottiſh army into England. I deſired to be excuſed as to what had paſſed in private diſcourſe, to which I thought I was not bound to anſwer, unleſs it were high-treaſon. They preſſed me long, and I would give them no other anſwer. So they all concluded that I knew great matters, and reported this ſpecially to the Houſe. Upon that, I was ſent for, and brought before the Houſe. I ſtood upon it, as I had done at the committee, that I was not bound to anſwer; that nothing had paſſed that was high-treaſon; and as to all other things, I did not think myſelf bound to diſcover them. I ſaid farther, I knew Duke Lauderdale was apt to ſay things in a heat, which he did not intend to do.——I was brought four times to the bar. At laſt I was told, the Houſe thought they had a right to examine into every thing that concerned the ſafety of the nation, as well as into matters of treaſon, and they looked on me as bound to ſatisfy them; otherwiſe they would make me feel the weight of their heavy diſpleaſure, as one that concealed what they thought was neceſſary to be known. Upon this I yielded, and gave an account of the diſcourſe formerly mentioned,' &c. 'I was much blamed, adds the Biſhop (23), for what I had done. Some, to make it look the worſe, added, that I had been his Chaplain, which was falſe; and that I had been much obliged to him, though I had never received any real obligation from him, but had done him great ſervices, for which I had been very unworthily requited. Yet the thing had an ill appearance, as the diſcloſing of what had paſſed in confidence; though I make it a great queſtion, how far even that ought to bind a man, when the deſigns are very wicked, and the perſon continued ſtill in the ſame poſt, and capacity of executing them.'

In 1680, he publiſhed An Account of the Life and Death of the Earl of Rocheſter [U], with whom he became accidentally acquainted (x). During the affair of the Popiſh plot, Dr. Burnet was often ſent for by King Charles, and conſulted upon the ſtate of the nation; and, about the ſame time, refuſed the vacant biſhopric of Chicheſter, which his Majeſty offered him, provided he would entirely come into his intereſt (y). been bred among the Jeſuits, was Secretary to the Ducheſs of York, and very active in making proſelytes to the Church of Rome (24). Sir Philip Terwhit, a Papiſt, had married a zealous Proteſtant, who, ſuſpecting his religion, charged him with it: but he denied it before marriage, and carried the matter ſo far, that he received the Sacrament with her in her own church. After they were married, ſhe found that he had deceived her; and they lived untowardly together. Some time [illegible] had ſcruples ſuggeſted to her; with which ſhe acquainted our author, and ſeemed fully ſatisfied with the anſwers he gave her. She afterwards came to him, and deſired he would come to her houſe, and talk of thoſe matters with ſome perſons that her huſband would bring to meet him. He told her, he would not decline the thing, if deſired, though he ſeldom knew any good come of ſuch conferences. She made the ſame propoſition to Dr. Stillingfleet, and he gave the ſame anſwer. So a day was ſet, and they went thither, where they found Coleman, who took the whole debate upon him. Our author wrote down a particular account of all that paſſed, and printed it. Soon after that, the Lady, who continued firm upon the conference, was poſſeſſed with new ſcruples about the validity of the Engliſh ordinations. Our author got from her a paper that had been put into her hand, and anſwered it; and with that ſhe ſeemed likewiſe ſatisfied. But, afterwards, the uneaſineſs of her life prevailed more with her than her ſcruples; and ſhe changed her religion (25).

[T] His Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Church of England.] His own account of the riſe and progreſs of this work is as follows: 'Some time after I had 'printed the Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, which 'were favourably received, the reading of theſe got 'me the acquaintance and friendſhip of Sir William 'Jones, then Attorney-General.—My way of writ-'ing hiſtory pleaſed him; and ſo he preſſed me to 'undertake the Hiſtory of England. But Sanders's 'book, that was then tranſlated into French, and 'cried up much in France, made all my friends preſs 'me to anſwer it, by writing the Hiſtory of the Re-'formation. So now all my thoughts were turned 'that way. I laid out for manuſcripts, and ſearched 'into all offices. I got for ſome days into the Cot-'ton Library. But Duke Lauderdale hearing of my 'deſign, and apprehending it might ſucceed in my 'hands, got Dolben, Biſhop of Rocheſter, to di-'vert Sir John Cotton from ſuffering me to ſearch 'into his library. He told him, I was a great ene-'my to the Prerogative, to which Cotton was de-'voted, even to ſlavery. So he ſaid, I would cer-'tainly make an ill uſe of all I had found. This 'wrought ſo much on him, that I was no more ad-'mitted, till my firſt volume was publiſhed. And 'then, when he ſaw how I had compoſed it, he gave 'me free acceſs to it (26).' The firſt volume of this work lay near a year after it was finiſhed, for the peruſal and correction of friends; ſo that it was not publiſhed till the year 1679, when the affair of the Popiſh plot was in agitation. This book procured our author an honour never before or ſince paid to any writer: he had the thanks of both Houſes of Parliament, with a deſire that he would proſecute the undertaking, and complete that valuable work. Accordingly, in leſs than two years after (*), he printed the ſecond volume, which met with the ſame general approbation as the firſt: and ſuch was his readineſs in compoſing, that he wrote the hiſtorical part in the compaſs of ſix weeks, after all his materials were laid in order (27). The third volume, containing a Supplement to the two former, was publiſhed in 1714. 'The defects of Peter Heylyn's Hiſtory of the Reformation,' as Biſhop Nicholſon obſerves (28), 'are 'abundantly ſupplied in our author's more complete 'hiſtory. He gives a punctual account of all the 'affairs of the Reformation, from its beginning in 'the reign of Henry VIII. to its final eſtabliſhment 'under Queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1559. And the 'whole is penned in a maſculine ſtyle, ſuch as be-'comes an hiſtorian, and is the property of this au-'thor in all his writings. The collection of records, 'which he gives at the end of each volume, are good 'vouchers of the truth of what he delivers in the 'body of the hiſtory, and are much more perfect 'than could reaſonably be expected, after the pains 'taken, in Queen Mary's days, to ſuppreſs every 'thing that carried the marks of the Reformation 'upon it.' Our author's performance met with a very favourable reception abroad, and was tranſlated into moſt of the European languages; inſomuch that the keeneſt of his enemies (29) allows it to have a reputation firmly and deſervedly eſtabliſhed. Indeed, ſome of the French writers have cavilled at it; the moſt eminent of whom, M. Varillas and M. Le Grand, have received due correction from the author himſelf (30). Nor did it entirely eſcape cenſure at home. For, firſt, it was attacked by Mr. S. Lowth (31), who pretended only to oppoſe the Eraſtian tenets in Mr. Hobbes's Leviathan; but took occaſion, in the concluſion of his book, to cenſure the account Dr. Burnet had given of ſome of Archbiſhop Cranmer's ſingular opinions. This author had the confidence to aſſert, that both our Hiſtorian and Dr. Stillingfleet had impoſed upon the world in that particular, and had unfaithfully joined together in their endeavours to leſſen Epiſcopal Ordination. Our author replied to Mr. Lowth, in ſome letters in anſwer to his book. The next aſſailant was a gentleman, who, under the name of Anthony Harmer, publiſhed A Specimen of ſome Errors and Defects in the Hiſtory of the Reformation (32). It is a virulent and uncharitable performance; to which, however, our Hiſtorian vouchſafed a ſhort anſwer, in a Letter to the Biſhop of Litchfield (33). A third attack on this Hiſtory was made by the author of ſome Diſcourſes on Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotſon (34); in which the whole charge amounts to no more than this, that, in a matter of no great conſequence, there was too little care had in copying or examining a letter writ in a very bad hand, and that there was ſome probability that Dr. Burnet was miſtaken in one of his conjectures. Our author anſwered this piece, in a Vindication of his Hiſtory (35). The two firſt parts were tranſlated into French by M. de Roſemond, and into Latin by Melchior Mittelhorzer. There is likewiſe an High-Dutch tranſlation of it. In 1682, our author publiſhed an Abridgment of his Hiſtory of the Reformation (36), in which he tells us, he had wholly waved every thing that belonged to the records, and the proof of what he relates, or to the confutation of the falſehoods that run through the Popiſh Hiſtorians; all which is to be found in the Hiſtory at large. And therefore, in this Abridgment, he ſays, every thing is to be taken upon truſt; and thoſe who deſire a fuller ſatisfaction, are referred to the volumes he had before publiſhed.

[U] His Account of the Life and Death of the Earl of Rocheſter.] As our author, though he had at this time no parochial cure, refuſed not his attendance to any ſick perſon who deſired it, he was ſent for, amongſt others, to one who had been engaged in a criminal amour with Wilmot, Earl of Rocheſter. The manner he treated her in, during her illneſs, gave that Lord a great curioſity of being acquainted with him. Whereupon, for a whole winter, in a converſation of at leaſt one evening in a week, he went over all thoſe topics with him, upon which Sceptics, and men of looſe morals, are wont to attack the Chriſtian Religion (37). The effect of theſe conferences, in convincing the Earl's judgment, and leading him to a ſincere repentance, is the ſubject of this narrative.

ment, it gave him an opportunity of ſending his Majeſty a moſt remarkable letter [W]; in which, with great freedom, he reprehends the vices and errors both of his private life and his government (z). The unprejudiced part he acted during the time the nation was inflamed with the diſcovery of the Popiſh plot; his candid endeavours to ſave the lives of Staley and the Lord Stafford, both zealous Papiſts; his temperate conduct in regard to the excluſion of the Duke of York; and the ſcheme of a Prince Regent, propoſed by him, in lieu of that excluſion; are ſufficiently related in his Hiſtory of his own Time (a). In 1682, when the adminiſtration was wholly changed in favour of the Duke of York, he continued ſteady in his adherence to his friends, and choſe to ſacrifice all his views at Court, particularly a promiſe of the Maſterſhip of the Temple, rather than break off his correſpondence with them (b). This year our author publiſhed his Life of Sir Matthew Hale (c), and his Hiſtory of the Rights of Princes, in diſpoſing of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices and Church-Lands; which being attacked by an anonymous writer, Dr. Burnet publiſhed, the ſame year, An Anſwer to the Animadverſions on the Hiſtory of the Rights of Princes. As he was, about this time, much reſorted to by perſons of all ranks and parties, in order for a pretence to avoid the returning of ſo many viſits, he built a laboratory, and, for above a year, went through a courſe of chemical experiments (d). Upon the execution of the Lord Ruſſel, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, he was examined before the Houſe of Commons, in relation to that Lord's ſpeech upon the ſcaffold, in the penning of which he was ſuſpected to have had a hand (e). Not long after, he refuſed the offer of a living of three hundred pounds a-year, in the gift of the Earl of Halifax, who would have preſented him, on condition of his reſiding ſtill in London (f). In 1683, he went over to Paris, where he was well received by the Court, and became acquainted with the moſt eminent perſons, both Popiſh and Proteſtant (g). This year came out his Tranſlation and Examination of a Letter, writ by the laſt General Aſſembly of the Clergy of France to the Proteſtants, inviting them to return to their Communion, &c.; alſo his Tranſlation of Sir Thomas More's Utopia, with a Preface concerning the Nature of Tranſlations. The year following, the reſentment of the Court againſt our author was ſo great, that he was diſcharged from his lecture at St. Clement's, by virtue of the King's mandate to Dr. Haſcard, Rector of that pariſh; and, in December the ſame year, by an order from the Lord-Keeper North to Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, he was forbidden preaching any more at the Rolls Chapel (b) [X]. In 1685 came out our author's Life of Dr. William Bedell, Biſhop of Kilmore

[W] He ſent King Charles II. a moſt remarkable letter.] The original was in the hands of the life-writer, written by the Biſhop, with a memorandum how it was delivered, and when; and how it was received. It is printed at length in the Life (38); to which the reader is referred. Let us hear what the Biſhop himſelf ſays of it. 'Mrs. Robers, whom he (the King) 'had kept for ſome time, ſent for me when ſhe was 'dying: I ſaw her often for ſome weeks, and, 'among other things, I deſired her to write a letter 'to the King, expreſſing the ſenſe ſhe had of her paſt 'life; and, at her deſire, I drew ſuch a letter as 'might be fit for her to write. But ſhe never had 'ſtrength enough to write it: ſo upon that I reſolved 'to write a very plain letter to the King. I ſet 'before him his paſt life, and the effects it had upon 'the nation, with the judgments of God that lay on 'him, which was but a ſmall part of the puniſhment 'that he might look for. I preſſed him upon that 'earneſtly to change the whole courſe of his life. I 'carried this letter to Chiffinch's, on the twenty-'ninth of January; and told the King in the letter, 'that I hoped the reflections on what had befallen 'his father on the thirtieth of January, might move 'him to conſider theſe things more carefully. Lord 'Arran happened to be then in waiting; and he 'came to me next day, and told me, he was ſure 'the King had a long letter from me; for he held 'the candle to him while he read it: he knew at that 'diſtance that it was my hand. The King read it 'twice over, and then threw it into the fire: and not 'long after, Lord Arran took occaſion to name me; 'and the King ſpoke of me with great ſharpneſs: ſo 'he perceived he was not pleaſed with my letter (39).' This part of our author's conduct may perhaps offend the delicacy of ſome, and be cenſured as too great a liberty for any ſubject, eſpecially in Burnet's then ſtation, to take with his Sovereign. But, however that be, it conveys to the reader a much ſtronger idea of his character, than any deſcription can give; and it will ſcarcely be thought a ſtep which any Clergyman would have taken, who aimed more at preferment than the ſtrict diſcharge of his duty.

[X] He was forbidden preaching any more at the Rolls Chapel.] 'I continued, ſays the Biſhop (40), at the 'Rolls, avoiding very cautiouſly every thing that re-'lated to the public: for I abhorred the making the 'pulpit a ſtage for venting of paſſion, or for the 'ſerving of intereſts. There was a pariſh in London 'vacant, where the election lay in the inhabitants; 'and it was probable it would have fallen on me; 'though London was in ſo divided a ſtate, that every 'thing was managed by the ſtrength of parties. Yet 'the King, apprehending the choice might have 'fallen on me, ſent a meſſage to them, to let them 'know he would take it amiſs if they choſe me. 'Old Sir Harbottle Grimſtone lived ſtill, to the 'great indignation of the Court. When the fifth of 'November, being gun-powder-treaſon day, came, 'in which we had always ſermons at the Chapel of 'the Rolls, I begged the Maſter of the Rolls to ex-'cuſe me then from preaching; for that day led one 'to preach againſt Popery, and it was indecent not 'to do it. He ſaid, he would end his life as he had 'led it all along, in an open deteſtation of Popery. 'So, ſince I ſaw this could not be avoided, though 'I had not meddled with any point of Popery for 'above a year together, I reſolved, ſince I did it ſo 'ſeldom, to do it to purpoſe. I choſe for my text 'theſe words, Save me from the lion's mouth; thou 'haſt heard me from the horns of the unicorns. I made 'no reflection in my thoughts on the lion and uni-'corn, as being the two ſupporters of the King's 'ſcutcheon (for I ever hated all points of that ſort, 'as a profanation of ſcriptures); but I ſhewed how 'well Popery might be compared to the lion's mouth, 'then open to devour us; and I compared our for-'mer deliverance from the extremities of danger to 'the being on the horn of a rhinoceros. And this 'leading me to the ſubject of the day, I mentioned 'that wiſh of King James I. againſt any of his poſte-'rity that ſhould endeavour to bring that religion 'in among us. This was immediately carried to the 'Court. But it only raiſed more anger againſt me; 'for nothing could be made of it. They talked moſt 'of the choice of the text, as levelled againſt the 'King's coat of arms. That had never been once in 'my thoughts. Lord Keeper North diverted the 'King from doing any thing on the account of my 'ſermon. And ſo the matter ſlept till the end of the 'term;

more in Ireland (i). Upon the death of King Charles, and acceſſion of King James; having obtained leave to go out of the kingdom, he went firſt to Paris [Y]; where he lived in great retirement, to avoid being involved in the conſpiracies then forming in favour of the Duke of Monmouth. But, having contracted an acquaintance with Brigadier Stouppe, a Proteſtant officer in the French ſervice, he was prevailed upon to take a journey with him into Italy, and met with an agreeable reception at Rome [Z], and Geneva (k) [AA]. After a tour through the ſouthern parts of France, Italy, Switzerland, and many places of Germany, of which he has given an account, with reflections on their ſeveral governments, &c. in his Travels, publiſhed in 1687, he came to Utrecht, and intended to have ſettled in ſome quiet retreat within the Seven Provinces; but, being invited to the Hague by the Prince and Princeſs of Orange, he repaired thither, and had a great ſhare in the councils then carrying on, in relation to the affairs of England (l) [BB]. In 1687, our author publiſhed a Tranſlation of Lactantius, concerning the Death of the Perſecutors. The high favour ſhewn him at the Hague diſguſting the Engliſh Court, King James wrote two ſevere letters againſt him to the Princeſs of Orange, and inſiſted, by his Ambaſſador, on his being forbidden the Court; which, at the King's importunity, was done; though our author continued to be employed and truſted as before. Soon after, a proſecution for high-treaſon was ſet on foot againſt him, both in Scotland and England; but the States refuſing, at the demand of the Engliſh Court, to deliver him up [CC], deſigns were laid of ſeizing his perſon, and even [Y] He went to Paris.] Before he left England, he inquired of the French Ambaſſador, whether he might be ſafe in France; and being aſſured he might, he came to Paris; where there being many whom he had reaſon to look on as ſpies, he took a little houſe, and lived as privately as he could (41).

[Z] He met with an agreeable reception at Rome.] Pope Innocent XI. hearing of our author's arrival, ſent the Captain of the Swiſs guards to acquaint him, he would give him a private audience in bed, to avoid the ceremony of kiſſing his Holineſs's ſlipper. But our author excuſed himſelf as well as he could. He was treated with great familiarity by the Cardinals Howard and D'Eſtrees: the former ſhewed him all his letters from England, expreſſing the high expectations of the Popiſh party. One evening, upon viſiting Cardinal Howard, he found him diſtributing ſome relics to two French gentlemen: upon which he whiſpered to him in Engliſh, that it was ſomewhat odd that a Prieſt of the Church of England ſhould be at Rome helping them off with the ware of Babylon. The Cardinal ſmiled at the remark, and, repeating it in French to the gentlemen, bid them tell their countrymen, how bold the Heretics, and how mild the Cardinals, were at Rome. Some diſputes, which our author had at Rome, concerning religion, beginning to be taken notice of, made it proper for him to quit that city; which he accordingly did, upon an intimation given him by Prince Borgheſe (42).

[AA] —— and at Geneva.] Here, perceiving how ſtrongly they inſiſted upon their conſent of doctrine (43), which they required all thoſe to ſubſcribe who were admitted into orders, he employed all the eloquence he was maſter of, and all the credit he had acquired among them, to obtain an alteration in this practice. He repreſented to them the folly and ill conſequence of ſuch ſubſcriptions; whereby the honeſteſt and worthieſt men were frequently reduced to the neceſſity of quitting their native country, and ſeeking a ſubſiſtence elſewhere; whilſt others of leſs virtue were induced to ſubmit and comply againſt their conſcience, and even begin their miniſtry with mental equivocations. The warmth with which he expreſſed himſelf on this head was ſuch, and ſuch the opinion they had of him, that the clergy of Geneva were afterwards releaſed from theſe ſubſcriptions, and only left ſubject to puniſhment or cenſure, in caſe of writing or preaching againſt the eſtabliſhed doctrine (44).

[BB] He had a great ſhare in the counſels carrying on in relation to the affairs of England.] He adviſed the putting the fleet of Holland immediately into ſuch order, as might give courage to their friends in Great Britain, in caſe matters there ſhould come to extremities: he prevailed upon the Prince and Princeſs of Orange to write a letter to King James, in favour of the Biſhop of London, who was then under ſuſpenſion: he ventured to propoſe to the Princeſs the explaining herſelf upon that nice, but neceſſary point, of the ſhare the Prince was to expect in the government, in caſe the Britiſh crown ſhould devolve on her; and when it was determined to ſend over Mr. Dyckvelt as Ambaſſador to England, our author was employed to draw his ſecret inſtructions (45).

(45) Ibid. and Hiſt. ib. p. 691, 692.

[CC] A proſecution for high-treaſon was ſet on foot againſt him —— but the States refuſed to deliver him up.] Take an account of this affair in the Biſhop's own words (46): ' After I had ſtayed a year in Hol- ' land, I heard from many hands, that the King ' ſeemed to forget his own greatneſs when he ſpoke ' of me, which he took occaſion to do very often. ' I had publiſhed ſome account of the tour I had made, ' in ſeveral letters; in which my chief deſign was to ' expoſe both Popery and tyranny. The book was ' well received, and was much read; and it raiſed ' the King's diſpleaſure very high. My continuing ' at the Hague made him conclude, that I was ma- ' naging deſigns againſt him. And ſome papers in ' ſingle ſheets came out, reflecting on the proceed- ' ings of England, which ſeemed to have a conſi- ' derable effect on thoſe who read them. Theſe were ' printed in Holland; and many copies of them were ' ſent into all the parts of England: all which in- ' flamed the King the more againſt me; for he be- ' lieved they were writ by me, as indeed moſt of ' them were. But that which gave the criſis to the ' King's anger was, that he heard I was to be mar- ' ried to a conſiderable fortune at the Hague. So a ' project was formed to break this, by charging me ' with high-treaſon, for correſponding with Lord ' Argyle, and for converſing with ſome that were ' outlawed for high-treaſon. The King ordered a ' letter to be writ in his name to his Advocate in ' Scotland, to proſecute me for ſome probable thing ' or other; which was intended only to make a noiſe, ' not doubting but this would break the intended ' marriage. A ſhip coming from Scotland the day ' in which this proſecution was ordered, that had a ' quick paſſage, brought me the firſt news of it, ' long before it was ſent to D'Albeville. So I peti- ' tioned the States, who were then ſitting, to be na- ' turalized, in order to my intended marriage. And ' this paſt in courſe, without the leaſt difficulty; ' which perhaps might have been made, if this pro- ' ſecution, now begun in Scotland, had been known. ' Now I was legally under the protection of the States ' of Holland. Yet I writ a full juſtification of my- ' ſelf, as to all particulars laid to my charge, in ' ſome letters that I ſent to the Earl of Middleton. ' But in one of theſe I ſaid, that, being now natu- ' ralized in Holland, my allegiance was, during my ' ſtay in theſe parts, transferred from his Majeſty to ' the States. I alſo ſaid in another letter, that if, ' upon my non-appearance, a ſentence ſhould paſs ' againſt even deſtroying him, if he could be taken (m) [DD]. About this time Dr. Burnet married Mrs. Mary Scott [EE], a Dutch Lady of large fortune, and noble extraction (n). He had a very important ſhare in the whole conduct of the Revolution in 1688; the project of which he gave early notice of to the Court of Hanover, intimating, that the ſucceſs of this enterpriſe muſt naturally end in an entail of the Britiſh crown upon that illuſtrious Houſe (o). He wrote alſo ſeveral pamphlets (p) in ſupport of the Prince of Orange's deſigns; and, when his Highneſs undertook the expedition to England, our author accompanied him as his Chaplain, notwithſtanding the particular circumſtances of danger to which he was thereby expoſed (q). At Exeter, after the Prince's landing, he drew up the Aſſociation for purſuing the ends of his Highneſs's Declaration (r). During theſe tranſactions, Dr. Crew, Biſhop of Durham, who had rendered himſelf obnoxious by the part he had acted in the High-Commiſſion Court, having propoſed to the Prince of Orange to reſign his biſhopric in favour of Dr. Burnet, on condition of an allowance of 1000 l. per annum out of the revenue, our author refuſed to accept it on thoſe terms (s). But King William had not been many days on the throne before Dr. Burnet found the due recompence of this ſelf-denial, being advanced to the See of Saliſbury [FF], in the room of Dr. Seth Ward, deceaſed (t); and conſecrated March 31, 1689. Our Prelate had ſcarcely taken his ſeat in the Houſe of Lords, when he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by declaring for moderate meaſures with regard to the clergy who ſcrupled to take the oaths, and for a toleration of the Proteſtant Diſſenters from the Church of England (u); and, when the bill for de-

'againſt me, I might be perhaps forced to juſtify 'myſelf, and to give an account of the ſhare that I 'had in affairs theſe twenty years paſt; in which I 'might be led to mention ſome things, that I was 'afraid would diſpleaſe the King; and therefore I 'ſhould be ſorry if I were driven to it. Now the 'Court thought they had ſomewhat againſt me; 'for they knew they had nothing before. So the 'firſt citation was let fall, and a new one was or-'dered, on theſe two accounts: It was pretended to 'be high-treaſon to ſay, my allegiance was now 'transferred: and it was ſet forth as a high indig-'nity to the King, to threaten him with writing a 'hiſtory of the tranſactions paſt theſe laſt twenty 'years. The firſt of theſe ſtruck at a great point, 'which was a part of the law of nations. Every 'man that was naturalized took an oath of allegiance 'to the Prince or State that naturalized him. And 'ſince no man can ſerve two maſters, or be under a 'double allegiance, it is certain that there muſt be 'a transfer of allegiance, at leaſt, during the ſtay in 'the country where one is ſo naturalized. This 'matter was kept up againſt me for ſome time, the 'Court delaying proceeding to ſentence for ſeveral 'months. At laſt a ſentence of outlawry was given: 'and upon that Albeville ſaid, that, if the States 'would not deliver me up, he would find ſuch in-'ſtruments as ſhould ſeize on me, and carry me 'away forcibly. The methods he named of doing 'this were very ridiculous; and he ſpoke of it to 'ſo many perſons, that I believe his deſign was ra-'ther to frighten me, than that he could think to 'effect them. Many overtures were made to ſome of 'my friends in London, not only to let this proſe-'cution fall, but to promote me, if I would make 'myſelf capable of it. I entertained none of theſe. 'I had many ſtories brought me of the diſcourſes 'among ſome of the brutal Iriſh, then in the Dutch 'ſervice. But, I thank God, I was not moved with 'them. I reſolved to go on, and to do my duty, 'and to do what ſervice I could to the public, and 'to my country; and reſigned myſelf up entirely to 'that Providence, that had watched over me at that 'time with an indulgent care, and had made all the 'deſigns of my enemies againſt me turn to my great 'advantage.' The Biſhop goes on (47) to inform us, that Albeville preſented a memorial to the States, complaining of his (Dr. Burnet's) conduct, and inſiſting upon his being baniſhed the Provinces: upon which he was called before Deputies of the States, who were ſo ſatisfied with his anſwers to the Ambaſſador's memorial, that they ordered a memorial to be drawn up agreeable thereto; and inſtructed their Ambaſſador in England to repreſent to the King, how ſacred a thing naturalization was; and, if his Majeſty had any thing to lay to Dr. Burnet's charge, juſtice ſhould be done in their courts. This produced another memorial againſt our author, but with no better ſucceſs than the former.

[DD] Deſigns were laid of ſeizing his perſon, and even deſtroying him, if he could be taken.] Somebody, it ſeems, had ſuggeſted to King James, that, ſince a ſentence had paſſed againſt Dr. Burnet for non-appearance, and the States refuſed to deliver him up, he (the King) might order private perſons to execute the ſentence as they could. Our author received poſitive aſſurances, that five thouſand pounds would be given to any one that ſhould murder him: and a gentleman of an unblemiſhed reputation, he tells us, wrote him word, that he himſelf by accident ſaw an order, drawn in the Secretary's Office, but not yet ſigned, for three thouſand pounds to a blank perſon, who was to ſeize and deſtroy him (48).

[EE] He married Mrs. Mary Scott.] This Lady's anceſtor, on the father's ſide, was a younger brother of the family of Buccleugh, who, upon a quarrel in Scotland, went over to Holland: his ſon was a Brigadier-general at the ſiege of Middleburgh, in the year 1574, and afterwards Deputy for the province of Zealand, in the Aſſembly of the States-General: his grandſon, Apollonius Scott, who was the Lady's grandfather, was Preſident of the High Court of Juſtice at the Hague, and by marriage allied to the nobleſt houſes in Zealand. On the mother's ſide, who was a De Ruyter, ſhe was related to the principal families in Guelderland. With theſe advantages of birth, ſhe had thoſe of a fine perſon; was well ſkilled in Muſic, Drawing, and Painting; and ſpoke Dutch, Engliſh, and French, equally well. Her knowledge in matters of Divinity was ſuch, as might rather be expected from a Student, than from a Lady. She had a fine underſtanding, and ſweetneſs of temper; and excelled in all the qualifications of a dutiful wife, a prudent miſtreſs of a family, and a tender mother of children (49).

[FF] He was advanced to the See of Saliſbury.] The writer of his life tells us (50), 'he was ſo little 'anxious after his own preferment, that, when the 'Biſhopric of Saliſbury became void, as it did ſoon 'after King William and Queen Mary were eſta-'bliſhed on the throne, he ſolicited for it in favour 'of his old friend Dr. Lloyd, then Biſhop of St. 'Aſaph;' and that 'the King anſwered him in a 'cold way, That he had another perſon in view; and 'the next day he himſelf was nominated to that See.' The Biſhop himſelf tells us (51), the King named him to that See in terms more obliging than uſually fell from him; and that, when he waited on the Queen, ſhe ſaid, ſhe hoped he would now put in practice thoſe notions with which he had taken the liberty often to entertain her. The Biſhop informs us farther, that Archbiſhop Sancroft refuſed to conſecrate him, and for ſome days ſeemed determined to venture incurring a præmunire, rather than obey the Mandate for Conſecration: but at laſt he granted a commiſſion to all the Biſhops of his province, or to any three of them, in conjunction with the Biſhop of London, to exerciſe his metropolitical authority during pleaſure.

claring the rights and privileges of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, was brought into parliament, he was the perſon appointed by King William to propoſe naming the Ducheſs (afterwards Electreſs) of Brunſwick, next in ſucceſſion after the Princeſs of Denmark and her iſſue (w); and, when this ſucceſſion afterwards (x) took place, he had the honour of being Chairman of the Committee to whom the bill was referred (y). This made him conſidered by the Houſe of Hanover as one firmly attached to their intereſts, and engaged him in an epiſtolary correſpondence with the Princeſs Sophia (z), which laſted to her death (a). This year Biſhop Burnet addreſſed a Paſtoral Letter to the clergy of his dioceſe, concerning the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to King William and Queen Mary; in which having grounded their Majeſties title to the crown upon the right of Conqueſt [GG], ſome Members of both Houſes took ſuch offence at it, that they procured an order for burning the book by the hands of the common executioner (b). After the ſeſſion of parliament was over, the Biſhop went down to his dioceſe, where, by his pious, prudent, and vigilant diſcharge of the epiſcopal functions [HH], he gained an univerſal love and eſteem (c). In 1692, he publiſhed a treatiſe, intitled, The Paſtoral Care (d), in which the duties of the Clergy are laid down with great ſtrictneſs, and enforced with no leſs zeal and warmth. The next year came out his Four Diſcourſes to the Clergy of his Dioceſe [II]. In 1694, our author preached the Funeral Sermon of Archbiſhop Tillotſon, with whom he had long kept up an intimate acquaintance and friendſhip (e), and whoſe memory he vindicated (f) againſt the virulent attacks made upon it. The death of Queen Mary, which happened the year following, drew from our author's pen that Eſſay on her character (g), which her uncommon talents, and ſhining qualities, merited at the hands of a perſon who enjoyed ſo high a degree of her favour and confidence (h). After the deceaſe of that Princeſs, through whoſe hands the affairs and promotions of the Church had wholly paſſed, our Prelate was one of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion appointed by the King to [GG] He grounded their Majeſties title to the crown upon the right of Conqueſt.] Having ſet forth the motives upon which the Prince of Orange acted, in making war upon King James, and ſhewed them to be juſtifiable, he goes on: 'So then here was a war 'begun upon juſt and lawful grounds; and a war 'being ſo begun, it is the uncontroverted opinion of 'all Lawyers, that the ſucceſs of a juſt war gives a 'lawful title to that which is acquired in the progreſs 'of it. Therefore, King James having ſo far ſunk 'in the war, that he both abandoned his people, and 'deſerted the government, all his right and title did 'accrue to the King, in right of a Conqueſt over 'him; ſo that, if he had then aſſumed the crown, 'the opinion of all Lawyers muſt have been on his 'ſide. But he choſe rather to leave the matter to 'the determination of the Peers and People of Eng-'land,' &c. [HH] His pious, prudent, and vigilant diſcharge of the epiſcopal functions.] We ſhall juſt touch upon the principal parts of his conduct as a Biſhop, which are deſcribed at large by the author of his Life (54). As he had always looked upon Confirmation as the likelieſt means of reviving a ſpirit of Chriſtianity, if men could be brought to entertain juſt notions concerning it, he wrote a ſhort Directory, containing proper rules for preparing the youth upon ſuch occaſions: this he printed, and ſent copies of it, ſome months beforehand, to the miniſter of every pariſh where he intended to confirm. Every ſummer, he made a tour, for ſix weeks or two months, through ſome diſtrict of his biſhopric, daily preaching and confirming from church to church, ſo as, in the compaſs of three years (beſides his triennial viſitation), to go through all the principal livings of his dioceſe. In theſe circuits he entertained all the clergy that attended upon him, at his own expence, and held conferences with them upon the chief heads of Divinity (55). During his reſidence at Saliſbury, he conſtantly preached a Thurſday's lecture, founded at St. Thomas's church: he likewiſe preached and confirmed, every Sunday morning, in ſome church of that city, or of the neighbourhood round about it; and, in the evening, he had a lecture in his own chapel, wherein he explained ſome portion of Scripture. Every week, during the ſeaſon of Lent, he catechiſed the youth of the two great ſchools in the Cathedral Church, and inſtructed them in order for Confirmation. He endeavoured, as much as in him lay, to reform the abuſes of the Biſhop's Conſiſtorial Court. No part of the epiſcopal office was more ſtrictly attended to by him, than the examination of candidates for holy orders. He examined them himſelf, as to the proofs of the Chriſtian Religion, the authority of the Scriptures, and the nature of the Goſpel Covenant; and, a day or two before Ordination, he ſubmitted all thoſe whom he had accepted to the examination of the Dean and Prebendaries. As the qualification of clergymen for the paſtoral care was always uppermoſt in his thoughts, he inſtituted at Saliſbury a little nurſery of ſtudents in Divinity, being ten in number, to each of whom he allowed a ſalary of thirty pounds a-year. Once every day he examined their progreſs in learning, and gave them a lecture on ſome ſpeculative or practical point of Divinity, or ſome part of the paſtoral function. But this foundation being exclaimed at, as a deſigned affront upon the method of education at the Univerſities, he was prevailed upon, after ſome years, to lay it wholly aſide. He was a warm and conſtant enemy to Pluralities, where non-reſidence was the conſequence of them, and in ſome caſes hazarded a ſuſpenſion, rather than give inſtitution. In the point of Reſidence, he was ſo ſtrict, that he immediately diſmiſſed his own Chaplains, upon their preferment to a cure of ſouls. He exerted the principle of Toleration, which was deeply rooted in him, in favour of a Nonjuring Meeting-houſe at Saliſbury, which he obtained the Royal permiſſion to connive at; and this ſpirit of moderation brought over ſeveral Diſſenting families of his dioceſe to the Communion of the Church.

recommend to all biſhoprics, deanries, and other vacant benefices in his Majeſty's gift. In 1698, the Biſhop loſt his wife by the ſmall-pox; but the conſideration of the tender age of his children, and his own avocations, ſoon induced him to ſupply that loſs by a marriage with Mrs. Berkley [KK]. This year he was appointed Preceptor to his Highneſs the Duke of Glouceſter [LL], and employed great care in the education of that young Prince [MM]. In 1699, our author publiſhed his Expoſition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England [NN]. In 1704, the ſcheme for the augmentation of poor livings, firſt projected by Biſhop Burnet [OO], took place, and paſſed into an Act of [KK] He married Mrs. Berkley.] This Lady was the eldeſt daughter of Sir Richard Blake, Knight, the fifth ſon of Thomas Blake, of Earantoun, in the county of Southampton, Eſq; of an eminent family; and of Elizabeth, the daughter of Dr. Bathurſt, an eminent Phyſician in London. She was born the 8th of November, 1661. At a little more than ſeventeen years of age, ſhe was married to Robert Berkley of Spetchly, in the county of Worceſter, Eſq; grandſon of Sir Robert Berkley, who was a Judge in King Charles the Firſt's time. Mr. Berkley's mother was a Papiſt, but Mr. Berkley himſelf a Proteſtant; which put Mrs. Berkley upon ſtudying her own religion more fully, and obliged her to a more than ordinary ſtrictneſs in her whole conduct. In King James's time, when the fears of Popery began greatly to increaſe, ſhe prevailed with her huſband to go to Holland, and travelled with him over the ſeventeen provinces; after which, they ſettled at the Hague till the Revolution, when they returned to England, and their country-ſeat at Spetchly. In 1693, ſhe loſt her huſband Mr. Berkley, who was buried with his anceſtors at Spetchly. After his death, ſhe perfected the hoſpital at Worceſter, for the erecting of which he had bequeathed a large ſum of money. During her widowhood, ſhe made the firſt draught of that pious treatiſe, which ſhe afterwards finiſhed and publiſhed, intitled, A Method of Devotion: or, Rules for holy and devout Living; with Prayers on ſeveral Occaſions, and Advices and Devotions for the holy Sacrament, in octavo. This piece has been ſo well received, as to run through three editions. After continuing a widow near ſeven years, ſhe was married to the Biſhop of Saliſbury, who was ſo ſenſible of her worth and goodneſs, that he committed the care of his children entirely to her, and left her abſolute miſtreſs of her own fortune. In 1707, ſhe took a journey to Spa for her health, and, after her return, ſeemed to be much recovered: but, the winter following, upon the breaking of the froſt in January, ſhe was taken with a pleuritic fever, of which ſhe died in a few days, and was buried at Spetchly, by her former huſband, according to a promiſe ſhe had made him, as appears by a clauſe in her will. She was a Lady, in every reſpect, of moſt exemplary life and converſation (58).

[LL] He was appointed Preceptor to his Highneſs the Duke of Glouceſter.] The Biſhop was, at this time, retired to his dioceſe, upon the death of his Lady; and took that opportunity to wave the offer of this important charge, though he was aſſured the Princeſs of Denmark had teſtified her approbation of the King's choice. He wrote to the Earl of Sunderland, to uſe his intereſt that he might be excuſed; and to his friend Archbiſhop Teniſon, deſiring him to wait on the King in his name, and entreat his Majeſty to allow him to decline this employment. But all his friends concurring to preſs him earneſtly not to refuſe a ſtation in which he might do his country ſuch ſignal ſervice, as in the right education of the Duke of Glouceſter, he thought it might be conſtrued obſtinacy not to ſubmit. He therefore ſignified his compliance in a letter to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and waited on the King at Windſor, where he aſſured his Majeſty, it was no longer his intention to decline ſo honourable an employment, as the educating of a Prince ſo nearly related to the crown, ſince his Royal Maſter thought him worthy of that truſt: but, as the diſcharge of his duty in this ſtation muſt confine him conſtantly to Court, which was inconſiſtent with his epiſcopal function, he deſired leave to reſign his Biſhopric. The King was much ſurpriſed at the propoſal, to which he would by no means conſent. However, he was at length prevailed on to agree that the Duke ſhould reſide all the ſummer at Windſor (which is in the dioceſe of Saliſbury), and that the Biſhop ſhould have ten weeks allowed him every year to viſit the other parts of his dioceſe (59). An attempt was made in parliament, the year following, to turn the Biſhop of Saliſbury out from the truſt of educating the Duke of Glouceſter; ſome objecting to his being a Scotchman, and others alleging the book * which had been ordered to be burnt. But when an addreſs to the King for that purpoſe was moved for, it was rejected by a great majority (60).

I reſolved alſo to look very 'exactly to all the maſters that were appointed to 'teach him other things.' In another place, ſpeaking of the Duke of Glouceſter's death, he ſays (62), 'I had been truſted with his education now for two 'years, and he had made an amazing progreſs: I 'had read over the Pſalms, Proverbs, and Goſpels, 'with him, and had explained things that fell in my 'way very copiouſly.——I went through Geography 'ſo often with him, that he knew all the maps very 'particularly: I explained to him the forms of Go'vernment in every country, with the intereſts and 'trade of that country, and what was both good and 'bad in it: I acquainted him with all the great re'volutions that had been in the world, and gave him 'a copious account of the Greek and Roman Hiſtories, 'and of Plutarch's Lives: the laſt thing I explained 'to him was the Gothic Conſtitution, and the Bene'ficiary and Feudal Laws: I talked of theſe things, 'at different times, near three hours a-day.'

[NN] His Expoſition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England.] This excellent performance was cenſured by the Lower Houſe of Convocation, in 1701, firſt, as allowing a diverſity of opinions, which the Articles were framed to prevent; 2dly, as containing many paſſages contrary to the true meaning of the Articles, and to other received doctrines of our Church; and, 3dly, as containing ſome things of pernicious conſequence to the Church, and derogatory from the honour of the Reformation: but that Houſe refuſing to enter into particulars, unleſs they might, at the ſame time, offer ſome other matters to the Upper Houſe, which the Biſhops would not admit of, the affair was dropped (63). The Expoſition was attacked in a piece (64), intitled, A Prefatory Diſcourſe to an Examination of a late Book, intitled, An Expoſition, &c. London, 1702, in 4*to*. An anſwer to this diſcourſe (65) came out the year following. Dr. Jonathan Edwards likewiſe attacked our author in a piece, intitled, The Expoſition given by my Lord Biſhop of Sarum of the ſecond Article of our Religion, examined. London, 1702, in 4*to*. In anſwer to which, there appeared Remarks on the Examiniſt of the Expoſition, &c London, 1702. At the ſame time, Mr. Robert Burſcough publiſhed A Vindication of the twenty-third Article of Religion, from a late Expoſition, aſcribed to my Lord Biſhop of Sarum. Mr. Edmund Elys likewiſe publiſhed, in 1704, Reflections on a late Expoſition of the Thirty-nine Articles, &c. in 4*to*. There were two editions of the Expoſition, in folio, the ſame year.

[OO] He projected the ſcheme for the augmentation of poor livings.] The reader will be pleaſed to find here a particular account of this affair, as it is given us by the Biſhop himſelf (66). On the 6th of February, 1704, Queen Anne ſent a meſſage to the Houſe of Commons, ſignifying her purpoſe to apply that branch of the revenue which was raiſed out of the firſt-fruits and tenths, paid by the Clergy, to the increaſe of all the ſmall benefices in the nation. This branch was an impoſition, begun by the Popes, in the time of the of Parliament (i). In 1706, he publiſhed a collection of Sermons and Pamphlets, in three volumes, 4*to*; in 1710, an Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm; and in 1713, Sermons on ſeveral Occaſions, with an Eſſay towards a new Book of Homilies. We ſhall mention ſome other pieces of Biſhop Burnet's in the remark [PP]. This learned and eminent Prelate died [QQ] the ſeventeenth of March, 1714-15, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age (k), and was interred in the pariſh-church of St. James's Clerkenwell, in London. the Holy Wars, and raiſed as a fund to ſupport thoſe expeditions. But when taxes are once raiſed by ſuch an arbitrary power as the Popes then aſſumed, and after there has been a ſubmiſſion, and payments have been ſettled into a cuſtom, they are generally continued, even after the pretence, upon which they were at firſt raiſed, ſubſiſts no more. So this became a ſtanding branch of the Papal revenue, till Henry VIII. ſeemed reſolved to take it away. It was firſt aboliſhed for a year, probably to draw in the Clergy to conſent the more willingly to a change that delivered them from ſuch heavy impoſitions. But, in the ſucceeding ſeſſion of Parliament, this revenue was again ſettled as part of the income of the Crown for ever. The whole amounted to between ſixteen and ſeventeen thouſand pounds a-year. This was not brought into the Treaſury, as the other branches of the revenue; but the Biſhops, who had been the Pope's collectors, were now the King's: ſo perſons in favour obtained aſſignations on it for life, or a term of years. In Charles II.'s time, it went chiefly among his women and his natural children. 'When 'I wrote the Hiſtory of the Reformation, ſays the 'Biſhop, I conſidered this matter ſo particularly, that 'I ſaw here was a proper fund for providing better 'ſubſiſtence to the poor Clergy; we having among 'us ſome hundreds of cures, that have not of certain 'proviſion twenty pounds a-year; and ſome thou-'ſands, that have not fifty.——I had poſſeſſed the 'late Queen (*) with this; ſo that ſhe was fully re-'ſolved, if ever ſhe had lived to ſee peace and ſet-'tlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue 'of all the aſſignations that were upon it, and to 'have applied it to the augmentation of ſmall bene-'fices. I laid the matter before the late King (‖), 'when there was a proſpect of peace, as a proper ex-'preſſion, both of his thankfulneſs to Almighty God, 'and of his care of the Church (67).—He entertained 'this ſo well, that he ordered me to ſpeak to his Mi-'niſters about it. They all approved it: the Lord 'Somers did it in a moſt particular manner. But 'the Earl of Sunderland obtained an aſſignation 'upon two dioceſes for two thouſand pounds a-year, 'for two lives: ſo nothing was to be hoped for after 'that. I laid this matter very fully before the pre-'ſent Queen (†), in the King's time, and had ſpoken 'often of it to the Lord Godolphin.'—Upon the Queen's meſſage, a bill was brought in, enabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a corporation by a charter, for applying it to the uſe for which ſhe now gave it. They added to this, a repeal of the ſtatute of Mortmain, ſo far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their laſt wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmenting of benefices. Thus are the Clergy, in a great meaſure, indebted to Biſhop Burnet for the advantage they derive from this eſtabliſhment of the firſt-fruits and tenths.

The occaſion of his writing this paper, as he himſelf informs us (69), was this: About the year 1670, or 1671, Duke Lauderdale, having diſcovered to our author the ſecret of the Duke of York's religion, and perceiving him ſtruck with great apprehenſions thereupon, hinted to him a project of King Charles's divorce, in order, by an heir to the crown, to ſet aſide the Duke of York. Our author was then but ſeven and twenty years of age; and, being pretty full of the Civil Law, which had been his firſt ſtudy, he mentioned to the Earl ſeveral paſſages out of the Digeſts, Code, and Novels, upon that head. The Earl thereupon deſired the Doctor to ſtate that matter in writing; which the latter did; telling the Earl at the ſame time, that he ſpoke of the ſudden, but that, when he went home among his books, he would conſider the matter more ſeverely. Accordingly, the winter following, he wrote to the Earl, retracting the whole paper, and anſwering all the material things in it. II. Myſtery of Iniquity unveiled. London, 1673, 8*vo*. [QQ] His death.] He was taken ill of a violent cold, which turned to a pleuritic fever: he was attended in it by his friend and relation, Dr. Cheyne, who, finding the diſtemper grow to an height, called in the aſſiſtance of Sir Hans Sloane and Dr. Mead. He bore the notice of his danger with calmneſs and reſignation; and, as he preſerved his ſenſes to the laſt, he employed the ſhort remainder of his life in continual acts of devotion, and giving the beſt advice to his family, of whom he took leave with the utmoſt tenderneſs, and firmeſt conſtancy of mind (71).

[RR] His Hiſtory of his own Time.] The Biſhop, by his laſt will and teſtament, ordered, that this Hiſtory ſhould not be printed till ſix years after his death, and then faithfully, without adding, ſuppreſſing, or altering it in any particular. Accordingly the firſt volume was printed at London in 1723, and the ſecond in 1734, in folio. To the firſt volume is prefixed an advertiſement, acquainting the reader, that 'the Editors intended, for the ſatisfaction of 'the public, to depoſit the copy, from which this 'Hiſtory is printed (corrected, and interlined in many 'places with the author's own hand), in ſome public 'library, as ſoon as the ſecond volume ſhould be 'publiſhed.' The firſt part of this Hiſtory was written ſome time before the year 1705, but how long, is uncertain: only it appears it was then finiſhed, becauſe, in the beginning of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, the author dates the continuation of it on the firſt day of May 1705. What led him at firſt to look into the ſecret conduct of public affairs, as he himſelf tells us (72), was the manner of his education, which being ſolely in the hands of his father, who had been engaged in great friendſhips with all parties, and took a pleaſure in relating to him the ſeries of public tranſactions, he had, while very young, a greater knowledge of thoſe matters than is uſual at that age. Beſides which, he himſelf fell into great acquaintance and friendſhips with ſeveral perſons, who either were, or had been, Miniſters of State, from whom, when the ſecret of affairs was over, he ſtudied to know as many particulars as he could draw from them. He ſaw, likewiſe, a great deal more among the papers of the Dukes of Hamilton, than was properly a part of their Memoirs, or fit to be told at that time. Add to this, his intimacy, for above thirty years, with all who had the chief conduct of affairs, and his own ſhare in many of them, which enabled him to penetrate far into the true ſecret of counſels and deſigns. 'This, our author goes 'on (73), made me, twenty years ago, write down a 'relation of all that I had known to that time. 'Where I was in the dark, I paſſed over all, and 'only annexed, has been publiſhed, in two volumes in folio, by his ſon Thomas Burnet, Eſq; (l). Our author's public character, and conduct as a Biſhop, have been already ſet forth: it remains only to take a ſhort view of him in his domeſtic life [SS]; to which we ſhall ſubjoin his general character, as drawn by the Marquis of Halifax [TT].

'only opened thoſe tranſactions that I had particular 'occaſions to know. My chief deſign in writing, 'was to give a true view of men and of counſels, 'leaving public tranſactions to Gazettes, and the 'public Hiſtorians of the times. I writ with a de'ſign to make both myſelf and my readers wiſer and 'better, and to lay open the good and bad of all 'ſides and parties, as clearly and impartially as I 'myſelf underſtood it; concealing nothing that I 'thought fit to be known, and repreſenting things 'in their natural colours, without art or diſguiſe, 'without any regard to kindred or friends, to parties 'or intereſts: for I do ſolemnly ſay this to the world, 'and make my humble appeal upon it to the great 'God of truth, that I tell the truth on all occaſions, 'as fully and freely, as, upon my beſt enquiry, I 'have been able to find it out. Where things ap'pear doubtful, I deliver them with the ſame incer'tainty to the world (74).' Our author then apologizes for the ſeverity with which he has treated thoſe of his own profeſſion, his dwelling ſo long on the affairs of Scotland, and his inclination to think generally the worſt both of men and of parties. Laſtly, as to the ſtyle of the Hiſtory, he tells us (75), he purpoſely avoided all laboured periods and artificial ſtrains, and that he wrote it in as clear and plain a ſtyle as was poſſible, chooſing rather a copious enlargement than a dark conciſeneſs. He concludes the preface with a ſolemn dedication of his work to God. There are two French tranſlations of the firſt volume of this Hiſtory; the one by M. de la Pilloniere, the other by an anonymous tranſlator: the firſt was printed at the Hague, in three volumes 12*mo*, 1725; the other, with cuts, at the ſame place, in the ſame year, in two volumes 4*to*. This laſt verſion was reprinted at Trevoux, in four volumes 12*mo*. Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time has been ſeverely attacked by ſeveral writers; particularly, I. By John Cockburn, D. D. in a piece, in 8*vo*, intitled, A Specimen of ſome free and impartial Remarks on public Affairs and particular Perſons, eſpecially relating to Scotland, occaſioned by Dr. Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Times. A Vindication of our author againſt this writer was publiſhed in 1724; to which a reply was made under the title of A Defence of Dr. Cockburn, againſt the Vindication of Biſhop Burnet. A IId antagoniſt was an anonymous writer, in a piece, intitled, A Review of Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Times, particularly his Characters and ſecret Memoirs; with critical Remarks, ſhewing the Partiality, Inconſiſtency, and Defects of that Political Hiſtory, 8vo. III. In 1725, appeared a book, intitled, Biſhop Burnet's late Hiſtory charged with great Partiality and Miſrepreſentation, to make the preſent and future Ages believe, that Arthur, Earl of Eſſex, in 1683, murdered himſelf, &c. By Mr. Braddon, 8vo. IV. The ſame year, Mr. Bevil Higgins publiſhed, in 8vo, Hiſtorical and Critical Remarks on Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time. This author writes with a peculiar vehemence and ſharpneſs of ſtyle. He tells us, in his preface, 'It 'is very evident, that revenge has abſolutely guided 'him (the Biſhop) through this Hiſtory, and ſo 'darkened his underſtanding, as ſometimes to make 'him fall into the groſſeſt abſurdities.' The ſecond edition of this book is of the year 1727, with Additional Remarks, and a Poſtſcript, in Anſwer to the London Journal of January 30th and February 6th, 1725. V. The late Lord Landſdowne attacked our author's Hiſtory, in a Letter to the Author (Mr. Oldmixon) of the Reflections, Hiſtorical and Political, &c. to which the Biſhop's ſon, Thomas Burnet, Eſq; replied, in ſome Remarks upon that Letter, London, 1732, 4*to*. Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time concludes with a warm and affectionate addreſs to all ranks and degrees of perſons; the Clergy, the Commonalty, the Gentry, the Traders, the Nobility, the Houſes of Parliament, and our Monarchs themſelves; cenſuring the faults and errors of their conduct, giving them ſuitable advice, and earneſtly exhorting them to the practice of virtue and religion.

[SS] A ſhort view of him in his domeſtic life.] His time was employed in one regular and uniform manner. He was a very early riſer, ſeldom in bed later than five or ſix o'clock in the morning. Private meditation took up the two firſt hours, and the laſt half hour of the day. His firſt and laſt appearance to his family was at the morning and evening prayers, which he always read himſelf, though his Chaplains were preſent. He took the opportunity of the tea-table to inſtruct his children in religion, and in giving them his own comment upon ſome portion of Scripture. He ſeldom ſpent leſs than ſix, often eight, hours a day in his ſtudy. He kept an open table, in which there was plenty without luxury: his equipage was decent and plain; and all his expences generous, but not profuſe. He was a moſt affectionate huſband to his wives; and his love to his children expreſſed itſelf, not ſo much in hoarding up wealth for them, as in giving them the beſt education. After his ſons had perfected themſelves in the learned languages, under private tutors, he ſent them to the Univerſity, and afterwards abroad, to finiſh their ſtudies at Leyden. In his friendſhips, he was warm, open-hearted, and conſtant; and though his ſtation and principles raiſed him many enemies, he always endeavoured, by the kindeſt good offices, to repay all their injuries, and overcome them by returning good for evil. He was a kind and bountiful maſter to his ſervants, and obliging to all in employment under him. His charities were a principal article of his expence. He gave an hundred pounds at a time for the augmentation of ſmall livings: he beſtowed conſtant penſions on poor clergymen and their widows, on ſtudents for their education at the univerſities, and on induſtrious, but unfortunate families: he contributed frequent ſums towards the repairs or building of churches and parſonage-houſes, to all public collections, to the ſupport of charity-ſchools (one of which, for fifty children at Saliſbury, was wholly maintained by him), and to the putting out apprentices to trades. Nor were his alms confined to one nation, ſect, or party; but want, and merit, in the object, were the only meaſures of his liberality. He looked upon himſelf, with regard to his epiſcopal revenue, as a mere truſtee for the Church, bound to expend the whole in a decent maintenance of his ſtation, and in acts of hoſpitality and charity; and he had ſo faithfully balanced this account, that, at his death, no more of the income of his biſhopric remained to his family, than was barely ſufficient to pay his debts (76).

(76) Life, &c. p. 721—724.

[TT] His character, as drawn by the Marquis of Halifax.] 'Dr. Burnet is like all men, who are 'above the ordinary level, ſeldom ſpoken of in a 'mean; he muſt either be railed at, or admired. He 'has a ſwiftneſs of imagination, that no other comes 'up to; and as our nature hardly allows us to have 'enough of any thing, without having too much, he 'cannot at all times ſo hold in his thoughts, but that 'at ſome time they may run away with him; as it is 'hard for a veſſel, that is brim-full, when in motion, 'not to run over; and therefore the variety of mat'ter, that he ever carries about him, may throw out 'more than an unkind critic would allow of. His 'firſt thoughts may ſometimes require more digeſtion, 'not from a defect in his judgment, but from the 'abundance of his fancy, which furniſhes too faſt for 'him. His friends love him too well, to ſee ſmall 'faults; or if they do, think that his greater talents 'give him a privilege of ſtraying from the ſtrict rules 'of caution, and exempt him from the ordinary rules 'of cenſure. He produces ſo faſt, that what is well 'in his writings calls for admiration, and what is 'incorrect deſerves an excuſe; he may in ſome things 'require grains of allowance, which thoſe only can 'deny him who are unknown or unjuſt to him. He 'is not quicker in diſcerning other men's faults, than 'he is in forgiving them; ſo ready, or rather glad, 'to acknowledge his own, that from blemiſhes they 'become ornaments. All the repeated provocations 'of his indecent adverſaries, have had no other effect 'than the ſetting his good-nature in ſo much a better 'light, ſince his anger never yet went farther than 'to pity them. That heat, which in moſt other 'men raiſes ſharpneſs and ſatire, in him glows into 'warmth for his friends, and compaſſion for thoſe in 'want and miſery. As dull men have quick eyes in 'diſcerning

'discerning the ſmaller faults of thoſe that nature 'has made ſuperior to them, they do not miſs one 'blot he makes; and being beholden only to their 'barrenneſs for their diſcretion, they fall upon the 'errors which ariſe out of his abundance; and, by 'a miſtake, into which their malice betrays them, 'they think, that, by finding a mote in his eye, they 'hide the beams that are in their own. His quick-'neſs makes writing ſo eaſy a thing to him, that his 'ſpirits are neither waſted nor ſowered by it: The 'ſoil is not forced; every thing grows, and brings 'forth, without pangs; which diſtinguiſhes as much 'what he does, from that which ſmells of the lamp, 'as a good palate will diſcern between fruit which 'comes from a rich mould, and that which taſtes of 'the uncleanly pains that have been beſtowed upon 'it. He makes many enemies, by ſetting an ill-na-'tured example of living, which they are not inclined 'to follow. His indifference for preferment; his 'contempt, not only of ſplendor, but of all unne-'ceſſary plenty; his degrading himſelf into the loweſt 'and moſt painful duties of his calling; are ſuch un-'prelatical qualities, that, let him be never ſo or-'thodox in other things, in theſe he muſt be a Diſ-'ſenter. Virtues of ſuch a ſtamp are ſo many here-'ſies, in the opinion of thoſe Divines, who have 'ſoftened the primitive injunctions, ſo as to make 'them ſuit better with the preſent frailty of man-'kind. No wonder, then, if they are angry, ſince it 'is in their own defence; or that, from a principle 'of ſelf-preſervation, they ſhould endeavour to ſup-'preſs a man, whoſe parts are a ſhame, and whoſe 'life is a ſcandal to them.' The copy, from which this is printed, in the Biſhop's Life (77), was taken from one given to the Biſhop, in the Marquis of Halifax's own hand-writing. B.

Farther perſonal circumſtances concerning Biſhop Burnet.

 [Biſhop Burnet hath been ſo greatly celebrated, both as a man and a writer, and his works and character have been the objects of ſo much diſcuſſion, that it will not appear ſurpriſing that his article ſhould admit of very conſiderable additions. There are not, however, many new circumſtances to be mentioned with regard to his perſonal hiſtory. A ſtriking inſtance of his mother's bigoted attachment to the Preſbyterian diſcipline, hath been communicated to us by a valuable correſpondent. Whilſt Doctor Burnet reſided at Salton, he was ſeized with a fever, and having imagined, during the ravings of his diſtemper, that Archbiſhop Sharp was to ſleep at his houſe, he teſtified great anxiouſneſs about a proper place for his reception. Upon this his mother deſired him not to give himſelf any trouble on that account; for that a place ſhould be provided for the Archbiſhop,—in the hotteſt corner of hell. From the ſame correſpondent we learn, that the time which Doctor Burnet particularly allotted for preparing himſelf to ſpeak in public, was that which he employed in combing his hair. Macky, in his Characters, and Groſley, upon Macky's authority, have greatly miſrepreſented our author's marriage with the Lady Margaret Kennedy. According to them, he was obliged, on account of this affair, to run away to England; and Macky adds, that he married the lady in England (78). The laſt circumſtance is certainly falſe, and the whole ſtory appears to be groundleſs. The reaſons of Doctor Burnet's making a journey to London in 1673, and which was ſome time after his marriage, are given in note [N]; and it is evident from the cloſe intimacy he then had with the Hamilton family, that they were by no means offended with him. Indeed, it was not uncommon in the laſt century, for clergymen of eminent characters in Scotland, to marry women of high birth in that country; nor were ſuch connections eſteemed diſgraceful to the ladies' noble relations. Lady Margaret, though an excellent woman, was not, it ſeems, diſtinguiſhed for her political diſcretion. One day, during the time of the Commonwealth, as ſhe was ſtanding at a window, ſhe reviled ſome of Cromwell's ſoldiers, as murderers of their king. The ſoldiers threatened her, that, unleſs ſhe would be quiet, they would fire up at her. Nevertheleſs ſhe continued in the ſame ſtrain; ſo that the ſoldiers fired, and a bullet paſſed between her and another lady of the Crawford family (79). Biſhop Burnet himſelf, not from deſign, but from inadvertence, was very often remarkably imprudent in converſation. The Counteſs of Soiſſons, Prince Eugene's mother, was one, of ſeveral ladies, who, about the year 1680, had been impriſoned at Paris, on ſuſpicion of poiſoning. When the Prince, in the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, came over to England, our prelate requeſted of the Duke of Marlborough, that he might have the ſatisfaction of being in company with a perſon whoſe fame reſounded through all Europe. To this the Duke agreed, upon condition that the Biſhop would be on his guard againſt ſaying any thing that might give diſguſt. Being, accordingly, invited to dine at Marlborough Houſe, with Prince Eugene and other company, he reſolved to ſit ſilent and incognito during the whole entertainment. The Prince, however, ſeeing a dignified clergyman at table, inquired who he was; and underſtanding that he was Biſhop Burnet, of whom he had often heard, he addreſſed his diſcourſe to him, and aſked him, in particular, when he was laſt at Paris. To this queſtion our Prelate anſwered with precipitation, that he could not recollect the year, but that it was at the time when the Counteſs of Soiſſons was impriſoned. Scarcely had he pronounced theſe words, when, his eyes meeting thoſe of the Duke of Marlborough, he inſtantly recogniſed his blunder, and was ſo totally deprived of all remaining diſcretion, that he redoubled his error by aſking pardon of his Highneſs. The concluſion was, that ſeeing the whole company embarraſſed, and out of countenance, he retired in the utmoſt confuſion (80). When Mr. James Lindſay, the laſt Earl of Balcarras, in his early youth, was introduced to Biſhop Burnet by Lady Stair, the Biſhop, after the common compliments, aſked her, in the preſence of a large number of people, 'Pray what is be-'come of that wicked wretch, Lady Wigton?' Now the Counteſs of Wigton was the young gentleman's ſiſter. Doctor Burnet was himſelf ſo far ſenſible of his weakneſs, that he ſometimes avoided the perſons whom he might offend by it. After Lady Frances Pierpoint was married to the Earl of Marr, the Biſhop never went to viſit her, and gave Lady Stair this reaſon for his ſeeming neglect, that he did not like Lord Marr, and could not anſwer for his not babbling out ſomething with regard to him which might give offence (81).

(81) From information of the ſame correſpondent.

The following anecdote, concerning our Prelate, hath been communicated to us by the Rev. Mr. Hall, of Child-Okeford, Dorſetſhire. 'My grandfather, 'ſays Mr. Hall, who was eminent for piety and 'learning, was much eſteemed by the Biſhop, and 'frequently viſited him at his palace at Saliſbury. 'He paid his Lordſhip a viſit on purpoſe to congra-'tulate him that he had juſt paſſed his grand climac-'terical year. A faithful ſervant, who had lived 'with his Lordſhip many years, and was in the room, 'turned and ſaid, "Permit me, my Lord, to con-"gratulate you on the ſame occaſion, that you have "gone through your grand hypocritical year." The 'Tories often told the ſtory, to the deriſion of the 'good Prelate.' Mr. Hall hath frequently heard his grandfather ſay, that it was uſual for a ſervant to read the newſpapers aloud in the room, at the time the Biſhop and his company were at breakfaſt.

If we are to credit ſome verſes written by Dr. Parnell, our right reverend Author was once in danger of being burnt in his cloſet. The verſes are as follows:

'From that dire æra, bane to Sarum's pride,
'Which broke his ſchemes, and laid his friends aſide;
'He talks and writes that popery will return,
'And we, and he, and all his works, will burn.
'What touch'd himſelf was almoſt fairly proved,
'(Oh, far from Britain be the reſt removed!)
'For, as of late he meant to bleſs the age
'With flagrant prefaces of party rage,
'O'erwrought with paſſion, and the ſubjects' weight,
'Lolling he nodded in his elbow ſeat,
'Down fell the candle; greaſe and zeal conſpire,
'Heat meets with heat, and pamphlets burn their 'fire.
'Here crawls a preface on its half-burn'd maggots,
'And there, an introduction brings its faggots:
'Then roars the prophet of the Northern nation,
'Scorch'd by a flaming ſpeech on moderation:
'Unwarn'd by this, go on the realm to fright,
'Thou Briton, vaunting in thy ſecond ſight;
'In ſuch a miniſtry you ſafely tell,
'How much you'd ſuffer if religion fell (82).'

nied, that the malignity of them is ſuperior to their poetry.

Additional account of his writings.

Though Biſhop Burnet was, on the whole, a very eminent writer, and his works are many of them extremely valuable, there have been few authors of whoſe productions more different judgments have been formed, or which have been expoſed to greater variety of criticiſm and cenſure. Out of the number of remarks that might be collected from various quarters, we ſhall take notice of ſome things which have been ſaid concerning them, both in the way of diſapprobation and applauſe. Dr. Swift hath thrown a reproach upon the Biſhop, on account of his Vindication of the Church and State of Scotland. 'That early love of 'liberty he boaſts of, ſays this ſatirical writer, is ab-'ſolutely falſe; for the firſt book that I believe he 'ever publiſhed, is an entire Treatiſe in favour of 'paſſive obedience and abſolute power; ſo that his 'reflections on the clergy, for aſſerting and then 'changing thoſe principles, come very improperly 'from him (83).' Not to mention, that the Vindication of the Church and State of Scotland was not Dr. Burnet's firſt publication, it would ſurely have been no diſhonour to him that he altered his ſentiments on any diſputed ſubject. But the fact ſeems to have been, that he never materially changed his ideas concerning the doctrine of paſſive obedience. What he contended for in the book for which Swift hath reproached him, was, the illegality of reſiſtance, merely on account of religion; in oppoſition, we ſuppoſe, to the violent Scotch covenanters. It appears, likewiſe, to have been always his opinion, that reſiſtance could not be juſtified by ſingle acts of oppreſſion, and that it was not lawful till the very baſis of the conſtitution was attempted to be overturned (84). The inconſiſtency charged upon him by Dr. Swift is not a new accuſation. It was alleged againſt him by the writer of the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience, and afterwards repeated by Dr. Hickes. But it was amply confuted by Biſhop Burnet himſelf, in his anſwer to the calumnies of that bigoted Divine. A full account of the matter may likewiſe be ſeen in the General Dictionary (*). Indeed, we ſhould not at all have taken notice of Dr. Swift's cenſure, had we not been ſenſible that his works will be read long after Hickes's Diſcourſes and Burnet's Defence have been forgotten.

(*) General Dict. Vol. iii. p. 705. article Burnet, note O.

Our Author's Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Church of England, is one of his works which was not only highly applauded at its firſt appearance, but which ſtill continues juſtly to be held in the greateſt eſteem. Dr. Birch hath obſerved, that it is one of the moſt valuable hiſtories in our own, or any other language, and that the publication of it was a moſt ſeaſonable ſervice to the nation, amidſt the alarms of popery (85). Dr. Apthorpe ſays, that 'Biſhop Bur-'net, in his immortal Hiſtory of the Reformation, 'has fixed the Proteſtant religion in this country, as 'long as any religion remains among us (86);' and the ſame learned writer calls him the Engliſh Euſebius. In 1713, which was the year before the third volume of this great work was given to the world, the Biſhop publiſhed ſeparately the Introduction to that volume; wherein he ſtrongly expreſſes his apprehenſions concerning the return of popery into England. This circumſtance gave much offence to the miniſtry of that period, and occaſioned Dr. Swift to write a Tract, intitled, 'A Preface to the Biſhop of 'Sarum's Introduction,' in which our Prelate is treated with uncommon ſeverity, and ſeveral accuſations are brought againſt him, that are evidently the reſult of party-ſpirit (87). The verſes of Parnell, before cited, were undoubtedly compoſed about the ſame time, and on the ſame occaſion. There is one circumſtance which ſets the correctneſs and value of the Hiſtory of the Reformation in a very ſtriking light. Mr. Strype deſcended to a full and minute reviſion both of the Hiſtory and the copies of records, omitting nothing how ſmall and inconſiderable ſoever, that was liable to correction; and yet, though he had then been employed above thirty years in examining all the tranſactions of that age, and had made great diſcoveries of his own, he did not touch upon any thing which was of any moment in the whole work. This fact is juſtly ſpoken of with particular pleaſure by the Biſhop, in the preface to his third volume; at the end of which volume Mr. Strype's remarks are ſubjoined.

(87) Swift's Works, Vol. ix. p. 207—252.

Dr. Burnet's account of ſome paſſages in the Life and Death of John Earl of Rocheſter, hath lately received a diſtinguiſhed encomium from no leſs an eminent writer than Dr. Samuel Johnſon; who, from his known political ſentiments, might be thought not to be highly prejudiced in our Author's favour. It is a book, which, in the opinion of the poetical Biographer, 'the Critic ought to read for its ele-'gance, the Philoſopher for its arguments, and the 'Saint for its piety. It were an injury to the reader 'to offer him an abridgment (88).' Upon a re-peruſal of this work, we agree in the character here given of it, though with ſome ſmall abatement. The compoſition is undoubtedly far more accurate and finiſhed than is uſual with Dr. Burnet. Many of the ſentences are extremely beautiful, and form happy inſtances of that circuitus et ambitus verborum, that period which the ancients ſo well underſtood, and which ſeveral of our own authors, of the laſt century, aimed at, and frequently with ſucceſs; though ſometimes their language was ſo involved as to become obſcure, if not ungrammatical. Dr. Burnet informs us, in the preface, that he took great pains in drawing up the work; and, conſidering the notice it was likely to excite, and that it would be expoſed to all the criticiſm, and, if poſſible, to all the ridicule, of the enemies of religion, it was right that it ſhould be compoſed with peculiar attention. It is probable, likewiſe, that improvements in the language were ſuggeſted by thoſe able friends of the author who were conſulted with regard to the publication. The ſtyle, however, is not ſo uniformly elegant, but that ſome inaccuracies might be pointed out. Dr. Burnet occaſionally falls into his cuſtomary negligence of compoſition: for, with relation to his writings in general, it muſt be allowed that the language of them, though, upon the whole, perſpicuous and manly, is far from being pure and correct. Dr. Swift is very ſevere upon him in this reſpect. That author, ſpeaking of the Biſhop's Hiſtory of his own Time, ſays, that his ſtyle is rough, full of improprieties, in expreſſions often Scotch, and often ſuch as are uſed by the meaneſt people; and that he diſcovers a great ſcarcity of words and phraſes, by repeating the ſame ſeveral hundred times, for want of capacity to vary them (89). Dr. Swift, ſome years before this, had condemned our Prelate's language in the following terms: 'I 'would adviſe him, if it be not too late in his life, 'to endeavour a little at mending his ſtyle, which is 'mighty defective in circumſtances of grammar, pro-'priety, politeneſs, and ſmoothneſs.—Whoever has 'heard his ſermons, or read his other tracts, will find 'him very unhappy in the choice and diſpoſition of 'his words, and, for want of variety, repeating them, 'eſpecially the particles, in a manner very grating to 'an Engliſh ear (90).' Though it may, perhaps, juſtly be thought that party prejudice hath carried theſe cenſures too far, we are, nevertheleſs, of opinion, that there is in them a conſiderable degree of truth. It ought, however, to be remembered, that any deficiencies in Dr. Burnet's ſtyle are uſually compenſated for by the excellency of his matter. To return to his account of the Life and Death of the Earl of Rocheſter, we may add, that the reaſoning part of it is not in every place equally ſtrong, though its arguments are, in general, very ſolid and convincing.

Biſhop Burnet's 'Expoſition of the Thirty-nine 'Articles of the Church of England,' is another of his capital works, which hath received much applauſe. Dr. Flexman calls it a learned, judicious, and inſtructive performance. the reſult of great abilities and indefatigable induſtry (91). It was undertaken at the requeſt of Queen Mary, ſeconded by Archbiſhop Tillotſon. It was reviſed and corrected likewiſe by that excellent man, and peruſed and approved, before publication, by the Archbiſhops Teniſon and Sharp, and the Biſhops Stillingfleet, Patrick, Lloyd, Williams, and More (92). The laſt mentioned Biſhop, whilſt the manuſcript was with him, committed it to the peruſal of his chaplain, Mr. Whiſton; and when Mr. Whiſton returned it, aſked him, Whom he took to be the author? To this Whiſton replied, that nobody could write it but Biſhop Burnet (93). A late ingenious and learned writer hath alleged ſome reaſons to ſhew, that our Prelate undertook the work with reluctance; and the ſame writer, with his uſual acuteneſs, hath examined at large, and pointed out the weak parts of the Biſhop's introduction, relative to ſubſcription (94).

With regard to the caſes of conſcience, mentioned in note [PP], it might farther be added, to what is there there ſaid, that there is a paſſage, in the Life of the Earl of Rocheſter, which clearly ſhews that Dr Burnet had diſcarded the doctrine which ſeemed to be favoured in the reſolution of theſe caſes (95). But though he had retracted the whole paper within a year after it was firſt written, he hath lately been calumniated on account of it by Groſley, who has indeed been miſled by Macky (96).

Eſtimate of the Biſhop's Hiſtory of his own Time.

But the work which hath given riſe to the largeſt number of ſtrictures, and hath cauſed the greateſt variety of ſentiments, is the Biſhop's Hiſtory of his own Time. From its firſt appearance, a general clamour was excited againſt it among the Tories and High Churchmen; and many perſons beſides were offended with it, on account of the freedom with which particular characters were drawn, and particular facts repreſented. The wits, too, combined againſt it, to expoſe it to ridicule. Hence it was that Mr. Pope wrote the Memoirs of a Pariſh Clerk, the pleaſantry and humour of which muſt be admired, even by thoſe who may not approve of that great poet's deſign. 'The Notes and Memorandums of the ſix Days preceding the Death of the late Right Rev. ————,' which are inſerted in Dr. Arbuthnot's Miſcellanies, have likewiſe the ſame object. Dr. Swift hath made a more ſerious attack upon the work, in what he calls, 'Short Remarks on Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory (97);' with regard to which remarks it is no injuſtice to obſerve, that they contain more of ſeverity than truth. In Ralph's Review of the Reigns of Charles the Second and James the Second, a variety of obſervations may be met with concerning our Prelate's accounts of things; and they are frequently noticed by others of our hiſtorical writers. John Duke of Argyle, in one of the parliamentary debates of 1740, took occaſion to ſpeak of the Biſhop and his Hiſtory in very ſevere terms. Lord Cholmondeley having quoted our author, in confirmation of a fact relative to Sir George Rook, his Grace anſwered that part of the Earl's ſpeech in the following manner: 'As for 'what has been mentioned in relation to Admiral 'Rook, we know, my Lords, the hiſtory from which 'it was taken. It is a ſtory of Biſhop Burnet's, in 'his Hiſtory of his own Times; and thoſe who have 'ſat in this houſe with that Prelate, muſt know he 'was a very credulous, weak man. I remember him, 'my Lords, in this houſe; and likewiſe remember, 'that my Lord Halifax, my Lord Somers, and his 'other friends in the houſe, were always in a terror 'when he roſe up to ſpeak, leſt he ſhould injure their 'cauſe by ſome blunder. With regard to what he ſays 'againſt Admiral Rook, I know I have heard it from 'thoſe that were preſent, that the greateſt part of it 'is a downright lie. The Biſhop, it is well known, 'was no friend to that admiral; and therefore he 'eaſily gave credit, as he generally did in like caſes, 'to every malicious ſtory he heard againſt him (98).' Perhaps it may be thought probable, that the heat of parliamentary debate carried the Duke of Argyle farther than he would have permitted himſelf to have gone in calm and ſober converſation. Sir John Dalrymple, however, hath lately delivered an opinion, of a more deliberate kind, which is equally to the diſadvantage of Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory. 'It may appear ungenerous in the living,' ſays Sir John, 'to 'throw reflections on the dead. But it is a piece of 'juſtice I owe to hiſtorical truth, to ſay, that I have 'never tried Burnet's facts by the teſts of dates, and 'of original papers, without finding them wrong; 'for which reaſon I have made little uſe of them in 'theſe Memoirs, unleſs when I found them ſupported by other authorities. His book is the more 'reprehenſible, becauſe it is full of characters, and 'moſt of them are tinged with the colours of his own 'weakneſſes and paſſions (*).' Lively writers are not always conſiſtent. Sir John Dalrymple never tried Burnet's facts—without finding them wrong; and yet he ſometimes made uſe of them, when he found them ſupported by other authorities. In the caſes, therefore, wherein he made uſe of them, becauſe, upon trial, he found them ſupported by other authorities, they could not be wrong. But though Sir John Dalrymple's cenſure is extravagantly and injudiciouſly expreſſed, it is not entirely groundleſs. It is certain that Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time is often very inaccurate in point of dates, and in many of the ſmaller circumſtances of the facts related by him. This the writer of the preſent note can ſay from his own knowledge; having had occaſion to inquire, with particular attention, into ſome of our Prelate's accounts of things. It may be aſked, then, what is the real merit of his Hiſtory; and as the queſtion is well worthy of a ſerious and impartial determination, we ſhall endeavour to give the beſt anſwer to it that is in our power.

(*) Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 34, note.

In the firſt place, it may be obſerved, that ſeveral of the errors which are diſcoverable in the work, are of ſuch a kind as are common to the hiſtorians in general of that period, when it was not cuſtomary to examine and ſettle the ſlighter circumſtances of events with the accuracy and ſcrupuloſity which have lately been faſhionable; and when, indeed, there was not the ſame opportunity for doing it that hath ſince been afforded by the ſtudy of the Lords' and Commons' Journals, the printing of State Papers, and the publication of various other hiſtorical materials, collections, and criticiſms. Clarendon, Kennet, Eachard, and Rapin, would all of them be found, upon examination, to have fallen into the like inadvertencies which are chargeable upon Burnet.

Secondly, the Biſhop was a man who always aimed at truth, and always told it to the very beſt of his knowledge. Of this, which we might be aſſured of, from his general character for integrity, he hath himſelf given us the moſt poſitive declaration. After having recited the ſources of his information, he adds; 'For I do ſolemnly ſay this to the world, and 'make my humble appeal upon it to the great God 'of truth, that I tell the truth, on all occaſions, as 'fully and freely as upon my beſt inquiry I have been 'able to find it out:' And he farther acquaints us, that he reckons 'a lie in hiſtory to be as much a 'greater ſin than a lie in common diſcourſe, as the 'one is like to be more laſting, and more generally 'known than the other (99).' When, therefore, we reflect upon the Biſhop's integrity, in conjunction with his extenſive opportunities for intelligence, we may conclude, that, whatever miſtakes he has been led into from inadvertence or miſinformation, he is abſolutely to be depended upon with regard to the grand facts which he hath tranſmitted to poſterity.

(99) Preface to the Hiſtory of his own Time, ubi ſupra, Vol. i. p. 3, 4.

Thirdly, when he relates things not upon his own knowledge, but from the teſtimony of others, he faithfully informs us from whom his accounts are derived; and conſequently we have it in our power to determine, from the character, connections, and ſituations of the perſons mentioned, what degree of credit is due to their reſpective narrations. It hath, indeed, been aſſerted, that Dr. Burnet being a credulous man, people took a pleaſure in impoſing upon him, by falſe ſtories. Perhaps there is not much truth in this aſſertion; but be that as it may, ſince the Biſhop always gives his authorities, we can ſtill judge for ourſelves concerning their validity. He himſelf hath told us, that where things appear doubtful, he hath delivered them with the ſame uncertainty to the world (100).

Fourthly, Several of the facts in our Prelate's Hiſtory of his own Time, which at firſt were diſcredited, or at leaſt conſidered as dubious, have ſince been proved to be true. His aſſertion that Charles the Second, during his exile, was converted to popery, and that he died in the belief and exerciſe of that religion, though long rejected by many perſons, muſt now be conſidered as ſupported by inconteſtible evidence. His account of that Monarch's faith in necromancy, and conſulting an aſtrologer at Paris, by means of his embaſſador, Ralph Montague, and of that embaſſador's entering into an intrigue with the Ducheſs of Cleveland, to convert the King's folly to their own purpoſes, are matters of the ſame kind. We only here touch on a point which might admit of greater enlargement.

Fifthly, Though Biſhop Burnet's Characters have been particularly objected to, and he may poſſibly have been miſtaken in ſome circumſtances relating to them, yet, in general, they will be found, we apprehend, to be juſt. The chief fault imputed to them is, that they are drawn up with too much ſeverity; and it muſt be allowed that our Author's Hiſtory of his own Time does not abound with very flattering pictures of public men. But the queſtion is, whether ſuch pictures could have been given in conſiſtency with truth. It is to be feared that a real knowledge of the world will not preſent us with many characters which can bear to be repreſented in a view that is in every reſpect favourable; and leaſt of all is this to be expected among courtiers and ſtateſmen. Clarendon's Continuation, which deſcribes ſeveral of the perſons delineated by Burnet, is ſo far from always appearing more full in their praiſes, that it ſometimes treats them with greater ſeverity. We do not mean, however, entirely to exculpate our worthy Prelate. Beſides his being occaſionally liable to miſtakes and wrong information, he ſeems to have been diſpoſed to look too much to the dark ſide of a character; and of this diſpoſition he was himſelf ſenſible. 'I find,' ſays he, 'that the long experience 'I have had of the baſeneſs, the malice, and the 'falſehood of mankind, has inclined me to be apt to 'think generally the worſt of men and of parties.' He warns therefore his readers to take what he advances with ſome grains of allowance; though he adds at the ſame time, that he hath watched over himſelf and his pen ſo carefully, that he hoped there was no great occaſion for an apology (101).

(101) Preface to the Hiſtory of his own Time, ubi ſupra, Vol. i. p. 3, 4.

Sixthly, When all the ſubtractions are made from the merit of the Biſhop's Hiſtory, which can be made, a vaſt deal will ſtill remain. It will be found to contain, on the whole, a faithful and intereſting repreſentation of times and manners. It lets us more fully into the real temper and character of the age, than many productions which may boaſt a ſuperior accuracy in ſmaller matters, and a higher finiſhing with reſpect to leſſer ornaments. In ſhort, it is written with a ſpirit of integrity and liberty that cannot fail of recommending it to a judicious reader; and there are few hiſtories in our language which will be found to convey more ſolid and uſeful information. Accordingly, notwithſtanding the various attacks to which it hath been expoſed, it ſeems to be riſing in its reputation; and, in our opinion, it clearly deſerves the encomium which hath lately been beſtowed upon it by a very elegant poet.

'Yet Burnet's page may laſting glory hope,
'Howe'er inſulted by the ſpleen of POPE.
'Tho' his rough language haſte and warmth denote,
'With ardent honeſty of ſoul he wrote.
'Tho' critic cenſures on his work may ſhower,
'Like faith, his freedom has a ſaving power (102).'

Beſides thoſe works of Biſhop Burnet, that are mentioned in our learned predeceſſor's article, he wrote a number of others which are there omitted. This is apparent from the accurate chronological account of his publications that hath been drawn up by Dr. Flexman, and is annexed to the later editions of our Prelate's Hiſtory of his own Time. Dr. Flexman's catalogue is ranged under five heads; which are, Sermons; Diſcourſes and Tracts in Divinity; Tracts againſt Popery; Tracts polemical, political and miſcellaneous; Hiſtory and hiſtorical Tracts. The Sermons publiſhed by Dr. Burnet were fifty-eight in number. Forty-four of theſe, moſt of which had been ſeparately printed, may be met with in the collection of the Biſhop's Tracts and Diſcourſes that appeared in 1704, and in the volume of Sermons which came out in 1713. The preface to this volume contains a judicious and laboured defence of the Revolution; in which the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of that important tranſaction are fully juſtified againſt the reproaches and miſrepreſentations of the Non-jurors, and others, who were diſaffected to our happy conſtitution of government. The Sermons which were not collected together, in the publications above ſpecified, were as follows:

1. 'Subjection for Conſcience Sake aſſerted;' at Covent-garden, 6 Decem. 1674, on Rom. xiii. 5. 1675, 4*to*. 2. 'The royal Martyr lamented;' at the Savoy, 30 Jan. 1674-5, 2 Sam. i. 12. 1675, 4*to*. Theſe two diſcourſes were reprinted in 1710, 8*vo*. 3. At Saliſbury, at the triennial viſitation, Oct. 17[illegible]4, Phil. ii. 1, 2. 4. At St. James's, 10 March, 1705-6, the fifth Sunday in Lent, Pſalm xlix. 20. 1706, 4*to*. 5. Before the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c. at St. Sepulchre's, on Eaſter Monday, 25 March, 1706, Matt. xxiv. 12. 4*to*. 6. On the Day of Thankſgiving, 27 June, 1706, Deut. iv. 6, 7, 8. 8*vo*. 7. Before the Queen, and the two Houſes of Parliament, at St. Paul's, 31 Dec. 1706, the day of thankſgiving for the wonderful ſucceſſes of that year, Pſalm lxxii. 4. 8*vo*. 8. At Saliſbury, 29 May, 1710, Matt. xxii. 21. 8*vo*. 9 and 1[illegible]. At Saliſbury, 5 Nov. 1710, and 7 Nov. 1710, the day of thankſgiving, Pſalm cxliv. 15. 8*vo*. 11. Before the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c. at St. Bride's, on Eaſter Monday, 2 April, 1711, Pſalm cxxii. 6, 7, 8, 9, 4*to*. 12. Before the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c. at St. Bride's, on Eaſter Monday, 29 March, 1714, Daniel iv. 27. 8*vo*. 13. At Saliſbury, at the triennial viſitation, 1714, Acts xx. 28. 4*to*. 14. Before the King at St. James's, 31 Oct. 1714, Pſalm ii. 10, 11. 8*vo*. There is, we are informed, in the poſſeſſion of George Baillie of Yerrefwood, Eſq; a manuſcript ſermon, by the Biſhop, preached before his Majeſty on the fifth of November, 1714, which is a ſpirited performance, and well deſerving of publication. We ſhall here ſubjoin an account of the other pieces publiſhed by Dr. Burnet, which are not taken notice of in our predeceſſor's article. 'Rome's Glory, or a Collection 'of divers Miracles wrought by Popiſh Saints, col-'lected out of their own Authors, with a prefatory 'Diſcourſe, declaring the Impoſſibility and Folly of 'ſuch vain Impoſtures,' 1673, 8*vo*. 'Obſervations 'on the firſt and ſecond of the CANONS, commonly 'aſcribed to the holy Apoſtles; wherein an Account 'of the primitive Conſtitution and Government of 'Churches is contained. Drawn from ancient and 'acknowledged Writings.' Glaſgow, 1673, 12*mo*. 'A Relation of the barbarous and bloody Maſſacre of 'about an hundred thouſand Proteſtants, begun at 'Paris, and carried on all over France, by the Papiſts 'in the Year 1572 Collected out of Mezeray, Thuanus, and other approved Authors.' 1678, 4*to*. 'A Letter written upon the Diſcovery of the late 'Plot.' 1678, 4*to*. 'The Unreaſonableneſs and 'Impiety of Popery, in a ſecond Letter written upon 'the Diſcovery of the late Plot.' 1678, 4*to*. 'A 'Decree made at Rome, 2 March, 1679, condemning ſome Opinions of the Jeſuits and other Caſuiſts.' 1679, 4*to*. 'The Infallibility of the Romiſh Church 'examined and confuted.' 1680, 4*to*. 'The laſt 'Words of Dr. Lewis du Moulin; or his Retraction 'of all the perſonal Reflections he had made on the 'Divines of the Church of England.' 1680, 4*to*. 'The Converſion and Perſecution of Eve Cohan, 'now called Elizabeth Verboon; a Perſon of Quality of the Jewiſh Religion.' 1680, 4*to*. 'The Policy of Rome, as delivered by Cardinal Palavicini, 'in his Hiſtory of the Council of Trent; with a Preface by G. Burnet, D. D.' 1681, 8*vo*. 'An Account of the Confeſſions of Lieutenant John Stern, 'and George Boroſky, executed for the Murder of 'Thomas Thynn, Eſq; 10 March, 1681-2.' 1682, folio. 'News from France: in a Letter giving a 'Relation of the preſent State of the Difference between the French King and the Court of Rome; to 'which is added, the Pope's Brief to the Aſſembly of 'the Clergy, and the Proteſtation made by them in 'Latin, together with an Engliſh Tranſlation of 'them.' 1682, 4*to*. 'A Letter written to Dr. Burnet, giving ſome Account of Cardinal Pole's ſecret 'Powers; from which it appears that it was never intended to confirm the Alienation that was made of 'the Abbey Lands. To which are added, two BREVES 'that Cardinal Pole brought over, and ſome other 'of his Letters, that were never before printed.' 1685, 4*to*. This Tract hath been aſcribed to Sir William Coventry. 'A Letter containing Remarks 'on the two Papers, writ by his late Majeſty King 'Charles the Second, concerning Religion.' 1688, 4*to*. (103) 'An Enquiry into the Reaſons for abrogating the Teſt impoſed on all Members of Parliament, offered by Dr. Samuel Parker, Biſhop of 'Oxford.' 1688, 4*to*. 'A ſecond Part of the Enquiry into the Reaſons offered by Dr. Samuel Parker, Biſhop of Oxford, for abrogating the Teſt: 'or an Anſwer to his Plea for Tranſubſtantiation, and 'for acquitting the Church of Rome of Idolatry.' 1688, 4*to*. 'A Continuation of the ſecond Part of 'the Enquiry into the Reaſons offered by Dr. Samuel Parker, Biſhop of Oxford, for abrogating the 'Teſt: relating to the Idolatry of the Church of 'Rome.' 1688, 4*to*. The ſecond Part, and the Continuation, were ſome months after publiſhed in one Tract, intitled, 'A Diſcourſe concerning Tranſubſtantiation and Idolatry, being an Anſwer to the 'Biſhop of Oxford's Plea relating to thoſe two 'Points.' 1688, 4*to*. 'Reflections on "the Relation of the Engliſh Reformation, and the THESES "relating to it," lately printed at Oxford, by Obadiah Walker, Maſter of Univerſity College.' In two Parts. Amſterdam, 1688. 'A Charge given at the triennial Viſitation of the 'Dioceſe of Saliſbury, 1714;' publiſhed together with a Sermon preached at the ſame Viſitation. 1714, 4*to*. Several of theſe pieces, as well as of the others mentioned in the article above, are in the Collection of Tracts and Diſcourſes. With regard to the pamphlets and papers written by Dr. Burnet to promote the Prince of Orange's deſigns, and which were reprinted in 1689, the diſtinct titles of them may be ſeen in the Catalogue drawn up by Dr. Flexman.

That worthy and learned friend hath informed us, that the Biſhop was the author of a few publications not ſpecified in the Catalogue. One or two pieces were written by him concerning the treaty of Ryſwick, and another on the conferences at Gertrudenburg. He wrote, likewiſe, a preface to Mrs. Cockburn's two Letters concerning a Guide in Controverſies (104). In the Annual Regiſter for 1760, we find 'An hum-'ble Repreſentation to thoſe who are to ſit on the 'Throne,' ſaid to be left by our Prelate to be printed after his death (105). It is certain that a book which he had finiſhed and prepared for the preſs, intitled, 'Eſſays and Meditations on Morality and Religion,' was directed by him, in his laſt will, to be publiſhed; but it doth not appear that this order was ever put into execution (106). Mr. Whiſton mentions a Vindication which Biſhop Burnet wrote of himſelf from the reflections that Dr. Stillingfleet caſt upon him, for requiring bonds of reſignation from thoſe whom he made Prebendaries of Sarum, in caſe they left that dioceſe. The publication of this paper, of which Mr. Whiſton ſpeaks very highly, was ſuppreſſed, at the time of its being written, out of reſpect to Biſhop Stillingfleet; nor did Mr. Thomas Burnet, after his father's deceaſe, chooſe to give it to the world (107).

In 1761, was printed at London, from an original manuſcript, in the poſſeſſion of Sir Alexander Dick, of Preſtonfield, Baronet, 'Thoughts on Education,' drawn up by Dr. Burnet when he was not quite twenty five years of age. The manuſcript (the authenticity of which is undoubted) was found by Sir Alexander Dick among the papers of his grandfather, Sir John Cunningham of Caprington, Baronet, a very learned and eminent Scotch lawyer in the reign of King Charles the Second. Though the language of this Tract is much inferior to that of the Biſhop's later works, it is an extraordinary compoſition for ſo young a man, who had then never been out of Scotland. He ſhews in it much knowledge and reflection; and he hath hit upon ſeveral things which have ſince been advanced by the moſt capital writers on the ſubject of education. It is worthy of obſervation, that he wiſhes the offices of Governor and Preceptor to be in diſtinct hands; and he thinks it a deplorable error, that youths lately come from college, who cannot govern themſelves, and that pedants, whoſe arrogance, ignorance, indiſcretion, rudeneſs, and miſbehaviour ruin young perſons, ſhould be entruſted with the breeding of Gentlemen and Noblemen. It is ſomewhat ſtrange that he propoſes the rewarding of children, when they behave well, not only with pretty knacks, and gilded books, but with fine clothes, pieces of money, and gratifications of the palate. He very judiciouſly concludes, that it is not a good and ſafe courſe to ripen young minds too faſt; 'for,' ſays he, 'ſince diſcretion doth not ripen but 'with years, to fill a child's ſails with too much wind 'of knowledge, before he can have the ballaſt of ſet-'tled wiſdom, ſeems an error in breeding.' Speaking of Virgil, whom he particularly recommends for the purity and nobleneſs of his ſtyle, he adds, that for his fancy he deſerves not the name of a poet, but of an eloquent verſifier. This deciſion will probably, in the opinion of ſome of our claſſical readers, reflect but little honour on our Author's taſte. As for the learning of Latin, he wiſhes a boy to be much diſcourſed with in that language, and would have him always talk in it with his maſter and governor. He is for granting large portions of time to the recreations of young gentlemen, and believes that the whole afternoon, excepting one hour before ſupper, may well be allowed them for this purpoſe, without any obſtruction to their neceſſary improvements. It is obſervable, that he decries the ſtudy of logic, which might ariſe from the abſurd ſyſtems of it that had long prevailed in the world. The leſs a pupil converſes with women, Dr. Burnet thinks it the better; but he acknowledges, that to be ſometimes with the wiſe and excellent of that ſex, is one of the greateſt helps for breeding. It is remarkable, that, very differently from the ideas then entertained by many of his countrymen, he conſiders the being a ſoldier of fortune as an unvirtuous and ungentleman-like courſe of life. With reſpect to travelling, he allows it to be neceſſary, when a youth is bred for a court, and may probably be appointed an ambaſſador, or to negociate foreign affairs; but otherwiſe he cannot ſee why any ſhould travel to France and Italy, in order to learn to live in Scotland. He admits, however, that if a perſon hath a mature ſpirit and ripe judgment, is confirmed in his religion, poſſeſſes a true ſenſe of piety and virtue, and is not of a light or gadding mind, but knows what to obſerve and ſearch after, he may, if he be well recommended, and is paſt twenty-one years of age, ſpend a year or two abroad with much advantage (108) *.

As to Biſhop Burnet's general character as a writer, little needs to be ſaid of it, after the view we have taken of ſeveral of his principal productions. We have ſeen that ſome of his works are of great conſequence, which continue to be read, and to be held in high eſtimation. Others of them, though now leſs noticed, would well reward a peruſal, as they uſually contain very valuable matter on the reſpective ſubjects concerning which they treat. It ought not to be forgotten, that he has conſiderable merit as a biographer; the lives written by him, beſides that of the Earl of Rocheſter, being both inſtructive and entertaining. Mr. Ralph, ſpeaking of our Prelate, ſays, 'I do not rank Burnet in the firſt claſs of authors, 'and yet it was not his divinity which made him 'biſhop of Saliſbury (109).' Without diſputing whether he ought to be reckoned in the firſt claſs of authors, it is certain that his merit as a writer is eminent; and without entering into the queſtion whether it was, or was not, his divinity which made him biſhop of Saliſbury, it is evident, from his various and excellent theological works, that he deſerved, on their account alone, to be raiſed to the prelacy. He was indeed poſſeſſed of abilities and talents which fitted him for diſtinguiſhed uſefulneſs in the ſtate as well as in the church. Now we are ſpeaking of his promotion to the ſee of Saliſbury, we may take occaſion to obſerve, that he hath been charged with having had a view to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, and with being ſo diſappointed at his failure in that reſpect, as to form an incurable reſentment againſt King William. But that this is a calumny, is plain from the particular ſhare he had in obtaining the primacy for his friend Dr. Tillotſon (110). When Dr. Burnet became a biſhop, though no one could be more attentive to his eccleſiaſtical and epiſcopal duties, and though it is evident, from his ſubſequent writings, how much divinity was his ſtudy, yet his abilities enabled him to extend his uſefulneſs beyond the mere government of the Church. He was not an inactive or ſilent member of the Houſe of Lords, but ſometimes took a diſtinguiſhed part in the tranſactions and debates of parliament. We find him one of the managers of a conference with the Commons, relative to a bill concerning Dr. Titus Oates. Beſides the two Speeches ſeparately publiſhed by him on the Occaſional Conformity Bill, and at the trial of Dr. Sacheverell, we meet with hints of others which were delivered by him on various occaſions (111). When it was apprehended that Queen Anne's Miniſters would move for an act, or at leaſt for an addreſs, approving of the peace of Utrecht, our Prelate prepared a Speech on the occaſion; and it was the only one which he ever prepared before-hand: but not being called to make uſe of it, he hath inſerted it in the Hiſtory of his own Time, to be handed down to poſterity as a teſtimony of his ſentiments concerning that famous treaty (112). Macky, though not friendly to Biſhop Burnet, deſcribes him as one of the greateſt orators of the age he lived in; and aſſerts that he was very uſeful in the Houſe of Peers, where he was a great pillar, both of the civil and eccleſiaſtical conſtitution (113). As he was a man of ſuch extenſive capacity, knowledge, and experience, he was conſulted on many particular occaſions, and eſpecially at the time of the Revolution, his concern in which he hath himſelf given a full account of in his Hiſtory. Dr. Swift charges him, on what foundation we know not, with having been the author of the deteſtable project of funding (114); but we have been able to meet with no other proof of this charge than what ariſes from his having been an advocate for eſtabliſhing the Bank of England (115). Though Biſhop Burnet hath been ſo much reproached as a party man, it is certain that he was very moderate in his conduct towards thoſe who differed from him in this reſpect; and that he exerciſed great kindneſs to ſome who had engaged in deſigns againſt the Government (116).

In eccleſiaſtical matters, notwithſtanding that he hath been accuſed of not having been ſufficiently zealous for the rights and privileges of the Church and of Church-men, we find that he oppoſed the mixing of laymen with clergymen, in the commiſſion for a comprehenſion with the Diſſenters, ſoon after the Revolution. The ſhare he had in the alterations then propoſed in the Liturgy, was the adding of farther force and ſpirit to the new Collects drawn up by Dr. Patrick. In the Convocation which met about the ſame time, the Biſhop was chief manager, for the Upper Houſe, in the conference with the Lower Houſe, relative to an addreſs to his Majeſty (117).

With reſpect to our eminent Prelate's general character, though he was held in diſlike by a number of perſons, the account of it given by his ſon ſeems to be undoubtedly juſt. Even Dr. Swift acknowledges that he was a man of generoſity and good-nature, and very communicative (118). The author of the Confeſſional aſſigns it as a reaſon why he was never a favourite with that part of the clergy who ſtile themſelves orthodox, that he was apt to ſpeak his mind freely concerning ſuch men and ſuch things in the Church, as he thought wanted reformation (119). Whiſton relates an agreeable circumſtance with regard to the liberality and candour of his mind. That learned man having written an Anſwer to Collins's Diſcourſe on Free-thinking, Biſhop Burnet liked it ſo well, that he ſaid, that for its ſake he forgave Mr. Whiſton all his hereſy (120). Dr. Towers, in his Britiſh Biography, hath largely inſiſted on the Biſhop's character; but we muſt only refer to what he hath ſaid upon it, as this note hath already been extended to ſo great a length (121).

The manner in which Dr. Burnet hath expreſſed himſelf concerning two of our poets, hath given offence to many men of taſte. He calls Dryden a monſter of immodeſty, and of impurity of all ſorts (122). If this was ſpoken of Mr. Dryden's perſonal character, it was very unjuſt; but if it referred, as probably it did, to that great poet's plays only, the cenſure was too well founded. The Biſhop, ſpeaking of Mr. Prior's being employed by Queen Anne's Miniſtry, in the negociations for a peace, ſtiles him, 'one Prior, 'who had been Jerſey's ſecretary (123).' This was undoubtedly very improper language to be uſed concerning a man who had long before diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his elegant poetical productions. Our right reverend Author's expreſſion hath given occaſion to the following lines, by the late Mr. Robert Dodſley.

'One Prior! and is this, this all the fame
'The poet from the hiſtorian can claim?
'No; Prior's verſe poſterity ſhall quote,
'When 'tis forgot one Burnet ever wrote (124).'

Biſhop Burnet's third wife, of whom ſome account is given in note [KK], hath had an article aſſigned to her in Mr. Ballard's 'Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, who 'have been celebrated for their writings or ſkill in the 'learned languages, arts and ſciences;' where her character is drawn out at large, and to great advantage (125). She was indeed a moſt excellent woman, being equally diſtinguiſhed for her piety, prudence, and benevolence. At the Biſhop's requeſt, the management and diſpoſal of her eſtate were ſecured wholly to herſelf; and ſhe applied her income chiefly to charitable purpoſes, reſerving only the fifth part of it, and ſometimes not even that, to her own uſe. She particularly favoured the ſetting up of ſchools for the inſtruction and education of poor children, above an hundred of whom were taught at her expence in and about Worceſter and Saliſbury. Though ſhe had no ſkill in the learned languages, ſhe had a very enlarged and cultivated underſtanding, and Dr. Stillingfleet was often heard to ſay of her, that he knew not a more conſiderable woman in England than ſhe was. She was held in the ſame eſtimation by Dr. Talbot, afterwards biſhop of Durham, and by Dr. Lloyd, Stillingfleet's ſucceſſor in the ſee of Worceſter. She died on the 3d of February, 1708-9. The clauſe of her will, by which ſhe directed the place of her burial, was as follows: 'I will that my body 'be buried in the pariſh-church of Spetchley, in the 'county of Worceſter, in a vault made by me for my 'former huſband, Robert Berkeley, Eſq; and myſelf. I order this to fulfil a promiſe I made to him; 'not out of any want of reſpect or kindneſs to my 'preſent huſband, who has, by his great kindneſs and 'confidence, deſerved from me all the gratitude and 'acknowledgments of love and reſpects I can teſtify '(126).' Biſhop Burnet had by this lady two children, who died in their infancy (127). A letter which ſhe wrote to Mrs. Catharine Trotter (afterwards Mrs. Cockburn) is preſerved in Dr. Birch's Life of that extraordinary woman, and fully juſtifies the applauſes that have been beſtowed on the excellency of Mrs. Burnet's underſtanding and temper (128).

Our prelate, by his ſecond wife, Mrs. Mary Scott, had ſeven children, three ſons and four daughters. His three ſons ſurvived him, and ſo did two of his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth (129). What became of his daughters we know not; but his ſons were of ſuch conſideration as to deſerve that ſome account of them ſhould be added in this place.

William, the eldeſt of them, was entered, at ſeven years of age, into the Latin tongue, under a diſtinct tutor; and when he was perfected in the learned languages, was removed to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was admitted a Gentleman Commoner of Trinity College. Here, beſides the College tutor, he had a private one, to aſſiſt him in the acquiſition of literature, and to ſuperintend his behaviour. In the year 1706, he was ſent, with his two younger brothers, abroad, to finiſh his ſtudies at Leyden; from whence he appears to have made a tour through Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. By his own choice he was bred to the law; but we cannot tell whether he ever practiſed at the bar (130). In 1720, he was one of the unhappy perſons who ſuffered greatly in the infatuation of the South-Sea ſcheme. He had, however, a place in the revenue, of twelve hundred pounds a year; but, being deſirous of retrieving his fortune, he quitted that poſt, and was appointed Governor of New York and the Jerſeys. In this ſtation, his conduct, in general, was very acceptable to thoſe colonies, and approved of in England. After the acceſſion of King George the Second, in order to provide for a gentleman who was underſtood to be in particular eſteem with his Majeſty, Mr. Burnet was removed from the governments of New York and the Jerſeys to thoſe of the Maſſachuſets and New Hampſhire. This change was highly diſagreeable to him. He conſidered it as a great hardſhip to be ſuperſeded in ſo ſhort a time; and to be obliged to part with poſts that were very profitable, for ſuch as would afford him, at beſt, only a decent ſupport; and to leave an eaſy adminiſtration for one which he foreſaw would be extremely troubleſome. He complained to his friends of the cruel treatment he had met with, and it had a viſible effect upon his ſpirits (131). On the 13th of July, 1728, he arrived at Boſton, and was received with unuſual pomp. Having been inſtructed, from England, to inſiſt on a fixed ſalary's being ſettled upon him as Governor, he adhered hered to his inſtructions with ſuch unabated vigour and perſeverance, as involved him in the warmeſt diſputes with the general Aſſembly of the province. A large detail of theſe conteſts may be ſeen in Mr. Hutchinſon's Hiſtory of Maſſachuſet's Bay, from which Mr. Burnet's abilities, firmneſs, and ſpirit will appear in a ſtriking light (132). Being deprived of his ſalary, by refuſing to receive it in the mode propoſed by the Aſſembly, and having by that means been driven to ſuch ſtraits as obliged him to apply to the aſſiſtance of his friends for the ſupport of his family, he thought he might be juſtified in eſtabliſhing a fee and perquiſite which had never been known in the province before. At New York, all veſſels took from the Governor a paſs, or permiſſion for ſailing out of the harbour, which, though it had no foundation in law, was ſubmitted to without complaint. The ſame diſpoſition did not prevail in the inhabitants of Boſton. The fee which Mr. Burnet impoſed on the ſhips, for their paſſes, being complained of to the King and Council, as illegal and oppreſſive, it was immediately diſapproved. In all other reſpects, unleſs we ſhould think that the warmth with which he purſued the affair of the ſalary was carried too far, his adminiſtration was unexceptionable (133). It was obſerved by his friends, that his controverſy with the general Aſſembly made a great impreſſion upon his mind. In the latter end of Auguſt, 1729, he was ſeized, at Boſton, with a fever, which carried him off on the ſeventh of September. The immediate cauſe of his illneſs was ſuppoſed to be a cold which he caught from falling into the water, in conſequence of his carriage being overſet upon the cauſeway at Cambridge, when the tide was high. Upon Governor Burnet's death, the reſentment which had been raiſed againſt him among the inhabitants of the province ceaſed; the amiable parts of his character were affectionately called to remembrance; and the Aſſembly ordered him a very honourable funeral, at the public expence. Though he had been ſteady and inflexible in his adherence to his inſtructions, he diſcovered nothing of a graſping avaricious temper. An immoral or unfair character was a bar to office with him, and, in one inſtance, he gave a negative to an election of a councellor upon that principle alone. His ſuperior talents, and free and eaſy manner of communicating his ſentiments, rendered him the delight of men of ſenſe and learning; and his right of precedence in all companies, facilitated his natural diſpoſition to take a great lead in converſation. His own account of his genius was, that it was late before it budded; and that, until he was nearly twenty years of age, his father deſpaired of his ever making any figure in life. This, perhaps, might proceed from the exact diſcipline of the Biſhop's family, not calculated alike for every temper. To long and frequent religious ſervices at home in his youth, Mr. Burnet would ſometimes pleaſantly attribute his indiſpoſition to a ſcrupulous attendance on public worſhip. Indeed, he had an abhorrence of oſtentation and formality in religion; to avoid which he was thought, in the opinion at leaſt of moſt of the ſerious people of the province, to approach too much towards the other extreme. His open undiſguiſed mind could not ſubmit to that caution, and conformity to the manners and prejudices of the perſons among whom he was placed, which good policy required. Being invited to dine with an old Charter Senator, who retained a cuſtom, formerly in uſe among ſome of the rigid Independents, of ſaying grace ſitting, the grave gentleman deſired to know which would be more agreeable to his Excellency, that grace ſhould be ſaid ſtanding or ſitting: To this the Governor replied, 'Standing or ſitting, any way 'or no way, juſt as you pleaſe.' By a clauſe in his laſt will, he ordered his body, if he died at New York, to be buried near his wife *; if in any other part of the world, in the neareſt church-yard or burying-ground, 'all places being alike to God's all-ſeeing 'eye (134).' Mr. Burnet's firſt lady was a daughter of Dr. George Stanhope, dean of Canterbury, and was a woman equally diſtinguiſhed for her beauty, wit, good-humour, ſinging, and various accompliſhments. When ſhe was dying, being worn out with a long and painful ſickneſs, as they rubbed her temples with Hungary water, in her laſt faintings, ſhe begged them not to do it, for 'that it would make her hair grey.' Though her marriage with Mr. Burnet was a very advantageous one, and he was a moſt agreeable and worthy man, yet, having had a prior attachment, which could by no means take place, ſhe pined in thought, and died (135). Mr. William Burnet was the author of a tract, intitled, 'A View of Scripture 'Prophecy.'

Gilbert Burnet, the Biſhop's ſecond ſon, had preciſely the ſame advantages of education with his elder brother, having a diſtinct tutor both at home and the Univerſity. He purſued his ſtudies, likewiſe, for two years, at Leyden. The Engliſh Univerſity at which he was brought up was that of Oxford, where he was admitted a Commoner of Merton-College (136); but how long he ſtudied there we are not informed, nor where he took his degree of Maſter of Arts. Having entered into holy orders, we find him a Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majeſty ſo early as in 1718, when he could not be thirty years of age. He is ſaid to have been a contributor to Hibernicus's Letters, a periodical paper carried on at Dublin in the years 1725, 1726, and 1727; and we believe there is no doubt of his having been one of the writers of another valuable paper, intitled, 'The Free-'thinker,' which was afterward collected into three volumes, 12*mo*, that are now become ſcarce. In the Hoadlian controverſy, he was an able aſſiſtant to the eminent prelate from whom that controverſy received its denomination. Three pieces were publiſhed by Mr. Burnet on this occaſion, the firſt of which was, 'A Letter to the Rev. Mr. Trapp, occaſioned by his 'Sermon on the real Nature of the Church and King-'dom of Chriſt;' the ſecond, 'An Anſwer to Mr. 'Law's Letter to the Lord Biſhop of Bangor;' and the third, 'A full and free Examination of ſeveral 'important Points relating to Church-Authority, the 'Chriſtian Prieſthood, the poſitive Inſtitutions of the 'Chriſtian Religion, and Church-Communion, in 'Anſwer to the Notions and Principles contained in 'Mr. Law's ſecond Letter to the Lord Biſhop of Ban-'gor.' Concerning this laſt treatiſe, which was printed in 8*vo*, in 1718, we can aſſert, from our own knowledge, that it is a very maſterly performance, diſplaying great liberality of mind, ſtrong powers of reaſoning, and an accurate acquaintance with Scripture. Dr. Hoadly conſidered our author as one of his beſt defenders. In 1719, Mr. Burnet publiſhed an Abridgment of the third volume of his father's Hiſtory of the Reformation. If he had not been cut off in early life, there is no doubt but that he would have made a diſtinguiſhed figure in the literary world; and it is probable that he would have riſen to a high rank in the church. The Gilbert Burnet who abridged the Boylean Lectures was another perſon (137) *.

(137) From the information of Dr. Flexman.

* This Gilbert Burnet was vicar of Coggeſhall, Eſſex, and curate of St. John's Clerkenwell, and died Jan. 28, 1746.

Biſhop Burnet's third and youngeſt ſon, Thomas, had an education equally advantageous with that of his two elder brothers. When he had acquired a ſufficient preparation of grammatical learning, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, where he became a Commoner of Merton-College. After this, he ſtudied two years at Leyden; from whence he ſeems to have made a tour through Germany, Switzerland, and Italy (138). Having choſen the profeſſion of the law, he was entered at the Temple, where he appears to have contracted that wildneſs of diſpoſition, and irregularity of conduct, which too many young men, in our Inns of Court, have done. To this part of his character there are frequent alluſions in the ſatirical publications of the times; and particularly in Dr. Arbuthnot's notes and memorandums of the ſix days preceding the death of a Right Reverend Prelate. Mr. Thomas Burnet was even ſuſpected of being one of the Mohocks mentioned in the Spectator, whoſe extravagant and cruel exploits made much noiſe, and excited no ſmall degree of terror at that period. Swift, in one of his letters to Stella, has the following paſſage: 'Young Davenant was telling us, how 'he was ſet upon by the Mohocks, and how they ran 'his chair through with a ſword. It is not ſafe being 'in the ſtreets at night. The Biſhop of Saliſbury's 'ſon is ſaid to be of the gang. They are all 'Whigs. A great lady ſent to me, to ſpeak to her 'father, and to Lord Treaſurer, to have a care of 'them, and to be careful likewiſe of myſelf; for ſhe 'heard they had malicious intentions againſt the mi-'niſtry and their friends. I know not whether there 'be any thing in this, though others are of the ſame 'opinion (139).' The report concerning Mr. Burnet might be groundleſs: but however that may have been, it is certain that his time was not wholly ſpent in diſſipation; for, being warmly devoted to the cauſe of the Whigs, he commenced political writer againſt the the adminiſtration of the four laſt years of Queen Anne. No leſs than ſeven pamphlets of this kind, though without his name, were written by him, in 1712 and 1713. His firſt publication was intitled, 'A Letter to the People, to be left for them at the 'Bookſellers; with a Word or two of the Bandbox 'Plot.' This ſmall tract is drawn up in ſhort paragraphs, after the manner of Mr. Aſgill; but not in ridicule of that author, who is ſpoken of in terms of high commendation. Another piece of Mr. Burnet's was, 'Our Anceſtors as wiſe as we, or ancient Pre-'cedents for modern Facts, in Anſwer to a Letter 'from a noble Lord;' which was followed by 'The 'Hiſtory of Ingratitude, or a ſecond Part of ancient 'Precedents for modern Facts,' wherein many inſtances are related, chiefly from the Greek and Roman hiſtories, of the ungrateful treatment to which the moſt eminent public characters have been expoſed; and the whole is applied to the caſe of the Duke of Marlborough. A ſubſequent publication, that had likewiſe a reference to the conduct of the miniſtry towards the ſame great General, and which was dedicated to him, was intitled, 'The true Character of 'an honeſt Man, eſpecially with relation to public 'Affairs.' Another of Mr. Burnet's tracts, which was called, 'Truth, if you can find it; or a Cha-'racter of the preſent Miniſtry and Parliament,' was entirely of an ironical nature, and ſometimes the irony is well ſupported. But our author's principal political pamphlet, during the period we are ſpeaking of, was, 'A certain Information of a certain Diſ-'courſe, that happened at a certain Gentleman's 'Houſe, in a certain County; written by a certain 'Perſon then preſent, to a certain Friend now at 'London; from whence you may collect the great 'Certainty of the Account.' This is a dialogue in defence of the principles and conduct of the Whigs; and it gave ſuch offence to Queen Anne's Tory miniſtry, that, on account of it, Mr. Burnet was taken into cuſtody in January 1712-13. He wrote, alſo, 'Some new Proofs by which it appears that the Pre-'tender is truly James the Third;' wherein, from the information, we ſuppoſe, of his father, he gives the ſame account, in ſubſtance, of the Pretender's birth, that was afterwards publiſhed in the Biſhop's Hiſtory of his own Time. What Mr. Burnet endeavours to make out is, that three ſuppoſititious children were introduced; and conſequently, that the Pretender was James the Third; or, to put it more plainly, the third pretended James. Whilſt our young author, notwithſtanding his literary application and engagements, ſtill continued his wild courſes, it is related, that his father one day ſeeing him uncommonly grave, aſked what he was meditating. 'A 'greater work,' replied the ſon, 'than your Lord-'ſhip's Hiſtory of the Reformation.' 'What is that, 'Tom?' 'My own Reformation, my Lord.' 'I ſhall 'be heartily glad to ſee it,' ſaid the Biſhop, 'but 'almoſt deſpair of it (140).' This, however, was happily accompliſhed, though, perhaps, not during the life of the good Prelate; and Mr. Burnet became not only one of the beſt lawyers of his time, but a very reſpectable character. After the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, he wrote a letter to the Earl of Halifax (141), on 'the Neceſſity of impeaching 'the late Miniſtry;' in which he urges the point with great zeal and warmth, and ſhews the utmoſt diſlike of treating with any degree of lenity, a ſet of men whoſe conduct, in his opinion, deſerved the ſevereſt puniſhment. He inſiſts upon it, that the makers of the treaty of Utrecht ought to anſwer for their treaſons with their heads, and add one example more to our Engliſh Hiſtory of Courtiers, who, while they were contriving the ruin of their country, periſhed themſelves before they could bring their projects to bear. The Letter to the Earl of Halifax, which appeared with Mr. Burnet's name, was followed by an anonymous treatiſe, intitled, 'A ſecond Tale of a 'Tub: or, The Hiſtory of Robert Powel the Puppet-'Showman (142).' This work, which is a ſatire on the Earl of Oxford and his miniſtry, and is far from being deſtitute of wit and humour, hath never had the good fortune (nor, indeed, did it deſerve it) of being read and admired like the original Tale of a Tub. The author himſelf, in the latter part of his life, wiſhed it to be forgotten; for we are well informed that he ſought much for it, and purchaſed ſuch copies as he could meet with, at a conſiderable price. Soon after his father's death, he publiſhed 'A Character of the Right Reverend Father in God, 'Gilbert Lord Biſhop of Sarum: with a true Copy 'of his laſt Will and Teſtament (143).' In ridicule of this publication, was printed, in Hudibraſtic verſe, and with a very ſmall portion of merit, 'A certain 'dutiful Son's Lamentation for the Death of a certain 'Right Reverend: with the certain Particulars of 'certain Sums and Goods that are bequeathed him, 'which he will moſt certainly part with in a certain 'Time.' In 1715, Mr. Burnet, in conjunction with Mr. Ducket, wrote a traveſtie of the firſt book of the Iliad, under the title of 'Homerides;' which expoſed him to the laſh of Mr. Pope, and occaſioned that great poet to give him a place, though not with remarkable ſeverity, in the Dunciad. He was, likewiſe, concerned in a weekly paper, called 'The Grumbler.' He was, however, ſoon taken from theſe literary occupations, by being appointed his Majeſty's Conſul at Liſbon, where he continued ſeveral years. Whilſt he was in this ſituation, he had a diſpute with Lord Tyrawley, the Ambaſſador, in which the merchants ſided with Mr. Burnet. During the continuance of the diſpute, the Conſul took an odd method of affronting his antagoniſt. Employing the ſame taylor, and having learned what dreſs his Lordſhip intended to wear on a birth day, Mr. Burnet provided the ſame dreſs as liveries for his ſervants, and appeared himſelf in a plain ſuit. It is ſaid, that in conſequence of this quarrel (though how truly may, perhaps, be doubted), the Ambaſſador and Conſul were both recalled (144). Upon Mr. Burnet's return to his country, he reſumed the profeſſion of the law. In 1723, he publiſhed, with a few explanatory notes, the firſt volume of his father's Hiſtory of his own Time; and, in 1732, wrote ſome remarks in defence of that Hiſtory, in anſwer to Lord Landſdowne's Letter to the author of the Reflections hiſtorical and political. When Mr. Burnet gave to the public, in 1734, the ſecond volume of the Biſhop's Hiſtory, he added to it the life of that eminent Prelate, which is a valuable piece of Biography. In Eaſter Term, 1736, he was called to the degree of Serjeant at Law; and, in May 1740, was appointed King's Serjeant, in the room of Serjeant Eyre, deceaſed. When, in 1741, Judge Forteſcue was raiſed to the Maſterſhip of the Rolls, Mr. Burnet, in the month of October in that year, ſucceeded him as one of the Juſtices of the Court of Common Pleas. On the 23d of November, 1745, when the Lord Chancellor, the Judges, and the aſſociated gentlemen of the law, waited on the King, with their addreſs on occaſion of the rebellion, his Majeſty conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. He was alſo a Member of the Royal Society. Sir Thomas Burnet continued in the Court of Common Pleas, with great reputation, to his death, which happened on the fifth of January, 1753. He died of the gout in his ſtomach, and left behind him the character of an able and upright judge, a ſincere friend, a ſenſible and agreeable companion, and a munificent benefactor to the poor. Dr. Ferdinando Warner, in his dedication of Sir Thomas More's Life to the then Lord Keeper Henley, having mentioned that Mr. Juſtice Burnet recommended to him the tranſlation of the Utopia, adds, 'of whom I take this opportunity to ſay with 'pleaſure, and which your Lordſhip I am ſure will 'allow me to ſay with truth, that for his knowledge 'of the world, and his able judgment of things, he 'was equalled by few, and excelled by none of his 'contemporaries (145).' The following clauſe, in our learned Judge's will, was the ſubject of converſation after his deceaſe, and was inſerted in the monthly collections, as being ſomewhat extraordinary. 'I think it proper in this ſolemn act to declare, that 'as I have lived, ſo I truſt I ſhall die, in the true faith 'of Chriſt as taught in the Scriptures; but not as 'taught or practiſed in any one viſible church that I 'know of; though I think the Church of England 'is as little ſtuffed with the inventions of men as any 'of them; and the Church of Rome is ſo full of 'them as to have deſtroyed all that is lovely in the 'Chriſtian religion (146).' This clauſe gave occaſion to the publication of a ſerious and ſenſible pamphlet, intitled, 'The true Church of Chriſt, which, 'and where to be found; according to the Opinion of 'the late Judge Burnet: with an Introduction concerning divine Worſhip, and a Caution to Goſpel 'Preachers; in which are contained, the Reaſons for 'that Declaration in his laſt Will and Teſtament.' As to Sir Thomas Burnet's declaration, it only expreſſes preſſes the ſentiments of a judicious and candid man, who underſtood the true nature of Chriſtianity; and who, whilſt he gave the preference to the Church of England, was perſuaded that no religious eſtabliſhment was entirely free from defects. A judgment may be formed of his abilities in his profeſſion, from his argument in the caſe of Ryal and Rowls. In 1777 were publiſhed, in quarto (147), 'Verſes 'written on ſeveral Occaſions, between the years '1712 and 1721.' Theſe were the poetical productions of Mr. Burnet in his youth, of whom it is ſaid, by the editor, that he was connected in friendſhip and intimacy with thoſe wits, which will for ever ſignaliſe the beginning of the preſent century; and that himſelf ſhone with no inconſiderable luſtre amidſt the conſtellation of geniuſes which then ſo illuſtriouſly adorned the Britiſh hemiſphere. The poems, we are told, were fairly tranſcribed by the author, and the following motto, from Buchanan, prefixed to them, intimating his having then relinquiſhed the enchanting purſuits of poeſy, in which he once delighted.

'Ite leves nugæ, ſterileſque valete camænæ,
'Grataque Phœbæo Caſtalis unda choro,
'Ite: ſat eſt, primos vobiſcum abſumpſimus annos.'

It is related of him, that he would himſelf have publiſhed his Verſes, if he had not thought that ſome of them were too light and ſportive for the gravity of the judicial character, and would derogate, in a certain degree, from the dignity of the tribunal to which he had aſcended. With regard to the poems themſelves, which are for the moſt part very ſhort, and chiefly upon amorous ſubjects, and among which are ſeveral ſongs, and tranſlations from the Odes of Horace, their characteriſtic excellence is an eaſy negligence and elegant ſimplicity. They are ſuch productions as might be expected from a young man of lively parts and claſſical taſte; but who, at the ſame time, was not endued with any extraordinary vigour of poetical imagination. A ſpecimen of them ſhall conclude our account of Sir Thomas Burnet.

* For many particulars in the preceding account, and for an opportunity of peruſing Sir Thomas Burnet's Political Tracts, we are indebted to our ingenious and obliging friend, Iſaac Reed, Eſq.

Beſides Sir Thomas Burnet, there lived in the preſent century another Thomas Burnet, who was an eminent Divine, and the author of ſeveral valuable publications. His four principal works are, an Anſwer to Tindal's Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, a Treatiſe on Scripture Politics, a Courſe of Sermons preached at Mr. Boyle's Lecture, and an Eſſay on the Trinity; in which laſt performance he endeavours, with great ingenuity and plauſibility, to unite the rationality claimed by the Unitarians, with the orthodox language of thoſe who admit the Athanaſian doctrine of the Trinity. It is ſurpriſing that this curious tract ſhould now be ſo little known as not to have been at all taken notice of in any of the late Trinitarian controverſies, excepting in a pamphlet intitled 'Orthodoxy and Charity united.' Our learned writer was educated in New College, Oxford, where he became Maſter of Arts; and, on the eighth of July, 1720, he accumulated, in the ſame Univerſity, the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Divinity, for which he went out grand Compounder (149). Dr. Thomas Burnet, who was Rector of Weſt Kingſton, Wilts, and Prebendary of Sarum, died in May, 1750 (150). Some farther particulars, which we expected concerning this gentleman, not having been communicated in time, we muſt refer them, if they ſhall be found to merit peculiar attention, to the Addenda that will be prefixed to the next volume.] K.

BURTON (WILLIAM), a very ſkilful Topographer, and author of The Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, was born Auguſt 24, 1575, being deſcended from a very ancient family [A], ſeated at Lindley in this county, and Falde in Staffordſhire (a). After having been educated in grammar-learning at Sutton-Colfield in Warwickſhire, he was admitted, in Michaelmas-term 1591, in Brazen-Noſe College in Oxford; where, by the benefit of a careful tutor, he got a tolerable ſtock of Logic and Philoſophy. On the twentieth of May 1593, he became a member of the Inner Temple, London (b); and, on the twenty-ſecond of June 1594, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c). But, without completing it, he went and ſettled in the Temple; and, after having ſpent a due time in the ſtudy of the Law, was made a Barriſter (d). However, 'the weak 'conſtitution of his body not permitting him to practiſe in that laborious profeſſion,' he 'retyred to a private countrie life,' and gave himſelf up to the 'ſtudie of Antiquities, 'to which he was drawn by a natural genius (e).' Wanting neither leiſure nor opportunities of improvement (as he had a conſiderable fortune), he became, with due diligence and application, one of the moſt eminent perſons in the kingdom, for the knowledge of Heraldry, Genealogies, and Antiquities (f). Of this he gave an excellent ſpecimen in his Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire [B], and other works [C]. Having ſuffered much

[A] Deſcended from a very ancient family.] It appears from the pedigree, inſerted by our author in his Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire (1), That James de Burton was Squire of the body to King Richard I, and attended him to the Holy Land. His great great-grandſon, Nicolas de Burton, who lived in the 14th of Edward II., married Agnes, ſiſter and heir of John Curzun of Falde, by whom that eſtate came into the Burton family. William Burton, Standard-bearer to King Henry VI., died in the 39th of that King. His grandſon, James Burton, married, in 1511, Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir of John Herdwick, of Lindley in Leiceſterſhire; which Elizabeth had, for her portion, the third part of the manor of Lindley, with the capital ſeat. Our author's father, grandſon of James laſt mentioned, was Ralph Burton of Lindley; born in 1547, who died the 17th of March 1619, and was buried at Higham. His wife was Dorothy, daughter of William Faunt, of Foſton in Leiceſterſhire, born in 1550, and married in 1571.

 [The reputation of Mr. Burton's Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire ariſes from its having been written early, and only preceded by Lambard's Kent, in 1576, Carew's Cornwall, in 1602, and Norden's Surveys. It is in compariſon with theſe alone, and not of Dugdale's more copious work, that the praiſes ſo freely beſtowed upon Burton are to be underſtood. Were his volume to be diveſted of its unneceſſary digreſſions, and the pedigrees to be reduced into a leſs compaſs, it would ſhrink into a ſmall book. The topographical errors, eſpecially in the Latin, are ſo numerous, and the ſtyle, according to the manner of the time, ſo looſe, that the meaning is often doubtful. The Deſcription is in alphabetical order, and conſiſts chiefly of pedigrees and moot caſes. A good abſtract of the work may be ſeen in Oldys's Britiſh Librarian; and it is obſervable, that not above ſeven or eight families of note, mentioned by Burton, are now in being (4). As the author, ſenſible of the defects of his book, greatly enriched it with the addition of Roman, Saxon, and other antiquities (5), it is to be wiſhed that his additions, which are now in the poſſeſſion of Lord Chetwynd, were given to the public (6). A new edition of the Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, corrected by William Whittingham, was publiſhed, in folio, at Lynne, in 1777. In this edition the arms are thrown into two plates, and there is a new map, engraved by Pyle (7). Mr. Burton was one of Sir Robert Cotton's particular friends, and had the honour of inſtructing Sir William Dugdale. He was acquainted with Somner, and with Drayton the poet, who was his near countryman (8). Among his manuſcripts are large collections for the Hiſtory of Staffordſhire, in the hands of Thomas Aſtle, Eſq; (9). Mr. Peck had collected materials for the Life of Mr. Burton, and his younger brother Robert; but where theſe materials are, is not at preſent known.

Account of ſome other Burtons.

Robert Burton was born at Lindley, on the eighth of February, 1576, and had his grammatical education at Sutton-Colfield, after which, in 1593, he was admitted a Commoner of Brazen-Noſe College, and a ſtudent of Chriſt-Church, in 1599, under the tuition (though only for form's ſake) of Dr. John Bancroft, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford. In 1616, the Dean and Chapter of Chriſt-Church preſented him to the vicarage of St. Thomas in Oxford, in which pariſh he always gave the ſacrament in wafers; and George Lord Berkeley beſtowed upon him the rectory of Segrave in Leiceſterſhire. Both theſe preferments he held till his deceaſe, which happened at Chriſt-Church, on the 27th of January, 1639. He was ſuch a curious calculator of nativities, that the time of his death anſwering exactly to his own predictions, it was whiſpered in the College, that (to uſe Anthony Wood's language), rather than there ſhould be any miſtake in the calculation, he ſent up his ſoul to heaven through a ſlip about his neck. He was a general ſcholar and ſevere ſtudent, of a melancholy yet humourous diſpoſition, and figured in the pedantic learning of the times. In his moral character, he was a man of great integrity, plain dealing, and charity. Mr. Robert Burton was the author of a very celebrated and popular work, intitled, ' The Ana- ' tomy of Melancholy,' publiſhed firſt in quarto, and which afterwards went through ſeveral editions in folio, ſo that the bookſeller acquired an eſtate by it. This book was compiled by our learned writer with a view of relieving his own melancholy; but it increaſed to ſuch a degree, that nothing could divert him but going to the bridge foot, and hearing the ribaldry of the bargemen, which ſeldom failed to throw him into a violent fit of laughter. In the intervals of his vapours, he was one of the moſt facetious companions in the Univerſity. The Anatomy of Melancholy is for the greater part a cento, though a very ingenious one. The quotations, which abound in every page, are pertinent; but if the author had made freer uſe of his invention, and leſs of his Common-place book, his work, perhaps, would have been more valuable. However, he generally avoids the affected language, and ridiculous metaphors, which were common in that age. On Mr. Burton's monument in Chriſt-Church is his buſt, with his nativity, with this deſcription by himſelf, put up by his brother: ' Paucis ' notus, paucioribus ignotus, hic jacet Democritus ' junior, cui vitam dedit et mortem melancholia. ' Obiit viii. Id. Jan. A. C. MDCXXXIX.' He left behind him a choice collection of books, many of which he bequeathed to the Bodleian Library. He left, alſo, a hundred pounds, for a fund to purchaſe five pounds worth of books, every year, for the library of Chriſt-Church (10).

Beſides Mr. William Burton, the Leiceſterſhire Antiquary, there flouriſhed, nearly in the ſame period, another William Burton, who was diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge in Britiſh antiquities, as well as by his learning in general. His principal work was, ' A ' Commentary on Antoninus his Itinerary, or Jour- ' neys of the Roman Empire ſo far as it concerneth ' Britain,' illuſtrated with ' A Chorographical Map ' of the ſeveral Stations. Lond. 1658, folio.' Biſhop Kennet, ſpeaking of him, ſays, that this now neglected author was the beſt Topographer ſince Camden. Mr. Burton was born in London, educated in St. Paul's ſchool, and became a ſtudent in Queen's College, Oxford, in 1625. When at the Univerſity, he was patroniſed by the learned Mr. Allen, of Gloceſter Hall, who appointed him Greek Lecturer there. His indigence obliging him to leave the Univerſity (11), after he had taken the degree of Bachelor of the Civil Law, he was for ſome time Uſher to Mr. Thomas Farnaby, a famous Schoolmaſter in Kent. He was afterwards Maſter of the Free Grammar-ſchool at Kingſton upon Thames, in which ſtation he continued till within two years of his death, when he retired to London, where he died in 1657. A liſt of his works may be ſeen in Wood's Athenæ. Among others, we find that he wrote, in Latin, a Hiſtory of the ancient Perſic Language, which may probably be worth looking into, at a time when that language excites the public attention. Mr. Burton's funeral oration, on the death of Mr. Allen, was much applauded for its propriety and elegance. His great-grandfather wife, Jane, daughter of Humphrey Adderly, of Weddington in Warwickſhire, he had a ſon named Caſſibilan, born 19th November 1609 (b), who tranſlated Martial's Epigrams into Engliſh verſe; and, like a true poet, conſumed moſt part of the eſtate left him by his father. He died February 28, 1681 (i). As for our author, he was one of the moſt laborious and underſtanding Antiquaries of his time: and, as one ſtiles him (k), was 'the diligence, and the great ornament of his country.' He gave to the Bodleian Library at Oxford, Leland's Collections, and his Itinerary, which had fallen into his hands (l).

expired with exceſs of joy, upon his being informed of the deceaſe of Queen Mary (12).

There flouriſhed, likewiſe, in the laſt century, Dr. Hezekiah Burton, a Divine of excellent character, and diſtinguiſhed abilities, who was educated in Magdalen College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow, and where he was an eminent tutor. He was ordained Prieſt by Biſhop Sanderſon; and, in 1667, was appointed Chaplain to Lord Keeper Bridgeman, by whom he was preſented to a Prebend of Norwich, and to the rectory of St. George's in Southwark. In 1668, he was engaged, with Dr. Stillingfleet and Dr. Tillotſon, in the treaty propoſed by Sir Orlando Bridgeman, and countenanced by Lord Chief Baron Hale, for a comprehenſion with the Diſſenters. About a year before his death, Dr. Burton, by the intereſt of his friend Tillotſon with the Chapter of St. Paul's, obtained the rectory of Barnes in Surry, at which place he died, of a malignant fever, in 1681. The only thing of his that appeared during his life, was the ſhort Alloquium ad Lectorem, prefixed to Dr. Cumberland's treatiſe, De Legibus Naturæ. After Dr. Burton's deceaſe, Dean Tillotſon publiſhed two volumes of his Diſcourſes, which reflect great credit on his memory, from the piety contained in them, and the juſt ſentiments they abound with on the nature and end of religion (13).

In the preſent century, Dr. John Burton, a phyſician and man-midwife at York, made very large and moſt valuable collections for the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Yorkſhire, and printed one volume upon the ſubject. An account of theſe collections, with ſome particulars concerning the collector himſelf, may be ſeen in the Britiſh Topography (14).] K.

BURTON (HENRY) was born at Birdſall in Yorkſhire, in the year 1579 (a), and educated at St. John's College in Cambridge, where he took the degrees in Arts (b). In 1612, July the 14th, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford (c). He took afterwards his degree of Bachelor of Divinity. The firſt employment he had, was that of tutor to the ſons of Robert Lord Carey of Lepington, created in 1625 Earl of Monmouth, whoſe Lady (d) was governeſs to Prince Charles, in his infancy (e). Through this Lord's intereſt, probably, he was made Clerk of the Cloſet to Prince Henry; and, after his death, to Prince Charles (f). In 1623, he was appointed to attend that Prince into Spain; but, for what reaſons is unknown, was ſet aſide, when part of his goods were ſhipped (g). Upon King Charles the Firſt's acceſſion to the crown, he expected no leſs than to be continued Clerk of the Cloſet to him; but his Majeſty giving that place to Dr. Neile, Biſhop of Durham, who had in that quality ſerved his father King James I. Mr. Burton was highly diſguſted at this and the forementioned affront, and expreſſed his reſentment upon all occaſions, particularly by railing againſt the Biſhops (h). On the twenty-third of April 1625, he preſented a letter to King Charles, wherein he remonſtrated to him, how popiſhly affected were Dr. Neile and Dr. Laud, his continual attendants (i); for which, and ſome other indiſcretions, he was forbidden the court (k). About the year 1625, he was preſented to the Rectory of St. Matthew's, in Friday-ſtreet, London (l). But what rendered him moſt conſiderable, and cauſed him to be much taken notice of, was his ſevere proſecution in the Star-Chamber (m). For having on the fifth of November 1636, preached, in his own church of St. Matthew's, two ſermons, publiſhed afterwards under the title of For God and the King [A], he was, in December following, ſummoned to appear before Dr. Duck, one of the Commiſſioners for cauſes eccleſiaſtical, who tendered to him the oath ex officio, to anſwer to certain articles preſented to him. But Burton refuſed to take that oath; and, inſtead of anſwering, appealed to the King. However, notwithſtanding his appeal, a Special High-Commiſſion Court being called ſoon after at Doctor's-Commons, he was ſuſpended by them, in his abſence, both from his office and benefice. Upon that, he thought fit to conceal himſelf in his own houſe; and in that time publiſhed his two ſermons, with an Apology to juſtify his appeal. But on the firſt of February, a Serjeant at Arms, with ſeveral Purſuivants and other armed officers, by virtue of a warrant from the Star-Chamber, broke open his doors, ſearched his ſtudy, and carried him to priſon; whence the next day (February the ſecond) he was, by an order from the Privy-Council, conveyed to the Fleet, and there kept ſeveral weeks cloſe priſoner. [A] Two ſermons, publiſhed afterwards, &c.] The text they were preached upon, was, Proverbs xxiv. 21, 22. In theſe two ſermons, and his Apology mentioned afterwards, he charged the Biſhops (†) with 'dangerous plots to change the orthodox Religion 'eſtabliſhed in England; and to bring in Romiſh 'ſuperſtition in the roome of it:' And blamed them for introducing ſeveral innovations into divine worſhip. The chief he mentioned, were (1)—'That in 'the Epiſtle the Sunday before Eaſter, they have put 'out In, and made it, At the name of Jeſus, which 'alteration is directly againſt the Act of Parliament: '—That two places are changed into the praiers ſet 'forth for the 5th of November; namely, Root out 'that Babyloniſh and Antichriſtian Sect, which ſay, '&c is thus altered, Root out that Babyloniſh and 'Antichriſtian Sect of them which ſay; next, Cut off 'thoſe workers of iniquity whoſe religion is rebellion, '&c. was, in the book printed in 1635, thus altered, 'Cut off thoſe workers of iniquity, who turne religion 'into rebellion:—That the Prayer for the Navy is left 'out of the late booke for the faſt:—That the placing 'the communion-table altar-wiſe, at the upper-end 'of the chancel, is done to advance and uſher in 'Popery:—That the ſecond ſervice, as dainties, is 'ſaid there:—That bowing towards the altar, is wor-'ſhipping the table, or God knows what.'

ment in this place, he wrote An Epiſtle to his Majeſty; another to the Judges; and a Letter to the true-hearted Nobility (n); for which, as well as for his two ſermons above mentioned, he was proceeded againſt in the Star-Chamber, on March the eleventh, as a ſeditious libeller. In the mean time, Mr. Prynne, who was proſecuted with him, fearing that they ſhould not be permitted to make a full anſwer to their information, draws up a croſſe-bill againſt the Archbiſhop and others; in which he charged them 'with uſurping upon his Majeſtie's prerogative-royal, with innovations in religion, licenſing of Popiſh and Arminian books, &c.' Having ſigned it, they tendered it to the Lord Keeper, who refuſed to admit it; and accordingly it was ſuppreſſed (†). But it is to be obſerved, that the Court had a great deſire of making their crime amount, if poſſible, to high-treaſon; for, June 6, 1637, all the Judges and the King's Counſel met at Serjeant's-Inn (o), about ſeditious books written and diſperſed by Mr. Burton and Dr. Baſtwick: but nothing being found in Burton's books, on which to ground an indictment for treaſon, he was proceeded againſt, as obſerved above, in the Star-Chamber. The ſcope of the information againſt him was (p), for writing and publiſhing ſeditious, ſchiſmatical, and libellous books, againſt the Hierarchy of the Church, and to the ſcandal of the Government. To this information, he (and Baſtwick and Prynne, who were indicted with him) prepared anſwers; but their counſel refuſed to ſign them, for fear of offending the Court of Star-Chamber. Upon this, the defendants petitioned the Court, that, according to ancient precedents, they might ſign their anſwers with their own hands; declaring they would abide by the cenſure of the Court, if they did not make good what was contained therein. But this was refuſed by the Court, unleſs they brought their anſwers ſigned by counſel. Mr. Burton's anſwer was at length ſigned by Mr. Holt, a Bencher of Gray's-Inn, who afterwards withdrew his hand, becauſe the other counſel, out of fear, would not ſubſcribe it. However, Mr. Burton tendered it to the Court, deſiring it might be accepted, or Mr. Holt ordered to new ſign it. Upon this, the Court ordered that it might be received under the hand of Mr. Holt alone; which was accordingly done. After it had lain in Court near three weeks, upon the Attorney-General's ſuggeſtion to the Court, on the nineteenth of May, that it was ſcandalous, it was referred to the two Chief Juſtices, Sir John Bramſton and Sir John Finch, to conſider of, and to expunge what was contained therein as unfit to be brought into Court, or otherwiſe impertinent and ſcandalous (†). They expunged ſixty-four whole ſheets, that is the whole anſwer, except ſix lines at the beginning, and about twenty-four at the latter end. Soon after, a perſon came to the Fleet to examine Mr. Burton upon interrogatories grounded on his anſwer; but hearing how much had been expunged out of it, he refuſed to be examined, unleſs his anſwer might be admitted as it was put in, or he permitted to put in a new anſwer. This not being allowed of, it was ordered by the Court, on the ſecond of June, that if he would not anſwer to interrogatories framed upon his anſwer, he ſhould be proceeded againſt pro confeſſo; his obſtinacy being looked upon as a ſelf-conviction. On the day of the ſentence, which was June 14, 1637, Burton and the two other defendants ſtanding at the bar, the Court cauſed the information to be read; and no legal anſwer being put in in time, nor filed on record, the Court began for this contempt to proceed to ſentence. But the defendants, before the Court ſpake, cried out for juſtice——that their anſwers might be read, and that they might not be condemned unheard. Nevertheleſs, becauſe their anſwers were not filed on record, the Court proceeded to give this ſentence (q); namely, to fine Burton and the others five thouſand pounds a-piece, and to order, that he in particular ſhould be deprived of his eccleſiaſtical benefice, degraded from his miniſterial function, and degrees in the Univerſity; ſhould be ſet on the pillory, and both his ears cut off there; confined to perpetual cloſe impriſonment in Lancaſhire-caſtle; debarred the acceſs of his wife, or any other, excepting his keeper, and denied the uſe of pen, ink, and paper. All this (excepting the fine) was executed accordingly; for, June the twenty-ſeventh, he was degraded by Sir John Lamb, in St. Paul's; and the thirtieth of the ſame month was ſet in the pillory (r) in the Palace-yard, Weſtminſter [B], where his

[B] He was ſet in the pillory in the Palace-yard, Weſtminſter.] Here he made a long ſpeech, not entire and continued, but interrupted with occaſional expreſſions. The main deſign of it was, to parallel his ſufferings with our Saviour's: For, at the firſt ſight of the pillory, 'Methinks, ſaid he, I ſee Mount 'Calvary, where the three croſſes were pitched.' [For there were three pillories, one for himſelf, and a double one for Baſtwick and Prynne.] 'If Chriſt 'was numbered among thieves, ſhall a Chriſtian think 'much, for his ſake, to be numbered amongſt rogues '(†), ſuch as we are condemned to be? Surely if I 'be a rogue, I am Chriſt's rogue, and no man's.'—Shortly after he ſaid to his wife, 'See thou be not 'ſad, for I would not have thee to diſhonour the day, 'or to darken the glory of it, by ſhedding one tear, 'or fetching one ſigh; for behold there, for thy com-'fort, my triumphant chariot, on the which I muſt 'ride for the honour of my Lord and Maſter: And 'never was my wedding-day ſo well-come, and ſo 'joyful a day as this day is.'—When he was put in the pillory, he ſaid,—'Good people, I am brought 'hither to be a ſpectacle to the world, to angels, and 'to men; and howſoever I ſtand here to undergo the 'puniſhment of a rogue, yet except to be a faithful 'ſervant to Chriſt, and a loyal ſubject to the King, 'be the property of a rogue, I am no rogue; but 'yet, if to be Chriſt's faithful ſervant, and the 'King's loyal ſubject, deſerve the puniſhment of a 'rogue, I glory in it, and, I bleſs God, my conſci-'ence is clear'——Some aſking him, 'If the pil-'lory were not uneaſy for his neck and ſhoulders?' He anſwered, 'How can Chriſt's yoke be uneaſy? 'This is Chriſt's yoke, and he bears the heavier end 'of it, and I the lighter; and if mine were too 'too heavy, he would bear that too.'—One of the guards his ears were cut off in a barbarous manner: for they were pared ſo cloſe, that the temporal artery was cut, which made the blood ſtream in great abundance upon the ſcaffold, and yet he never ſhrunk at the pain (s). After that, he was ſent to Lancaſter-Caſtle, in Auguſt, and impriſoned there in the common gaol (t); but great crowds, who pitied his misfortunes, reſorting to him there; and he finding means to have ſome of his papers diſperſed in London (u), he was, after twelve weeks confinement in that place, removed by an order of Council to Cornet-Caſtle, in the iſle of Guernſey, in October 1637, where he remained a cloſe priſoner almoſt three years. But on November 7, 1640, his wife, Sarah Burton, preſented a petition to the Houſe of Commons (w), complaining of the ſevere ſentence of the Court of Star-Chamber, inflicted upon her huſband in the pillory; and that, by a particular order, ſhe was not to be permitted to come and viſit him. Upon this the Houſe ordered, on the tenth (x), that her huſband ſhould be forthwith ſent for to the Parliament, in ſafe cuſtody, by warrant of the Houſe, directed to the Governor of the iſle where he was priſoner, and to the Captain of the caſtle there; and that the cauſe of his detainer might be certified alſo to the Houſe (y). Accordingly a warrant was ſigned by the Speaker to the Governor and Captain of the Caſtle of Guernſey, which was ſent with all poſſible expedition (z). Mr. Burton and Mr. Prynne (who was now releaſed from his confinement in Montorgueil-Caſtle, in Jerſey) landed at the ſame time at Dartmouth, on the twenty-ſecond of November, where they were received and entertained with extraordinary demonſtrations of affection and eſteem, attended by a marvellous conflux of company, and their charges not only borne with great magnificence, but liberal preſents given to them: And this method and ceremony kept them company all their journey, great numbers of people meeting them at their entrance into all towns, and waiting upon them out, with wonderful acclamations of joy. When they came near London, multitudes of people of ſeveral conditions, ſome on horſeback, others on foot, met them ſome miles from the town; very many having been a day's journey; and they were brought, about two of the clock in the afternoon, in at Charing-Croſs, and carried into the city by above ten thouſand perſons, with boughs and flowers in their hands (a); the common people ſtrewing flowers and herbs in the ways as they paſſed, making great noiſe, and expreſſions of joy for their deliverance and return; and in thoſe acclamations, mingling loud and virulent exclamations againſt the Biſhops (b). On the fifth of December, Mr. Burton preſented a petition to the Houſe of Commons, wherein he ſet forth his ſufferings (c); in conſequence of which, the Houſe reſolved, on the twelfth of March following (d), that the ſuſpending of him, the breaking open his houſe, and arreſting him without any cauſe ſhown, and his impriſonment thereupon; and the ſearching and ſeizing of his books and papers, was againſt law, and the liberty of the ſubject; and that he ought to have reparation and recompence for the damages ſuſtained by thoſe proceedings [C]. The twenty-fourth of the ſame month, they farther reſolved (e), that the ſentence againſt him was illegal, and ought to be reverſed; that he be freed from the fine of five thouſand pounds, and from impriſonment, and reſtored to his degrees in the Univerſity, orders in the Miniſtry, and to his eccleſiaſtical benefice in Friday-ſtreet, London; and alſo have recompence for his impriſonment, and for the loſs of his ears: which, on the twentieth of April, they voted ſhould be ſix thouſand pounds (f). But the enſuing confuſions in the kingdom prevented his receiving that ſum (g). However, in October 1642, he was reſtored to his living of St. Matthew's; Mr. Cheſtlin, the then incumbent, having quitted it (h). Burton, after this, declared himſelf an Independent, and complied with all the alterations that enſued. But we are told by A. Wood (i), that when he ſaw what ſtrange courſes the Parliament took, he grew more moderate. He was buried January 7, 1647-8 (k); and therefore A. Wood is miſtaken, when he ſays (l) that he lived till after the beheading of his old maſter, King Charles I. Beſides the books above mentioned, for which he was ſo ſeverely puniſhed, he wrote many other things; of which there is an account in the note [D].

 [BURTON (JOHN), a learned Divine of the preſent century, was born, in 1696, at Wembworth, in Devonſhire, of which pariſh his father was Rector. The firſt part of his grammatical education he received at Okehampton in the ſame county, and the remainder in the ſchool of the city of Ely. The occaſion of his being removed to ſo great a diſtance from the place of his nativity, aroſe from the death of his father, by which event he was put under the guardianſhip of the Rev. Mr. Samuel Bentham of Ely, who was his firſt couſin by his mother's ſide. Such were the proofs which young Burton afforded at ſchool of his capacity, diligence, and worthy diſpoſitions, that the learned Dr. Aſhton, Prebendary of Ely, and Maſter of Jeſus College, Cambridge, deſigned to have him admitted into his own college. But, in the mean time, Dr. Turner (a), Preſident of Corpus Chriſti College, Oxford, and likewiſe Prebendary of Ely, having made an accidental trial of Mr. Burton's literary improvements, he procured him a ſcholarſhip in that college in 1713, when he was ſeventeen years of age (b). Here he made ſo diſtinguiſhed a progreſs, that Dr. Mather, the Preſident, appointed him to the important office of tutor, when he was only Bachelor of Arts. Soon after, the college conferred upon him the honour of reading the Greek lecture. During the whole courſe of his ſtudies, his behaviour was at once ſo cheerful and ſo regular, that he equally recommended himſelf to the affection of his equals, and the eſteem of his ſuperiors. Dr. Potter, in particular, at that time Regius Profeſſor of Divinity, and Biſhop of Oxford, conceived a great regard for him, on account of the ingenuity and learning which he diſplayed in theological diſputations (c). On the 24th of March, 1720, Mr. Burton was admitted to the degree of Maſter of Arts (d). In the exerciſe of his duty as a tutor, no one could exceed him in attention, diligence, and a zealous concern for the improvement of his pupils. As he was himſelf unacquainted with mathematics, and ignorant of the Hebrew tongue, he took effectual care that the young men under his tuition ſhould be well inſtructed in theſe points. With regard to thoſe of his pupils who were upon charitable foundations, he was ſolicitous that the acquiſition of knowledge ſhould be rendered as cheap to them as poſſible. He was even anxious that it might be no expence to them at all: and, indeed, ſo diſintereſted and beneficent was the whole of his conduct, that, after having diſcharged the office of a tutor almoſt fifteen years, he was ſcarcely poſſeſſed of fifty pounds when he quitted the univerſity (e). In explaining to his pupils the principles of logic and metaphyſics, he began with Sanderſon and Le Clerc, and from them proceeded to Locke. In ethics, he firſt read Ariſtotle, with the addition of Cicero upon the ſame topics; and then made uſe of Puffendorf's Abridgment, and Sanderſon's Lectures. With regard to natural philoſophy, after beginning with a ſhort ſketch, on the plan of Bartholine (purged, however, from the errors of Deſcartes), he recommended to his young gentlemen to go through a courſe of experiments under Whiteſide (f) and Bradley; and for ſuch ſtudents as were poor, he obtained the liberty of attending the experiments gratis. In the mean while, Mr. Burton did not ſuffer the learned languages to be neglected, but lectured his pupils twice a-week in Xenophon and Demoſthenes, hearing them conſtrue word for word, and forming them to a critical taſte by his own obſervations. He did the ſame with reſpect to the Latin tongue, but leſs frequently; becauſe, in Corpus Chriſti college, as well as in other colleges, the juniors are examined twice a-week in ſome Roman author. In reviſing, correcting, and improving the exerciſes of the ſtudents, Mr. Burton diſplayed ſurpriſing patience, and indefatigable diligence; and there are ſtill extant his Themes, Declamations, Orations, and Poems of every kind, which he compoſed for the uſe of his own pupils, and even of others (g). His attention, however, was not ſolely confined to the buſineſs of tuition. He was anxious for reſtoring the credit of the Univerſity preſs, and for enabling poor editors to carry on their literary undertakings. With this view, he often prevailed upon Dr. Mather, Dr. Holmes, and other Vice-Chancellors, to order new and neat ſets of types; and, by the aſſiſtance of ſome noble friends, he was ſo ſtrenuous in behalf of the learned Hutchinſon, the editor of Xenophon, that no editors, ſince that time, have had any delay or difficulty in obtaining the exemption from the duty on paper, which has been granted by parliament to books printed at the Clarendon preſs. It was, alſo, by Mr. Burton's perſuaſion, that Mr. (afterwards Lord) Rolle gave an hundred pounds to the univerſity, for the purpoſe of lending it to editors; and that Dr. Hodges, Provoſt of Oriel College, bequeathed two hundred pounds to the ſame uſe (b). In 1725, when our learned tutor was Pro-proctor and Maſter of the Schools, he ſpoke, before the determining Bachelors, a Latin oration, intitled Heli, which was both written and publiſhed with the deſign of enforcing the ſalutary exerciſe of academical diſcipline. The ſame ſubject was ſtill more fully conſidered by him in four Latin ſermons, preached before the univerſity, which, likewiſe, with Appendixes, were afterwards given to the public. Indeed, the labour that Mr. Burton, during two years, cheerfully went through, as Maſter of the Schools, was immenſe. Among other improvements, he had the honour of introducing into the ſchools, Locke, and ſome other eminent modern philoſophers, as not unworthy companions of Ariſtotle; and he printed, for the uſe of the younger ſtudents, a double ſeries of philoſophical queſtions, with references to the writers proper to be read or conſulted under each topic. This ſcheme was ſo much approved of by the learned Thomas Johnſon, M. A. of Magdalen College, Cambridge, that, with the conſent of the Author, he formed upon it a larger plan of the ſame kind, which has gone through ſeveral editions (i). On the 19th of July, 1729, Mr. Burton was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (k); and in 1732, when the ſettlement of the colony of Georgia was in agitation, he was ſolicited, by the excellent Dr. Bray, and other eminent clergymen (l), to give his aſſiſtance in promoting that undertaking. Accordingly, he preached a ſermon in its recommendation, before the ſociety for conducting it; and his diſcourſe was afterwards publiſhed, with an Appendix concerning the ſtate of the colony. He was, likewiſe, through his whole life, an ardent promoter of Dr. Bray's admirable ſcheme of parochial libraries.

Among other youths who were committed to the tuition of Mr. Burton, there were ſeveral from Eton ſchool, who excelled in genius and learning. This circumſtance introduced him to an epiſtolary correſpondence, and a ſocial intercourſe, with the maſters of the ſchool, and the provoſt and fellows of the college; the conſequence of which was, that they formed ſo good an opinion of his diſpoſition and character, as to elect him, in 1733, into a fellowſhip of their ſociety. About the ſame time, upon the death of Dr. Edward Littleton, he was preſented to the vicarage of Maple-derham in Oxfordſhire; which may be conſidered as a grand æra in Mr. Burton's life. Upon going to take poſſeſſion of his new preferment, he found the widow of his predeceſſor, and three infant daughters, without a home, and without a fortune. A ſight ſo affecting inſpired him with compaſſion; compaſſion was followed by love, and love by marriage. Indeed, the lady had every qualification, excepting money, to recommend her; for ſhe was graceful in her perſon, elegant in her manners, cultivated in her underſtanding, amiable in her diſpoſition, and excellent in her character (m). The cold maxims of the world would, no doubt, condemn Mr. Burton's choice as imprudent; but, for our part, we eſteem him for his diſintereſtedneſs, and his ſuſceptibility of the finer feelings. It is to his honour that he was open to the impreſſions of beauty and virtue in diſtreſs, and that he could bind them to his heart by the cloſeſt and tendereſt ties. Mr. Burton ſhewed the ſame contempt for money, and perhaps carried it to an exceſs, after he was ſettled in his living. His ſituation being remarkably pleaſant, nothing gave him a greater delight than repairing, enlarging, and adorning his houſe, embelliſhing his gardens, planting trees, clearing fields, making roads, and introducing ſuch other improvements as he believed would be of advantage to his ſucceſſors [A]. Works of a ſimilar kind were undertaken by him, when, in 1766, he was inſtituted to the rectory of Worpleſdon in Surry. By theſe means his expences ſometimes ſo far exceeded his income, that we are obliged to charge him with imprudence, whilſt we admire his benevolence and generoſity (n). In 1748, the death of his wife affected him in the tendereſt manner, as is evident from ſeveral parts of his Opuſcula Metrico-Proſaica (o). This event did not leſſen his regard for her three orphan daughters, towards whom he continued to exert the greateſt affection, care, and liberality. From henceforward he ſpent the principal part of the year at Eton College; where he gave himſelf entirely up to the ſtudy of literature, and the aſſiſtance of his friends. Indeed, Eton was preciſely the ſituation which ſuch a man as Mr. Burton could wiſh to enjoy. There he had the converſation of the learned, the uſe of a large and well-choſen library, a table plentifully, though temperately, furniſhed, and the morning and evening celebration of divine worſhip; and theſe were bleſſings which, in his eſtimation, called for his warmeſt gratitude to the Supreme Being. Whenever there were any public meetings on literary or eccleſiaſtical affairs, whether at Oxford, London, or Cambridge, he had as much ſatisfaction in being preſent at them, as others have in hunting, racing, or gaming; and he was diſpleaſed when thoſe of the clergy who might have been expected to have attended ſuch meetings, permitted themſelves to

be prevented from doing it by trifling conſiderations. On the firſt of July, 1752, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, and afterwards publiſhed his lectures on that occaſion. He was intimately connected with many of the biſhops; and perhaps he was the more acceptable to them, as he never aſked any thing for himſelf. A Hayter, a Lowth, and a Secker, were in the number of his friends. To the laſt great prelate he was always a moſt welcome gueſt; and he had peculiar ſatisfaction in viſiting the Archbiſhop. When he was firſt invited by his Grace to Lambeth, he anſwered, that he ſhould with pleaſure quit the Bear and Ragged Staff (his uſual inn) for the Mitre. Whilſt Dr. Burton was thus careſſed by the governors of the church, he was equally dear to the loweſt of the clergy; who were aſſiſted by his advice and intereſt, and hoſpitably received by him at his table. He did not even diſdain the company of the common people; and nothing was more agreeable to him, than to ſee all around him eaſy, cheerful, and happy. To ſuch of the young ſcholars at Eton as appeared to be of promiſing abilities and diſpoſitions, he ſhewed a particular attention, made them the companions of his hours of leiſure, and afforded them every encouragement which lay in his power. On Dr. Burton's character as a ſcholar it is needleſs to enlarge, as that is beſt diſplayed in his writings. His theological abilities are apparent in his Engliſh and Latin Sermons; his critical ſkill in his Diſſertations, and the prefaces prefixed to his Opuſcula, as well as in the Opuſcula themſelves; and his talents as an editor in the Pentalogia. When he preached before the Univerſity, no one was heard with greater attention, or had a more numerous and reſpectable auditory. Amongſt his other employments, he was fond of amuſing himſelf with the exerciſe of poetry; but always in a manner that was chaſte, innocent, and inoffenſive. In all his journies and excurſions, he was accompanied by the Muſes; nor did they forſake him in the ſeaſons of diſtreſs, or in the hours of pain and ſickneſs (p). How far he excelled as a poet, may be judged of from his works; which, perhaps, may lead ſome perſons to imagine, that he rather wrote from a warm affection to poetry, and from an extraordinary knowledge and admiration of the claſſics, than from any great vigour of genius and imagination.

When Dr. Burton came to an advanced age, and his eyes began to fail him, he thought proper to collect together and publiſh his ſcattered pieces, under the title of Opuſcula Miſcellanea. Scarcely had he finiſhed this taſk, when he was ſuddenly attacked by an eryſipelous fever, which diſturbed his intellects, and ſhattered his decaying frame. He ſeemed, however, at intervals, to recover, and to be deſirous of reſuming his ſtudies. The day before his death, the lamp of life appeared to be rekindled. In the evening, it being Sunday, he ſent, as had been his cuſtom, for five or ſix promiſing youths, and, after ſupper, diſcourſed to them, with more than uſual perſpicuity and elegance, on ſome important ſubject of divinity. From hence his phyſician and friends conceived hopes, though miſtaken ones, of his recovery; for, after a moſt ſerene ſleep, he quietly departed this life the next morning, being the 11th of February, 1771, in the 76th year of his age, and was buried at the entrance of the inner chapel at Eton (q).

Dr. Burton's character is apparent from what has already been ſaid. As he was not entirely without enemies, we believe that he hath ſometimes been charged with pedantry; nor have ſtrictures been wanting on the Burtonian ſtyle. It is, likewiſe, highly probable, that there are perſons who do not agree with him in every theological ſentiment which may have been advanced in his writings. But be theſe things as they may, prejudice itſelf cannot deny that he was an able divine, a ſound ſcholar, and an excellent academic; and that he ſet an uſeful example to univerſity-men, whether as fellows, tutors, officers, or editors. In ſhort, his abilities, virtues, and learning, were ſuch as juſtly entitle him to have his name tranſmitted with honour to poſterity.

An account of his works will be given below [B]. K.]

[B] An account of his works will be given below.] Many of Dr. Burton's ſermons, and all his theological diſſertations, were ſeparately publiſhed; but, becauſe they are collected together in the two volumes of his diſcourſes, and in his Opuſcula, we ſhall take them as they occur in theſe publications. 'Occaſional Sermons preached before the Univerſity 'of Oxford, on public Days appointed for Faſts and 'Thankſgivings. By John Burton, D. D. Vice-'Provoſt of Eton College. 8*vo*, 1764. At the Cla-'rendon Preſs.' This volume contains, beſides a general preface on preaching and publiſhing ſermons, eleven diſcourſes on the following occaſions and ſubjects. General Faſt, 1741. The Time of War a ſpecial Call to Piety. On the Martyrdom of King Charles the Firſt. 1743. Principles of Chriſtian Loyalty. General Faſt, 1744. The Folly and Wickedneſs of miſplacing our Truſt. General Faſt, 1757. God's Call of the Jews to Repentance applied. General Faſt, 1762. Moral Uſes of Faſting conſidered and applied. General Thankſgiving, 1746. The Expoſtulation, &c. of Samuel applied. Inauguration, June 22, 1752. The Duty and Intereſt of a Chriſtian Subject conſidered. Inauguration, three Sermons. Univerſity Politics; or, the Study of a Chriſtian, Gentleman, Scholar. Nov. 5, 1752. The Regulation of Zeal in Controverſies of Religion. The ſubjects of the ſecond volume of Dr. Burton's Diſcourſes, which was intitled, 'Sermons preached on public 'Occaſions,' and printed at Oxford, in octavo, in 1766, were as follows. Aſſize, 1746. Principles of Religion the only ſufficient Reſtraint from Wickedneſs. Meeting of Charity-Schools in London, 1759. Religious Education of poor Children recommended. Before the Sons of the Clergy in London, 1761. Zeal for our Conſtitution in Church and State recommended. Before the Aſſociates of Dr. Bray and Truſtees of Georgia, 1732. The Duty and Reward of propagating Principles of Religion. Before the Univerſity of Oxford, 1733. The extenſive Propagation of Abraham's Religion repreſented. Inauguration, 1764. The Uſe and Neceſſity of Religion in Perſons of high Stations. Conſecration of a Chapel. Confirmation. God's Word the young Man's Guide. Homily on Iſaiah liii. with a Preface on Homily-preaching. To each of his volumes Dr. Burton has prefixed a Synopſis, or Summary of the Contents. With regard to the Sermons themſelves, they are not of

of a slight and slimsy contexture, but are much laboured; being of a very considerable length, and containing a great variety of matter. The method and manner of them are, indeed, somewhat more formal than hath lately been fashionable; but our learned Author acted, in this respect, according to his own deliberate judgment. 'An affected spruce 'brevity,' says he, 'an elegant negligence in the 'composition—miscellaneous reflections—and a total 'dissimulation of all order and method, are circum-'stances more agreeable to the present popular taste. 'But I profess myself a friend to the old fashion, as 'being a way of fair and honest dealing in the li-'terary world, and most conducive to edification: 'and with good reason I prefer the old-fashioned 'methodical elaborate sermon, with all its formali-'ties, to the modern plausible loose essay, and the 'fallacious praise of writing with ease; which I con-'sider in no other view, than as a plea for idle-'ness (2).'

(2) Preface to the first volume of Sermons, p. xi, xii.

Dr. Burton's Latin theological dissertations, collected and published in one volume, 8*vo*, about the time of his death, under the title of Opuscula Miscellanea Theologica, are these: Hophni et Phinees; sive Impietas Sacerdotum publicæ Impietatis Causa. Concio pro Gradu S. T. B. cum Appendice, de Vitiis quibusdam in Rerum sacrarum Administratione tollendis. A. D. 1729. Heli: sive Exemplum Magistratûs intempestivâ Lenitate peccantis. Concio eo Animo conscripta ut Academicæ Disciplinæ salubris Administratio strenuè exerceatur. A. D. 1725. Samuel triplici Nomine laudatus, Propheta; Populi Israelitici Judex; Scholarum Propheticarum Rector. Conciones duæ, cum Additamentis, et Appendice de Studiis Theologiæ instituendis; quo quidem pertinent aliæ duæ Conciones seu Dissertationes. Scilicet, De Fundamentalibus Dissertatio Theologica. 1756. De Praxeos Theologicæ Abusibus, Concio. 1760. Appendicis Loco additur, Concio Johannis Bear de Primævorum Patrum Auctoritate, cum Præfatione Commendatoriâ Johannis Burton. The Dissertations on Samuel contain some curious observations on the schools of the Prophets among the Israelites.

Our Author's Opuscula Miscellanea Metrico-Prosaica comprehend a variety of pieces in Greek and Latin, with two or three copies of English verses. The longest poem is the Sacerdos Paræcialis Rusticus, which had been separately published. The two most important pieces in prose are, the Dissertatio critica de Literarum Græcarum Institutionibus, and the Commentariolus Thomæ Secker, Archiep. Cantuar. Memoriæ sacer. Dr. Burton having, in this last performance, which appeared soon after the Archbishop's death, spoken with severity concerning the Dissenters, on account of their supposed opposition to the settlement of a Bishop in America, Dr. Furneaux took occasion, in his Letters to Mr. Justice Blackstone, to vindicate that body of men from the charge brought against them (3). With respect to some of the smaller pieces in the Opuscula Metrico-Prosaica, perhaps the public would not have greatly suffered, or the writer have lessened his reputation, if they had been omitted.

(3) P. 190, Note.

Dr. Burton was the author of some publications besides those which are collected together in the volumes now mentioned. In 1744, he published (4) 'The Genuineness of Lord Clarendon's History of 'the Rebellion printed at Oxford vindicated;' in which he clearly and fully refutes the slander that had been advanced by Oldmixon, in his Critical History of England. In 1758, appeared the Doctor's Dissertatio et Notæ criticæ spectantes ad Tragœdias quasdam Græcas editas in Pentalogia. The publication of the five select tragedies which constitute the Pentalogia had been recommended by our Author to a pupil of his, of great expectation, Mr. Joseph Bingham. The young gentleman had proceeded so far as to collate a number of manuscripts, and print almost the whole text and notes, when the world was deprived of him, in 1736, by an immature death. By this unfortunate event the work lay neglected, till Dr. Burton undertook the labour and expence of completing the edition; and accordingly it came out, in 1758, with a preface, dissertations, index, and additional notes (5). The Pentalogia hath lately been reprinted at the University press. The Doctor's pamphlet on the navigation of the river Thames has already been noticed. In 1766, he published a discourse, intitled, 'Papists and Pharisees compared: 'or, Papists the Corrupters of Christianity;' occasioned by Philip's Life of Cardinal Pole. About the same time, he delivered at Oxford a set of sermons, still in manuscript, the design of which was to refute the Articles of the Council of Trent (6).

(5) De Vitâ et Moribus, &c. p. 26, 27.

(6) Ibid.

Dr. Burton is understood to have been the author, under the name of Philaleutherus Londinensis, of 'Remarks on Dr. King's Speech before the Uni-'versity of Oxford, at the Dedication of Dr. Rad-'cliff's Library, on the 13th of April, 1749.' This produced from Dr. King, 'Elogium Famæ inser-'viens Jacci Etonensis, sive Gigantis; or, The Praises 'of Jack of Eton, commonly called Jack the Giant: 'collected into English Metre, after the Manner of 'Thomas Sternhold, John Hopkins, John Burton, 'and others. To which is added, a Dissertation on 'the Burtonian Style. By a Master of Arts (7).'

But the severest attack ever made upon our Author's manner of composition, is that which is contained in the following lines of the late celebrated poet Churchill:

'Burton (whilst aukward affectation's hung
'In quaint and labour'd accents on his tongue,
'Who 'gainst their will makes junior blockheads
'speak,
'Ign'rant of both, new Latin and new Greek,
'Not such as was in Greece and Latium known,
'But of a modern cut, and all his own;
'Who threads, like beads, loose thoughts on such a 'string,
'They're praise and censure; nothing, every thing;
'Pantomime thoughts, and style so full of trick,
'They even make a Merry Andrew sick;
'Thoughts all so dull, so pliant in their growth,
'They're verse, they're prose, they're neither, and 'they're both)
'Shall (though by nature ever loth to praise)
'Thy curious worth set forth in curious phrase;
'Obscurely stiff, shall press poor Sense to death,
'Or in long periods run her out of breath;
'Shall make a babe, for which, with all his fame,
'Adam could not have found a proper name,
'Whilst, beating out his features to a smile,
'He hugs the bastard brat, and calls it Style (8).'

(8) Churchill's Works, Vol. iii. p. 124. 5th edition.

We shall only observe concerning these lines, that the invectives of a satiric poet, whose genius pushed him to the extreme of severity, and who was probably stimulated by personal dislike, will never be considered as the language of truth.

 [To our account of Dr. Burton, we shall add some memoirs of the gentleman who wrote his life, and with whom he was connected above fifty years, as a relation, a pupil, and a most intimate friend, Dr. Edward Bentham. An article concerning him was intended by us in its regular place; but the materials not having been communicated in time, we cannot now more properly introduce him, than by joining him to a name with which he was so long and so closely united.

BENTHAM (EDWARD) *, Canon of Christ-Church, Oxford, and King's Professor of Divinity in that University, was born in the College at Ely, on the 23d of July, 1707. His father, Mr. Samuel Bentham, was a very worthy clergyman, and Vicar of Witchford, a small living near that city; who having a numerous family, his son Edward, on the recommendation of the learned and celebrated Dr. Smalridge, then Dean of Christ-Church, was sent, in 1717, to the school of that college.

* For the materials of this article we are indebted to Dr. Bentham's son, Thomas Bentham, M. A. student of Christ-Church.

Having there received the rudiments of claſſical education, he was, in the Lent term of 1723, when he was nearly ſixteen years of age, admitted a Member of the Univerſity of Oxford, and placed at Corpus-Chriſti College, under the more immediate care and tuition of his relation, Dr. John Burton. In this ſituation, his ſerious and regular deportment, and his great proficiency in all kinds of academical learning, recommended him to the notice of ſeveral eminent men; and, among others, to the favour of Dr. Tanner, Canon of Chriſt-Church, by whoſe death he was diſappointed of a nomination to a ſtudentſhip in that ſociety. At Corpus-Chriſti College he formed a ſtrict friendſhip with Robert Hoblyn, Eſq; of Nanſwydden in Cornwall, afterwards repreſentative for the city of Briſtol, whoſe character, as a ſcholar and a member of Parliament, rendered him deſervedly eſteemed by the lovers of literature and of their country. In company with this gentleman, and another intimate friend, Dr. Ratcliff, afterwards Maſter of Pembroke College, Mr. Bentham made, at different times, the tour of part of France, and other places. Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was invited by Dr. Cotes, Principal of Magdalen Hall, to be his Vice-Principal; and was accordingly admitted to that ſociety on the 6th of March, 1729-30. Here he continued only a ſhort time; for, on the 23d of April in the year following, he was elected Fellow of Oriel College, in the room of Mr. Martin. In Act term, 1732, he proceeded to the degree of Maſter of Arts, and, about the ſame time, was appointed tutor in the college; in which capacity he diſcharged his duty, in the moſt laborious and conſcientious manner, for more than twenty years. This is apparent, as well from the grateful ſenſe his pupils have ever expreſſed of his care over them, as by the many letters, introductions, &c. which were drawn out and calculated for their improvement (a); and alſo from the great reſort of perſons of the firſt rank to that college. As a member of the ſociety at large, no man could be more valuable, or more eſteemed; for he not only punctually and cheerfully diſcharged that part of college duties and offices which fell to his ſhare, but was willing to aſſiſt others, and even to take their burthen on himſelf. No one excelled him in thoſe ſmaller attentions to the intereſt and pleaſure of his friends, which, though they do not of themſelves conſtitute a great character, are certainly the beſt recommendations of it: and, indeed, few men, however willing they might be, were capable of being ſo generally uſeful. By a conſtant and unwearied application to whatever he undertook, he had at length acquired ſuch a readineſs and facility of mind, that as ſcarcely any kind of buſineſs could occur for which he was wholly unprepared, ſo he tranſacted the ordinary courſe of it with the utmoſt eaſe and convenience to himſelf; and his advice and aſſiſtance were the more eagerly ſought for, as they were not only ſatisfactory and beneficial, but communicated without the leaſt degree of parade and oſtentation. On the 26th of March, 1743, Mr. Bentham took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity; and on the 22d of April, in the ſame year, he was collated, by Biſhop Egerton, to the Prebend of Hundreton, in the cathedral-church of Hereford. On the 8th of July, 1749, he proceeded to the degree of Doctor in Divinity; and in April 1754, upon the death of Dr. Newton, Canon of Chriſt-Church, he was promoted to the fifth ſtall in that cathedral. Here he continued the ſame active and uſeful courſe of life for which he had always been diſtinguiſhed. He ſerved the offices of Sub-dean and Treaſurer, for himſelf and others, above twelve years. The affairs of the treaſury, which Dr. Bentham found in great confuſion, owing to the negligence of the deputy, he entirely new-modelled, and put into a train of buſineſs in which they have continued ever ſince, to the great eaſe of his ſucceſſors, and benefit of the ſociety. So intent was he upon the regulation and management of the concerns of the college, that he refuſed ſeveral preferments which were offered him, from a conſcientious perſuaſion that the avocations they would produce were incompatible with the proper diſcharge of the offices he had voluntarily undertaken. Being appointed by the King to fill the Divinity chair, vacant by the death of Dr. Fanſhawe, Dr. Bentham was, with much reluctance, and after having repeatedly declined it, perſuaded, by Archbiſhop Secker and his other learned friends, to accept of it; and, on the 9th of May, 1763, he was removed to the eighth ſtall in the cathedral. His unwillingneſs to appear in this ſtation was increaſed by the buſineſs he had to tranſact in his former ſituation, and which he was afraid would be impeded by the acceſſion of new duties: not to ſay that a life ſpent in his laborious and ſedentary manner had produced ſome unfavourable effects on his conſtitution, and rendered a greater attention than he had hitherto ſhewn to private eaſe and health, abſolutely neceſſary. Beſides, as the duties, when properly diſcharged, were great and intereſting, ſo the ſtation itſelf was of that elevated and public nature to which his ambition never inclined him: latere maluit atque prodeſſe. The diffidence he had of his abilities (that ſure criterion of real merit) had ever taught him to ſuſpect his own ſufficiency; and his Inauguratory Lecture breathed the ſame ſpirit, the text of which was, 'Who is ſufficient for theſe things?' But whatever objections Dr. Bentham might have to the profeſſorſhip before he entered upon it, when once he had accepted of it, he never ſuffered them to diſcourage him in the leaſt from exerting his moſt ſincere endeavours to render it both uſeful and honourable to the Univerſity. He ſet himſelf immediately to draw out a courſe of lectures for the benefit of young ſtudents in divinity, which he conſtantly read at his houſe at Chriſt-Church, gratis, gratis, three times a-week during Term-time, till his deceaſe. The courſe took up a year; and he not only exhibited in it a complete ſyſtem of divinity, but recommended proper books, ſome of which he generouſly diſtributed to his auditors. His intenſe application to the purſuit of the plan he had laid down, together with thoſe concerns in which his affection for his friends, and his zeal for the public good in every ſhape, involved him, proved more than a counterbalance for all the advantages of health and vigour that a ſtrict and uniform temperance could procure. It is certain that he ſunk under the rigorous exerciſe of that conduct he had propoſed to himſelf: for though ſixty-eight years are a conſiderable proportion in the ſtrongeſt men's lives, yet his remarkable abſtemiouſneſs and ſelf-denial, added to a diſpoſition of body naturally ſtrong, promiſed, in the ordinary courſe of things, a longer period. Dr. Bentham was a very early riſer, and had tranſacted half a day's buſineſs before many others began their day. His countenance was uncommonly mild and engaging, being ſtrongly characteriſtic of the piety and benevolence of his mind; and, at the ſame time, it by no means wanted expreſſion, but, upon proper occaſions, could aſſume a very becoming and affecting authority. In his attendance upon the public duties of religion, he was exceedingly ſtrict and conſtant; not ſuffering himſelf ever to be diverted from it by any motives, either of intereſt or pleaſure. Whilſt he was thus diligent in the diſcharge of his own duty, he was not ſevere upon thoſe who were not equally diligent. He could ſcarcely ever be prevailed upon to deliver his opinion on ſubjects that were to the diſadvantage of other men; and when he could not avoid doing it, his ſentiments were expreſſed with the utmoſt delicacy and candour. No one was more ready to diſcover, commend, and reward every meritorious endeavour. Of himſelf he never was heard to ſpeak; and if his own merits were touched upon in the ſlighteſt manner, he felt a real uneaſineſs. Though he was not fond of the formalities of viſiting, he entered into the ſpirit of friendly ſociety and intercourſe with great pleaſure. His conſtant engagements, indeed, of one kind or other, left him not much time to be devoted to company; and the greater part of his leiſure hours he ſpent in the enjoyment of domeſtic pleaſures, for which his amiable and peaceable diſpoſition ſeemed moſt calculated. Till within the laſt half-year of his life, in which he declined very faſt, Dr. Bentham was ſcarcely ever out of order; and he was never prevented from diſcharging his duty, excepting by a weakneſs that occaſionally attacked his eyes, and which had been brought on by too free an uſe of them when he was young. That part of his laſt illneſs which confined him, was only from the 23d of July to the firſt of Auguſt. Even death itſelf found him engaged in the ſame laborious application which he had always directed to the glory of the Supreme Being, and the benefit of mankind; and it was not till he was abſolutely forbidden by his phyſicians, that he gave over a particular courſe of reading, that had been undertaken by him with a view of anſwering Mr. Gibbon's Roman Hiſtory. Thus he died at his poſt, like a faithful ſoldier, in the exerciſe of his arms, and the defence of his religion. That ſerenity of mind and meekneſs of diſpoſition, which he had manifeſted on every former occaſion, ſhone forth in a more eſpecial manner in his latter moments; and, together with the conſciouſneſs of a whole life ſpent in the divine ſervice, exhibited a ſcene of true Chriſtian triumph. After a few days illneſs, in which he ſuffered a conſiderable degree of pain without repining, a quiet ſigh put a period to his exiſtence below, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1776, when he had entered into the 69th year of his age. His remains were depoſited in the weſt end of the great aile in the cathedral of Chriſt-Church, Oxford. Dr. Bentham reſided, the principal part of the year, ſo regularly at Oxford, that he never miſſed a term from his matriculation to his death. In the ſummer, he generally made a tour of ſome part of the kingdom, with his family; and, for the laſt thirty years of his life, ſeldom failed in carrying them to meet all his brothers and ſiſters at Ely, amongſt whom the greateſt harmony and affection ever prevailed. One of his brothers is the Rev. James Bentham, Prebendary of Ely, to whom the antiquarian and biographical world is ſo highly indebted for his excellent Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Conventual and Cathedral Church of Ely. Dr. Bentham married Elizabeth, the ſecond daughter of Thomas Bates, Eſq; of Alton in Hants, by whom he had three children, Edward, Thomas, and Elizabeth, the firſt of which died young: the two others, together with his widow, ſurvived him. His ſon Thomas is M. A. and Student of Chriſt-Church.

Beſides Dr. Bentham's great intimacy with Mr. Hoblyn and Dr. Burton, already mentioned, he enjoyed, alſo, the friendſhip of Archbiſhop Secker, the late Duke of Marlborough, Dr. Butler and Dr. Egerton, Biſhops of Durham, Dr. Hayter and Dr. Lowth, Biſhops of London, Dr. Pearce, Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Dr. Tucker, Dean of Glouceſter. With the Archbiſhop he was peculiarly intimate, a correſpondence being conſtantly kept up between them till that eminent prelate's death; and ſcarcely either of them appeared in any public tranſaction before the other had been previouſly informed and conſulted. Dr. Bentham's conſtant reſidence in the Univerſity exempted him from, what was naturally very irkſome to him, a perſonal attendance upon great men; and as he was not eagerly bent on the purſuit of worldly honours, and was ever of opinion, that what he had to communicate was beſt done by letters, he was rarely ſeen at levees and at court. Whenever he did appear at theſe places, he certainly was a much more agreeable viſitant, becauſe he had no favours to ſolicit. Such were his friends; and as they were men who were highly valuable, both for their private virtues, and their public zeal in the common cauſe of religion and learning, ſo it will be thought no diminution of their characters, that they are recorded among the friends of Dr. Bentham.

On the whole, when we reflect on Dr. Bentham's ſincere and unaffected piety, on his extenſive comprehenſion in the ſeveral branches of liberal ſcience and claſſical knowledge, on his conſcientious attention to the intellectual and moral improvement of his pupils, on the zeal he diſplayed for their benefit in his uſeful writings [A], on his ſtrict regard to order and diſcipline, on his diligence and prudence in the management of the temporal affairs of the ſocieties he belonged to, on the exactneſs and credit with which he diſcharged every part of his office as Regius Profeſſor of Divinity, on the meekneſs and mildneſs of his temper, joined with a due degree of ſenſibility; on the conſtancy and ardour of his friendſhips, and, in ſhort, on the uniform tenour of his conduct, in all the duties of public and of private life, we cannot heſitate in pronouncing, that he was a diſtinguiſhed ornament of the Univerſity of Oxford, of the Church of England, and of the general cauſe of religion and literature. [A] In his uſeful writings.] Dr. Bentham's publications were as follows: 1. 'The Connection be-'tween Irreligion and Immorality. A Sermon 'preached at St. Mary's in Oxford, at the Aſſizes: 'before the Honourable Mr. Juſtice Denniſon and 'Mr. Serjeant Birch, and before the Univerſity, on 'March the 1ſt, 1743-4.' 8*vo*, 1744. 2. 'An In-'troduction to Moral Philoſophy.' 8*vo*, 1745. A ſecond edition was publiſhed in 1746. To this tract is annexed, firſt, a Table of Reference to Engliſh Diſcourſes and Sermons upon moral Subjects, ranged according to the Order of the Introduction; and, ſecondly, a Table of ſeveral of the principal Writers in Moral Philoſophy. 3. 'A Letter to a young 'Gentleman.' 8*vo*, 1748. 4. 'A Letter to a Fellow 'of a College. Being the Sequel of a Letter to a 'young Gentleman of Oxford.' 8*vo*, 1749. Theſe two letters are upon Diſaffection to Government, and were intended to promote in the Univerſity the principles of the Revolution, and a ſpirit of loyalty to the preſent royal family. 5. 'Advice to a young 'Man of Rank upon coming to the Univerſity.' 6. 'A Sermon preached before the Honourable Houſe 'of Commons, at St. Margaret's Weſtminſter, on 'Tueſday, January 30, 1749-50. Being the Anni-'verſary of the Martyrdom of King Charles the 'Firſt.' 4*to*, 1750. 7. 'Reflexions on Logic.' 8*vo*. A ſecond edition came out in 1755. At the end is added, a Table of the principal Writers of Logic. Our Author having been charged, in the Biographia Britannica, under the article Locke, with a deſign of excluding from the ſchools that great man's Eſſay on the Human Underſtanding, he ſubjoined, in 1760, a ſhort, but ſatisfactory, vindication of himſelf, to the remaining copies of the Reflexions. 8. 'Τῶν Παλαι-'ῶν, &c. Επιτάφιοι.' 'Funeral Eulogies upon Mi-'litary Men from Thucydides, Plato, Lyſias, Xe-'nophon. In the Original Greek. To which are 'added, Extracts from Cicero. With Obſervations 'and Notes in Engliſh.' 8*vo*. The ſecond edition, with additions, appeared in 1768. The impreſſion is beautiful, and the Notes and Obſervations ſhew Dr. Bentham's great acquaintance with claſſic antiquity, and the Greek language. 9. 'De Studiis 'Theologicis Prælectio.' 1764. 10. 'Reflexions 'upon the Study of Divinity. To which are ſub-'joined, Heads of a Courſe of Lectures.' 8*vo*, 1771. This tract contains many judicious obſervations; and the Heads of a Courſe of Lectures exhibit, perhaps, as complete a plan of theological ſtudies as was ever delivered. 11. 'De Vitâ et Moribus Johannis Bur-'toni, S. T. P. Etonenſis. Epiſtola Edvardi Ben-'tham, S. T. P. R. ad Reverendum admodum Ro-'bertum Lowth, S. T. P. Epiſcopum Oxonienſem.' To this we are almoſt wholly indebted for our account of Dr. Burton. 12. 'A Sermon preached in the 'Pariſh-Church of Chriſt-Church, London, on 'Thurſday, April the 30th, 1772: being the Time 'of the yearly Meeting of the Children educated in 'the Charity-Schools in and about the Cities of 'London and Weſtminſter.' 4*to*. 13. 'An Intro-'duction to Logic, ſcholaſtic and rational.' 8*vo*, 1773. The Specimen Logicæ Ciceronianæ annexed, diſplays Cicero's cloſe attention to the ſtudy of logic, and our Author's intimate knowledge of Cicero. 14. 'De Tumultibus Americanis deque eorum Con-'citatoribus ſenilis Meditatio.' This was occaſioned by ſome members of parliament having cenſured the Univerſity of Oxford for addreſſing the King in favour of the American war. Dr. Bentham, like many other wiſe and good men, did not imagine that the conteſt would turn out to be ſo formidable as it hath ſince appeared. He takes occaſion, in the courſe of the pamphlet, to pay a high compliment to his friend Dr. Tucker.

BUSBY (Richard), the moſt eminent ſchoolmaſter in his time, was the ſecond ſon of Richard Buſby, of the city of Weſtminſter, Gent. but born at Lutton in Lincolnſhire, September 22, 1606 (a). He received his education in Weſtminſter-ſchool, as a King's Scholar; and in 1624 was elected Student of Chriſt-Church (b). The twenty-firſt of October 1628, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and that of Maſter, June 18, 1631 (d); at which time he was eſteemed a great Maſter of the Greek and Latin tongues, and a complete Orator [A]. On the firſt of July 1639, he was admitted to the Prebend and Rectory of Cudworth, with the chapel of Knowle annexed, in the church of Wells; of which he loſt the profits during the civil wars; but found means to keep his Student's place, and other preferment (e). He was appointed Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, December 13, 1640 (f); in which laborious ſtation he continued above fifty-five years, and bred up the greateſt number of learned ſcholars that ever adorned any age or nation. But he met with great uneaſineſs from the ſecond Maſter, Edward Bagſhaw; who being a buſy and pragmatical man, endeavoured to ſupplant him; but was himſelf removed out of his place for his inſolence [B], in May 1658.

 [We do not apprehend that there is any evidence, that Bagſhaw really attempted to ſupplant Buſby in Weſtminſter-ſchool; nor does Anthony Wood accuſe him of this, though he has given a very unfavourable account of him, and appears to have been much prejudiced againſt him. But Bagſhaw was of an intractable temper; and it was evidently ſome miſunderſtandings between him and Buſby which occaſioned his removal. In the pamphlet above mentioned, Bagſhaw alleged, that it had been a cuſtom, for above ſixty years, that the forms in Weſtminſter-ſchool ſhould be thus ordered: the upper maſter taught the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh; the ſecond maſter taught the third and fourth; and an uſher, for the eaſe of both, and the benefit of the upper maſter, taught the firſt and ſecond: but that, in 1657, Mr. Buſby having repreſented to the governors of the ſchool, that, in conſequence of his age, he had need of an aſſiſtant, they had made an order for that purpoſe: after which he alſo procured another order, that the ſecond maſter, who had till then taught the third and fourth, might now be put down to teach the younger boys in the firſt, ſecond, and third forms. This Bagſhaw complained of as both injurious and diſhonourable to him; as Buſby's aſſiſtant was thereby placed above him (4). 'Mr. Buſby,' he ſays, 'brought 'Mr. James (the aſſiſtant) into the ſchool, and there, 'with a great deal of ceremony, placed him above 'me, employing him, for the moſt part, to teach 'the fourth form, from which I was ſo lately re-'moved. Which indignity was ſo much the greater, 'in that Mr. James was not only ſome other ways 'inferior to me, but likewiſe many years my junior 'in the univerſity; and before that change, uſher 'below me in the ſchool (5).'

(4) True and perfect Narrative of the Differences between Mr. Buſby and Mr. Bagſhaw, 4to, 1659, p. 3. 6.

(5) ibid. p. 11.

Bagſhaw alſo ſays, 'Mr. Buſby hath oft complained 'to me, and ſeemed to take it ill, that I did not uſe 'the rod enough.' On the other hand, he charges Buſby with being too ſevere. 'So far,' ſays he, 'as 'relates to this ſchool, I could wiſh there were ſome 'order taken to limit and reſtrain the exorbitance of 'puniſhment; that poor little boys may not receive 'thirty or forty, nay ſometimes ſixty laſhes at a time, 'for ſmall and inconſiderable faults (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 19.

In a petition of Buſby's to the governors of the ſchool, beſides ſtating that Bagſhaw expreſſed great diſcontent at their appointing him an aſſiſtant, and mentioning ſome other particulars againſt him, he ſays, that 'he had commanded his ſcholars not to 'pay that accuſtomed civility, which is due from 'ſcholars unto their teacher, to the aſſiſtant at his 'paſſing by them; and puniſhed ſome of his ſcholars 'for ſo doing. Whereupon ſo great diſorder enſued, 'that the reſpect was thereupon omitted to your pe-'titioner, which hath been theſe nineteen years due 'to him. Mr. Bagſhaw did likewiſe command the 'monitor to put your petitioner (Buſby) into his 'monitor's bill, and to ſhew that bill unto him; 'thereby expoſing your petitioner to be indicted by 'his own monitor, and pretending to a power of 'puniſhing your petitioner.' After replying to theſe accuſations, Bagſhaw adds, 'I am very ſorry that 'Mr. Buſby's paſſion ſhould make him betray either 'ſo much levity, or ſo much guilt, as now in his old 'days to fear a whipping, as it were by way of re-'taliation, for thoſe many ſharp ſeverities he hath 'uſed to others (7).'

(7) Ibid. p. 14, 15. 21.

Wood ſays of Bagſhaw, that when he was at Oxford, and 'while he continued in the ſtate of under-'graduate and bachelor, he did ſet a high value 'upon, and expreſſed himſelf, very often into-'lerably impudent, ſaucy and refractory to the cen-'ſor, and thereupon was either ſconced, or put out 'of commons, or forced to make his palinody in a 'declamation in the public hall. Farther alſo, when 'quadrageſimal diſputations were publicly performed 'in the ſchools, he would, without any provocation, 'take the queſtions, either of an under-graduate or 'bachelor, purpoſely to diſpute with him, and ſo 'conſequently ſhew his parts, and be ſhouldered out, 'or carried out into the quadrangle on the ſhoulders 'of his admirers (8).' Wood is alſo much diſſatisfied with him for not having had a due reverence for the academic dreſs; and adds, that, in 1651, when he 'proceeded in arts (a year being then allowed to 'him), and was ſenior of the act then celebrated, 'and being ſoon after put in office, he ſhewed him-'ſelf a turbulent and domineering perſon, not only 'in his college, but in the univerſity, where it was 'common with him to diſturb the Vice-chancellor 'with interpoſed ſpeeches, without formalities, and 'his hat cocked: which poſture alſo he uſed when 'he read the catechiſt-lecture in his houſe (9).'

After his removal from Weſtminſter-ſchool, in 1659, he was admitted into holy orders by Dr. Ralph Brownrig, Biſhop of Exeter; and became Vicar of Amerſden in Oxfordſhire. After the Reſtoration, he was made Chaplain to the Earl of Angleſea (10); but, in 1662, he was ejected from his living, in conſequence of the Act of Uniformity (*). The ſame year, he was apprehended by order of the Council, and committed priſoner to the Gatehouſe in Weſtminſter, becauſe, as Wood ſays, he had 'written and preached 'ſeveral matters againſt his Majeſty and preſent 'government, church and biſhops.' Dr. Pope ſays, that King Charles II. ſent for him, 'deſigning to 'work ſome good upon him, and do him a kindneſs: 'but he found him ſo obſtinate and refractory, that 'he was forced to leave him to his own imaginations.' Dr. Calamy adds, that 'when he was with the King, 'he ſaid ſomething that was ſo offenſive to him, that 'he was ſent to the dungeon in the Tower (11).' In 1664, he was removed to South-ſea Caſtle, near Portſmouth. How long he was confined there, we are not informed. But it appears, that he again gave offence to the government after his being ſet at liberty, and was at length committed to Newgate for refuſing to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy. He died there, according to Dr. Calamy, in 1671; but Wood ſays, that 'he unwillingly laid 'down his head, and died in an houſe in Tuttle-'ſtreet, within the city of Weſtminſter (12).' He was interred in Bunhill burying-ground, near Moorfields, being 'accompanied to that place by near a 'thouſand Proteſtant Diſſenters (13).' The inſcription upon his tomb was written by Dr. Owen, and in that he is ſpoken of as a pious, ſincere, and zealous divine (14). He was the author of ſundry pieces, chiefly on controverſial ſubjects, which are enumerated in the Athenæ Oxonienſes. Wood ſays, that, ſome years before his death, he had 'taken to wife a vir-'tuous and ſuperannuated maid (but perfectly blind), 'named Margaret, the daughter of John Peacock.' Dr. Calamy informs us, that this 'blind gentle-'woman fell in love with him for his preaching (15).' The Oxford antiquary ſays, 'he was a perſon of very 'good parts (which he himſelf knew too well), well 'learned, but of a hot and reſtleſs head (16).' He ſeems to have been a zealous Calviniſt, and a warm friend to civil liberty. He had many admirers, and might be poſſeſſed of more good qualities than Wood allows him. But Dr. Calamy ſays, 'I believe they 'that had the greateſt value for his miniſterial gifts '(which I have heard ſome repreſent as very emi-'nent and conſiderable) won't ſtick to own, that he 'was a man of a very warm and eager temper (17).'

The father of this Edward Bagſhaw, who was of the ſame name, was alſo an author, and a perſon of ſome note in his time. He was educated in Brazennoſe College, Oxford, where he took a degree in arts, and afterwards ſettled in the Middle Temple, where he ſtudied the law, became a bencher, and acquired reputation in his profeſſion. In the fifteenth year of the reign of Charles I. he was elected Lent-reader for that ſociety; and in the courſe of his readings maintained, that a parliament might be held without biſhops, and that biſhops had no right to interfere in civil affairs. But this doctrine giving great offence to Archbiſhop Laud, he made application to the King concerning it, who commanded the Lord Keeper Finch to prohibit Mr. Bagſhaw from reading any farther upon this ſubject. He was choſen Member of the Houſe of Commons for the borough of Southwark, in the parliament which began to ſit at Weſtminſter on the 3d of November, 1640. He afterwards ſided with the royal party, and attended the parliament called by the King at Oxford. In 1644, he was taken into cuſtody by a party of parliamentarians, which he was inſtalled July 5, 1660 (b); and the eleventh of Auguſt following, he was made Treaſurer and Canon-Reſidentiary of the church of Wells (i). The nineteenth of October 1660, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (k). At the coronation of King Charles II., on the twenty-third of April 1661, he carried the Ampulla (l). In the Convocation, which met June the twenty-fourth, the ſame year, he was Proctor for the Chapter of Bath and Wells; and one of thoſe who approved and ſubſcribed the Common Prayer-Book (m). He gave two hundred and fifty pounds towards repairing and beautifying Chriſt-Church College and Cathedral (n); and founded and endowed two lectures in the ſame College, one for the Oriental languages, and another for the mathematics; giving moreover a hundred pounds, to repair the room in which they were to be read. He contributed alſo to the repair of Lichfield church (o). As for his many other benefactions, they are not upon record, becauſe they were done in a private manner. This great man, after a long, healthy, and laborious life, died April 6, 1695, aged 89 (p), and was buried in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where there is a curious monument erected to him [C]. He compoſed ſeveral books for the uſe of his ſchool [D]. With regard to his character, we are told, that he was very well acquainted

The ſubſtance of which is: 'You ſee below a repreſentation of Buſby's body (20), and outward appearance. If you would ſee his inward qualifications, behold the lights of both Univerſities, and of Weſtminſter-hall, the chief men at Court, in the Parliament, and in the Church. And when you perceive how large and how plentiful a harveſt of ingenious men was ſown by him, conſider how great was the ſower. He was a perſon very ſagacious in finding out every one's genius and diſpoſition, and no leſs induſtrious in employing them to advantage, and forwarding them ſucceſsfully. He was a perſon who ſo formed and trained up the minds of youth by his inſtructions, that they learned at the ſame time both to ſpeak and to be wiſe; and whilſt they were inſtructed by him as boys, they inſenſibly grew up to be men. As many ſcholars as he ſent out into the world, ſo many faithful, and in general brave, champions, did Church and State obtain. Whatever reputation Weſtminſter-ſchool enjoys, whatever advantage has thence accrued, is chiefly due to Buſby, and will for ever be due to him. So uſeful a man God bleſſed with long life, and crowned with riches. And he, on his part, cheerfully devoted himſelf, and his poſſeſſions, to the promoting of piety. To relieve the poor; to ſupport and encourage learned men; to repair churches; That, he thought, was truly enjoying his riches. And what he employed not upon thoſe good uſes in his lifetime, he bequeathed to the ſame at his death.'——The reſt contains only an account of his birth and death, and of his ſeveral promotions, already mentioned above.

 [Though Dr. Buſby's father was a gentleman, it appears that the circumſtances of the family were ſuch as rendered it neceſſary for young Buſby to receive aſſiſtance in the courſe of his education. The following facts are tranſcribed, by Widmore (22), from the accounts of the churchwardens of St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter.

The appointment of Dr. Buſby to the Headmaſterſhip of Weſtminſter-ſchool, is repreſented by Widmore (23) as having taken place in 1638, and not in 1640, as is aſſerted in the inſcription on the Doctor's monument. Which account is true, we cannot preciſely aſcertain: but Widmore's ſeems the more probable, as Lambert Oſbolſtone (or Oſbaldeſton), Buſby's predeceſſor in the ſchool, was proſecuted, by Archbiſhop Laud, in 1638-9, and, in conſequence of a ſevere and unjuſt ſentence paſſed upon him in the Star-Chamber, immediately fled, and lay concealed till the meeting of the parliament, in November 1640 (24).

Beſides Dr. Buſby's actual benefactions to the college of Chriſt-Church, Oxford, and other places, we find that he formed a deſign of eſtabliſhing a lecture-ſhip at each of our Univerſities, which did not take effect. The fact is thus related in the Life of Dr. Humphrey Prideaux: 'Dr. Buſby offered to found 'two catechiſtical lectures, with an endowment of '100l. per annum each, for inſtructing the under-'graduates in the rudiments of the Chriſtian religion, 'provided all the ſaid under-graduates ſhould be 'obliged to attend the ſaid lectures, and none of 'them be admitted to the degree of Bachelor of 'Arts, till after having been examined by the cate-'chiſt as to their knowledge in the doctrines and 'precepts of the Chriſtian religion, and by him ap-'proved of.——But this condition being rejected by 'both Univerſities, the benefaction was rejected 'therewith, and the church hath ever ſince ſuffered 'for the want of it (25).' The author of the Confeſſional, from whom we have taken the preceding anecdote, has made ſome ſtrictures, with his uſual ingenuity and acuteneſs, on the rejection of Dr. Buſby's propoſal.

(25) Confeſſional, p. 436, 437, 3d edition.

Mr. Groſley, in his Tour to London (26), ſpeaking of the Doctor's ſtatue in Weſtminſter-Abbey, ſays, that this ſtatue, admirably executed, and placed among the monuments of the poets, &c. ſtruck him by its exact reſemblance, for beauty and truth, to the celebrated Languet, curate of St. Sulpice's church at Paris.

(26) Vol. i. p. 206.

Dr. Buſby's ſeverity to his ſcholars is of ſuch notoriety, that it has almoſt become proverbial. Of its being carried to exceſs, ſtriking proofs appear in the relation of his quarrel with Bagſhaw, annexed to note [B]. Correction by ſtripes is not always avoidable, eſpecially where a large number of children are educated together; and Dr. Beattie hath ſhewn, in his Eſſay on Claſſical Learning, that the cuſtom of flogging, in our public ſchools, has not the effect of breaking the ſpirits of the boys, or of rendering them ſervile in future life. However, when every allowance is made for Dr. Buſby, and when we even take into conſideration the number of excellent ſcholars formed by him, it muſt ſtill, we think, be acknowledged, that he was guilty of an unjuſtifiable ſeverity. In ſupport of this ſentiment, we ſhall tranſcribe the reflections with which the ingenious Mr. Knox concludes his Eſſay on Parental Indulgence. 'With the 'excellent effects of Spartan diſcipline, every one is 'acquainted. Of the lamentable conſequences of 'modern relaxation, daily experience furniſhes ex-'amples. The puerile age is patient and tractable. 'Reformation muſt begin there. Temperance, di-'ligence, moderation, and humility, cannot be too 'early inculcated. Theſe will lead through the 'temple of Virtue to the temple of Honour. In this 'progreſs, ſtrict diſcipline will ſometimes be neceſ-'ſary; but let not the pretence of proper correction 'give an opportunity for the gratification of vin-'dictive cruelty. Inhumanity even in a Buſby can-'not admit of palliation (27).'

We have been favoured, by the preſent learned and worthy Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, Dr. Smith, with a ſight of the book containing the names of the King's ſcholars who have been ſent, from time to time, to the Univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge; and we find among them a number of perſons who have been eminent for their genius and learning, and have diſtinguiſhed themſelves in various reſpects. Several of them have either already appeared in the Biographia Britannica, or will hereafter contribute to its ornament and credit. We ſhall add a catalogue of the Firſt and Second Maſters of Weſtminſter-ſchool, from its eſtabliſhment to the preſent time, with the years of their appointment, and their removal, reſignation, or death.

Dr. Pope, in his Life of Biſhop Ward, ſays, that Edward Bagſhaw junior, when he was a King's ſcholar at Weſtminſter, 'was a well-favoured white-'haired youth, and his father was liberal to the maſter: 'all which concurring with a good docible inclina-'tion, made him one of Mr Buſby's white boys, or 'chief favourites.' The ſame author inſinuates, that both Bagſhaw and Buſby were of tempers too violent and imperious to remain long in amity. He repreſents Dr. Buſby, likewiſe, as making intereſt with the ruling powers, and as having had too much compliance, cunning, and money, to be hurt by his antagoniſt (29). Some farther particulars concerning Mr. Bagſhaw might be extracted from Biſhop Kennet's Regiſter; and particularly a large account of the manner in which he was treated by Dr. James Margetſon, Archbiſhop of Dublin, when, in 1662, he accompanied the Earl of Angleſey to that city, in quality of his Lordſhip's chaplain (30). one ever trained up a greater number of eminent men, both in Church and State, than himſelf; which was a plain demonſtration of his uncommon ſkill and diligence in his profeſſion. He extremely liked, and even applauded, and rewarded, wit in any of his ſcholars, though it reflected upon himſelf; of which many inſtances are ſtill remembered. We are farther told, that there was an agreeable mixture of ſeverity and ſweetneſs in his manners; ſo that if his carriage was grave, it was at the ſame time civil, and full of good-nature, as his converſation was always modeſt and learned; but in his ſchool he was extremely ſevere. His piety was unfeigned and without affectation, and his ſtedfaſt zeal to the Church, and loyalty to the Crown, were eminent, and not without trials in the worſt of times. But his greateſt virtue was charity; in the diſcharge of which none ever took more care, that his right hand ſhould not know what his left did. As to his conſtitution of body; he was healthy to ſuch a degree, that his old age proved altogether free from thoſe diſeaſes and infirmities which moſt commonly attend other perſons: and as this was the conſequence and reward of his chaſtity, ſobriety, and temperance, ſo he ſpent this bodily ſtrength altogether upon his indefatigable labours, in the education of youth in Weſtminſter-ſchool; which he never remitted till he was releaſed of it by death, to which he ſubmitted with the utmoſt conſtancy and patience (q).

BUTLER, or BOTELER, the name of a noble family, which, for the great ſervices they have done the Britiſh crown, have been raiſed to titles of honour in all the three kingdoms. The antiquity of this family is ſo great, that it appears to have ſurpaſſed the ſkill of our ableſt antiquaries to fix the origin of it with any degree of exactneſs (a). Indeed, they have been ſo far from doing this, that ſome have ſuggeſted the original ſirname of the family was Walter, others again have inclined to think it Becket, and there want not thoſe who declare in favour of le Boutiller or Butler, againſt them all (b) [A]. But whatever obſcurity there may be in regard to the ſtate of the family in thoſe times, there is nothing more certain, than that Theobald, who was declared Butler of Ireland in the very beginning of the XIIIth century, eſtabliſhed in that kingdom a moſt honourable and potent houſe, which, by the great ſervices they rendered the crown, by their intermarriages with the nobleſt families in England and Ireland, and by being intruſted with the moſt honourable and profitable employments in the government, acquired to themſelves vaſt poſſeſſions (c); ſo that King Edward II., in the ninth year of his reign, was pleaſed to create, by patent under the great-ſeal, dated at Lincoln, Sept. 1, 1315, Edmund le Botiller, Earl of Karryke or Carrick, who was afterwards raiſed to be Chief Governor of Ireland, under the title of Guardian or Lord Juſtice of that kingdom (d). His ſon James le Botiller, who married Eleanor, daughter of Humphry de Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Eſſex, and Conſtable of England, by [A] Who declare in favour of le Boutiller, or Butler, againſt them all.] We are told, that Mr. Roberts, Ulſter King of Arms in Ireland, took a great deal of pains in compiling a Genealogical Hiſtory of the family of Ormond, wherein he labours to prove, that the name of the family was originally Walter, or Water; and in ſupport of this, he brings a great number of inſtances, from which it appears, that Theobald, after he was Butler of Ireland, ſubſcribed Theobald Walter to charters of King John; and he likewiſe ſhews, that his deſcendents preſerved the ſurname of Walter, down to the time of James the firſt Earl of Ormond, who ſtyled himſelf, Jacobus Walter Pincerna Hiberniæ (1). We are, likewiſe, told in ſupport of this notion, that Walter is alſo a name of office, and that it ſignifies the ruler over any of the King's foreſts; and this upon the authority of Richard Verſtegan (2): but as that writer is not very correct, I am apt to think he is a little miſtaken here, and that the office he means was ſtyled, not Walter, but Waldtgrave; and that Walter is a contraction or corruption of Waldtheer, i. e. the lord or owner of a wood (3), anſwering to the word Sylveſter, or Sylvius; ſo that taking all this together, it is not at all improbable, that the father of Theobald might uſe this ſurname. Sir Robert Rothe, who put the laſt hand to another very laborious account of the deſcent of this noble family, which was written by his father, a Barriſter at Law, and Counſel to Thomas Earl of Ormond, in Queen Elizabeth's time, declares expreſsly for the ſurname of Becket, and will have Theobald, Butler of Ireland, to be the ſon of Walter Fitz-Gilbert, i. e. ſon of Gilbert Becket; and many writers concur in deriving this family from Walter Becket, a younger brother of Thomas, Archbiſhop of Canterbury (4). That the Earls of Ormond were deſcended ſome way or other from the family of Becket, is aſſerted in an act of parliament; but this does not prove that the ſurname of the family was Becket, ſince they might be deſcended as well by marriage; which notion may be ſupported from two pedigrees, wherein it is ſo laid down: but as theſe pedigrees are inconſiſtent with each other, ſo the Reverend Mr. Carte has clearly ſhewn, that they are irreconcileable to truth (5). But the Reverend Mr. John Butler, a clergyman in Northamptonſhire, being diſſatisfied with all the accounts he had met with, and even with that of the famous Sir William Dugdale (6), who, to ſay the truth, ſpeaks very cautiouſly of this family, being ſenſible of the imperfections of his materials, reſolved to ſet this whole matter in a new light; and the ſtory he tells us is this: That Richard I. Duke of Normandy had, beſides his ſon Richard II. by Gunora, another ſon by a lady whom he does not mention, whoſe name was Geoffry, Count of Brionis; who had iſſue Giſlebert, who was guardian to William the Conqueror. He had alſo two ſons, Richard Earl of Clare, and Baldwin. This Richard Earl of Clare was Cupbearer in ordinary to William I. and had five ſons; Gilbert, Roger, Walter, Robert, and Richard: theſe two laſt mentioned often ſupplying their father's place, took from thence the ſurname of Bouteillers. Robert, after his father's death, became Cup-bearer to Henry I. and had iſſue Walter, and other ſons. Walter ſucceeded him as Cup-bearer, and was Baron of Baynard Caſtle; and the eldeſt ſon of this Walter was Herveus, who was the father of Theobald, the firſt Butler of Ireland (7). This Reverend Gentleman has taken a great deal of pains to ſhew, that the ſurname of Botiller was much ancienter than the grant of this office to Theobald; whence he would infer, that the ſurname of the family was not either Walter or Becket, but Botiller or Butler. All this very eminently demonſtrates, that it is a fruitleſs thing to expect either exactneſs or certainty in matters of this nature; and, indeed, having looked into the pedigrees of ſeveral families of this name in England, I find different accounts of its origin in almoſt every one of them.

Elizabeth, daughter of Edward I., was, in conſideration of that marriage, created, by Edward III., Earl of Ormond; which being a large territory, whereas Carrick was only a manor, the family bore this title, and, in ſucceeding times, ſeldom uſed that of their more ancient honour (e). It was to the ſame perſon, and on account of the ſame marriage, that King Edward III. granted by patent, dated at Wallingford November 9, 1358, the regalities and liberties of Tipperary, and the rights of a palatine in that county (f). He died January 6, 1307-8, and was ſucceeded by his ſon James, the ſecond, commonly called the Noble Earl, on account of his being great-grandſon to King Edward I. In 1359, he was appointed Lord Juſtice of Ireland; and on July 24, 1376, he was again intruſted with that power, with an appointment of five hundred pounds a year, which was the uſual ſalary (g). He died October 18, 1382, and was ſucceeded by his ſon James, the third Earl of Ormond, who had alſo the honour to be appointed Lord Juſtice of Ireland by King Richard II., July 25, 1392. He was afterwards made Conſtable of Ireland by King Henry IV., who alſo intruſted him with the office of Lord Juſtice of that kingdom, in poſſeſſion of which he died, Sept. 7, 1405 (h). He left two ſons, James, the fourth Earl of Ormond, and Sir Richard le Botiller. This Earl of Ormond had a very remarkable honour done him; for he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland before he was of age, by commiſſion dated the eighteenth of December, in the ninth year of the reign of Henry IV. In 1420, he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by King Henry V., and ſeveral times after enjoyed the ſame honour (i). He died Auguſt 23, 1452, and left behind him three ſons, James, John, and Thomas. The firſt of theſe, ſtiled James, the fifth Earl of Ormond, was, in 1449, created by King Henry VI. Earl of Wiltſhire; two years after he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland; and adhering ſteadily to King Henry VI. he was not only appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for ten years, but was twice made High-Treaſurer of England, and honoured with the Garter. He had a large ſhare in the battle of Wakefield, fought December 21, 1460, in which the Duke of York was killed; but being taken priſoner the year following, at the bloody battle of Towton in Yorkſhire, he was beheaded on the firſt of May 1461, at Newcaſtle (k). His brother John, who was with him in that battle, was attainted; but by the kindneſs of Edward IV. he was reſtored in blood, and ſucceeded to the earldom of Ormond. He was looked upon as one of the fineſt gentlemen of that age, and was ſent Ambaſſador to ſeveral Courts of Europe; but, in a fit of devotion, making a journey to Jeruſalem, he died in the Holy Land in 1478 (l). Thomas, his younger brother, being reſtored in blood, ſucceeded him as Earl of Ormond, who was of the Privy-Council in England to King Henry VII., and ſummoned to Parliament there by the ſtile of Lord Rochford. He died in 1515, and left iſſue two daughters, the youngeſt of which, Margaret, married Sir William Bullen, Knight of the Bath, by whom ſhe had Sir Thomas Bullen (m). Sir Pierce Butler, grandſon to Sir Richard Butler, ſecond ſon of James the third Earl of Ormond, ſucceeded to that title, and to all the eſtates of the family in Ireland, of which he was appointed Lord Deputy in 1521, and in 1524 he was made Lord Treaſurer of that kingdom. He had great diſputes there with the potent family of Fitzgerald; and finding himſelf oppreſſed by their intereſt at Court, he came over here to ſolicit for redreſs (n). At this time, King Henry VIII. being much enamoured of the Lady Anne Bullen, prevailed upon Sir Pierce Butler to reſign his earldom of Ormond, that he might beſtow it upon her father; with which propoſition he complied, though probably very unwillingly, and becauſe he durſt not refuſe it (†) [B]. He was thereupon created with great pomp at Windſor, Feb. 23, 1527-8, Earl of Oſſory; and, beſides other gratifications, he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, which he held for ſeveral years; and, in proceſs of time, on the death of Sir Thomas Bullen, he was reſtored to the title of Earl of Ormond, which was afterwards confirmed to his ſon by act of parliament.

[B] Probably very unwillingly, and becauſe he durſt not refuſe it.] It is ſtrange to ſee what lengths princes will go to gratify their paſſions. Sir Thomas Bullen was, indeed, the grandſon of Thomas Earl of Ormond, and the grand-nephew of James Earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond; but both his father and his uncle had been attainted for their adherence to the houſe of Lancaſter: yet now the King was fond of ſeeing the former title revived, and the latter added to it, in favour of a perſon whoſe daughter he thought fit to marry; and, therefore, not ſatisfied with raiſing him to the title of Viſcount Rochford, and to the Order of the Garter, he, on the 8th of December, 1530, created him Earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond, limiting the former honour to the heirs-male of his body, and the latter to his heirs general (8); and, on the 24th of January following, he was made Lord Privy Seal; which, however, did not hinder him from having the diſmal mortification of ſitting in judgment upon his daughter, when the King thought fit to proceed againſt her, in order to take away her life. With that unfortunate princeſs died her brother George Viſcount Rochford, who was alſo attainted, and left no iſſue; and, in 1539, Thomas Earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond departed this life (9), which renders it not eaſy to apprehend what is ſaid by the hiſtorian of the Ormond family, as to Peter Earl of Oſſory's being reſtored to the title of Ormond, February the 22d, 1537-8, becauſe then Sir Thomas Bullen was living, or Sir William Dugdale is much miſtaken as to the time of his death. The act of parliament mentioned in the text was made in the 35th year of the King, and ſeems to be intended to ſecure effectually the honour of Ormond to James, the then Earl, and his heirs-male, with the like precedency as the ancient Earls of Ormond had. This was a point of juſtice certainly due to the family, and ſeems to be one of the worthieſt actions of that prince's reign (10). We may from hence diſcern the reaſon why Queen Elizabeth had always ſo great a regard for Thomas Earl of Ormond, and ſupported him, notwithſtanding he had the misfortune to be upon very bad terms with her potent favourite, Robert Earl of Leiceſter.

ment (o). This Pierce or Peter, Earl of Ormond and Offory, died Auguſt 26, 1539, leaving two ſons, James and Richard; the latter of whom was created, by King Edward VI., Viſcount Mountgarret, which honour continues in his poſterity. James, the eldeſt ſon, was, in his father's lifetime, created Viſcount Thurles, and enjoyed moſt of the great offices of the kingdom, ſucceeded his father as Earl of Ormond and Offory, and was Lord Treaſurer of Ireland the greateſt part of his life. He made a very great figure in his country, and would very probably have made a much greater, if he had not been cut off by ſudden death: for coming over hither at the King's command, he was poiſoned at a feaſt at Ely-houſe, and died October 28, 1546 (p). He left behind him, by his wife the daughter and heireſs of the Earl of Deſmond, ſeven ſons, Thomas, Edmund, John, Walter, James, Edward, and Pierce. Thomas, Earl of Ormond and Offory, was bred up with King Edward VI., and was in great favour with him, as he appears to have been alſo with Queen Mary, and much more ſo with Queen Elizabeth, who conſidered him as her kinſman and near relation; and, in the firſt year of her reign, ſhe not only confirmed a grant of lands made to him by her ſiſter, and releaſed the reſerved rent, but alſo granted him the office of Lord Treaſurer of Ireland, which high poſt he held during all her reign, and afterwards during his life (q). She likewiſe confirmed to him the grant of the regalities of Tipperary; and ſo great a confidence ſhe had in his loyalty, that when two of his brothers, Edmund and Peter, took part with the rebels, ſhe ſent the Earl over to reduce them, which he did by fair means. He alſo managed a long war againſt the Earl of Deſmond, and contributed greatly to his defeat and deſtruction (r). He was afterwards General againſt the famous rebel Tyrone, and without involving himſelf in any of the factions that diſturbed the Government, contented himſelf with doing his duty, and this with great hazard to himſelf and his family: for, by the treachery of the Iriſh, he was taken priſoner at a conference, and very hardly treated; but at laſt he was ſet at liberty, from an apprehenſion that he might have died in their hands, which would not have anſwered their purpoſes (s). He was about ſeventy years of age when King James came to the throne, who renewed his commiſſion of Lieutenant-General of the army, and ſhewed him great reſpect. He was the firſt Proteſtant of his family, and very ſincere in his religion. He had the misfortune to be quite blind for about twelve years before his death, and had the mortification alſo to loſe his only ſon, which gave him much grief (t). He died in 1614, leaving behind him an only daughter, Elizabeth, whom he married firſt to Theobald, the youngeſt ſon of his ſecond brother Sir Edmund Butler, intending that young gentleman for his heir, whom he procured to be created Viſcount Tulleophelim; but he dying ſoon after, King James prevailed upon, or rather obliged him, to give his daughter in marriage to Sir Richard Preſton, a favourite of his, whom he created Baron Dingwall, in the kingdom of Scotland (u). But notwithſtanding this marriage, the Earl, both by a deed and by his will, ſettled all his eſtates, excepting one manor, and ſix thouſand pounds portion which he aſſigned his daughter, upon his heirs at law. Upon his death, Sir Walter Butler of Kilcaſhe, eldeſt ſon to Sir John Butler, who was the third ſon of James the ſixth Earl of Ormond, ſucceeded to that title, and ought to have ſucceeded to the eſtate, but that the ſuperior intereſt of the Lord Dingwall kept him from it; and ſo partial was King James in this affair, that he undertook to decide the cauſe himſelf; but making ſuch an award as the Earl of Ormond and Offory would not ſubmit to, he was, for his contempt, committed to the Fleet, where he remained a priſoner eight years (w) [C]. In 1625 he recovered his liberty; and going over ſoon after into Ireland, died at Carrick, Feb. 24, 1632. He married Ellen, daughter to Edmund Viſcount Mountgarret, by whom he had iſſue two ſons and nine daughters. His eldeſt ſon,

[C] Where he remained a priſoner eight years.] There was ſomething in this caſe exceſſively hard. Sir Richard Preſton was a gentleman who had been bred up with the King, and therefore it is no wonder that he had an affection for him: but this was no excuſe for his obliging the Earl of Ormond to marry his daughter to him, and much leſs could it be a reaſonable cauſe for his making uſe of ſuch violent methods, for depriving Walter Earl of Ormond of what had been ſettled upon him many years before by deed, and was again confirmed to him by will (11). But, notwithſtanding all this, that noble Earl continued always loyal, and attributed the wrongs done him to the King's miſinformations, or miſconceptions. His Majeſty is ſaid to have relented at laſt; and, when preſſed by ſome of his Scotch favourites to carry things farther, he anſwered, 'That they had been carried 'too far already; and that if ever he looked into this 'affair again, it ſhould be to unravel what he had done.' The Earl of Ormond, however, did not recover his liberty till King James's death: and if we conſider this tranſaction attentively, it will be found a moſt exorbitant and moſt ungrateful ſtretch of prerogative againſt a family the moſt unſtained in its honour, and the moſt affectionate to the Engliſh Intereſt, and the Crown, of any that had ſettled in Ireland, which had been remarkably diſtinguiſhed in former reigns, and for which King James pretended to have the higheſt eſteem and regard, while he was oppreſſing one branch of it, and offering violence to the inclinations of the other; for the Lady Dingwall adhered cloſely to her father's ſentiments, and was far from being in the leaſt inſtrumental to the wrongs done to her couſin, though it was pretended they were done for her ſake.  [The behaviour of King James the Firſt to Walter Earl of Ormond reflects peculiar diſgrace on the character of that monarch. He became convinced that he had made an unjuſt deciſion; he was ſenſible that he ought to unravel what he had done; and yet he perſiſted in depriving the Earl of Ormond of his right, and in ſuffering him to be kept a priſoner. The King could declaim, upon occaſion, on the duties of a prince, and particularly on his obligations to do juſtice; but, at the ſame time, he could be guilty of the moſt flagrant violations of it, to comply with the intereſted and wicked views of his favourites. Thomas Viſcount Thurles, married, againſt his conſent, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Poyntz of Acton (x), in the County of Glouceſter. He had the misfortune to be drowned near the Skerries, as he was going to England, December 15, 1619, leaving three ſons and four daughters (y). BUTLER (JAMES), Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Ormond; one of the ableſt Stateſmen, moſt accompliſhed Courtiers, and worthieſt perſons of the age in which he flouriſhed. He was the ſon of Thomas Butler, Eſq; eldeſt ſon and heir apparent of Sir Walter Butler of Kilcaſh, by Mrs. Elizabeth Poyntz, and was born on the nineteenth of October 1610, in Newcaſtle-houſe at Clerkenwell, which was then inhabited by his grandfather Sir John Poyntz (a). The affairs of his family were at that time in ſuch diſorder, that ſcarcely any man would have imagined he ſhould ſo ſoon have worked himſelf through them, and appeared with that luſtre and dignity he did [A]. He was ſent to Hatfield to a carpenter's wife, by whom he was nurſed till he was about three years old, and he was then ſent for over to Ireland by his father and mother. He was frequently carried by them to Thomas Earl of Ormond, who lived about a year after he came over to Ireland; and having a great love to his mother's family, her grandfather having been his conſtant and faithful friend, as well as a reſpect for the nearneſs in blood between them, he was extremely fond of the child, and delighted much in playing with him, though he was then blind (b). Upon the deceaſe of the good old Earl, his grandfather, Sir Walter Butler of Kilcaſh, aſſumed that title, and his father was called by courteſy Viſcount Thurles; who coming over to England about the law-ſuits of the family, was unfortunately drowned near the Skerries, December 15, 1619, leaving behind him a widow and ſeven children, in very diſconſolate circumſtances (c) [B]. James Butler, now in the ninth year of his age, was by courteſy ſtiled Viſcount Thurles, and the next year was ſent over to England by his mother, and placed under the care of Mr. Conyers, a Popiſh ſchoolmaſter at Finchley near Barnet. But Sir William Parſons, having, by ſome artifice, intitled the Crown to the wardſhip of the young Lord Thurles, King James removed him from this ſchool, and ſent him to Lambeth, to be brought up under the care and inſpection of Dr. George Abbot, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that he might be well fixed in the Proteſtant religion; and in this, as the King's intention was good, and his care viſible, ſo it was indiſputably attended with ſucceſs; though ſome ſay no great regard was had to his education there, and that his circumſtances were very narrow; all which may poſſibly be very true, though there are authorities which may be urged in proof of a contrary opinion, in reſpect, at leaſt, to the Archbiſhop's attention (d) [C]. While Lord Thurles was at Lambeth, his grandfather, Walter

[A] And appeared with the luſtre and dignity he did.] Beſides the diſputes that happened in this noble family, from the partiality of King James in favour of his countryman Sir Richard Preſton, there were others that took riſe from perſonal cauſes, particularly the high ſpirit of Sir Walter Butler, of Kilcaſh, who was extremely diſpleaſed that his ſon Thomas had married Mrs. Elizabeth Poyntz. Whence this diſpleaſure aroſe, does not appear; for, in point of family, there was no ſort of occaſion to complain, there being, as I take it, ſcarcely a better in England; and as to the lady's qualities, they were ſuch as intitled her to the eſteem of the moſt judicious perſons of that age (1). Add to this, that Thomas Earl of Ormond had the greateſt intimacy with Sir Nicholas Poyntz, this Lady's grandfather, as appears by his ſending him with a challenge to the great earl of Leiceſter (2), which he carried, though againſt his will. It was, probably, this friendſhip between the two families, that brought Mr. Thomas Butler, afterward Viſcount Thurles, to his firſt acquaintance with the young Lady he married; and it appears that her family had a great affection for him and his children: but this produced no alteration in Sir Walter's ſentiments, who, when his ſon and daughter came over to Ireland after the birth of this their eldeſt ſon, did not ſuffer them to live in the ſame houſe with him (3); ſo that few perſons have been born, or bred, under more untoward circumſtances, than attended the coming into the world, the infancy, and even the youth, of this great man, who, notwithſtanding, gave early hopes of his becoming, in time, all that he afterwards was. So irreſiſtible are the efforts of a great genius, and ſo much ſuperior to the injuries of fortune!

[B] A widow and ſeven children, under very diſconſolate circumſtances.] The affairs of the Lord Viſcount Thurles were in a very perplexed ſituation; his father was under the King's diſpleaſure, and a priſoner in the Fleet; he laboured himſelf under his father's diſpleaſure: the family-eſtate was under ſequeſtration; and the liberties of the County-palatine of Tipperary had been ſeized by a Quo Warranto; which misfortunes making his preſence neceſſary in England, he was going thither when he had the misfortune to be drowned (4). His iſſue by his Lady were three ſons and four daughters, viz. James, who is the ſubject of this article; John, who died at Naples in his travels, unmarried, in 1636; and Richard Butler of Kilcaſh, Eſq. [C] In reſpect, at leaſt, to the Archbiſhop's attention.] We are told by Mr. Carte, that, whatever learning the Archbiſhop had himſelf, he ſhewed very little concern to encourage it in others; and that the young Lord Thurles had ſo little notice taken of him, that he was not taught ſo much as to underſtand Latin (6). 'He lived, however, continues he, in the Archbiſhop's family, and was maintained there, though but very indifferently, till after the death of King James. The reaſon of this neglect probably was, that the Archbiſhop conſidered him as a burden impoſed on him by the King, and which he could not, in decency, decline; for he received no allowance for the young Lord's ſubſiſtence, either from the Court, or from the Ormond family, the whole eſtate whereof was under ſequeſtration by an extent from the Crown; and forty pounds a year was all that the young Lord had for his own and his ſervant's clothing and expences.' But Sir Richard

Walter Earl of Ormond, was in great trouble and perplexity: King James had thrown him into the Fleet for contempt, in refuſing to acquieſce under his award, and ſequeſtered his eſtates, and left him nothing to ſubſiſt upon. In this ſituation things continued during the lifetime of that Prince; but, upon his deceaſe, the Earl recovered his liberty, and part of his eſtate, and then took home his grandſon, who by this time was ſixteen. It does not appear, that by this change there was any more care taken of the young Lord's education. On the contrary, his grandfather left him pretty much to himſelf; ſo that at eighteen, we find him attending the Duke of Buckingham at Portſmouth, though that favourite was the capital enemy of his family; but from the principles of loyalty, hereditary in his noble houſe, the young Lord never found any obſtacles, when his Sovereign or his country required his ſervice (e). On the Duke's being ſtabbed by Felton, Lord Thurles returned to London, and embarked in a new ſcene of life: for finding his couſin, the Lady Elizabeth Preſton, at Court, and a very agreeable young Lady, he began to entertain deſires of compromiſing the diſputes that had been ſo fatal to both their families, by marrying her. He met, however, with many and great difficulties in this affair, which might have exhauſted the patience, and been too hard for the prudence of an older man: but his conſtancy in his addreſſes, and his indefatigable attention to remove theſe obſtacles, by degrees got the better of them all at laſt; ſo that, with the King's conſent, ſignified by his letters patents, dated September 8, 1629, he obtained leave to marry her (f) [D]. This marriage was ſolemniſed the Chriſtmas following; and immediately after he went down to Acton in Glouceſterſhire, the ſeat of his uncle, Sir Robert Poyntz; and there, with the aſſiſtance of his uncle's chaplain, he applied himſelf to, and gained a competent knowledge of, the Latin tongue. About the cloſe of the enſuing year, he went over to Ireland, where ſoon after he purchaſed a troop of horſe; but his affairs requiring his preſence in England, he left his Lady behind him, and paſſing through the north of Ireland, croſſed over to Scotland, and having viſited his Lady's relations in that kingdom, came up to London, where he was at the time of his grandfather's deceaſe, February 24, 1632, by which he became Earl of Ormond (g). He returned to Ireland in the beginning of the month of September in the enſuing year, at a very critical juncture, when the Lord Wentworth, afterwards the great Earl of Strafford, entered upon the government of Ireland, with the title of Lord Deputy. He was very early and very advantageouſly taken notice of by that eminent Stateſman, who, amongſt his other ſhining qualities, was an excellent judge of men. He had ſent a meſſage to the Earl of Ormond, in relation to a ſubſcription for the ſupport of the army, which, however legal it might be, was a thing unqueſtionably neceſſary; and this induced the Earl to ſecond the Lord Deputy's deſires, in ſuch a manner, as procured him a very handſome letter of thanks (h). His Lordſhip ſoon after came up to Dublin, to pay his compliments to the Deputy; who obſerving him very attentively as he croſſed the Caſtle-yard, ſaw ſomething ſo very extraordinary in his looks and in his mien, that he could not help ſaying to thoſe who ſtood near him, That if his ſkill in phyſiognomy did not fail him, that young nobleman would make the greateſt man of his family (i): a prediction which did equal honour to the young Earl of Ormond, and to the Lord Deputy, whoſe ſkill in this inſtance moſt certainly did not deceive him. One of the firſt ſteps taken by the new Governor was to call a Parliament, which, though a thing abſolutely neceſſary, he foreſaw would be attended both with danger and difficulty: but, notwithſtanding this, he ventured upon it, and the Houſes met July 14, 1634; to whom he went in great ſtate, the Earl of Kildare bearing the Cap of Maintenance, and the Earl of Ormond the Sword (k). In this Parliament, however, there happened a difference be-chard Cox gives ſomewhat a different account of this matter, and more eſpecially of the Archbiſhop's behaviour, which is the more remarkable, becauſe he tranſcribed it from a manuſcript for which he expreſſes great eſteem. Speaking of the mother of Lord Thurles's management of him after his father's unfortunate death, he ſays (7), 'She put him to a private ſchool under a Roman Catholic; but by order of King James, he was removed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's, Doctor Abbot, and by him he was wholly maintained for five or ſix years without any penſion from Court, or poſſibility of help from home, where all was ſequeſtered and depreſt. (7) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

[D] He obtained leave to marry her.] The difficulties the Earl of Ormond had to ſtruggle with in this reſpect, are very well worth knowing. That potent favourite the Duke of Buckingham, whoſe ruling paſſion was raiſing every branch of his family to titles of honour, and vaſt eſtates, caſt his eyes upon the Lady Elizabeth Preſton, while a very child, and engaged her father, Sir Richard, to beſtow her upon his nephew George Fielding, ſecond ſon to the Earl of Denbigh; and, with a view to this marriage, this young gentleman was created Lord Fielding of the Caghe in the kingdom of Ireland, and Sir Richard Preſton was created Viſcount Callan and Earl of Deſmond, with remainder to his intended ſon-in-law George Lord Fielding, by which limitation thoſe honours are now in the Denbigh family (8). To ſecure all things more effectually for the favourite's purpoſe, King James was prevailed upon to grant the wardſhip and marriage of James Lord Thurles to the ſaid Earl of Deſmond, which was certainly a very ſtrange act in that Prince (9). But Providence defeated all theſe ſchemes by the murder of the Duke of Bucks, and the death of the Earl of Deſmond, who was drowned in his paſſage between Dublin and Holyhead, October the 28th, 1628. His Counteſs, the daughter of Thomas Earl of Ormond, died eighteen days before him, and recommended it to her daughter, upon her death-bed, to marry her couſin, if poſſible, to put an end to the diſputes in the family (10). After the death of her parents, the Earl of Holland had the wardſhip of this young Lady, and ſhewed, at firſt, a ſtrong inclination to make good the contract that had been entered into with the Denbigh-family; but was, at laſt, content to ſell his intereſt for fifteen thouſand pounds (which was more than he could have got by the other marriage) to my Lord of Ormond, and then the King's leave was eaſily obtained (11).

tween the Earl and the Lord Deputy, of ſo extraordinary a nature, that, conſidering the temper of the latter, it is a wonder that it was ſo eaſily made up (l) [E]. But after this they ſeem to have agreed perfectly well. The Deputy was indeed of a very high ſpirit, proceeded in his own way, and dealt roundly with people of all ranks: but the Earl of Ormond having nothing in view, but the ſervice of his country and the honour of the Crown, adminiſtered no ground of offence, but, on the contrary, did ſuch eminent ſervices, and in a way ſo open and free from particular views, that the Lord Wentworth eſteemed and admired him, writing over highly in his favour to England, and, without any application from him, procured him to be ſworn of the Privy-Council in that kingdom, when he was but twenty-four years of age (m) [F]. The ſame good underſtanding continued after the Lord Deputy was appointed Lord Lieutenant, and created Earl of Strafford: and in the next Parliament of Ireland, which ſat in 1640, the Earl of Ormond was very active, and by his behaviour gave ſuch ſatisfaction, that when the troubles in Scotland rendered it neceſſary to raiſe an army in Ireland, his Lordſhip was made choice of to command it under the Lord Lieutenant; when, by his zeal and dili-

[E] That it was ſo eaſily made up.] We ſhall give the reader the ſtory of this quarrel, from the manuſcript quoted by Sir Richard Cox, and which, it is not impoſſible, might be copied from ſome memoirs of this noble perſon, drawn up by Sir Robert Southwell; for it agrees perfectly with the account given from that gentleman's papers by Mr. Carte; only it is ſhorter, and ſeems to be more plainly expreſſed (12). 'The Lord Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, 'went over Lord Deputy in 1633. In a while after 'he called a Parliament; which being appointed to 'meet within the Caſtle of Dublin, a proclamation was 'iſſued, That none of the Members, either Peers or 'Commons, ſhould enter with their ſwords. All obeyed 'the order ſave this young Lord, who told the Black 'Rod at the door, he ſhould have no ſword of his ex-'cept in his guts. So being the only Peer, who ſat 'that day in defiance of the proclamation, it fired the 'Lord Deputy, who was not wont to be diſobeyed. The 'Earl was called upon in the evening to anſwer for 'it, who thereupon ſhewed His Majeſty's Writ, call-'ing him to Parliament, cinctus cum gladio; which 'ſort of anſwer being not expected, and finding him 'like to prove an untractable companion, it was in de-'liberation that night, between the Lord Deputy and 'his two friends Sir George Ratcliff and Mr. Wan-'desford, whether to trample him quite under foot, or 'to oblige ſo daring a young man, who was now alſo 'grown very popular? But Sir George being for the 'more benign extreme, he was taken into favour, ca-'reſſed, and made one of the Privy Council, and no 'opportunities were from that time forward omitted to 'oblige him, or ſet him forth in a high character to 'His Majeſty.' Mr. Carte's remark upon this tranſaction, is equally pertinent and proper (13). He thinks that his Lordſhip's defence was founded on the inveſtiture of the earldom per cincturam gladii, which was a neceſſary badge of that dignity, uſed in all ages as ſuch, and worn by the Earls of England in the Houſe of Lords; a practice to which the Iriſh Earls were by expreſs law obliged to conform; ſo that in this reſpect he had a ſtatute to ſupport him, with which no order of the Lord Deputy could diſpenſe; and I am entirely of his opinion, that the event in this caſe was very extraordinary, and ſo unlikely to follow from a diſpute with a Lord Deputy, ſo impatient of contradiction, that it was no encouragement to any body to engage another. It is, however, poſſible, that Lord Wentworth, who was a man of great ſpirit, might be ſecretly pleaſed with this ſimilitude of temper in another man of quality; and it is farther probable, that finding it impoſſible to cenſure his Lordſhip's conduct, he thought it more agreeable to good policy to approve it.

(13) Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. i. p. 65.

[F] Procured him to be ſworn of the Privy Council, when he was but twenty four years of age.] We cannot well have better lights upon any ſubject, than are derived to us on this, from the letters of the Earl of Strafford; which being of a private nature, and written in confidence, moſt certainly ſhow the real ſentiments of his heart; who, beſides, was not a man at all inclined to diſſimulation. The firſt mention he makes of my Lord Ormond, is in a letter dated Auguſt 3, 1633, wherein, having taken notice of the manner in which he had provided for the pay of the army on his firſt coming over, he has this paragraph (14). 'My Lord of Ormond, being the Maſ-'ter of the Rolls, made acquainted with this day's 'reſolution of this Council, came the next morning 'to me in a very noble way, to witneſs his full con-'ſent thereunto, as well for himſelf as for all his 'tenants and friends (15).' The only letter in that collection, directed to the Earl of Ormond, is dated from Dublin, June 2, 1634: it is as full and clear, in reſpect to his Lordſhip's conduct, and the Deputy's regard for him, as words can make it, but is too long to be inſerted here. But in a diſpatch, dated from Dublin Caſtle, December 16, 1634, directed to Mr. Secretary Cook, intended as a general view of the ſtate of Ireland at that time; and on the margin of which, his Majeſty's ſenſe of the Lord Deputy's repreſentations is written by the hand of the ſaid Secretary; there is this very remarkable paragraph (16). 'In the higher Houſe there is my Lord of Ormond, 'that hath as much advantage of the reſt in judgment 'and parts, as he hath in eſtate and blood; and one 'who, upon my obſervation ſince I came thither, 'expreſſeth very good affections to the crown and 'government, ſo as I hold him a perſon of conſe-'quence, and fit to receive ſome mark of his Ma-'jeſty's favour, and humbly offer it to his Majeſty's 'wiſdom, Whether it were not ſeaſonable to make 'him a Counſellor: he is young, but take it from 'me, a very ſtaid head; ſo as I ſhould think we had 'got much the better, by the exchange of the Earl 'of Ormond for Sir Piers Croſby. Beſides, it will 'be impoſſible, without his Lordſhip, to find a title 'for the crown to Ormond, ſo as without him no 'plantation neither, in which reſpect it were good 'to take him in. But as in all others of this nature, 'I refer it clearly to the King's wiſdom, as one who 'will have no other intereſts here but the ſervice of 'my maſter; nor, upon my faith, did I ever ſo much 'as mention this, or any ſuch thing, to my Lord of 'Ormond.' The Anſwer to this part of the Lord Deputy's letter runs thus. 'All theſe you mention 'ſhall find themſelves remembered; and for the Earl 'of Ormond, your Lordſhip ſhall receive herewith his 'Majeſty's warrant to ſwear him Counſellor accord-'ing to your advice.' In other letters of his, he ſpeaks of him to the King, and to his miniſters, with all imaginable eſteem and reſpect. After his troubles came on, and he was priſoner in the Tower, he looked upon the Earl as his ſincere friend, and writes to him with all imaginable freedom and confidence. In a letter (17) dated from the Tower, December the 17th, 1640, he informs him, that he had mentioned him to the King for Lord Deputy of Ireland, and that he was hindered from that preferment by his own countrymen, and the Earl Marſhal, that is, the then Earl of Arundel. When things bore harder upon him, and his great ſoul felt, though it never ſunk under, his misfortunes, he wrote with ſome degree of paſſion, to the Earl of Ormond. His letter is dated from the Tower, February the 3d, 1640 (18). It begins thus: 'My noble Lord, there is ſo little reſt given me, as 'I have not time ſcarce to eat my bread. I truſt to 'have more quietneſs after a while. Your Lordſhip's 'favours towards me in theſe afflictions are ſuch as 'have, and ſhall, level my heart at your foot ſo long 'as I live, or elſe let me be infamous to all men.' There is ſomething ſo generous and ſo great in the friendſhip between theſe noblemen, that it ought to be tranſmitted with juſt praiſe to poſterity.

gence, the forces intended to be raiſed were levied in a ſhort ſpace of time: and in the month of Auguſt, the Lord Lieutenant, being then in England, ſent over a deputation to the Earl of Ormond, conveying to him all the powers granted to him by his commiſſion, as Lieutenant General (n). But the fair weather in Ireland did not laſt long. The ſame Parliament that had thanked the King, in the moſt ſolemn manner, for ſending them ſo good a Lieutenant as the Lord Strafford, now, in his abſence, and when they found he was like to be attacked in England, fell upon him firſt in Ireland. The Houſe of Commons drew up a long and vehement remonſtrance, conſiſting of ſixteen articles; and endeavours were uſed to procure a like remonſtrance from the Houſe of Lords; but they were defeated by the ſtrenuous oppoſition of the Earl of Ormond and his friends; for which the King thanked him, by a letter dated the twenty-ſecond of November 1640 (o). It was his Majeſty's intention, at this time, to have declared the Earl, Deputy of Ireland; but this being oppoſed by the Committee of the Iriſh Houſe of Commons, was laid aſide. The Earl was no leſs active and diligent in the enſuing Parliament, though with different ſucceſs: but his zeal and candour were ſo well known and ſo thoroughly underſtood, that the laſt requeſt the Earl of Strafford made the King, when he knew that there were no hopes of ſaving his life, was, that his Blue Garter might be given to his friend the Earl of Ormond; with which his Majeſty would very readily have complied, but that the Earl upon the firſt notice of it declined it; modeſtly hinting, that his own loyalty ſtood in no need of rewards to confirm it, and that perhaps ſuch an honour might be employed more for his Majeſty's ſervice (p) [G]. When the great rebellion broke out in that kingdom, on the twenty-third of October 1641, the Earl was at his country ſeat of Carrick, the government being then in Sir William Parſons and Sir John Borlace, who had the title of Lords Juſtices. As ſoon as the King was informed of it, he thought of the Earl of Ormond for Lieutenant-general; and though the Earl of Leiceſter, at the deſire of the Parliament, was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, yet the Lords Juſtices, upon notice of his Majeſty's deſignation, ſigned a commiſſion to the Earl of Ormond, to be Lieutenant-general and Commander in Chief of the army, which conſiſted at that time of no more than three thouſand men (q). The Earl no ſooner received this commiſſion, than he propoſed acting vigorouſly againſt the rebels, with the ſmall force he had, and what additional troops could be immediately raiſed, that they might not have time to form or arm themſelves effectually: but from ſome fatal diſtaſte which the Lords Juſtices had to the Earl, grounded, as a certain writer tells us, on their apprehenſion, that, if he ſuppreſſed the rebellion, he would be rewarded with the government of Ireland, they oppoſed him in every thing; ſo that with the beſt intention in the world he was not able to do much; but what he could do he did (r). In the latter end of the month of January 1642, the rebels having advanced within ſeven miles of Dublin, the Earl marched out of that city, with 2000 foot, 300 horſe, and five ſmall field-pieces, and diſlodged them from the Naas, and would have proceeded farther if thoſe who had the ſupreme power would have permitted him. Soon after he made another excurſion, by which he obliged the rebels to raiſe the blockade of Drogheda, and would have purſued them vigorouſly if he had not been recalled. In the beginning of April he made a third expedition; and having beaten the rebels from their ſeveral poſts, at laſt, on the fifteenth of that month (s), he came up with and engaged them at Kilruſh. The forces under his command did not exceed three thouſand five hundred men, and thoſe of the rebels were above double his number. He attacked, however, and routed them entirely, with the loſs only of twenty killed and forty wounded; whereas the rebels had ſeveral hundred killed upon the ſpot, and would have ſuffered more, if they had not had a bog near them. This was a very glorious and important ſervice; and though the enemies of the Earl of Ormond had raiſed many cruel calumnies againſt him in England, yet they were ſo ill put together, and ſo apparently falſe, that the Houſe of Commons ordered the Speaker to write him a letter of thanks for his ſervices; and it was propoſed to move the Houſe of Lords, to join with them in beſeeching his Majeſty to make the Earl of Ormond Knight of the Garter. They likewiſe ſent him a jewel of the value of ſix hundred and fifty pounds; and, in the account of the victory, publiſhed by order of their Houſe, celebrated his conduct and courage very highly (t). The Earl made another expedition that year with great ſucceſs; and there is no doubt but the rebels had been purſued with much greater effect, if he had been more at liberty: but ſtanding very indifferently with the Lords Juſtices, and diſputes ariſing ſoon after with the Earl of Leiceſter, [G] Might be employed more to his Majeſty's ſervice.] One of the laſt acts of the Earl of Strafford's life, was to teſtify his kindneſs and regard to the Earl of Ormond, whom he recommended, the evening before he ſuffered, to his Majeſty, by the Lord Primate Uſher; and at that time it is moſt likely, that he deſired his Garter might be given to him; for amongſt the memoranda ſet down in the Primate's almanack, of the anſwers given him, by the King, to the Earl's requeſts, which were to be communicated to him the morning he ſuffered (the 7th), is this (19): 'Earl of Ormond ſhall be Knight of Garter in his place.' We are indebted to Mr. Carte for the account given us of the Earl's declining this honour (20), and of his reaſon for it. That he did decline it is certain, ſince he did not receive the Garter during this reign; and that he did it from the motive aſſigned in the text, is highly probable, becauſe he could not well do it from any other: for as things ſtood at that time, the Parliament would not have been diſpleaſed at his receiving that favour.

who was Lord Lieutenant, the ſervice in Ireland was much impeded (u). But the King, being very ſenſible of the Earl's entire fidelity to him, releaſed him in ſome meaſure from the difficulties he was under, by appointing him Lieutenant-general, by an independent commiſſion from himſelf under the Great Seal; and ſoon after, of his own motive, he created him Marquis of Ormond (w), as a farther mark of his favour. All this, however, did not contribute much to the proſecution of the war. The Iriſh became daily more and more numerous, and the Engliſh weaker and weaker; and, which was ſtill worſe, they were ſo ill ſupplied, that the only method that could be found to enable the army once more to take the field, was by calling in and coining half the plate of thoſe who were ſo good ſubjects as to ſend it. At length, however, the Marquis of Ormond marched with two thouſand five hundred foot, and five hundred horſe; on the ſecond of March 1642-3, and, after ſome ſmall advantages, came before the town of Roſs. On the twelfth he battered it in breach and made an aſſault, in which he was repulſed. This encouraged the Iriſh General, Preſton, to advance with ſix thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe to its relief; and being an officer of experience and judgment, he not only threw a ſupply into the place, but alſo forced the Marquis of Ormond to a battle, under various diſadvantages, excluſive of the ſuperiority of numbers of two to one (x). The horſe of the Marquis's army, or at leaſt the beſt part of them, were weak enough to fancy that they were betrayed by him, which made them give way, and thereby endangered his life and liberty; but having got with ſome difficulty to his foot, he charged the Iriſh ſo briſkly, that he broke them, and gained a complete victory, taking Lieutenant-general Cullen and a great number of priſoners, with all the baggage (y). If this victory could have been improved, there is no doubt the conſequences of it would have been great: but the government in Ireland was ſo weak, and the people either ſo poor, or had ſo little confidence in their rulers, that no ſufficient ſupply was furniſhed for the uſe of the army; and this, together with the commands he received from Oxford, obliged the Marquis of Ormond to think ſeriouſly of a ceſſation which the rebels had propoſed; more eſpecially when by a reſolution of the Privy-Council at Dublin, dated the twenty-ſecond of June 1643, it was declared that the army could not be ſupplied with ten thouſand pounds, half in proviſion and half in money, in which caſe the Marquis offered to beſiege Wexford, diſcontinue the treaty, and proſecute the war (z). Being thus diſappointed on one ſide, and preſſed on the other, he concluded, but not without the greateſt caution, and with the beſt advice, ſuch a ceſſation on the fifteenth of September 1643 [H]. The news of this ceſſation was [H] Such a ceſſation on the 15th of September, 1643.] There was no action of this noble perſon's life that has been more cenſured, than his making this ceſſation, which, it muſt be allowed, had a bad effect upon his Majeſty's affairs in England, and muſt likewiſe be confeſſed not to have done much good in Ireland (21). Yet, upon a fair and candid inquiry, it will not be found that the Earl of Ormond acted any other part than became a perſon of ſtrict honour, and ſteady principle. It has been very truly obſerved, that there were, at that time, no leſs than five parties in Ireland; the Proteſtants loyal to the King, at whoſe head was the Earl of Ormond; the Proteſtants inclined to the Parliament, who were countenanced, at leaſt, by one of the Lords Juſtices; the Papiſts that were well affected to the Conſtitution, whoſe chief was the Marquis of Clanrickard; the Papiſts that meant to adhere to the Pope, headed by the greateſt part of their Clergy; and the Scots who meant well to themſelves, who were reſolved to keep what they had got, and deſired to get more if they could. As all theſe parties had different views, ſo they purſued different meaſures. The Earl of Ormond was for proſecuting the war againſt ſuch as were actually rebels, but not for driving all the Iriſh to deſpair, which he thought would ſtrengthen the rebels (22). The Lords Juſtices were for the continuance of the war, though cold in the proſecution of it; but, at the ſame time, violent in refuſing the ſubmiſſions, forfeiting the eſtates, and executing, by law, ſuch of the Iriſh Papiſts as fell into their hands, depending upon a force from England, ſooner or later, to ſupport their conduct. The wiſer part of the Iriſh were for obtaining a toleration of their religion, and returning to their duty. The wilder ſort, who, by the way, were much the majority, aimed at throwing off, what they called, the Engliſh yoke, and ſetting up for themſelves. The Scotch were for the continuance of the war, as that by which they were like to get moſt. The Earl of Ormond laboured all he could to reduce all parties to one mind, and to the obedience that was due to the laws and to the King. While he had any hopes of accompliſhing this by drawing off ſuch as had unwillingly, or upon miſtaken notions, joined the rebels, and reducing thoſe who perſiſted in rebellion, by the ſword, he was for continuing the war, in which no man had acted more vigorouſly, or had more freely expoſed his perſon. But when he ſaw that, by a complication of untoward accidents, this was rendered very impracticable, if not abſolutely impoſſible, he then inclined, from the natural generoſity of his temper, his deſire to prevent unneceſſary effuſion of blood, and, above all, out of regard to his maſter's ſervice, and of preſerving, at leaſt, one kingdom in its obedience, to give way to a ceſſation, with a view of coming at peace (23). That he was not alone in theſe ſentiments, but had the concurrence of the wiſeſt and beſt men of all ranks and profeſſions in that nation, will ſufficiently appear to the candid reader, from the following paper ſigned by thoſe with whom he adviſed, and containing the reaſons which induced them to give him ſuch advice (24), which may be looked upon as a full vindication of the rectitude of his intentions, and the uprightneſs of his conduct, from which we ought to judge of a man's character, and not from events.

'WHEREAS the Lord Marquis of Ormond hath demanded the opinions, as well of the members appointed from the Council-board to aſſiſt his Lordſhip in the preſent treaty, as of other perſons of honour and command, that have, ſince the beginning thereof, repaired out of ſeveral parts of this kingdom to his Lordſhip: They therefore ſeriouſly conſidering how much his Majeſty's army here hath already ſuffered through want of relief out of England, though the ſame was often preſſed and importuned by his moſt gracious Majeſty, who hath left nothing unattempted, which might conduce to their ſupport and maintenance, and unto what common miſery, not only the officers and ſoldiers, but others alſo his Majeſty's good ſubjects within this kingdom, are reduced: And further, conſidering how many of his Majeſty's principal forts and places of ſtrength are, at this preſent, in great diſtreſs, and the imminent danger the king-was but very ill received in England, where the barbarities committed by the Iriſh at the breaking out of the rebellion, made them juſtly conſidered as men who deſerved no regard; and, indeed, they met with none but what they derived from their own force, and the diviſions and weakneſs of the Engliſh, which had compelled the Marquis to act as he did (a). On the other hand, the Iriſh obſerved this ceſſation of theirs very indifferently, which put the Marquis under great hardſhips; notwithſtanding which, he ſent over forces to the aſſiſtance of his Royal Maſter; and the King was ſo fully ſatisfied with his fidelity on the one hand, and his capacity on the other, that he reſolved to make him Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the Earl of Leiceſter (b). The Marquis of Ormond had before declined that employment; but found himſelf now in ſuch circumſtances, or rather found the affairs of the King and of the nation in ſuch a ſituation, that he was obliged to accept it, and accordingly was ſworn into, and entered upon his government in the beginning of 1644 (c). He found every day new difficulties to ſtruggle with, from the time of his accepting that great truſt. The power of the Iriſh was continually increaſing; the Scots in Ireland were very little inclined to obey his orders; and the Parliament had their agents and emiſſaries every where, which gave him great diſturbance. But what troubled him moſt, was the new treaty, into which he was obliged to enter with the Iriſh, who, on the one hand, dealt very inſincerely with him, had an independent intereſt at Oxford, where they ought to have had none; and, on the other, pretended, on the ſcore of his tenderneſs for many miſguided, whom he therefore conſidered as honeſt, men amongſt them, and his relation to the moſt conſiderable perſons in their councils, to expect more from him than they could have pretended to from another in his place (d). All theſe conſiderations taken together, induced him to deſire leave to reſign; which the King would not hear of, but endeavoured to diſpel his apprehenſions, and to remove ſome at leaſt of the many difficulties he was under, by ſending him freſh powers (e) and farther inſtructions. Theſe, as they ſhowed his Majeſty's kindneſs towards him, prevailed upon him to continue in his poſt: yet neither theſe inſtructions, nor his care, could prevent many inconveniencies and misfortunes that fell out the enſuing year, when ſeveral attempts were made by the friends of the Parliament to ſurpriſe the fortreſſes [illegible] Ireland, and even Dublin itſelf; which though by his vigilance the Lord Lieutenan[illegible] prevented, yet theſe and other accidents gave ſuch encouragement to the Iriſh, that they broke out again in ſeveral parts of the kingdom (f). But the worſt of all was their inſincerity and double dealing in the management of the peace, and their ſtrange negociations with the Earl of Glamorgan, which have been the ſubject of ſo much diſpute, and which, though they remain ſtill not a little in the dark, ſufficiently demonſtrate the honour and integrity of the Lord Lieutenant, who never had any thoughts of peace (g) but upon juſt principles. The more prudent and moderate men, however, even amongſt the Iriſh, were equally ſenſible of the neceſſity of a peace, and of a peace concluded under the authority of the Lord Lieutenant, which at laſt they brought very near taking effect; but the arrival of John Baptiſti Rinuncini, Archbiſhop and Prince of Firmo, the Pope's Nuncio, made a great change in affairs (h), and excited a new ſpirit of madneſs amongſt thoſe who were beginning to return to their reaſon and duty. Yet, notwithſtanding all theſe diſtractions, and the ſtrange behaviour of the Iriſh, the peace was at laſt concluded at Dublin, on the thirtieth of July 1646, and actually proclaimed at Kilkenny, which had been the chief ſeat of the rebellion (i) [I]. But the Nuncio

[I] Which had been the chief ſeat of the rebellion.] There never was any thing more baſe, more barbarous, or more inconſiſtent with any kind of principles of honour, morality, or religion, than the behaviour of the Iriſh Catholics to the Marquis of Ormond. He marched to Kilkenny in the latter end of Auguſt, with two hundred horſe and twelve hundred foot, and was received there with all the marks of affection, reſpect, and triumph, that it was poſſible for a nation to expreſs. But when he heard what the Clergy were doing at Waterford, he ſuſpected the ſtorm that ſoon followed; and to prevent it, he offered, as the cleareſt mark of the ſincerity of his intentions, to give his lady and children as hoſtages. But even then, he did not ſuſpect any deſign againſt his perſon, or the forces under his command: So that he marched to Carrick, and from thence to Clonmell, where he was denied entrance; notwithſtanding which, he moved on to Caſhell, where he was informed that Owen O Neile had threatened the city with deſtruction, if they received his Excellency; and ſoon after he had full information, that this blood-thirſty rebel was marching with a numerous army to intercept him; upon which he turned back to Calan, and marched from thence to Loghlinbridge, arriving there before O Neile could reach him, and ſo back to Dublin, where he was received with inexpreſſible tranſports of joy, friends and foes having given him over for loſt (25). But the worſt part of this affair was, that General Preſton and his army, who were for the moſt part of Engliſh extraction, ſhould, againſt their own intereſt, ſo far concur in this meaſure, as to let O Neile march through their quarters, without giving the Marquis any notice: And afterwards he behaved ſtill worſe; and therefore the Lord Lieutenant and Council, in vindicating their next meaſure, wrote to the King in theſe terms:

Nuncio perſiſting in his bad deſigns, called an aſſembly of the Clergy at Waterford, by which he defeated all that might have been expected from that treaty, and had ſuch an influence over the Generals of the Iriſh rebels, as to gain them to a moſt perfidious attempt, for ſurpriſing the Marquis of Ormond, who, upon the faith of the treaty, had marched with a ſmall body of forces to Kilkenny; ſo that with infinite difficulty and danger he retreated back to Dublin, and the rebels immediately took meaſures for beſieging that city (k). The King was now in the hands of his enemies, the affairs of the Proteſtants in Ireland in a very low condition (l), the city of Dublin in ſo weak a ſtate, that, to excite the diligence of the ſoldiers and inhabitants to fortify it, the Marchioneſs of Ormond, and other Ladies of the firſt quality, carried baſkets of earth to the works with their own hands (m). Under theſe circumſtances the Marquis entered into a treaty with the Commiſſioners from the Parliament of England, but was far from being haſty therein, that the Iriſh might have time to conſider coolly of their own intereſts, and the duty they owed to their Sovereign. This had in ſome meaſure its effect. Some overtures were made and received; but their fickleneſs and inſincerity put it out of the Lord Lieutenant's power to deal with them (n), and he was at laſt compelled to ſign a treaty with the Parliament's Commiſſioners, which he did on the nineteenth of June 1647, on the beſt terms (o) that he could poſſibly obtain [K]. In purſuance of this treaty, on the twenty-eighth of July, he left the Regalia to be delivered to the Commiſſioners, and embarking on board Captain Matthew Wood's frigate, was tranſported to England, and landed on the ſecond of Auguſt at Briſtol (p). He went from thence to Acton in Glouceſterſhire, the ſeat of his uncle Sir Rober Pointz, and from thence, as ſoon as he could obtain Sir Thomas Fairfax's paſs, to London. As ſoon as he had permiſſion from thoſe who were then in power, he went to pay his duty to his Majeſty at Hampton-Court, to whom he gave in writing a clear and diſtinct account of his proceedings in Ireland, which when his Majeſty had conſidered at his leiſure, he fully and in every part approved; and upon the Marquis's offering to reſign his commiſſion, refuſed it (q), adding, that if it could be ever employed with ſucceſs in that kingdom, it muſt be by him. He gave his Majeſty his advice upon the then ſtate of his affairs, and attended him as long as he was ſo permitted: but finding public concerns running daily more and more into confuſion, his private circumſtances much embarraſſed, and his perſon in danger, he judged it neceſſary to provide for his own ſafety, and accordingly, December 25, 1647 (r), embarked for France. On his arrival there, he applied his thoughts more immediately to Ireland, and finding that all had happened there which he foreſaw, from the violence of the Nuncio, who had rendered himſelf odious even to all the diſcreet men of his own party, he ſet on foot new ſchemes for the bringing back that kingdom to its duty, by engaging part of the army to declare for the King, and the better part of the Roman Catholics to join with them; which deſign he managed with ſuch ſecrecy and addreſs, that the Lord Inchiquin offered to receive him in Munſter, and the Catholics, that they might be the better able to cloſe with him, expelled the Nuncio (s). Having taken all the precautions he was able, for receiving aſſiſtance from France, he ſet out from Paris, went to ſee his family at Caen in Normandy, and from thence embarking on board a cyder-boat of Havre de Grace, very narrowly miſſed being drowned (t) by a ſhip-wreck, procured by his own impatience [L]. With much ado he got on board a Dutch man of war, attended by the Earls of [K] On the beſt terms that he could poſſibly obtain.] The reader may find theſe articles at large in the Appendix to Cox's Hiſtory of Ireland; and upon reading them it muſt be readily owned, that they were ſuch as none but the Marquis of Ormond could have procured from thoſe who granted them (27). As this negociation had taken up a great deal of time, and as the preſervation of Dublin was, during all that time, chiefly owing to the ſupplies which the Lord Lieutenant procured on his own credit, there was, amongſt other articles, a very reaſonable one for his being reimburſed; which, however, gave his enemies, of whom he had always enow, ſome handle for aſperſing him. The Earl of Clarendon has cleared up this matter in very few words (28). 'Since upon 'the moſt ſtrict and impartial examination of thoſe 'proceedings, malice itſelf cannot fix a colourable 'imputation upon the Marquis, of the want of that 'fidelity and diſcretion which was requiſite to pre'ſerve his Majeſty's intereſt, or of any abſence of a 'ſingular affection and compaſſion towards the people, 'who have the honour to be of the ſame nation with 'him, they endeavoured to get it believed by dark 'and obſcure expreſſions, that in the articles he made 'before the delivery of Dublin, he intended his 'own particular benefit and advantage, and objected 'to him, that he conſented to have thirteen thou'ſand pounds paid to his own uſe and behoof, and 'that the ſame was paid by them, and received by 'him accordingly; and ſo they would perſuade the 'world, that the perſon which frankly expoſed the 'greateſt fortune and eſtate that any ſubject had in 'either of the three kingdoms, and who, while he 'was poſſeſſed of any part of it, made all worthy men 'in want owners of it with him, could betray a truſt 'for a vile ſum of money, and could be ſo ſottiſh as 'to make that infamous bargain, and inſert it into 'the articles which were to be viewed and peruſed 'by all men; whereas he might as eaſily have driven 'that traffic with ſuch ſecreſy, that it could never 'have been diſcovered if he had meant it ſhould be 'ſecret.' His Lordſhip then proceeds to ſhew, in what manner the money, raiſed by the Marquis of Ormond, was applied in the ſupport of Dublin, and other garriſons; how that account was audited by Sir James Ware; and how thoroughly ſatisfied the Parliament Commiſſioners were, that not one penny of this ſum could be acquired by, or come into the pocket of, the Marquis of Ormond, who diſpoſed of it immediately for the payment of debts he had contracted for thoſe ſervices.

of Roſcommon and Caſtlehaven, with many other perſons of diſtinction, and arrived ſafely at Cork September 9, 1648. He wrote from thence to the General Aſſembly of the Catholics at Kilkenny, and invited them to treat with him for a peace, to which they ſhewed themſelves very ſincerely inclined, and prevailed upon him to come to his own caſtle at Kilkenny, allowing him guards for his ſecurity; and the peace being concluded, was preſented to him by the hands of the Speaker of that Aſſembly, on the ſeventeenth of January following (u). There now ſeemed to be greater hopes than ever, of the revival and recovery of the Royal Authority in that kingdom. But that old intractable rebel, Owen O'Neile, who had revived that fatal diſtinction amongſt the Catholics, of the Old Engliſh and the Old Iriſh, refuſed to ſubmit to the peace, and all the creatures of the Nuncio and the bigotted Iriſh adhered to him (w). About this time the news of the King's being beheaded reached Ireland, and was received with ſuch univerſal abhorrence, that the Lord Lieutenant ſaw plainly, the whole Iſland might be brought to acknowledge King Charles II. whom he cauſed to be immediately proclaimed, if O'Neile could be brought over in time (x). But his endeavours upon this head proved ineffectual, as did alſo another attempt of his to gain over Jones and Coot; and though to outward appearance the King's affairs in Ireland looked fair and promiſing, yet the Lord Lieutenant quickly found that it was impoſſible to ſhake the reſolution of his open and declared enemies; and at the ſame time there appeared but too many good reaſons to doubt, whether he might ſafely rely upon the aſſurances of many of his pretended friends (y) [M]. Under all theſe perplexities, amongſt which this was not the leaſt, that a fair underſtanding was grown up between the Parliament Party, and the Old Iriſh under Owen O'Neile, he formed the great and generous deſign of attacking Dublin; in order to which, he had by continual ſkirmiſhes, whereby he ruined the Engliſh horſe, and by the aſſiſtance of his friends, and his own perſonal poſed to ride poſt down to the ferry oppoſite to Havre de Grace: But having rode the firſt ſtage to Dive, he there met the Maſter of an half-decked boat laden with cyder, who promiſed to convey him that evening to Havre; and the Marquis having with him a new book, which he was deſirous of reading by the way, he and his ſervant, for all the reſt of his company were gone before, went on board that ſmall veſſel. The wind turned, and ſat ſo croſs, that they were all night on the water. Towards morning the wind blew very high, and the Maſter being at a loſs, aſked the Marquis of Ormond what hour it was by his watch. The Marquis's impatience to be on ſhore, betrayed him into an error, that had like to have proved fatal to him, and, indeed, occaſioned the loſs of the veſſel. He told the Maſter, it was an hour later than, in fact, it was. This made the man ſo miſcount his tide, that he ran upon the flats, the boat was ſplit, and the Marquis, with ſome difficulty, eſcaped in the cock-boat, which brought him ſo near the ſhore, that men waded into the water, and carried him to land on their ſhoulders. This happening on a Sunday morning, when all people were at church, thoſe helps were wanting, which otherwiſe might have ſaved the cyder-boat (29).

(29) This account is taken from Sir Robert Southwell's Narrative.

[M] The aſſurances of many of his pretended friends.] It is not eaſy to conceive or deſcribe the ſituation of the Lord Lieutenant at this juncture. He returned into the kingdom without either men or money; and though he found numbers convinced of their paſt miſtakes, and making ſtrong profeſſions of obedience for the future, yet, at the ſame time, there were powerful enemies in different parts of the kingdom. The city of Dublin was in the hands of Colonel Michael Jones, who commanded the Parliament's forces: and beſides that, and other neighbouring garriſons, Colonel Monck was in poſſeſſion of Dundalk and other places, and the ſame party had alſo a ſtrong garriſon in Londonderry (30). Owen O'Neile had an army of near ſix thouſand men compoſed of the old Iriſh, who were wholly at his devotion; and though he always entertained ſome kind of correſpondence with the Lord Lieutenant, yet he was, at the ſame time, treating with Colonel Monk, and other officers of the Parliament party. In England, Oliver Cromwell had been appointed Commander in Chief for the reduction of Ireland, the very fame of which kept up the ſpirits of the rebels, and terrified many that were well affected. At the ſame time, the Lord Lieutenant was controuled by the Commiſſioners appointed by the aſſembly at Kilkenny: the diſputes about command in his own army, kept him in conſtant employment, and it was with great difficulty he found means to adjuſt them. Some alſo of Lord Inchiquin's officers were diſcontented, and this once roſe ſo high as a mutiny at Cork, to appeaſe which the Lord Lieutenant was obliged to go thither in perſon. But what is moſt ſurpriſing, Prince Rupert, who, with part of the fleet that had revolted from the Parliament, was all this time on the Iriſh coaſt; inſtead of giving the Marquis any aſſiſtance, as he might have done, created freſh uneaſineſs by his intrigues with all parties; attended with an apparent jealouſy of, and diſlike to, the Lord Lieutenant, flowing from motives of ambition and ſelf-conceit. Againſt ſo many open and concealed enemies, it was a difficult thing to make proviſion; and yet, for ſome time, the Lord Lieutenant did it with ſucceſs. Owed O'Neile, though he had a good army, wanted ammunition, and thereupon applied to Colonel Monk; who, upon his undertaking to make a diverſion, by cutting off the Marquis of Ormond's ſubſiſtence, promiſed to ſupply him with powder, bullet, and match; to receive which, O'Neile ſent Lieutenant General O'Farrel with a detachment of five hundred horſe; but Lord Inchiquin having intelligence of this, met O'Farrel in his return, routed and deſtroyed his detachment, took the whole convoy, beſieged Dundalk, and, in two days, obliged Monk to ſurrender; by which all the magazines in that place fell into the hands of the Royaliſts (31). This, though it put out of the power of O'Neile to perform what he had promiſed, yet did not hinder him from making a new agreement for relieving Londonderry, for which he had two thouſand pounds in money, a great quantity of ammunition, and two thouſand cows, and this ſervice he performed; ſo that, when it was to ſerve their own turns, the Parliament made no ſcruple at all of deriving aſſiſtance from the moſt guilty of the Iriſh rebels, and the avowed enemies of the Engliſh name and nation. The jealouſies in the Lord Lieutenant's army ſtill ſubſiſted; Cromwell was continually ſending over freſh emiſſaries to ſow ſedition and diſaffection; all the parties in Ireland had their particular views, which they continued to purſue at the expence of the public intereſt, which was the ſole care of the Lord Lieutenant; and it was the ſteadineſs he ſhewed in adhering to it, beyond all other conſiderations, that raiſed him ſo many enemies, who were continually plotting and contriving to defeat all his deſigns; and, in order to it, ſcrupled not to make uſe of any meaſures. Upon this view, therefore, of the ſituation of his affairs, the reader will eaſily judge of the care and perplexity he muſt be in; and if he be inclined to enter into all the particulars of his conduct, and to receive full ſatisfaction as to the grounds of theſe aſſertions, he need only conſult the Earl of Clarendon's elaborate work, in which he will find every ſtep of the Lord Lieutenant's management fully cleared and effectually vindicated (32).

credit in Ireland, raiſed money enough to keep together a very conſiderable body of forces, though, as he apprehended, ſcarcely ſufficient for the execution of ſo great a ſcheme (z). He came, however, before that city, with an army conſiſting of two thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot, excluſive of the forces under the Lord Dillon of Coſtillo, which were on the North ſide, and conſiſted of two thouſand foot and five hundred horſe. But while they were thus employed, they could not hinder the coming in of a great ſupply from England, conſiſting of two thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, under the command of the Colonels Reynolds and Venables (a). The Lord Lieutenant was extremely apprehenſive of Jones's making a ſally from the city, in which his forces were now become very near as numerous as thoſe that formed the ſiege, and therefore he was inclined to retire: But the Iriſh troops having been hitherto very ſucceſsful, ſince they were under his command, apprehended that nothing could oppoſe them; and, therefore, they deſired that a body of forces might be ſent to ſecure Baggatrath, in order to prevent any new ſuccours from entering the place (b). But while they were buſy in this, Jones, as the Lord Lieutenant apprehended, ſallied out of the city with four thouſand foot and twelve hundred horſe, and attacked the royal army, which was not in the beſt order, with ſuch fury, that notwithſtanding all the Lord Lieutenant could do, in point both of courage or conduct, and he gave very noble inſtances of both, yet they were totally routed with very great loſs of men; and all their baggage, tents, and artillery, fell into the enemies hands (c). This was the fatal battle of Rathmines, the loſs of which totally deſtroyed the hopes of the Lord Lieutenant, and threw the affairs of Ireland into greater confuſion than ever: yet ſuch was his preſence of mind, that in his retreat he took the important Fortreſs of Balyſonan, making the Governor believe that Dublin had ſurrendered; by which he covered Kilkenny, and ſoon after forced Jones to raiſe the ſiege of Drogheda (d). There wanted not ſome malicious people, who would have thrown the ſcandal of this great loſs upon the Lord Lieutenant; but the honeſteſt and beſt informed amongſt the Iriſh Papiſts have not only acquitted him on this head, but have fairly owned, that the chief cauſe of the defeat was the army's being betrayed by Edmund Reily, afterwards the Popiſh Archbiſhop of Armagh (e) [N]. The Lord Lieutenant, to repair in ſome meaſure this great misfortune, renewed his treaty with Owen O'Neile, and having ſhewn him in a clear light his own danger, brought him to conclude it, and promiſe to join him with an army of ſix thouſand foot and five hundred horſe; but before he could execute this, he was taken off by poiſon (f). In the mean time Oliver Cromwell landed with his army at Dublin, about the middle of Auguſt, having eight thouſand foot, four thouſand horſe, and two hundred thouſand pounds in ready money. He entered immediately after his arrival upon action, and advanced without delay to Drogheda, into which place the Lord Lieutenant had thrown a garriſon of two thouſand three hundred men of his beſt troops, under the command of Sir Arthur Aſton, while himſelf endeavoured to collect an army ſufficient to relieve it. Cromwell came before the place on the third of September, and receiving his heavy cannon by ſea, began to batter it on the ninth; and having made a breach that was practicable by the eleventh, he cauſed it to be attacked, carried it that day by aſſault, and with infinite barbarity put to death all that he found therein, which ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Iriſh as could never be worn off (g). A little before this time, King Charles II. ſent the Lord Lieutenant the Garter by Mr. Seymour. The growth of the enemies power, and the diviſions that happened among his own forces, put it entirely out of his power to raiſe an army ſufficient to look Cromwell in the face: But notwithſtanding this, and the deep diſtreſs he was in for want of money, he made a ſhift to force him to raiſe the ſiege of Duncannon, and kept him for ſome time from enlarging his conqueſts. But what Cromwell was notable to effect by force, he knew how to bring about by other means; and having debauched part of Lord In-[N] Edmund Reily, afterwards the Popiſh Biſhop of Armagh.] This Edmund Reily was, at this time, Vicar-General of Dublin, and had been engaged in a long ſeries of moſt iniquitous negociations between Colonel Michael Jones, the Marquis of Antrim, and Owen O'Neile (33). About four years after this, he was one of the chief authors of a moſt vile and deteſtable action, which was, the burning the black caſtle of Wicklow, and cauſing the people that were in it to be murdered, during the time of a ceſſation; for which inhuman barbarity he would infallibly have ſuffered death, had he not claimed the merit of this other infamous action, of betraying the Marquis of Ormond's army at this fatal action of Rathmines; which ſervice to the rebels he ſo fully made out, that he ſaved his life (34). Yet for all this, we have no very clear relation of the manner in which this act of treachery was committed; but from laying circumſtances together, it ſeems to have been thus: The poſt of Baggatrath was ſo ſituated, as to command a meadow under the walls of Dublin, in which the rebels grazed their horſes, and beſides, lay ſo conveniently towards the river, that by drawing a line from thence, and fortifying it, all future ſupplies might have been cut off, as well as the horſes ſtarved. The Lord Lieutenant detached fifteen hundred men for this ſervice, and they marched on the 1ſt of Auguſt at the fall of night; but though the place was not quite a mile off, yet their Popiſh guides ſo managed the matter, as that the detachment did not reach the ground they were to fortify, till an hour before day. It is therefore very likely, that Reily's treachery conſiſted in corupting theſe guides, and giving notice to the enemy of the march of the detachment; for before they had time to fortify themſelves, they were attacked by the rebels. But notwithſtanding all this, and his future behaviour at Wicklow, this very man was made choice of, by the Pope, to be afterwards Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland; which is an inconteſtable proof of Popiſh perfidy, and of the ſmall concern the ſubjects of that religion had for the ſervice of their Sovereign.

chiquin's forces, he thereby weakened the Lord Lieutenant's power extremely (b). The Biſhops and Clergy began now to revive their clamour, and to pretend that no good was to be expected ſo long as affairs were directed by Ormond; and their intrigues had ſuch an effect, that at laſt it was openly inſiſted upon, that the Lord Lieutenant ſhould leave Ireland; which, excepting the concern he had for the intereſt of the King, and his ſubjects that were ſtill faithful, was agreeable enough to his inclination; and therefore, when he found he could no longer be uſeful to either, he declared the Marquis of Clanrickard Lord Deputy, and embarked December 5, 1650, for France, carrying with him the Lord Inchiquin, Colonel Wogan, and about forty officers (i). The Marquis landed very ſafely in France, and went the beginning of the year following to Paris, where he attended the Queen-Mother and the Duke of York, till the arrival of his Majeſty, after his unfortunate defeat at Worceſter. His finances being now in a very diſordered condition, the King in no condition to aſſiſt him, and the Parliament about to ſhare all the lands in Ireland, belonging to perſons who had fought againſt them, amongſt thoſe that were ſtiled Adventurers, it was found abſolutely neceſſary to ſend the Marchioneſs over, to try if ſhe could not obtain from the Parliament of England an exemption of her own eſtate, that they might have ſomething to ſubſiſt upon (k). After her departure the Marquis fell into great ſtraits, and might have fallen into greater, if the nobility of France had not ſhowed him great civilities, and freely invited him to ſpend ſome time at their houſes, where he was treated with all poſſible kindneſs and reſpect. One of theſe invitations was attended with an adventure, the circumſtances of which were ſo entertaining, that I am perſuaded the reader will be pleaſed to ſee them in the notes (l) [O]. While he was thus in needy circumſtances abroad, the Marchioneſs ſtruggled through very great difficulties at home. She did, indeed, in the beginning of 1653, procure an order of Parliament for the ſettling upon her two thouſand pounds a year, together with Dunmore-houſe near Kilkenny, for the ſubſiſtence of herſelf and family; but ſhe found ſo many obſtructions in the carrying this order into execution, that it was about two years before ſhe got that matter fully ſettled; and then ſhe went over and reſided at Dunmore, after ſhe had ſent her two ſons to Holland, and never ſaw her Huſband till after the King's reſtoration (m). It is certain, that the Marquis had as great a ſhare in the King's confidence as any man, and hardly ever quitted his attendance on his perſon during the time of his exile. When Cardinal Mazarine, to oblige Cromwell, conſtrained his Majeſty to leave France, he went for Spaw, where meeting with his ſiſter the Princeſs of Orange, they went to Aix la Chapelle, and from thence to Cologne, where the King ſtaid for ſome time (n). It was here that his Majeſty had an account of the ill uſage his brother, the Duke of Glouceſter, met with from the Queen-Mother, in order to force him to change his religion; and this engaged the King to think of bringing him to Cologne, with the care of which the Marquis of Ormond was intruſted, and he performed it with great ſteadineſs and ſpirit. He went afterwards to the Hague to fetch the Princeſs of Orange, and on his return attended his Majeſty, her Royal Highneſs, and the Duke of Glouceſter, to the fair of Frankfort, and on that occaſion was preſent at Koningſtein, at an interview between his Maſter and Queen Chriſtina of Sweden, who, whatever reſpect ſhe might pay him, had been no friend to his family (o). The Marquis was afterwards intruſted with a negociation, in which the King engaged with the Duke of Newburgh, by whoſe aſſiſtance it was hoped he might conclude an advantageous treaty with Spain. This, however, went on [O] Will be pleaſed to ſee them in the notes.] A French nobleman of great quality having invited the Marquis of Ormond to his houſe at St. Germain en Laye (35), entertained him there for ſome time, in a manner perfectly ſuitable to his own rank, and that of his gueſt. At his coming away, the Marquis, in compliance with a very inconvenient Engliſh cuſtom, left with the Maître d'Hôtel ten piſtoles to be diſtributed among the ſervants. It was all the money he had, nor did he know how to get credit for more when he reached Paris. As he was upon the road, ruminating on this melancholy circumſtance, and contriving how to raiſe a ſmall ſupply for preſent uſe, he was ſurpriſed to be advertiſed by his ſervant, that the nobleman, at whoſe houſe he had been, was behind driving furiouſly, as if he was deſirous to overtake him. The Marquis had ſcarcely left St. Germain, when the diſtribution of the money he had given cauſed a great diſturbance among the ſervants, who exalting their own ſervices and attendance, complained of the Maître de Hôtel's partiality. The nobleman hearing an unuſual noiſe in his family, and, upon enquiry into the matter, finding what it was, took the ten piſtoles himſelf, and cauſing horſes to be put to his chariot, made all the haſte that was poſſible after the Marquis of Ormond. The Marquis, upon notice of his approach, got off his horſe, as the other quitted his chariot, and advanced to embrace him with great affection and reſpect; but was ſtrangely ſurpriſed to find a coldneſs in the nobleman which forbad all embraces, till he had received ſatisfaction in a point which had given him great offence. He aſked the Marquis, if he had reaſon to complain of any diſreſpect, or other defect, which he had met with in the too mean, but friendly, entertainment which his houſe afforded? And being anſwered by the Marquis, that his treatment had been full of civility; that he had never paſſed ſo many days more agreeably in his life; and could not but wonder why the other ſhould ſuſpect the contrary, the nobleman then told him, that the leaving ten piſtoles to be diſtributed among the ſervants, was treating his houſe as an inn, and was the greateſt affront that could be offered to a man of quality; that he paid his own ſervants well, and had hired them to wait on his friends as well as himſelf; that he conſidered him as a ſtranger that might be unacquainted with the cuſtoms of France, and err through ſome practice deemed leſs diſhonourable in his own country, otherwiſe his reſentment ſhould have prevented any expoſtulation; but as the caſe ſtood, after having explained the nature of the affair, he muſt either redreſs the miſtake by receiving back the ten piſtoles, or give him the uſual ſatisfaction of men of honour for an avowed affront. The Marquis acknowledged his error, took back his money, and returned to Paris with leſs anxiety about his ſubſiſtence.

but slowly, till Don Juan of Austria was declared Governor of the Spanish Low-Countries, and even then his Majesty procured but indifferent terms. Such as they were, however, it was thought requisite to draw over the Irish regiments from the French service to the Spanish; and this, by the industry of the Marquis, was effectually performed. They were formed into six regiments, and the Marquis had one of them; and by his interest also the town of St. Ghislain, in which the French had a garrison, was delivered up to the Spaniards in the beginning of the year 1657, a service of great importance, considering the vicinity of that place to Brussels (p). But notwithstanding all the services the King's subjects rendered to the Spaniards, they were not very forward in making returns, which was chiefly owing to the accounts given by Cardenas, their Minister in England; which meeting with entire credit from Don Juan, he expressed some diffidence of the interest of the King's friends in England (q). To clear up this point, the Marquis of Ormond offered to go over and gain an exact account of the state of things in that kingdom, which he performed with infinite hazard to himself, and returned in safety, after running through almost incredible dangers [P]. There

[P] After running through almost incredible dangers.] It is but reasonable to explain the cause that induced the Marquis of Ormond to undertake this perilous journey, before we mention his narrow escapes therein. The Spaniards had promised to furnish the King with six thousand men, whenever he was master of a port in England to receive them: there were also many gentlemen in England of family and fortune, that had offered their services to his Majesty; whence it seemed to be no rash, or ill-founded, scheme to hope, that an insurrection might be raised, and such a port secured (36). It was to look into the bottom of this business, and, if it was found practicable, to put things in motion, that the Marquis undertook this journey, which was covered by a pretence of his returning into Germany, to resume his negociations with the Duke of Newburgh, that his absence from the King might be accounted for, and Cromwell's spies (37) abroad be the less capable of giving him any information. Instead of going to Germany, the Marquis went directly into Holland; and hiring a small vessel at Scheveling, passed over into England, where he landed, in the beginning of February 1657, at Westmarsh, seven miles from Colchester in Essex, from whence he travelled up to London. His first lodging was at a Popish Surgeon's in Drury-lane (38), where he had not been long, before he took the freedom of asking his Landlord, if he had not a private place in his house to hide a Priest in? He answered in the negative; adding, that his house was the worst in the world for such a person to lodge in, because it was often searched, as all the houses were in two or three streets thereabouts. He took the hint immediately, paid his landlord, and decamped without delay; and very luckily; for that very night the Surgeon's house, and several others in the neighbourhood, were very closely searched. He went next to a French Taylor's in Black-Friars, where he was once alarmed to such a degree, that he was getting out of the garret-window; but finding it was only some workmen that ran hastily up stairs late on the Saturday night, to remove their tools before Sunday morning, he returned to his bed, where he slept in his clothes, that he might never be taken unprovided; and this precaution, and making himself well acquainted with all the back-ways, he used all the time he continued in England. This, indeed, was no more than he found necessary: for he had not been a week in town, before Cromwell had notice of it (39), and mentioned it to the Earl of Orrery. He went next to lodge in Old Fish-street, where he was somewhat more at his ease: he there took the name of Pickering, and passed for a disbanded officer. Finding a wig troublesome, and but an indifferent disguise, his friend Colonel Leg, to whom he complained of it, furnished him with a water to turn his own hair black; but either there was too much aquafortis in the mixture, or the Marquis applied it unskilfully; for instead of having the intended effect, it changed his hair of several colours, and besides, scalded his head to such a degree, as gave him a great deal of trouble. The Marquis ventured his person very freely, during the time he stayed, and saw all sorts of persons, that had manifested any inclinations for his Majesty's service, more especially in the city; where being introduced by Sir Philip Honeywood, to a company of some low, and all but middling sort of people, as a person for whom he would answer, and who was going to the King, they absolutely refused to say any thing, unless to some person of character and consideration, upon whom they might depend: upon which, he, to remove that difficulty, frankly discovered himself, but met with nothing in return, but general assurances, which might have been as well given, without his running that hazard (40). He afterwards met the sealed knot, as they were called, or Sir Richard Willis's club, once, in Colonel Russel's chambers, in Bedford garden; and at another time, at Sir Richard Willis's chambers, in Gray's Inn, where, however, nothing passed of moment, most of those gentlemen being persuaded, that any attempt to be made then, must be attended with insuperable difficulties, which were largely set forth by Sir Richard, who was all this while betraying them to Cromwell (41). The Marquis entered also into all the particular and private engagements of gentlemen, who were well affected; but seeing nothing that could encourage him to hope any good consequences from such a general insurrection, as had been meditated before his arrival, he advised laying all thoughts of it aside, and having stayed a month on this side the water, was conducted by Dr. Quartermaine, the King's Physician, into Sussex, and embarking at Shoreham in a small shallop, passed very safely over to Dieppe (42). It is very certain, that never any man ran through more dangers in so small a space than he did; for though at first his departure was mistaken by Cromwell's emissaries abroad, who thought he had left the King, as they phrased it, in a pet (43), yet they very soon penetrated the true design of his journey, and gave notice of it accordingly (44). Secretary Thurloe had several notices of his arrival, and of his transactions; but though he was indefatigable in searching for him, it was without success. On this occasion, Sir Richard Willis acted with great dexterity in his dangerous employment of a double spy, for he gave the Marquis notice to shift his lodgings in the morning, and in the evening gave Cromwell notice where those lodgings were. By this he at that time gained credit with both; for the Marquis finding his lodgings searched, gave him all the honour of his escape; and Cromwell finding the Marquis had been really there in the morning, looked upon Sir Richard's intelligence as well founded (45). Yet, by a comparison of circumstances, I cannot help thinking, that Cromwell was neither displeased with his journey nor his escape, for it gave a large field to his spies, and afforded a colour for setting on foot a most violent persecution, and erecting a new High Court of Justice, of which Lisle was the President. Before this bloody tribunal numbers were brought, many were tried, and few escaped. Sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewitt were beheaded, four persons of meaner quality were hanged, drawn, and quartered, and others were imprisoned (46) as long as Cromwell lived. The Marquis was not much safer at Paris than he had been at London, for Cromwell sent notice to Cardinal Mazarine of his being there, and insisted on his causing him to be apprehended; which he would certainly have done, if he had not been deceived in his intelligence, by which he

There were about this time ſome favourable hopes of the Dutch, and not without reaſon, ſince it is certain that John de Witt was well affected to His Majeſty, and inclined, ſo far as was conſiſtent with the ſecurity of his own country (r), to do him ſervice. So, indeed, the moſt conſiderable people in Holland were, and as for the populace, they never diſſembled their good affections. To promote theſe, the Marquis of Ormond entered into a treaty of marriage for his ſon the Earl of Oſſory, with a daughter of the Sieur de Beverweert, natural ſon of Maurice Prince of Orange (s), which ſoon after took effect; and though this may ſeem entirely a family tranſaction, yet it was attended with circumſtances as pregnant with affection and loyalty to his maſter, as any tranſaction of his whole life (t). He was ſoon after engaged in ſeveral other ſchemes for his Majeſty's ſervice; and when it was thought requiſite that a right underſtanding ſhould be reſtored with the Queen-Mother, the Marquis of Ormond was diſpatched to Paris to bring it about, and had all the ſucceſs that could be deſired in his negociation (u). He afterwards attended his Majeſty in his journey to Fontarabia, and had there a long conference with Cardinal Mazarine, who made it a point not to ſee the King; which, however, had no other conſequence, than confirming the Marquis in his notions of the inſincerity and bad principles of that Miniſter, whom he both diſliked and deſpiſed (w). On his return, things began to change their face in England, and Monk beginning his march from the North, the Marquis of Ormond was one of the firſt that formed a true notion of his deſign; and, not long after, Sir George Downing, who had been Cromwell's Miniſter to the States of Holland, deſired a conference with the Marquis, and therein gave him all the lights he could. When the General ſent over Sir John Grenvile to the King, the Marquis of Ormond was let into the ſecret, and had as great a ſhare in the tranſactions, which immediately preceded the King's return, as any man about him, without exception. When all things were fixed for that purpoſe, as he had attended his Majeſty during his long exile, he accompanied him alſo into England, where he was immediately ſworn of the Privy-Council, and made Lord Steward of the Houſehold (y). He was ſoon after appointed Lord Lieutenant of Somerſetſhire, and High-Steward of Weſtminſter, Kingſton, and Briſtol, and reſtored to his office of Chancellor of the Univerſity of Dublin: neither was it long before the King gave him farther marks of affection and eſteem, by reſtoring and augmenting the County Palatine of Tipperary, which his family had never enjoyed from the time of its being ſeized by King James (z). He was alſo created Baron of Lanthony and Earl of Brecknock (a), and very particular regard was ſhewn by the Parliament alſo in reſpect to his eſtates; to all which the King, likewiſe, added ſome grants that brought him both honour and advantage [Q]. he was perſuaded that the Marquis was gone to Scotland (47). One may gueſs at the Marquis's apprehenſion by the road he took to join the King again in Flanders; for he went in three days poſt to Lyons, from thence to Geneva, then paſſing through the Palatinate, and down the Rhine, made the Duke of Newburgh a viſit at Duſſeldorp, and from thence, about the middle of May, 1658, came to his Majeſty at Bruſſels (48).

[Q] Added ſome grants that brought him both honour and advantage.] Theſe grants were by letters patents under the great Seal, dated October 8, 1660, by which all the reſerved rents of his eſtates and the priſage of wines which he enjoyed as Butler of Ireland, were put out of charge in the Exchequer, and all arrears which were due before April, were ordered to be paid to the Marquis, who had likewiſe granted to him all his debts by bills, bonds, ſtatutes merchant, and of the ſtaple, or otherwiſe due to perſons, who had forfeited, all which being by ſuch forfeiture devolved to the crown, were now ordered to be diſcharged (49). His Majeſty, likewiſe, made him a grant of all the lands which had been formerly, by the Marquis himſelf, or by any of his anceſtors, Earls of Ormond and Oſſory, mortgaged, granted, demiſed, leaſed, or let to farm, in fee farm, fee-tail, lives or years, and which were forfeited by the having an hand in the late rebellion, directing commiſſions to be iſſued for finding his Majeſty's title to the premiſes; and upon return thereof, letters patents to be paſſed to the Marquis for the ſame (50). The King's letters were alſo ſent for putting him in poſſeſſion of the reſt of his eſtate reſtored to him by the Parliament of England, with the following remarkable preamble ſuppoſed to be drawn by Secretary Nicholas, which the reader cannot but judge worthy of his notice, as making a very material part of the perſonal hiſtory of this illuſtrious nobleman (51).

Majeſty's coronation, he was raiſed to the dignity of Duke of Ormond, and was created Lord High Steward of England, on account of that ſolemnity, at which he aſſiſted in that high office (b). On the fourth of October 1662, he was declared Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which was ſo ſatisfactory to that kingdom, that the Parliament made his Grace a preſent of thirty thouſand pounds (c); and, at the ſame time that his Grace ſent a letter of acknowledgment to the Houſe of Commons for this high and extraordinary favour, Secretary Nicholas acquainted the Lords Juſtices, that his Majeſty conſidered that act of the Parliament as a mark of affection to himſelf. The King's marriage hindered the Duke's going over to Ireland ſo early as he intended, and he did not arrive there till the twenty-ſeventh of July; yet he was ſo active and vigorous in the diſpatch of buſineſs, that he paſſed the Act of Settlement, and ſome other neceſſary laws, on the twenty-ſeventh of September, by which, order and good government in that kingdom were reſtored (d). His Grace had not been long in poſſeſſion of his great employment, before he found himſelf involved in new troubles and dangers. The Exchequer was empty, the army had great arrears, the Act of Uniformity excited great diſguſt among the fanatics, which ſoon after produced a dangerous conſpiracy for ſurpriſing the Caſtle of Dublin and ſeizing the Duke; but this was diſappointed by his vigilance, aſſiſted by the informations he received from his friends, as we have already had occaſion to ſhow in another place (e). He had beſides ſome other, and thoſe too very conſiderable, diſcouragements. Sir Henry Bennet, lately made Secretary of State, grew upon that promotion very cool towards him: the Counteſs of Caſtlemain, the King's miſtreſs, begged Phœnix-Park and Houſe; but his Grace ſtopped the warrant, which drew upon him her diſpleaſure; and the Queen-Mother, having taken the Marquis of Antrim under her protection, took occaſion to differ with the Duke of Ormond upon that nobleman's account (f). Theſe things, however, made no alteration in his conduct, and by degrees he got over moſt of the obſtacles, to the reſettling the tranquillity of that iſland. A ſum of money was remitted him which quieted the army, and a ſmall ſuccour of five hundred well affected men ſtrengthened his ſecurity, which was farther augmented by making a conſiderable draught from the Iriſh army, for the ſervice of Portugal (g). All things being now in a ſtate of tolerable quietneſs, his Grace, with the King's permiſſion, appointed his ſon, the Earl of Oſſory, Lord Deputy, and came over to England in May 1664 (h), and was received with great kindneſs by the King. He was far from being idle here; for as there were great complaints made of the Act of Settlement by different parties, the regulating of theſe fell in a great meaſure to the ſhare of the Duke, and it was chiefly through his care and indefatigable labours, that the Act of Explanation was framed and ſettled; and as ſoon as this was done he thought of returning to Ireland, where he landed on the third of September 1665 (i). The Parliament met in October following, and the great buſineſs of that ſeſſion, was the paſſing the Act before mentioned, which was happily effected, though not without great difficulty. The diſcontents that prevailed among the army, which was but ill principled towards the government, were daily increaſed by want of pay; ſo that at length they ſhewed themſelves mutinous, to a degree that broke out at laſt in an open inſurrection at Carrickfergus, which, however, was ſuppreſſed by the Duke's diſpatching his ſon, the Earl of Arran, with four companies of guards by ſea the very night he received the news, and the flame hindered from extending itſelf by the Duke's marching thither in perſon (k). By the like care and activity, other deſigns of the Malecontents were defeated, and the kingdom kept tolerably quiet. He made uſe of all his intereſt in England, in order to prevent the paſſing an Act for prohibiting the importation of Iriſh cattle, but to no purpoſe; for the Duke of Buckingham's party made a point of it and carried it (l). He foreſaw all the ill conſequences that attended this law, and did what he could to prevent them, and to find out various methods to balance them [R]. The cloſe friendſhip

'ing the time he commanded the army, and before 'he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and from that 'time he was by our Royal Father put into the ſu'preme command of that kingdom; and during the 'whole time that he had the adminiſtration thereof, 'he hath never received any of the profits, emolu'ments, or appointments thereof, but wholly ſup'ported himſelf and our ſervice upon his own for'tune and inheritance, and over and above borrow'ed and ſupplied great ſums of money upon the 'engagement or ſale of his own lands, and diſburſed 'the ſame upon carrying on the public ſervice, as 'well during the time of his firſt being there under 'our Royal Father, as ſince under us.' It muſt be a great ſatisfaction to the Marquis to be ſenſible, that this was not mere form, or the overflowings of a venal eloquence, but bare matters of fact, plainly told by one who knew them to be ſuch, and which, upon being either heard or read, would be ſo acknowledged by the moſt intelligent people in England and Ireland.

[R] And to find out various methods to balance them.] This act for the prohibiting of Iriſh cattle into England was a matter of very great importance to both nations; and though the ſubject was handled by the beſt heads, and the beſt pens, on both ſides of the water, yet it does not appear, that the real conſequences of this law (52) were diſcerned on either ſide. It took up the attention of both houſes, during two ſeſſions of Parliament, was puſhed with all imaginable vehemence, and ſupported with extraordinary clamour, on one ſide, and oppoſed with great vigour, with much ſhow of argument, and with many laboured computations, on the other. Yet, I think it very plainly appears from the event, that neither ſide was in the right. The truth of the matter ſeems to be, that the Duke of Buckingham and the reſt of the great patrons of this law were of opinion, friendſhip between his Grace and Lord Clarendon, drew upon him the hatred of all thoſe who ſtudied, and brought about the misfortune of that great man; and at the ſame time that they contrived this, they were endeavouring to find out pretences for impeaching the Duke of Ormond, in which, however, they were diſappointed (m). But the very rumour had bad effects, more eſpecially in Ireland, which was at that time in ſuch a ſituation, as made it but too eaſy for things of this nature to do miſchief. In the month of May 1668, his Grace came over to England, as well in obedience to the King's commands, as to take care of his concerns both public and private: when he drew near London, he was met by abundance of perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank and fortune, who, from a rare principle of generoſity, thought it became them to ſhow this mark of reſpect for the Duke, merely on account of thoſe rumours (n). He was well received by the King, and upon a very ſevere and ſtrict enquiry into his conduct, there appeared no ground for cenſure. Notwithſtanding this, an opinion generally prevailed that he would not long continue Lord Lieutenant, of which he ſpoke to the King in very pathetic terms, making uſe amongſt others of theſe, 'that though it would never 'trouble him to be undone for his Majeſty, yet it would be an inſupportable affliction 'to be undone by him (o).' The King gave him all the aſſurances in the world, and very probably meant as he ſpoke; but the Duke of Buckingham, who now governed all, made him ſo uneaſy that at length he reſolved to diſplace him, as he did in the ſpring of the year 1669 (p). John Lord Roberts of Truro, then Lord Privy-Seal, was appointed to ſucceed him, who behaved towards his Grace with all imaginable decency, as the Duke alſo did to him. When this news reached Ireland, it was very ill received; aud thoſe who had ſhewn coolneſs enough towards the Duke's adminiſtration, appeared to be very warmly affected by his being removed, and the diſcontents which this occaſioned increaſed afterwards very perceptibly (q). To balance the loſs of favour at Court, his Grace received a new and high office, merely from reſpect to his reputation. Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being very old and infirm, reſigned his poſt of Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and that learned Body, as a mark of their eſteem, unanimouſly elected the Duke of Ormond Auguſt 4, 1669 (r). Thoſe who had been inſtrumental in removing his Grace, could not bear to ſee him ſo popular; and, therefore, they had recourſe to all the arts that could be deviſed for tarniſhing his adminiſtration, and to make the world believe that he had raiſed a prodigious fortune at the expence of the public (s). His Grace took care to refute every thing of this kind in ſo full a manner, that little or no dirt ſtuck, and the world was particularly ſatisfied of the falſehood of what was ſuggeſted in reſpect to his private fortune [S]. His ſucceſſor, the Lord Roberts, was removed the year following, opinion, that it would diſtreſs the Iriſh exceedingly, that it would increaſe the diſcontents, and augment the difficulties in adminiſtering affairs in that iſland, which were already but too many, and conſequently perplex the Duke of Ormond, and his friends (53). There were alſo ſome particular advantages aimed at, by giving this trade to Scotland, which engaged the Earl of Lauderdale and Lord Aſhley to promote it, as well as private prejudices to be gratified, which drew in all the enemies to the Earl of Clarendon's adminiſtration; but the pretences uſed, were the preventing an immenſe loſs to the Engliſh nation, by the purchaſe of Iriſh cattle, which it was ſaid had ſunk the rents of England two hundred thouſand pounds a year, though the higheſt computation of the amount of Iriſh cattle, annually ſold in England, fell ſhort of one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds. On the other hand, thoſe who oppoſed the bill, fixing their attention entirely on the preſent benefits that accrued to Ireland (54) by this trade, which was almoſt the only one that Kingdom then had, looked upon it as a meaſure as ruinous on one ſide, as it was cruel on the other. Such as had eſtates or intereſts in Ireland, looked upon themſelves as deeply concerned in the event; and all the friends of the court, who knew that the King was in his judgment againſt this law, laboured with the utmoſt diligence to hinder it from paſſing. But after all, when this law came to take effect, its conſequences ſhowed them to be all miſtaken; for the pains and diligence employed by the Duke of Ormond, and all his friends, in ſupporting what they took to be Iriſh intereſt, endeared both him and them to that nation; ſo that the deſign of the party abſolutely miſcarried in that reſpect (55). As to the intereſt of the two nations, the Engliſh certainly were far enough from being hurt by this traffic; and the Iriſh, by the paſſing of this law, being obliged to look out for foreign markets, to feed ſheep, and to fall into manufactures; were ſo far from being hurt by it, that they derived ſeveral advantages from it (56), which otherwiſe they could never have attained to, and of which, few or none were foreſeen by their friends. The bill paſſed through the Houſe of Commons in the firſt ſeſſion in five days; and in the laſt ſeſſion the great queſtion was carried by one hundred and ſixty-five againſt one hundred ſixty-four; in the Houſe of Lords, the numbers were ſixty-three againſt forty-ſeven; and it was obſerved, that all the Biſhops were in the minority. The King had procured it to be once laid aſide, and had taken a reſolution never to paſs it; but was ſo much afraid of loſing his ſupplies, that he thought himſelf obliged to do it, though much againſt his will (57). As for the Duke of Ormond, he applied himſelf, on the one hand, to leſſen as far as he was able the great inconveniences that immediately enſued upon this law; and, on the other hand, to the promoting the ſtuff-manufactures and the linen trade, which he did with ſuch vigour, that in leſs than two year's time they became very conſiderable, which induced an excellent judge of the intereſt of Ireland to ſay (58), That poſterity would own their future affluence to be a bleſſing they derived from his Grace's great wiſdom and incomparable government.

[S] The falſehood of what was ſuggeſted in reſpect to his private fortune.] We have a very large account given us by Mr. Carte, of the libels that were publiſhed about this time againſt his Grace, which repreſented him as one who had made immenſe advantages, under colour of paſt ſervices, by dint of his great popularity in England and in Ireland, and by the high favour he ſtood in with the King his maſter. We are alſo furniſhed with all the anſwers that were given to theſe; but to take notice of either, would extend this article beyond its due bounds; and, therefore, we will content ourſelves with giving the reader a ſuccinct and very curious ſtate of the account between the Duke of Ormond and the public, which by that writer is thus repreſented (59):

(59) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. ii. p. 408, 409.

ing, and having in the mean time loſt his poſt of Privy-Seal in England, this diſguſted him ſo much that he reſolved to retire, as for ſome time he did, but was afterwards made Lord Preſident of the Privy-Council (t). The Lord Berkeley of Stratton was ſent over Lord Lieutenant in his room; and under his adminiſtration it was, that very extraordinary favours were granted to the worſt ſort of Iriſh Papiſts, which afterwards created much trouble in that kingdom. As this and other tranſactions occaſioned many complaints to the King, who examined them in Council; his Grace of Ormond had frequent opportunities of explaining things, and ſetting the affairs of Ireland in a right light. This heightened the reſentments of thoſe who were friends to Lord Berkeley, and who had ſent him to Ireland (u), more eſpecially the Duke of Bucks, by whoſe procurement, as is generally believed, or at leaſt not without his participation, a moſt outrageous and deteſtable attempt was made upon the perſon of the Duke. The Prince of Orange, afterwards King William, being at this time in England, was invited December 6, 1670, to dine in the City, whither his Grace attended him; and in his return home he was attacked in St. James's-ſtreet, and forced out of his coach by Colonel Blood, who, it is believed, intended to have hanged him at Tyburn, if he had not been happily reſcued (w). The King expreſſed very high reſentment on the firſt news of this inſult, but was afterwards prevailed upon, by its author, to ſend the Earl of Arlington to the Duke, to deſire he would forgive Blood, for certain reaſons which he had orders to tell him. His Grace anſwered, 'if the King could forgive him 'ſtealing his crown, he might eaſily forgive his attempt upon his life; and if ſuch was 'his Majeſty's pleaſure, that was a ſufficient reaſon for him, and his Lordſhip might 'ſpare the reſt (x).' In the courſe of ſeven years, that his Grace was equally out of favour and employment, he never miſſed any opportunity of doing either his Sovereign or his country ſervice, or of paying his duty at Court, which he did in ſuch a manner, that notwithſtanding the great influence his enemies had over his maſter, which went ſo far as to hinder him from ſpeaking to the Duke for a whole year, yet they could never deceive him into a cenſure of any part of his Grace's management in Ireland, though they led him into ſeveral enquiries with that view, or prevail upon him to take from his Grace his White Staff as Lord Steward (y). It muſt be allowed, that there were good reaſons why the Duke ſtood ill with this Miniſtry, ſince he had three capital faults. In the firſt place, he was a hearty friend, as well as a ſincere ſon, of the Church; and, therefore, never courted either the Papiſts or the Fanatics. He depended ſolely upon the King's ſentiments, and would never ſtoop ſo low as to make any intereſt with his miſtreſſes; and, which was not his leaſt crime, he was very cool towards France (z). At laſt, when his Majeſty ſeemed to have overlooked at leaſt, if not forgotten, all his former ſervices, and ſaw him at Court with the utmoſt indifferency; in the latter end of April 1677, he ſurpriſed the Duke, with a meſſage that he would come and ſup with him. He did ſo, and was entertained with all the freedom and mirth that the moſt dutiful and ſincere affection could ſuggeſt; ſo that before he went away, his Majeſty diſcloſed the buſineſs of his viſit, which was, the reſolution he had taken to make his Grace once more Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (a) [T]. As unexpected as the King's choice was, it no ſooner became public, than it was extremely well received in England, and with very unuſual marks of joy in Ireland, though the Lord Lieutenant they then had, on the removal of Lord Berkeley, viz. the Earl of Eſſex, had taken much pains to make himſelf maſter of their affairs, and had managed them with great integrity and honour. It is certain, that this conduct of his did not hinder him from having, perhaps might contribute to procure him, enemies, who had even the boldneſs to attack his behaviour at the Council-Board; where, from a mere principle of juſtice, he was very warmly and very effectually defended by the Duke of Ormond, before there was any probability of his ſucceeding him (b). This, however, had ſuch an effect upon the Earl of Eſſex, that when his Grace came over, in Auguſt 1677, to take the ſword, he ſurrendered it with very unuſual and even unexampled marks of eſteem. Almoſt as ſoon as he entered on his government, the Duke met with things to diſturb him. A Popiſh regiment had been raiſed, under pretence of being intended for foreign ſervice, but remained in the kingdom longer than there ſeemed to be any neceſſity, under pretence of their being diſciplined, and for the ſame reaſon his Grace was deſired to furniſh them with arms; which he poſitively refuſed, adding, that they might very well learn their exerciſe with ſticks (c). The Proteſtant army he put into the beſt condition poſſible, gave orders for repairing all the forts, and cauſed a new one to be raiſed for protecting Kingſale Harbour, which he called Fort Charles. The very next year the Popiſh plot broke out, and an account was tranſmitted to the Lord Lieutenant, of diſcoveries which had been made of dangers to which Ireland was expoſed; intimating alſo ſome deſigns againſt his perſon. Upon this he cauſed Peter Talbot, the Popiſh Archbiſhop of Dublin, and every way worthy of that office, as having been the greateſt incendiary in the kingdom, to be apprehended; and, by proclamation, ordered all the Dignitaries of the Church of Rome to depart the kingdom by the twentieth of November. He took this opportunity, alſo, of diſarming the Papiſts, and of making ſuch orders with reſpect to the army, that it was impoſſible either for officers or private men of that communion to ſhelter themſelves therein (d). All theſe and other wiſe precautions he daily took; which, however, did not protect him from various calumnies in England: but theſe made no ſort of impreſſion upon him;

him; for knowing that kingdom better than any other man, he went on his own way with great firmneſs; and the conſequences of his regulations fully anſwered all his expectations. Some attempts, however, were made to remove him; and a report of this prevailed ſo ſtrongly, that the Earl of Arlington, who was now become his Grace's warm friend, took occaſion to mention it to the King; whoſe temper was by this time very much changed, as appeared by the ſhort anſwer he gave him, which was to this effect; 'that the new Miniſters he had got, were for joſtling out his old 'friends, but they ſhould never gain that point of him;' adding with an oath, That while the Duke of Ormond lived, he ſhould never be put out of that government (e). The Duke of York was alſo of the ſame opinion. All this, however, did not diſcourage his enemies in England from proſecuting their old deſigns, and even forming new ones, in order to procure his removal from the Lieutenancy [U]. In the midſt of theſe public difficulties, one of the greateſt that could reach him in his private capacity, exerciſed his patience, which was, the death of the Earl of Offory, his eldeſt ſon, whom he loved with the tenderneſs of a father, and the affection of a friend (f). He bore this loſs, however, with great ſteadineſs; nor did he diſcover any marks of impatience, when, within three weeks after ſo great a misfortune, he found himſelf obliged to anſwer a new liſt of objections, which his enemies had prepared againſt his adminiſtration, with a view, perhaps, of picking more out of his anſwers than they knew how to thruſt into their charge. In this he diſappointed them; for he kept cloſe to his defence, and contented himſelf with ſhowing that what they ſuggeſted was either fooliſh or falſe (g). By this he preſerved his power, but not the exerciſe of it in ſuch an extent as he wiſhed: for though the times required, and himſelf preſſed, for a Parliament in Ireland, yet he was not permitted to call one; for both the intereſts at Court were now united againſt him; and though they could not prevail upon the King to part with his Lord Lieutenant, yet they kept the Lord Lieutenant from calling a Parliament (h). At laſt his Majeſty, conſidering the great proof the Duke had given of his abilities, in keeping all Ireland quiet during the time of the Popiſh plot, when England was in [U] In order to procure his removal from the Lieutenancy.] After the breaking out of the Popiſh plot, it was impoſſible for one of the Duke's rank, and in his ſtation, to paſs his days in peace. The very cares of his office at ſuch a time, were more than ſufficient to exerciſe all his diligence and attention; and there is no doubt that they did. But how well ſoever he might perform what was incumbent upon him from his poſt, it was impoſſible that he ſhould give ſatisfaction to all parties; indeed, hardly poſſible, that he ſhould give ſatisfaction to any: for whatever he did, the Papiſts though too much (67), and the malecontents in England, whatever they thought, were ready enough to aſſert, he did too little. As his Grace wanted not information of all that paſſed, as well to his prejudice as his advantage; ſo nobody knew better how to make a defence, than he did, as appears from the following extract of a letter of his to Sir Robert Southwell, which deſerves a place for two reaſons; firſt, becauſe it fully clears the point now under our eye; and next, becauſe it affords us a ſpecimen of this nobleman's way of writing, which, if I miſtake not, will ſatisfy every judicious peruſer, that his Grace's character would have appeared, even in a light ſuperior to what it now does, had he found leiſure to be his own Hiſtorian (68). 'It hath been 'my fortune, upon ſeveral occaſions, to be taken by 'the Papiſts to be their greateſt enemy, when it 'was thought that character would have done me 'hurt, and ſometimes to be their greateſt friend, 'when that would hurt me; and (which is unreaſonable) the very ſame men have been believed, when 'they have made ſo different a deſcription of me. 'A little indulgence towards one, will ſeem to conclude from thence, that I am in neither extreme, that 'is, neither tranſported with fury againſt them that 'are of that religion, becauſe ſome of them, and 'perhaps too many, are traitors and murtherers; 'not truſting too much to them, becauſe, I believe, 'ſome of them are good ſubjects and honeſt men. 'It may be perhaps unſeaſonable to profeſs ſuch a 'temper; yet it may be as ſoon excuſed in me as in 'any man; for if there be truth in the information 'of Oates, I am to wait upon the King in the tragedy deſigned; though I really profeſs, I had rather go before him, even for my own ſake, becauſe 'I would not live to ſee the calamities and confuſions, that would follow, if ſuch a villany ſhould 'have ſucceſs.——It ſeems now to be the Papiſts 'turn, to endeavour to diſpatch me: the other Nonconformiſts have had theirs, and may have again, 'when they ſhall be inſpired from the ſame place, 'for different reaſons, to attempt the ſame thing. 'I know the danger I am, and may be in, is a perquiſite belonging to the place I am in, and ſo 'much envied for being in; but I will not be frighted into a reſignation, and will be found alive or 'dead in it, till the ſame hand that placed me ſhall 'remove me.——I know well, that I am born with 'ſome diſadvantages, in relation to the preſent conjuncture, beſides my natural weakneſſes and infirmities, and ſuch as I can no more free myſelf 'from, than I can from them. My father and mother lived and died Papiſts, and only I, by God's 'merciful providence, was educated in the true Proteſtant religion, from which I never ſwerved towards either extreme, not when it was moſt dangerous to profeſs it, and moſt advantageous to quit it. 'I reflect not upon any, who have held another 'courſe, but will charitably hope, that though their 'changes happened to be always to the proſperous 'ſide, yet they were made by the force of preſent 'conviction. My brothers and ſiſters, though they 'were not very many, were very fruitful and very 'obſtinate (they will call it conſtant) in their way; 'their fruitfulneſs hath ſpread into a large alliance, 'and their obſtinacy hath made it altogether Popiſh. 'It would be no ſmall comfort to me, if it had 'pleaſed God, it had been otherwiſe, that I might 'have enlarged my induſtry, to do them good, and 'ſerved them more effectually to them, and more 'ſafely to myſelf. But as it is, I am taught by nature, and alſo by inſtruction, that difference in 'opinion, concerning matters of religion, diſſolves 'not the obligations of nature; and in conformity 'to this principle, I own, not only, that I have done, 'but that I will do my relations, of that, or any 'other perſuaſion, all the good I can. But I profeſs, at the ſame time, that if I find any of them, 'who are neareſt to me, acting or conſpiring rebellion, or plotting againſt the government and the 'religion eſtabliſhed amongſt us, I will endeavour to 'bring them to puniſhment, ſooner than the remoteſt 'ſtranger to my blood. I know profeſſions of this 'nature are eaſily made, and therefore ſometimes 'little credited; but I claim ſome belief from my 'known practice, having been ſo unfortunate as to 'have had kinſmen in rebellion, and ſo fortunate 'as to ſee ſome of them fall, when I commanded in 'chief. Thoſe that remain, have, I hope, changed 'their principles, as to rebellion; if they have not, 'I am ſure, they ſhall find, I have not changed 'mine.'

the utmoſt confuſion, reſolved to ſend for him over, which he did in the ſpring of the year 1682; and his Grace having ſettled affairs in Ireland, and left the ſword with his ſon Richard, Earl of Arran, landed at Cheſter on the ſecond of May (i). He was received by the King, with all the marks of affection and eſteem that his ſervices could deſerve; and, without doubt, his preſence and counſels were of great uſe to his Maſter in that critical juncture, which induced him to delay no longer a favour he had ſome time intended for his Grace, which was, raiſing him to the title of Duke in England; and this was accordingly done by a patent, dated November the ninth, in the thirty-fourth year of his Majeſty's reign, by the title of Ormond (k). All this, however, did not give him ſufficient weight to procure the King's aſſent to the meaſure which he had moſt at heart, which was the holding a Parliament in Ireland. On the contrary, the earneſtneſs with which he puſhed this was prejudicial to his intereſt; procured firſt an order for him to return to that kingdom, which he readily obeyed, and before he was well there, a reſolution to remove him from his government, which he received when he leaſt expected it (l). As diſagreeable as this news might be, it was followed by another piece of intelligence which gave him infinitely more diſquiet; and that was, the King's death; an event which he had always apprehended, and for which, in his private commerce with his friends, he expreſſed the moſt ſenſible concern. He cauſed King James II. to be proclaimed, as his duty required: but he was very ſoon made ſenſible, notwithſtanding all the ſervices he had rendered that Prince, at a ſeaſon when it was moſt dangerous to render him ſervice, of a wide difference between his Maſters: for whereas King Charles would never have obliged him to ſurrender the ſword in perſon; one of the firſt orders he received from his ſucceſſor, was, to give it up to the Lord Primate and the Earl of Granard, which he did on the laſt of March 1685 (m). It may, indeed, be ſaid in excuſe of King James, that the Duke of Ormond, having a great foreſight of the charges that were like to happen, employed all the time, from his laſt arrival in Ireland, in taking the beſt meaſures he was able for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant and Engliſh intereſt in that iſland; which was reſented to a degree of fury by the Iriſh, though without its having any effect upon him, who behaved with the ſame ſteadineſs from the time he received till he parted with the enſigns of his authority [W]. In performing this, which could be no very agreeable act, his Grace was very much ſurpriſed by the Lord Primate's making a long ſpeech, in which, with great plainneſs and perſpicuity, he inſiſted upon the miſeries which that kingdom had endured, and the deplorable condition it was in when his Grace was called to the government of it: he inſiſted alſo on the principal benefits derived from the Duke's gentle and wiſe adminiſtration; and concluded with obſerving, that as the effects of his prudence would be always felt, it was to be hoped they would produce perpetual gratitude towards the Ormond family in the whole Iriſh nation (n). On his arrival in England, his Grace was received with all poſſible marks of reſpect and affection, by all ranks of people, and with great civility by the King, at whoſe coronation he aſſiſted, as at that of King Charles II., and had the honour to carry the crown. He wanted not, however, ſome very ſenſible mortifications, for his regiment of foot was without ceremony taken from him, and given to Col. Juſtin Mackarty; and it is thought that his troop of horſe would have been likewiſe diſpoſed of; but as his Grace bought it fifty years before, it was not thought proper to repay the price he gave, in the decline of life, when his great age promiſed a ſpeedy vacancy (o). He ſtill kept his poſt of Lord Steward, which he might have diſpoſed of to advantage: but as it was given him freely by his late Royal Maſter, he ſcorned to ſell it; yet he ſaw no reaſon to reſign it; and no arguments could prevail upon King James to take it away. In Auguſt 1686, the King made a progreſs into the Weſt, in which his Grace attended him as far as Briſtol, and then his Majeſty making longer ſtages than were proper for a perſon of his age, the Duke returned to London (p). His affection for the perſon of the King, as well as his ſteady loyalty, induced him to behave to that Monarch with all imaginable marks of duty and reſpect: but the violent counſels by which that unfortunate Prince was hurried to his ruin, forced the Duke of Ormond, as well as ſeveral others of his beſt ſubjects, to oppoſe his will in caſes that were directly contrary to law: an extraordinary inſtance of which will be given in the notes (q) [X]. This did not hinder, however, King James's cauſing ſome attempts to be made upon the Duke's religion, by the Lord Arundel of Wardour, then Privy-Seal, and the Duke's intimate friend; and by Peter Walſh, a very honeſt, well-meaning Prieſt, to whom the Duke had been very kind: but both ended in ſuch repulſes, as gave no encouragement to make new trials (r). His Majeſty himſelf ſolicited the Duke for his conſent to aboliſh the Penal Laws; but met with ſuch an anſwer as he did not expect; to which he made a very memorable reply, That as his Grace had diſtinguiſhed himſelf from others, by his long and faithful ſervice to the crown, ſo he would alſo diſtinguiſh him from others by his indulgence (s). When the Earl of Clarendon went to Ireland, he lent his country-ſeat, at Cornbury in Oxfordſhire, to the Duke of Ormond, at which place he ſpent ſome part of two ſummers, and the reſt at other places. He intended to have followed his Majeſty in his next progreſs, and had provided accordingly: but being ſeized with the gout at Badminton, he was forced to remain there for about a month; when his Majeſty paſſing that way, in his road to and from Cheſter, made him a viſit each time in his chamber (t). At the laſt of theſe viſits, he gave him leave to reſide where he pleaſed, without being tied to any at-

[W] Till he parted with the enſigns of his authority.] We have often quoted in this article, a treatiſe intituled, 'A full and impartial Account of all the 'ſecret Conſults, Negociations, and Stratagems; 'Intrigues of the Romiſh Party in Ireland, from the 'Reſtoration to the Revolution, for the Settlement 'of Popery in that Kingdom.' Printed frequently by itſelf, and ſince placed in the Appendix to the State Tracts, in the reign of King William III. It is written with great ſpirit, and is one of the principal authorities which Mr. Oldmixon conſulted in writing his Hiſtory; ſo that we may be ſure, that it contains nothing partial in favour of the Duke of Ormond. The author of this piece, ſpeaking of his Grace's conduct, after the acceſſion of King James, deſcribes it thus: 'The Duke of Ormond 'foreſaw (69) what was now paſt remedy, and told 'a friend of his, that nothing could now preſerve 'the Engliſh, but a precipitateneſs of the Iriſh. 'For, ſaid he, let my countrymen alone, and they will 'ſpoil their own buſineſs. And ſo, indeed, they had 'in any time but this, when it might be ſaid, according to our Saviour's prediction, That the time 'was come, when they that deſtroyed the Proteſtants, 'thought they did God ſervice. King James, and his 'former (but now more eſpecial) favourites, the 'Iriſh, were become equally furious in their courſe, 'and ſeemed to contend, the one in his commands, 'the other in their forward obedience, which ſhould 'exceed in their joint deſign of extirpating hereſy. 'The Duke of Ormond was called over; but before 'his departure laboured with an indefatigable di'ligence, to eſtabliſh matters on ſuch a foundation, 'that it might not be eaſy for them to create a 'preſent change, without a manifeſt violation and 'infringement of the laws and conſtitutions of the 'Kingdom. The new hoſpital, a ſtately fabric, 'near Dublin, erected for poor Soldiers, would (he 'foreſaw) be made a neſt for hornets, which to 'prevent as well as poſſible, he ſat ſeveral days with 'the Council and Judges, in private, in the Caſtle, 'and there made all the proviſion that could be for 'it, againſt the imminent ſtorm. One remarkable 'paſſage I muſt not omit to mention, which de'monſtrates the great ſpirit of that excellent perſon. 'At the aforeſaid hoſpital, he appointed a dinner 'for all the officers of the hoſpital, and the officers 'of the army, then in Dublin; which being over, 'he took a large glaſs of wine in his hand, and bid 'them fill it up to the brim; then ſtood up and called 'to all the company, Look here, gentlemen, they ſay 'at Court, I am now become an old doating fool; you 'ſee, my hand doth not ſhake, nor does my heart fail; 'nor doubt but I will make ſome of them ſee their 'miſtake: and ſo drank the King's health. But upon his arrival at court, he found, that King 'James's bigoted opinion would carry him to the 'moſt violent actions: a diſmal apprehenſion where'of, as is believed, at length broke his heart; for 'though he was of a great age, yet he was of ſuch 'health of body and cheerfulneſs of mind, that, in 'courſe of nature, he might have lived twenty years 'longer, as his mother did. It was plain, that the 'Iriſh could faſten no calumnies upon him, when 'the firſt thing they reproached him with was cheating the army in building the hoſpital; and that 'Robinſon, the Architect, had inriched himſelf by 'it; when indeed, not to leſſen any thing of his 'due character, Robinſon ſhewed the parts of an 'excellent artiſt in the contrivance, and of an honeſt 'man in the charge, as men of value and experience 'in building affirm.'

[X] An extraordinary inſtance of which will be given in the notes.] The firſt inſtance in which the King took upon him to exerciſe this prerogative was, with regard to Sutton's Hoſpital, called the Charter-houſe (70); and in the caſe of one Andrew Popham, a Roman Catholic, whom by a letter, dated December 20th, 1686, and directed to the Governors of that hoſpital, he required to be admitted into the firſt penſioner's place that became vacant, without tendering him any oath, or requiring of him any ſubſcription in conformity to the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church of England, and notwithſtanding any ſtatute, order, or conſtitution of the ſaid hoſpital, with which he was pleaſed to diſpenſe. Dr. Thomas Burnet was at this time Maſter of the Charter-houſe, having been choſen, not long before, by the intereſt of the Duke of Ormond, to whoſe grandſon, the Earl of Oſſory, he had been Governor. The Biſhops, who were of the number of the electors, had made exceptions to him, that though he was a clergyman, he went always in a lay habit. But the Duke being ſatisfied, that his converſation and manners were worthy of a clergyman in all reſpects; and thinking theſe to be much more valuable than the exterior habit, inſiſted ſo ſtrongly in his favour, that he was at laſt choſen. Popham coming to him with his letter, demanded admiſſion, but was told, that the letter muſt be delivered to the Governors, before any thing could be done upon it; and was diſmiſſed without admiſſion. On January 17th, there was a full aſſembly of the Governors; when Popham being preſent, the letter was read, and the Lord Chancellor Jefferys preſently moved, that they ſhould immediately, without any debate, proceed to vote, whether Popham ſhould be accordingly admitted. Dr. Burnet, as the junior Governor, was to vote firſt; but inſtead thereof, he told them, he thought it his duty to acquaint their Lordſhips, that to admit a penſioner into that hoſpital, without taking the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, was not only contrary to the conſtitutions of the houſe, but alſo to an Act of Parliament, 3 Car. called the Charter-houſe Act. One of the Governors thereupon ſaying, 'What is this to the purpoſe?' the Duke of Ormond replied, 'He thought it was very much to 'the purpoſe: for an Act of Parliament was not 'ſo ſlight a thing, but that it deſerved conſidera-'tion.' After ſome diſcourſe, the queſtion was put, whether Popham ſhould be admitted; and was carried in the negative. The Governors intended to have returned immediately an anſwer to the King's letter; but as ſoon as the vote was paſſed, the Chancellor and ſome others hurried away; ſo that there was not a ſufficient number left to act as an aſſembly, or to do any more buſineſs at that time. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury attempted ſeveral times afterwards to have another aſſembly, that the letter might be written to the King; but could not get a full number together, till the Midſummer following. In the mean time, one Cardonnel, a French Proteſtant, naturaliſed and qualified for the place, appeared with a nomination from the King, prior to Popham's. His Majeſty thereupon ſent another letter, dated March 21ſt, to exclude him, and to reinforce his former order for Popham, to whom was likewiſe granted a diſpenſation under the great ſeal. This ſecond letter, and the letters patents, were read on Midſummer-day, in a ſtated aſſembly, where nine Governors were preſent. A letter was then drawn up in the name of the Governors, to one of the Secretaries of State, repreſenting, that they could not admit Popham, nor comply with his Majeſty's letters in his behalf, becauſe the hoſpital was of a private foundation, and the Governors obliged to act according to the conſtitutions of the ſame; and becauſe, likewiſe, the Act 3 Car. expreſsly enacted, That every perſon elected and admitted into it, ſhould, before he received benefit of any ſuch place, take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy. This letter was ſigned by Archbiſhop Sancroft, the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Craven, Danby, and Nottingham, the Biſhop of London, and Dr. Burnet. When it was read to the King, he gave it to the Lord Chancellor, with orders to find a way how he might have right done him in the caſe. But the perſons concerned were of ſo great a character, ſo much conſidered by the nation, and ſo well able to defend their cauſe, that it was thought better to let the matter alone, till the prerogative claimed was eſtabliſhed by the ſubmiſſion of the two Univerſities, who were encouraged to aſſert their rights and the obligation of their ſtatutes by this example of the Governors of the Charter-houſe.

tendance, as Lord Steward; and his Grace thereupon hired Kingſton-Hall in Dorſetſhire, whither he was carried from Badminton in a very ill ſtate of health. In the ſummer he grew better; but a little before Midſummer was ſeized with a kind of ague, which held him to the laſt. He kept up his ſpirits, however, with great fortitude, and expreſſed much pleaſure in ſeeing his great-grandſon, the young Lord Thurles, then about two years old, play by his bed-ſide. As he had always lived, ſo he died, a member of the Church of England, July 21, 1688, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age; and his corpſe, being removed to London, was on the fourth of Auguſt following interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey (u). He was without doubt one of the beſt, as well as the greateſt, men of his time; had all the virtues requiſite to adorn a man of his rank, and very few foibles. In reſpect to his perſonal accompliſhments, he was exceeded by none, and equalled but by few: he had the look and air of a man of Quality; a very graceful and eaſy behaviour, which at the ſame time was full of dignity, and created reſpect in all that ſaw him. He ſpoke extremely well, both in private converſation and upon public occaſions, in regard to which, he expreſſed himſelf with much facility and freedom (w). He had a very comprehenſive genius, ſo that there were few ſubjects that he was not maſter of; and yet, with all his parts and all his experience, he was extremely modeſt. His political principles were entirely agreeable to the conſtitution: he was loyal to his Prince in all circumſtances, and without any regard to conſequences. He underſtood the intereſt of the nation, and purſued it ſteadily. He thought that the law was to be the guide of Sovereigns as well as ſubjects, and, therefore, judged it his duty to aſſert it upon all occaſions (x). He was deſcended from a very noble and fortunate family, and was himſelf the moſt fortunate of that family [Y]. He was extremely happy in domeſtic concerns, living with the Ducheſs in the moſt ſincere friendſhip, as well as the moſt tender affection; regarding her death, which happened about four years before his own, as the greateſt misfortune of his life (y). He was no leſs happy in his children, and in their numerous poſterity, of which it will be neceſſary to give ſome account [Z]. To ſum up all; he paſſed through [Y] And was himſelf the moſt fortunate of that family.] We have already, in the preceding article, ſufficiently juſtified what is aſſerted in the text, as to the honours and fortune of this family; and ſhall only add, that from the 31ſt of Henry III. when Theobald Butler was made one of the Lords Juſtices, to the 1ſt of James II. when the Duke of Ormond quitted the government of Ireland, there had been, in the ſpace of four hundred and thirty-ſeven years, ten of this family, who had been twenty-ſeven times Lords Juſtices, Lords Deputies, or Lords Lieutenants of that Kingdom (71). His Grace had ſeen three generations above him; his father, Thomas, Viſcount Thurles; his grandfather, Walter, Earl of Ormond; and his great uncle, Thomas, Earl of Ormond; and he, likewiſe, ſaw three generations below him; his ſon, Thomas, Earl of Oſſory; his grandſon, James, who ſucceeded him as Duke of Ormond; and his great grandſon, Thomas, Lord Thurles. He had been himſelf, at the time of his deceaſe, fifty-ſeven years in the ſervice of the crown, under the reign of four Kings; and to three of them he had been Privy-Counſellor, and done moſt eminent ſervices. He was four times Lord Lieutenant, and in that ſpace held the ſupreme government for twenty-two years, which was more than any other ſubject had done (72). He lived always with great magnificence, and had rather too little care of his fortune. He bred ſeveral eminent men in his family, who came afterwards to be very conſiderable in the ſtate; and there were three at leaſt of his Chaplains, that came to be diſtinguiſhed highly in the Church; Dr. Hough, the late excellent Biſhop of Worceſter, Dr. Hartſtonge, Biſhop of Londonderry (73), and Dr. Thomas Burnet, Maſter of the Charter-houſe. Indeed, he was always eſteemed a great patron of the Clergy, as well as a true friend to the Church; following, therein, the maxim of his old friend, the Earl of Strafford, who was in nothing more commendable, than in his care of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate of Ireland; by which he kept up the credit of the Proteſtant Religion, and filled the ſeveral Sees with men of ſuch learning, virtue, and piety, as drew the eſteem, even of the Papiſts; at leaſt, of all ſuch as were not bigots to ſuch a degree, as hindered them from ſeeing the good qualities and exemplary behaviour of Chriſtian Prieſts, that were not of their own Church.

[Z] Of which it will be neceſſary to give ſome account.] The Duke of Ormond married but once, and that was his couſin, Lady Elizabeth Preſton, the only daughter of the Earl of Deſmond, by the only daughter of Thomas, Earl of Ormond. This Lady was born in 1615, and, conſequently, was five years younger than the Duke. She married at the age of fourteen; and after living fifty-four years in great harmony with her Lord, departed this life, July 21, 1684 (74). By this Lady the Duke had ten children, viz. eight ſons and two daughters. 1. Thomas, born in 1632; and died before he was a year old (75). 2. Thomas, Earl of Oſſory, of whom in the next article. 3. James, born in 1635; but died within the year. 4. James, who died a little above a year old (76). 5. Richard, born July 15, 1639; he was educated with great care, and taught every thing ſuitable to his birth, and the great affection that his parents had for him. As he grew up, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a brave and excellent diſpoſition, which determined him to a military life. When the Duke was firſt made Lord Lieutenant, after the Reſtoration, his Majeſty was pleaſed, by his letter, dated April 23, 1662, to create Lord Richard, Baron Butler of Cloghgrenan, Viſcount of Tullogh, in the county of Catherlogh, and Earl of Arran, with remainder to his brother (77). He was ſworn of the Privy-Council in that kingdom, Auguſt 26, 1663. In the month of September, 1664, he married Lady Mary Stuart, only ſurviving daughter of James, Duke of Richmond and Lenox, by Mary, the only daughter of the great Duke of Buckingham, who died in July, 1667, at the age of eighteen, and was interred at Kilkenny. The Earl of Arran commanding the guards in Ireland, and having, as we have ſhewn, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in reducing the mutineers at Carrick-Fergus, and behaving with great courage in the famous ſea-fight with the Dutch, in 1673, he was on the 27th of Auguſt, the ſame year, created Baron Butler of Weſton, in the county of Huntingdon (78). He married in the month of June preceding, Dorothy, daughter of John Ferrers, of Tamworth-Caſtle, in Warwickſhire, Eſq. In May, 1682, he was conſtituted Lord Deputy of Ireland, upon his father's going over to England; and held that high office till Auguſt, 1684 (79), when the Duke returned. In the beginning of the year 1686 he died at London, and was interred in the vault at the eaſt end of Henry VIIth's chapel at Weſtminſter; leaving an only daughter, Charlotte, who was married to Charles, Lord Cornwallis (80). 6. Walter, born September 6, 1641, died at Dublin in 1643, and was buried at Chriſt-Church (81). 7. John, born in 1643; he was Captain of the troop of through a long life and variety of fortunes, with honour and reputation; was esteemed and beloved by the good men of all parties; and died as much regretted as it was possible for man to be (z); and this, without courting popular applause; or pursuing any other rule in his conduct, than doing what was, in his own judgment, right.

of Horse Guards in Ireland, and was created Baron of Aghrim, Viscount Clonmore, and Earl of Gowran, in that kingdom (82). He married in 1675, the Lady Anne Chichester, sole daughter and heiress of Arthur, Earl of Donnegal; and was a young nobleman of great parts and spirit, but too much given to his pleasures, by which he greatly impaired his health; and going for the recovery of it to Paris, died there, in August 1676, without issue (83). 8. James, born in 1645, who while an infant being carried to take the air in a coach, the horses running away down Phœnix-hill, near Dublin, the woman who had the care of him, in her fright, threw him out of the window, and he was killed by the fall (84). 1. Lady Elizabeth, born June 29, 1640, who married Philip, Earl of Chesterfield, by whom she had one son, Henry, that died an infant, and a daughter, the Lady Elizabeth Stanhope, who married Patrick Lyon, Earl of Strathmore, in the kingdom of Scotland (85). 2. Lady Mary, born in 1646, married to William, Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl and Duke of Devonshire (86), by whom she had three sons, William, afterwards Duke of Devonshire, Lord Henry, and Lord James, and a daughter, Lady Elizabeth, married to Sir John Wentworth, of Broadsworth, in the county of York, Baronet (87). His Grace had also a natural son by the Lady Isabella Rich, daughter of the Earl of Holland, begotten before his marriage, and bred up at Paris, where he died a little before the Restoration. The Duke held a friendly correspondence with this Lady, during his exile, which, as we have elsewhere shewn, had like to have been fatal to his own Lady (88), who, notwithstanding had so little of jealousy in her nature, that when Lady Isabella was on this very account obliged to fly out of England, she received her very kindly at Caen, where she lived with her two or three years (89).  [A large and curious history of the Bill for prohibiting the Importation of Irish Cattle, is given in the Continuation of the Life of the Earl of Clarendon. Perhaps there never was a Bill that was carried through both Houses of Parliament with so much violence and acrimony. This was owing to the private views and party spirit which mingled in the contest; for, though many of the members in each House promoted the Bill from a conviction of its reasonableness and utility, others were impelled by their hatred to Lord Clarendon, and by a desire of mortifying the Duke of Ormond (90). It is surprising, that a repeal of this Act hath not hitherto been attempted; though it might probably not be assented to even in the present enlightened times. The Duke of Ormond's true patriotism is worthy of admiration, who exerted great wisdom and vigilance, in converting to the benefit of Ireland, an event which at first seemed likely to be so fatal to that country. The methods he pursued to this purpose are enlarged upon by Carte, and are well represented by Dr. Leland; who having related several of the Duke's attempts to promote the trade and manufactures of the Irish, goes on as follows: 'But of all 'such schemes of national improvement, that of a 'linen manufacture was most acceptable to Ormond. 'He possessed himself with the noble ambition of 'imitating the Earl of Strafford in the most honourable part of his conduct, and opening a source of 'public wealth and prosperity, which the troubles 'and disorders of Ireland had stopped. An act of 'parliament was passed at Dublin to encourage the 'growth of flax and manufacture of linen. Ormond was at the charge of sending skilful persons 'to the Low-Countries, to make observations on the 'state of this trade, the manner of working, the 'way of whitening their thread, the regulations of 'their manufacture, and management of their 'grounds, and to contract with some of their most 'experienced artists. He engaged Sir William 'Temple to send to Ireland five hundred families 'from Brabant, skilled in manufacturing linen: 'others were procured from Rochelle and the Isle of 'Ré, from Jersey and the neighbouring parts of 'France. Convenient tenements were prepared for 'the artificers at Chapel-Izod, near Dublin, where 'cordage, sail-cloth, ticken, linen, and diaper, 'were brought to a considerable degree of perfection. 'Such cares reflect real honour on the Governor, who 'thus laboured to promote the happiness of a nation; and should be recorded with pleasure and 'gratitude, however we may be captivated by the 'more glaring objects of history (91).' We are farther informed by Dr. Leland, that the Duke of Ormond was not less assiduous to cultivate knowledge and learning in Ireland, that he might root out the superstition by which the country had been enslaved, and introduce civility and refinement (92).

The Primate, who, when the Duke of Ormond quitted his government, in 1685, made a long speech in his Grace's commendation, was Dr. Michael Boyle, successively Bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, Archbishop of Dublin, Archbishop of Armagh, and twenty-two years Lord High Chancellor of Ireland. In the several articles concerning him, in Harris's edition of Sir James Ware's Works (93), there is scarcely any mention of the virtues of this Prelate. The Puritans, we are told, considered him as a churchman little removed from Popery (94).

When it is said, in the Duke of Ormond's article, that his political principles were entirely agreeable to the constitution, we cannot admit the truth of the assertion, unless we were to grant that the constitution of our government was legally absolute in Charles the Second's reign; for otherwise, it is certain that the Duke went to an unwarrantable length, in his compliance with that monarch's tyrannical conduct. This is acknowledged by Dr. Leland. 'It 'is not be doubted, says he, but that the King, in 'the present course of arbitrary measures which he 'adopted, wished for the countenance of a servant 'so generally respected as the Duke of Ormond; 'and that the Duke of York, knowing the instability of his brother, sought to keep him steady 'and determined by the authority of such a counsellor. Were it to the present purpose, to enter 'into a detail of Ormond's conduct in England, it 'might not appear to form the most brilliant part of 'his life. The very facts which his biographer hath 'recited with so much satisfaction, prove him to 'have displayed the most unbounded attachment to 'the Crown, by being an active agent in the 'most odious and obnoxious measures. But to his 'honour, it must be observed, that he was by no 'means admitted into all the most secret councils 'and purposes of the King and Duke (95).

Mr. Macpherson, in giving the character of Charles the Second's ministry, at the time of the Restoration, says, that Ormond was more remarkable for his honour and integrity, than for great abilities (96). It is not our intention to disparage the Duke's talents, which certainly were very considerable, and were displayed to eminent advantage in the settlement of Ireland; but, at the same time, we are apprehensive that they have been in some degree exaggerated, both by Mr. Carte and by our ingenious predecessor.

In the Earl of Clarendon's Continuation, there are several circumstances relative to the Duke of Ormond; the most remarkable of which is, the history of his appointment to the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, the Chancellor's opposition to it, and the reasons which induced the Duke to accept of that employment (97).] K.

 [In the British Museum (98) is a letter from the Duke of Ormond, and the Privy Council of Ireland, to Sir Henry Bennet, Secretary of State, relative to the Marquis of Antrim, dated the 31st of July, 1663. Letters had been sent, in the King's name, (98) Harleian MSS. No. 1579. fol. 137.

BUTLER (THOMAS), Earl of Oſſory, whoſe ſhining qualities, great parts, and exemplary virtue, independently of his high birth, and the honours to which he attained, rendered him the delight of the age in which he lived, and deſerved that his memory ſhould be tranſmitted with due praiſe to poſterity, was born when his father was Earl of Ormond and Oſſory, in the Caſtle of Kilkenny, July 9, 1634 (a). He was educated in his father's houſe, with all imaginable care, and under the beſt maſters, that, in thoſe troubleſome times, could be procured, till he was near thirteen; and then his father having ſigned a treaty with the Commiſſioners of the Parliament, for ſurrendering up Dublin, he came with him over into England (b). His ſtay was not long at that time; for the Marquis of Ormond, as we have ſhown in the foregoing article, being obliged to quit the kingdom in February 1648, took his ſon with him to France; and when, in September following, the Marquis went over again to Ireland, his Lordſhip and his brother Richard were left at the houſe of a Proteſtant Miniſter, at Caen in Normandy, for about a year, and were then ſent to a famous Academy at Paris, where the Earl diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his dexterity in his exerciſes, and by a ſteady and manly behaviour much beyond his years (c). In December 1650, he came back to Caen, where the Marchioneſs of Ormond then was, and remained there till the ſummer of 1652, when he attended her Ladyſhip into England, from whence he went with her in the beginning of the next year to Ireland (d). He returned from thence in 1654, with his mother, to London, and reſided with her in Wild-Houſe: but being now a man, and much courted and careſſed by perſons of all ranks, who were charmed with his eaſy and polite behaviour, and with the ſingular happineſs of his temper, in which a boundleſs bravery was united with the greateſt gentleneſs and modeſty; he ſoon made a great figure, and his name was almoſt in every body's mouth. This excited the jealouſy of Cromwell to a very high degree; and, therefore, he thought proper to ſecure him, which he accordingly did (e) in a very extraordinary manner [A]. He remained in the Tower near eight months, and then falling ill of a fever which threatened his life, Cromwell, not without great difficulty, conſented to his diſcharge. He went firſt with the Marchioneſs, his mother, to Acton in Glouceſterſhire; but the Phyſicians having certified, that a farther change of air was requiſite to reſtore his conſtitution; a paſs was obtained for him, and he went over to name, to the Duke of Ormond, as Lord Lieutenant, and the Council of Ireland, directing that the Marquis of Antrim ſhould be reſtored to his eſtate, as an 'innocent Papiſt.' But in this letter, the Duke of Ormond repreſents, that this would be contrary to the Act of Settlement, wherein it had been enacted, that ſuch as at any time had 'adhered to the Nuncio's or Clergy's party, or papal 'power, in oppoſition to the King's authority, 'ſhould not be reſtored as innocent Papiſts.' For his Grace maintained, that this had been the caſe with the Marquis of Antrim, to his own knowledge; that nobleman having 'continually ſerved with the 'Pope's Nuncio, and his adherents,' in 1646 and 1648, in oppoſition to his Grace, then Marquis of Ormond, and Lord Lieutenant. But in anſwer to this letter, another was ſent from the King in behalf of the Marquis of Antrim, wherein his Majeſty obſerved, that the caſe of that nobleman had been referred to the conſideration and examination of certain Lords of the Privy Council. It is added, in the King's name, 'that after ſeveral meetings, theſe 'Lords have reported unto us, that they have ſeen 'ſeveral letters, all of them hand-writing of our 'Royal Father, to the ſaid Marquis, and ſeveral inſtructions concerning his treating and joining with 'the Iriſh, in order to the King's ſervice, by reducing to their obedience, and by drawing ſome forces 'from them for the ſervice of Scotland: That beſides the letters and orders, under his Majeſty's 'hand, they have received ſufficient evidence and teſtimony of ſeveral private meſſages and directions 'ſent from our Royal Father, and from our Royal 'Mother, with the privity, and with the directions, 'of the King our Father, by which they are perſuaded, that whatever intelligence, correſpondence, 'or actings, the ſaid Marquis had with the confederate Iriſh Catholics, was directed or allowed 'by the ſaid letters, inſtructions, and directions; 'and that it manifeſtly appears to them, that the 'King our Father was well pleaſed with what 'the Marquis did after he had done it (99).'

(99) Ibid. fol. 142, 143.

It is manifeſt from the above letter, that King Charles I. carried on private intrigues with the Iriſh rebels, with which Ormond, though Lord Lieutenant, was wholly unacquainted; and, indeed, it is ſufficiently evident, that Charles, in order to promote his own arbitrary views, made uſe of great duplicity and inſincerity both with Proteſtants and Papiſts.] T.

[A] Which he accordingly did in a very extraordinary manner.] It is certain, that, at this time, Oliver Cromwell found himſelf in a very uneaſy and perplexed ſituation, being ſurrounded on all ſides with dangers and difficulties, and not knowing whom to truſt (1). He had been obliged to diſſolve his Parliament, when he moſt needed their aſſiſtance; he had diſcovered a deſign of the Royaliſts to riſe in different parts of the kingdom, which afterwards broke out; and in this ſtate of affairs, conſidering that Lord Oſſory was looked upon as, in all reſpects, one of the moſt promiſing young noblemen of the age, he judged it requiſite, though he had no particular informations, to cauſe him to be ſecured (2). His Lordſhip then reſided with his mother, the Marchioneſs, at Wild-Houſe, and thither an officer was ſent with a guard to take him into cuſtody. It happened that he was out at the time of their coming; but the Marchioneſs of Ormond told the officer who commanded, that he need not wait for his coming him; ſince ſhe would pawn her word, that he ſhould wait upon the Protector the next morning (3). One Mr. Stephen Ludlow, who had a reſpect for the family, gave his Lordſhip notice of what had happened, and offered to aſſiſt him in his eſcape; but the Marchioneſs was againſt that meaſure, and poſitively inſiſted, that he ſhould comply with what ſhe had undertaken on his behalf (4). He went, therefore, early the next morning to Whitehall, and deſired an audience of the Protector, but in vain; for, after he had waited ſome time, a perſon came out, and told his Lordſhip he had orders to carry him to the Tower, which he accordingly did. The Marchioneſs, during his confinement, applied often to Cromwell, who treated her with ſingular reſpect, made her many compliments, and gave her very civil anſwers; yet would not grant her ſon's diſcharge, till his confinement brought on a fit of ſickneſs. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that a little before his impriſonment, Lord Oſſory had procured a paſs from the Protector, allowing him to travel through Italy, and even as far as Jeruſalem; and having been very courteouſly treated at an audience of leave upon this occaſion, he was the leſs apprehenſive of the uſage he afterwards met with (5).

Flanders, and took with him his brother Lord Richard, who paſſed for his ſervant (f). He durſt not remain long there, for fear Cromwell ſhould make it a pretence for ſeizing his mother's eſtate; and, therefore, he retired into Holland, where he remained about four years, and behaved with ſo much prudence and diſcretion, that he was admired and eſteemed by the greateſt men in the Republic, more eſpecially by the Lord Beverweert, a nobleman of the firſt rank, and whoſe virtues were not at all inferior to his diſtinguiſhed birth. His intimacy with that nobleman, gave him an opportunity of converſing with the Lady Emilia Naſſau, his daughter, a Lady of very great beauty, and endowed with all the virtues of her ſex; ſo that his Lordſhip became very much in love with her, and a treaty of marriage being ſet on foot, the Marquis of Ormond came to Holland on purpoſe to conclude it, which he did, though it was attended with ſome difficulties (g) [B]. Upon the Reſtoration, Lord Oſſory attended the King to England, and by patent, dated February 8, 1661, was appointed Colonel of foot in Ireland. On the thirteenth of June following, he was made Colonel and Captain of horſe. He was ſoon after appointed Lieutenant-General of horſe; and, in the beginning of the year 1662, he ſucceeded the Earl of Montrath in the command of a regiment of foot and troop of horſe (h). On the twenty-ſecond of June, in the ſame year, he was called by writ to the Houſe of Lords in Ireland, and had very extraordinary compliments paid him on that occaſion by both Houſes of Parliament [C]. On the ſixteenth of Auguſt, 1665, he was appointed Lieutenant-General of the army in that kingdom: but returning into England the year following, he was with his brother-in-law the Earl of Arlington at his ſeat at Euſton in Norfolk, where, in the beginning of June, hearing the guns from ſea, he, with Sir Thomas Clifford, found means, on the third of that month, to get from Harwich on board the Engliſh fleet under the command of the Duke of Albemarle, to whom he brought the firſt news of Prince Rupert's coming to join him, and had his ſhare in that, and in the next day's glorious action (i). He was ſoon after ſworn of the Privy-Council in England, being then Lord of the Bed-Chamber to the King by his father's reſignation; and on the fourteenth of September 1666, he was ſummoned by writ to the Engliſh Houſe of Lords (k), by the title of Lord Butler of Moore Park. He had not ſitten ſix weeks in the Houſe before he called the Duke of Buckingham to an account, for ſaying, on the debate of the bill for prohibiting the importation of Iriſh cattle, that none were againſt it but ſuch as had Iriſh eſtates or Iriſh underſtandings. The Duke was to have met him in Chelſea-fields the next day; but, in his ſtead, about three hours after the time, came an officer with a guard to ſecure him; and the Duke had ſhared the ſame fate, if he had not prudently kept out of the way. The next morning his Grace complained to the Houſe of Lords of a breach of privilege, which produced a new quarrel with the Earl of Arlington. As ſoon as the King was informed of this complaint, he ordered the Earl of Oſſory to be releaſed, who went immediately to the Houſe to make his defence; which did not hinder his being ſent to the Tower, and the Duke was committed to the cuſtody of the Uſher of the Black-Rod; but, in two days, they were both releaſed (l). In May 1670, he attended the King in his journey to Dover, to meet his ſiſter the Ducheſs of Orleans; and in October following he was ſent to Holland, to bring over the Prince of Orange (m). At the cloſe of the ſame year, he thought himſelf obliged to reſent, in a very extraordinary manner, the inſult offered his father by Col. Blood, [B] Which he did, though it was attended with ſome difficulties.] This Dutch nobleman was the ſon of the famous Maurice Prince of Orange, by Madame de Beverweert. He was a man of great virtue and integrity, and not only aſſiſted his country with his counſels, but had expoſed his life alſo in her ſervice, and might have ſucceeded Tromp in the chief command of the fleet, if, out of modeſty, he had not declined it (6). He had three ſons and five daughters. His eldeſt ſon, Maurice, was created Count of Naſſau, by the Emperor Leopold; his ſecond ſon, William Adrian, was ſo created likewiſe, but was commonly called, Lord Odike; Henry, his third ſon, was Lord of Auverquerque, anceſtor to the Earls of Grantham (7). The eldeſt of his daughters was this Lady Emilia, with whom he offered to give a fortune of ten thouſand pounds, but inſiſted, that an eſtate of twelve hundred pounds a year ſhould be immediately put into the poſſeſſion of Lord Oſſory. It was no eaſy matter to fix this, conſidering how large a part it made of what was in his mother's poſſeſſion; and beſides, ſome overtures had been made towards a more advantageous match with the daughter of the Earl of Southampton (8). But the Earl of Oſſory looked upon his happineſs as inconſiſtent with any marriage but this; ſo that, at length, he procured the ſettlement inſiſted upon to be made, and the wedding was celebrated, November 16, 1659. It was propoſed, that part of the ten thouſand pounds ſhould have made the portion of his ſiſter Lady Elizabeth, who, about this time, married the Earl of Cheſterfield, and that the remainder ſhould be employed in defraying the expences of the education of Lord John; but the King's neceſſities being very preſſing, the Marquis of Ormond made no heſitation at ſacrificing this, which ſeemed to be his laſt ſtake, for his maſter's ſervice (9).

[C] Had very extraordinary compliments paid to him on that occaſion, by both Houſes of Parliament.] His Lordſhip took leave of the Commons, in a ſhort and handſome ſpeech, on the 8th of Auguſt, 1662; upon which an order was made, that Sir Paul Davis and Sir Henry Tichburne, with the body of the Houſe, ſhould accompany him to the bar of the Houſe of Lords (10). The Lords having notice of their coming, made an order, that, by the conſent of the Earl's bench, the Earl of Oſſory ſhould be placed above all the Earls, but that it ſhould be no precedent for the future. His place being thus fixed, the Houſe of Commons were called in, and the Speaker, in their name, returned thanks to the Lords for the honour they had been pleaſed to do the honourable perſon he then preſented to the Houſe; and aſſured them, that nothing could do them greater pleaſure; and the Commons doubted not, but as he had been a great help to their Houſe, ſo he would be an honour to that of the Peers, and very uſeful to both. The Commons being withdrawn, the Earl of Oſſory was introduced into the Houſe, and complimented by the Chancellor, in a ſhort and handſome ſpeech, upon that occaſion.

towards the Duke of Buckingham, who was thought to be the author of it [D]. In the month of February following, he attended the Prince of Orange back to the Hague, from whence he made a tour to the Court of France, returned by the way of Holland, and ſoon after he arrived in England. The Prince of Orange, as a mark of his high eſteem and regard, ſent him a baſon and ewer of maſſy gold (n). In the ſummer of 1671, he went over again to Flanders and Holland, and, in the beginning of 1672, he had the command of the Reſolution, a third rate man of war, having a little before received a very extraordinary mark of the King's ſincere affection for him. It ſeems his Lordſhip, who loved play too much, had run in debt about eight thouſand pounds, which made him extremely uneaſy; of which his Majeſty being informed, he was ſo kind as to pay it for him, and Sir Stephen Fox contrived that it ſhould be done in ſuch a way, that nobody at Court knew any thing of it. The Earl was on board the Reſolution the fourteenth of March with Sir Robert Holmes, when he attacked the Dutch Smyrna fleet, and gave ſignal marks of courage upon that occaſion, with which, however, his father was highly offended; becauſe, as that attempt was made before any declaration of war, he looked upon it as diſhonourable to the Engliſh arms (o). In April he had the command of the Victory given him, which was a ſecond rate. He was in the action off Southwould-Bay, which happened May 28, 1672, and acquired great reputation therein, as well as by relieving all the wounded ſeamen in St. Thomas's Hoſpital; and on the thirtieth of September he was elected Knight of the Garter (p). In November following he was ſent Envoy Extraordinary to France, with compliments of condolance on the death of the Duke of Anjou. He was received there with extraordinary honours, and extremely preſſed to accept a command in the army; to induce him to which, he was offered twenty thouſand piſtoles for his equipage, and ten thouſand piſtoles a year: but he excuſed himſelf, though he could not avoid accepting, at his audience of leave, a jewel of the value of two thouſand pounds (q). In May 1673, his Majeſty honoured him with the command of the St. Michael, a firſt rate, and appointed him Rear-Admiral of the Blue on the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, in which poſt he ſerved in the enſuing battle againſt the Dutch, and covered the Prince, which was the ſhip wherein Sir Edward Spragge bore his Flag, as Admiral of the ſquadron, after his death, and the veſſel's being diſabled, till towards night; and then brought her off in tow, and joined Prince Rupert's ſquadron (r). Upon this his Lordſhip was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral of the Red; and on the tenth of September he diſplayed the Union Flag, as Commander in Chief of the whole fleet, in the abſence of Prince Rupert (s), by the King's ſpecial command. It was towards the cloſe of this year, that the Earl formed a very important project of revenging the diſgrace the nation had ſuſtained in the former war, by the burning of our ſhips at Chatham; in return for which, he would have burnt all the ſhips that were laid up at Helvoetſluys; and why this was not put in execution remains a ſecret to poſterity (t) [E]. His Lordſhip had equally the confidence of the Duke of York, and of the [D] The Duke of Buckingham, who was thought to be the author of it.] This very ſingular incident (11) happened, when Dr. Turner, afterwards Biſhop of Ely, was Chaplain in waiting; and in his preſence, the Earl of Oſſory coming by chance, not long after Blood's attempt, into the Royal preſence; and ſeeing the Duke of Buckingham ſtanding by the King, his colour roſe, and he addreſſed him in the following words: 'My Lord, I know well, that you are 'at the bottom of this late attempt of Blood's upon 'my father; and therefore, I give you fair warning: 'if my father comes to a violent end, by ſword or 'piſtol; if he dies by the hand of a ruffian, or by 'the more ſecret way of poiſon, I ſhall not be at a 'loſs to know the firſt author of it; I ſhall conſider 'you as the aſſaſſin; I ſhall treat you as ſuch, and 'wherever I meet you, I ſhall piſtol you, though you 'ſtood behind the King's chair; and I tell it you in 'his Majeſty's preſence, that you may be ſure I ſhall 'keep my word.'

(11) This was related to Mr. Carte by Robert Leſley of Glaſlaghin the county of Monaghan, Eſq; who had it from the Biſhop of Ely. Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. ii. p. 425.

[E] Remains a ſecret to poſterity.] The Earl of Oſſory, in his ſeveral voyages to Holland, had heard, and at laſt had taken the pains to ſee, that the Royal Charles was laid up in Helvoetſluys. This is an excellent harbour on the iſland of Voorn, in the province of Holland, about five miles ſouth from the Briel, at that time little talked of, though ſince become well known to the world, from its being the ſtation of our packets (12). In the latter end of the ſummer, his Lordſhip was informed, that two and twenty of the largeſt ſhips of the Dutch fleet, were to be laid up there: and this induced him to conſider more ſeriouſly a ſcheme he formerly had of burning the veſſels in this port: and what contributed ſtill more to excite him to this undertaking, was an account, that though the place was of ſuch conſequence, and very capable of being defended, yet there was no better garriſon in it than two companies of foot. In order to be perfectly ſatisfied, he ſent over M. St. Paul, his Maſter of the horſe, to take a view of the place; which he did, and brought back an exact plan of it, though at the hazard of his life. He then propoſed it to the King, deſiring no more than eight men of war; the like number of large boats for landing men, with two thouſand land troops; or if ſo many could not be ſpared, he was content to undertake it with fifteen hundred (13). The King was very well pleaſed with the project; but the Duke of Buckingham ſecretly oppoſed it, and raiſed ſome objections about getting ſhips into the port: but Sir John Narborough, who was to command under the Earl, being conſulted by the King, offered to carry in the veſſels, at half flood, or loſe his head; to which the Earl added, that if he did not then fire the Dutch ſhips with a halfpenny candle, he would be content to have his fixed by Cromwell's, upon Weſtminſter-Hall. Upon this the neceſſary preparations were made with great diſpatch; and about the middle of the month of December, when the Earl of Oſſory was ready to take his leave, and to embark at Portſmouth, he ſuddenly received a countermand, the very night before his intended departure. Whether this proceeded from the pique and jealouſy of that Duke, or from the King's unwillingneſs to ſtrike ſuch a ſtroke, when he was on the point of concluding the peace, though even in that he had been juſtified by the conduct of the Dutch, on the like occaſion, remains, and perhaps ever will remain, a ſecret (14). This, however, is certain, that his Lordſhip afterwards examined the place, and was thoroughly ſatisfied from thence, that nothing could have hindered the ſucceſs of his deſign, if he had been allowed to have put it in execution.

King his maſter: and this both in their public and private concerns; as is evident from his being the only nobleman truſted with the ſecret of the Duke's firſt marriage (u), and the perſon who actually gave Mrs. Anne Hyde away. When, therefore, it was thought requiſite, in the winter of 1674, to offer the Lady Mary to the Prince of Orange, though the King made choice of Lord Oſſory, yet his Royal Highneſs confirmed it with a very ſignal teſtimony of reſpect, declaring he would rather truſt his concerns with his Lordſhip than with any other perſon; and when he embarked, on the tenth of November, with the Earl of Arlington his brother-in-law, it was univerſally underſtood at Court, that he was the Duke's Miniſter, as the other was the King's (w). How well he was received in Holland, and how grateful his perſon was to the Prince of Orange, appears from his Highneſs's conducting him on board his ſhip, which, though a great honour in itſelf, was much increaſed by the manner of doing it; for the Prince perceiving that the ſhip made little way, followed from ſhore the next morning in a long-boat, and accompanied his Lordſhip out to ſea (x). What the real iſſue was of this negociation, and by whom it was conducted, has been ſhewn in another place (y), and need not therefore be repeated here. In 1675, he was, as a mark of their reſpect, choſen Maſter of the Brotherhood of Trinity-houſe, and, in Auguſt following, made one of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty (z). In November 1676, he became Lord Chamberlain to Queen Catherine (a). When M. Bentinck came over to England in the ſummer of the next year, to reſume the treaty for the match before mentioned, he was particularly recommended by his Highneſs to the Earl of Oſſory, and the Duke of Ormond; and by their advice it was, that he applied himſelf to the Lord Treaſurer Danby; ſo that, by whatever means that negociation was happily terminated, his Lordſhip plainly had his ſhare in it. One advantage he drew from thence was this, that he obtained leave, which had been often refuſed him before, to go over, and make the reſt of the campaign with his Highneſs in Flanders, which he did; and, upon the appearance of a battle, he had the poſt of honour given him, with a command of ſix thouſand men (b). In the beginning of the year following, he went over again, in order to take upon him the command of the Britiſh ſubjects in the pay of the States, and, at the cloſe of the war, was continued in his command, with extraordinary marks of honour on the part of the States-General [F]. In the progreſs of that campaign he diſtinguiſhed himſelf extremely, more eſpecially at the battle of Mons, which was fought towards the cloſe of it, and wherein he commanded the Engliſh troops; with whom he did ſo much, and contributed ſo far to the retreat which Marſhal Luxemburg was obliged to make from the field of battle, that the States of Holland, the Duke of Villa Hermoſa, Governor of the Spaniſh Low-Countries, and even his Catholic Majeſty himſelf, thought fit, in a letter under his hand, to acknowledge the great ſervices (c) he performed in that action. His Lordſhip returned, in company with Mr. Hyde, who had been ſent to execute a commiſſion of importance to his Highneſs, September 13, 1678. His Majeſty intended, ſoon after, to have given him the command of a ſquadron, deſtined to chaſtiſe the Algerine pirates; but the Lord Treaſurer Danby interpoſing, and engaging that Sir John Narborough ſhould undertake that ſervice with a ſmaller force, he was thereupon preferred (d). His Lordſhip was in like manner diſappointed the next year, when the King had thought of him to have carried his compliments, and a jewel of the value of thirteen thouſand pounds, for the new Queen of Spain. But the Nobleman then at the head of the Treaſury, procured that deſign to be laid aſide, from a ſpirit of œconomy; notwithſtanding which, we are told, this jewel was, not long after, given to the Ducheſs of Portſmouth (e). It was in the courſe of this winter, that the enemies of the Duke of Ormond attacked his conduct warmly in the Houſe of Lords, where it was moſt vigorouſly defended by the Earl of Oſſory, who thought fit to carry the war into the enemies quarters, in a famous ſpeech in anſwer to one of the Lord Shafteſbury's,

which, as an inſtance of his Lordſhip's talents, ſhall be preſerved in the notes [G]. As this did him very great credit at home, ſo it procured him from abroad an honour he very little expected. This ſpeech of his being tranſmitted to Holland, was there tranſlated into, and printed in, Dutch; upon which the Prince of Orange, as a mark of his ſincere friendſhip, as well as a proof of his very high eſteem, wrote his Lordſhip a letter, the contents of which render it extremely worthy of notice (f) [H]. We draw now near the cloſe of his days, and the laſt period of his honours. The King was a good deal embarraſſed about the port of Tangier in Barbary, the poſſeſſion of which he acquired by his marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, and in fortifying of which he had ſpent immenſe ſums of money (g). The place was certainly of great importance, as it lay very commodiouſly for protecting our trade, for keeping the Moors in awe, and for giving us weight in the Mediterranean; but more eſpecially as we poſſeſſed it by an undiſputed title, and were at liberty to make what acquiſitions we could, without giving umbrage to any Chriſtian Prince. The Parliament, however, had conceived a diſlike to the manner in which this affair had been managed, grounded chiefly upon a rumour that the garriſon was a nurſery for Popiſh ſoldiers (h); to remove which fears, his Majeſty made choice of the Earl of Oſſory to go over thither in quality of Governor (i). He was preparing every thing for that purpoſe, when his Lordſhip was ſuddenly taken ill at Arlington-Houſe, of a high and malignant fever, which diſturbed his head almoſt from the time he was ſeized. The Phyſicians had for two days ſome hopes of his recovery; but he relapſed, and on July 30, 1680, expired, as univerſally lamented as he had been beloved (k). His Lordſhip died when he was juſt turned of the forty-ſixth year of his age, leaving his diſconſolate Counteſs and his [G] Shall be preſerved in the notes.] The Earl of Shafteſbury had not, very probably, any perſonal diſlike to the Duke of Ormond; but he ſaw clearly, that ſo long as he continued Lord Lieutenant, and in credit with the King, the progreſs of their party would be entirely ſtopped in Ireland, and much retarded in England (17). It was for this reaſon, therefore, that he expatiated in the Houſe of Lords, on the great danger the three kingdoms were in from Popery, and the little care that was taken to proſecute the Papiſts in Ireland, notwithſtanding that, of the three, it was viſibly the moſt expoſed. As he was a very copious and witty ſpeaker, he could not help throwing out ſome ſtrokes as to perſons allied to the Iriſh by blood, having a natural propenſity to indulge Papiſts; and upon this occaſion it was, that the Earl of Oſſory thought proper to anſwer him in the following ſpeech; the latter part of which is a ſuccinct view of his antagoniſt's meaſures, when he acted with the Court. The Earl of Shafteſbury, inſtead of replying with heat, as ſoon as the Earl ſat down, ſtood up again, and explained his firſt ſpeech in ſuch a manner, as that he ſeemed to take off thoſe reflections, that were undoubtedly deſigned to fall upon the Duke of Ormond; and this conceſſion in ſo great a man might well be eſteemed a victory.

'I am very ſorry, and do much wonder, to find 'that noble Lord ſo apt to reflect upon my father, 'when he is pleaſed to mention the affairs of Ire-'land. It is very well known that he was the chief 'perſon that ſuſtained the King's and the Proteſtant 'intereſt, when the Iriſh rebellion firſt broke out. 'His ſervices were ſo acceptable to the Long Parlia-'ment, that, after ſome ſucceſſes he had againſt the 'Iriſh rebels, the Parliament voted him thanks, and 'ſent him a rich jewel, as a mark of honour and 'their eſteem. It is well known, that when he had 'made two peaces with the Iriſh, they both times 'perfidiouſly broke them, and endeavoured his 'murder, and ſent out ſeveral excommunications 'againſt him, and thoſe that adhered to him. When 'he was abroad, I believe many may remember 'how, when the Duke of Glouceſter was taken into 'the hands of ſome that would have perverted him, 'the King commanded my father to bring him from 'Paris, which he did, notwithſtanding the threaten-'ings and animoſity of that party againſt him. 'How he has been laid at, by that party, ſince 'the King's Reſtoration, I think is ſufficiently noto-'rious. I beg your Lordſhips pardon, if the near-'neſs of my relation may have made me ſay any 'thing, which may look vain, being infinitely 'much concerned, that any ſuſpicion ſhould be 'raiſed againſt him, which may argue his being not 'ſufficiently zealous in all things wherein the Pro-'teſtant religion and the King's ſervice are con-'cerned. Having ſpoke of what he has done, I 'preſume with the ſame truth to tell your Lordſhips, 'what he has not done. He never adviſed the 'breaking of the triple league, he never adviſed the 'ſhutting up of the Exchequer, he never adviſed 'the declaration for a Toleration, he never adviſed 'the falling out with the Dutch and joining with 'France. He was not the author of that moſt ex-'cellent poſition of Delenda eſt Carthago, that Hol-'land, a Proteſtant country, ſhould, contrary to the 'true intereſt of England, be totally deſtroyed. I 'beg your Lordſhips will be ſo juſt, as to judge of 'my father and of all men, according to their 'actions and counſels (18).

children to the care of the Duke of Ormond his father; by whom they were educated and diſpoſed of in the world, in a manner ſuitable to their high quality [I]. To venture at drawing a character of this excellent perſon, at ſuch a diſtance of time, and from the ſcanty materials that we have been able to collect together, would be only amuſing the reader with a rude and imperfect ſketch of a picture that deſerves to be drawn at full length. We ſhall content ourſelves, therefore, barely with a few touches, and leave his portrait to be finiſhed by the hand of ſome able maſter. The Earl of Oſſory had a very graceful perſon, and, without concerning himſelf much about dreſs, made always as good a figure as any Nobleman at Court. He had a martial air, and that eaſineſs in addreſs, which is natural to thoſe who perform their exerciſes well, and have been much uſed to them. He poſſeſſed, in a high degree, all polite accompliſhments. He underſtood Muſic well, ſpoke and wrote French and Italian perfectly, underſtood moſt of the modern languages, and, with all the qualities that recommend a man in a Court, had all the talents alſo of a man of buſineſs. His courage was truly heroic, and roſe, upon all occaſions, in proportion to the danger; but it was the effect of his high ſpirit and good ſenſe, and not at all of a haſty diſpoſition, for in his behaviour no man was more cautious or more modeſt; and though, when he thought it neceſſary, he ſpoke with great warmth and freedom, yet he never did this unprovoked, and was very eaſily reconciled, provided he thought his antagoniſt ſincere. His generoſity was boundleſs, but at the ſame time was exerted to noble purpoſes, and upon proper occaſions. When he was Commander in Chief of the Engliſh brigade, and had the naming of the officers of ſix regiments, he ſhewed his diſintereſtedneſs in preferring men of merit freely, and at the ſame time directed his Secretary, Mr. Ellis of Pall-Mall, to take nothing for their commiſſions; and as he was by this means deprived of a conſiderable perquiſite, his Lordſhip thought himſelf obliged to make it up to him out of his own pocket. In a word, his virtue was unſpotted in the centre of a luxurious Court; his integrity unblemiſhed amidſt all the vices of his times; his honour untainted through the courſe of his whole life; his reputation general with all parties at home, and ſo diffuſed abroad, that he received the ſtrongeſt marks of confidence and eſteem from perſons of the higheſt rank in every nation in Europe; and had the honour of entertaining at his own houſe, all foreigners of diſtinction that viſited the Court of England in his time. Neither has this juſt tribute to his high virtues, and many amiable qualities, been confined only to the ſhort period of his life: the ſame felicity has attended his memory. Such as have written of Iriſh concerns, have commended his prudence in the government of that kingdom, of which he was twice Lord Deputy; thoſe who have treated of maritime affairs, have extolled his courage and conduct on board the fleet; and foreign Hiſtorians have recorded the great ſervices he performed in Flanders: nor even in theſe times, when men are too apt to take things in wrong lights, and to impoſe their own conceptions on poſterity for Hiſtory, has there yet appeared a writer ſo regardleſs of truth, or of his own character, as to venture a ſtroke of cenſure on that of Lord Oſſory.

[I] In a manner ſuitable to their high quality.] The Counteſs of Oſſory was naturaliſed by Act of Parliament, paſſed September 13, 1660 (20); and ſhe was conſidered throughout her whole life, as one of the beſt and moſt agreeable ladies of her rank, in the kingdom. She was certainly an excellent wife; and inſtead of reproaching the Earl with his ſingle indiſcretion, in point of play, ſhe always conſoled him with aſſurances, that ſhe would labour by her œconomy to prevent or repair any inconveniences it might otherwiſe occaſion (21). By her the Earl had eleven children, five ſons and ſix daughters, of whom the major part ſurvived him. His eldeſt ſon, James, who ſucceeded him in his title of Oſſory, was born April 29, 1665, in the caſtle of Dublin (22); and on the demiſe of his grandfather, ſucceeded him alſo, in the title of Ormond. Charles, the ſecond ſon, was created by King William and Queen Mary, in the year 1693, Baron of Cloghgrenan, Viſcount Tullogh, and Earl of Arran, in the kingdom of Ireland; as alſo Lord Butler of Weſton, in the county of Huntingdon, by which he became a Peer of England (23). His Lordſhip was Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, and Lord High-Steward of the city and liberty of Weſtminſter. Of Lord Oſſory's four ſurviving daughters, Lady Elizabeth, the eldeſt, was married to William Stanley, Earl of Derby (24); Lady Emilia Butler lived a maid: Lady Henrietta eſpouſed Henry Naſſau d'Auverquerque, Earl of Grantham (25); and Lady Catherine Butler never married. Another James, who was elder than the deceaſed Duke of Ormond, and two other ſons that were younger, dying in Ireland, were buried at Chriſt Church, Dublin, as were alſo two of his Lordſhip's daughters.  [In the Continuation of the Life of the Earl of Clarendon, there is a particular account of the quarrel between Lord Oſſory and the Duke of Buckingham, concerning the Iriſh Cattle Bill; and the ſtory, as told by the noble Hiſtorian, is far from redounding to the credit of the Duke (26).

The Duke of Ormond's being highly offended with his ſon, for engaging in the attack of the Dutch Smyrna fleet, before a declaration of war, diſplays the true honour and dignity of his Grace's ſentiments. The obſervation of thoſe formalities which the Law of Nations has been underſtood to preſcribe, before contending kingdoms actually draw the ſword, is founded both on the principles of equity and ſound policy. The deviations from ancient rules in this reſpect, which have lately taken place, were thought, without doubt, to be juſtified by ſufficient motives; but whether they will in the end appear to be the reſult of genuine wiſdom, may reaſonably be queſtioned.

We believe it is true, what our predeceſſor declares, that no writer has ventured a ſtroke of cenſure on Lord Oſſory. His qualities were of ſuch a ſplendid as well as ſolid nature, that they excited univerſal eſteem and affection. There are ſome characters which are peculiar favourites in their own times, and the memory of which is handed down to poſterity with ſingular pleaſure. The principal ingredients in the compoſition of theſe characters are, affability of temper, openneſs of behaviour, an abhorrence of diſſimulation and low policy, undaunted valour, and a generoſity bordering upon extravagance. The late Marquis of Granby ſeems to have reſembled Lord Oſſory, though with inferior abilities.] K.

BUTLER (SAMUEL), a celebrated Poet of the laſt century, was born at Strenſham in Worceſterſhire, and baptiſed there the thirteenth of February 1612 (a) [A]. His father Mr. Samuel Butler, a reputable country farmer [B], perceiving in his ſon an early inclination to learning, ſent him for education to the free-ſchool of Worceſter, under the care of Mr. Henry Bright; where having laid the foundation of Grammar-learning, he was ſent, for ſome time, to Cambridge [C], but was never matriculated in that Univerſity (b). After he had reſided there ſix or ſeven years (c), he returned to his native country, and became clerk to one Mr. Jefferys of Earl's-Croom, an eminent Juſtice of the Peace for that county, with whom he lived ſome years in an eaſy and reputable ſervice (d); during which time, through the indulgence of a kind maſter, he had ſufficient leiſure to apply himſelf to his favourite ſtudies, Hiſtory and Poetry; to which, for his diverſion, he added Muſic and Painting [D]. He was afterwards recommended to that great encourager of learning, Elizabeth, Counteſs of Kent; under whoſe patronage, he had not only the opportunity of conſulting all kinds of books, but of converſing likewiſe with that living library of learning, the great Mr. Selden (e); who was very converſant in that Lady's family, and often employed our Poet to write letters beyond ſea, and tranſlate for him (f). He lived ſome time alſo with Sir Samuel Luke, a gentleman of an ancient family in Bedfordſhire, and a famous commander under Oliver Cromwell; about which time he wrote the celebrated HUDIBRAS [E]; under which character, it is generally ſuppoſed, he intended to ridicule that Knight [F]. [B] His father——a reputable country farmer.] Anthony Wood tells us, that Butler's father had a competent eſtate of nearly three hundred pounds a year, but moſt of it in leaſe lands held of Sir Thomas Ruſſel, grandfather of Sir Francis Ruſſel, Baronet, Lord of the Manor of Strenſham (3). The authority of the Oxford Antiquary, in what he ſays of our Poet, is the more to be depended upon, as he had his information from Butler's own brother, then living.

[C] He was ſent, for ſome time, to Cambridge.] Some of the neighbourhood, Mr. Wood informs us (4), pretended, that Butler went to Oxford; and he aſſures us, that one Samuel Butler was elected from Weſtminſter-ſchool, a ſtudent of Chriſt-church in 1623; but, making very little ſtay there, he was not matriculated, and conſequently his age and place of nativity are not remaining on record in that Univerſity: otherwiſe, had he been a member of that body, we ſhould have known whether he was afterwards the famed author of Hudibras. The reader ſhould be told, that the gentleman mentioned above (5) affirmed, that Mr. Butler never reſided at Oxford.

[D] He applied himſelf to——Painting.] The anonymous author of his Life (6) tells us, he had ſeen ſome pictures, ſaid to be of Mr. Butler's drawing, which were preſerved in Mr. Jefferys's family: 'which 'I mention not (adds he) for the excellency of them, 'but to ſatisfy the reader of his early inclinations to 'that noble art; for which alſo he was afterwards 'entirely beloved by Mr. Samuel Cooper, one of the 'moſt eminent Painters of his time.' The Oxford Antiquary (7) places our Poet's improvement in Muſic and Painting to the time of his ſervice under the Counteſs of Kent.

[E] About which time he wrote the celebrated HUDIBRAS.] 'Though fate (ſays the Author of his 'Life) more than choice, ſeems to have placed him 'in the ſervice of a Knight, ſo notorious both in 'perſon and politics; yet, by the rule of contraries, 'one may obſerve throughout his whole poem, 'that he was moſt orthodox both in his religion 'and loyalty. And I am the more induced to believe he wrote it about that time, becauſe he had 'the opportunity to converſe with thoſe living characters of rebellion, nonſenſe and hypocriſy, which 'he ſo livelily and emphatically expoſes throughout 'the whole work (8).'

(8) Life, &c. page 7.

[F] It is generally ſuppoſed, he intended to ridicule Sir Samuel Luke under the character of Hudibras.] The principal reaſon of this conjecture is founded on the following paſſage of the poem:

'Tis ſung there is a valiant Mamaluke,
In foreign land ycleped ——
To whom we have been oft compared,
For perſon, parts, addreſs, and beard:
Both equally reputed ſtout;
And in the ſame cauſe both have fought.
He oft in ſuch attempts as theſe,
Came off with glory and ſucceſs;
Nor will we fail i' th' execution
For want of equal reſolution (9).

(9) Hudibras, Part i. Canto i. ver. 904.

The name Sir Samuel Luke exactly ſupplies the deficiency in the ſecond line, if you melt the two ſyllables of SAMUEL into one; and the compariſon Hudibras makes between himſelf and that Knight, ſeems to juſtify the ſuppoſition. But what tends farther to confirm it, is a ballad, intitled, A Tale of the Cobler and Vicar of Bray, printed in Butler's poſthumous Works (10); in which Sir Samuel Luke is thus characterized:

(10) Page 285. See the Remark [R].

In Bedfordſhire there dwelt a Knight,
Sir Samuel by name,
Who by his feats in civil broils
Obtained a mighty fame.

Nor was he much leſs wiſe than ſtout,
But fit in both reſpects
To humble ſturdy Cavaliers,
And to ſupport the ſects.

This worthy Knight was one that ſwore
He wou'd not cut his beard,
Till this ungodly nation was
From Kings and Biſhops clear'd.

Which holy vow he firmly kept,
And moſt devoutly wore
A griezly meteor on his face,
Till they were both no more.

His Worſhip was, in ſhort, a man
Of ſuch exceeding worth,
No pen or pencil can deſcribe,
Or rhyming bard ſet forth.

Many and mighty things he did
Both ſober and in liquor;
Witneſs the mortal fray between
The Cobler and the Vicar.

Then follows the tale, in which the Knight acts as a Juſtice of the Peace, and has a Clerk named Ralph:

RALPH, who was both his Squire and Clerk,
And Conſtable withal.

I ſhall not diſpute whether this ballad be Butler's or not; but ſhall only obſerve from it, that as, in Hudibras, the Knight is ſuppoſed to be drawn in the character of Sir Samuel Luke, ſo here Sir Samuel is evidently drawn in the character of Hudibras. For, beſides what has been already quoted, he is armed with a Baſket-hilt:

Then up he took his baſket-hilt,

In

After the Reſtoration of King Charles II. our Poet was made Secretary to Richard Earl of Carberry, Lord Preſident of the Principality of Wales, who appointed him Steward of Ludlow-Caſtle, when the Court was revived there; and about this time he married one Mrs. Herbert, a gentlewoman of a very good family [G]. The Oxford Antiquary pretends (g), that Butler was Secretary to George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, when that Lord was Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge; and the Life-writer aſſures us (b), the Duke had a great kindneſs for our Poet, and was often a benefactor to him [H]. But no one was a more generous friend to Mr. Butler, than that Mæcenas of all learned and witty men, Charles Lord Buckhurſt, the late Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex; who, being himſelf an excellent Poet, knew how to ſet a juſt value upon the ingenious performances of others (i); and we are told, he owed it to that Nobleman, that the Court taſted his Hudibras (k). He had alſo promiſes of places and employments of great value and credit, from the Lord Clarendon, High Chancellor of England (l); but they proved mere Court promiſes. In ſhort, Mr. Butler affords a remarkable inſtance of that coldneſs and neglect, which great geniuſes often experience from the Court and age in which they live [I]. The integrity of his life, the acuteneſs of

And ſerve for fight and dinner both (11).

(11) Hudibras, Part i. Canto i. ver. 351.

And whether we ſuppoſe this ballad to be written before or after Hudibras, it will equally anſwer our purpoſe: for, in the firſt caſe, it will be evident, that Butler drew from this character; and, in the latter, it will ſhew, that, at that time, Sir Samuel Luke was generally underſtood to be meant under the character of Hudibras. The new editor of Hudibras (†) tells us, 'it has been ſuggeſted—that, notwithſtanding Sir Samuel Luke of Wood-end, in the pariſh of Cople, in Bedfordſhire, has generally been reputed the Hero of this poem, yet, from the circumſtances of his being compared to Sir Samuel Luke, it is ſcarce probable, that he was intended, it being an uncommon thing to compare a perſon to himſelf: that the ſcene of action was in Weſtern Clime; whereas Bedfordſhire is north of London; and that he was credibly informed by a Bencher of Gray's-inn, who had it from an acquaintance of Mr. Butler's, that the perſon intended was Sir Henry Roſewell, of Ford-abbey in Devonſhire.—Theſe, indeed (adds our Editor), would be probable reaſons to deprive Bedfordſhire of its Hero, did not Mr. Butler, in his Memoirs of 1649, give the ſame deſcription of Sir Samuel Luke; and, in his Dunſtable-Downs, expreſsly ſtyle Sir Samuel Luke, Sir Hudibras. And from the ſham ſecond part, publiſhed 1663, it appears, that the Bear-bating was at Brentford, which is Weſt of London; and this might induce him to ſay,

'In Weſtern Clime there is a Town, &c.'

[G] He married Mrs. Herbert, a gentlewoman of a very good family.] Anthony Wood ſays, ſhe was a widow, and that Butler ſupported himſelf by her jointure; for though, in his riper years, he had ſtudied the Common Law, yet he made no advantage by the practice of it (12). But the Life-writer aſſures us, ſhe was not a widow; and that, though ſhe had a competent fortune, it was of little or no advantage to Butler, being moſt of it unfortunately loſt by being put out on bad ſecurities (13).

[H] Wood pretends, he was Secretary to the Duke of Buckingham —— and the Life-writer aſſures us, the Duke had a great kindneſs for him, &c.] The late ingenious Major Richardſon Pack tells us a ſtory; which, if it be true, overthrows the aſſertion both of the Antiquary and the Life-writer. We ſhall give it in his own words. 'Mr. Wycherly had always laid hold 'of an opportunity, which offered, to repreſent to 'his Grace (the Duke of Buckingham) how well Mr. 'Butler had deſerved of the Royal Family by writing 'his inimitable Hudibras; and that it was a reproach 'to the Court, that a perſon of his loyalty and wit 'ſhould ſuffer in obſcurity, and under the wants he 'did. The Duke ſeemed always to hearken to him 'with attention enough, and, after ſome time, undertook to recommend his pretenſions to his Majeſty. Mr. Wycherly, in hopes to keep him ſteady 'to his word, obtained of his Grace to name a day, 'when he might introduce that modeſt and unfortunate Poet to his new patron. At laſt an appointment was made, and the place of meeting was 'agreed to be the Roe-buck. Mr. Butler and his 'friend attended accordingly; the Duke joined them. 'But, as the D—l would have it, the door of the 'room where they ſat was open, and his Grace, who 'had ſeated himſelf near it, obſerving a pimp of 'his acquaintance (the creature too was a Knight) 'trip by with a brace of ladies, immediately quitted 'his engagement, to follow another kind of buſineſs, 'at which he was more ready, than in doing good 'offices to men of deſert; though no one was better 'qualified than he, both in regard to his fortune and 'underſtanding, to protect them; and from that hour, 'to the day of his death, poor Butler never found 'the leaſt effect of his promiſe (14).'

[I] He affords a remarkable inſtance of that coldneſs and neglect, which the greateſt geniuſes often experience from the court and age in which they live.] We are told, indeed, by the gentleman mentioned in the remark [A], that King Charles II. once ordered him a ſmall gratuity of three hundred pounds; which had this compliment attending it, that it paſſed all the offices without any fee, at the ſolicitation of Mr. William Longueville of the Temple, Lord Danby being at that time High Treaſurer. But this ſeems to have been the only Court-favour he ever received. A ſtrange inſtance of neglect, when we conſider King Charles's exceſſive fondneſs for the poem of Hudibras. This is movingly related by our Poet himſelf (†), who thence takes occaſion to do juſtice to his poem, by hinting its excellencies in general, and paying a few modeſt compliments to himſelf; of which the following lines are worth tranſcribing:

(†) In his Hudibras at Court. See his Remains.

Now you muſt know, Sir Hudibras
With ſuch perfections gifted was,
And ſo peculiar in his manner,
That all that ſaw him, did him honour.
Among the reſt this Prince was one,
Admired his converſation:
This Prince, whoſe ready wit and parts
Conquer'd both men and women's hearts,
Was ſo o'ercome with Knight and Ralph,
That he cou'd never claw it off:
He never eat, nor drank, nor ſlept,
But Hudibras ſtill near him kept;
Nor wou'd he go to church, or ſo,
But Hudibras muſt with him go;
Nor yet to viſit concubine,
Or at a City feaſt to dine,
But Hudibras muſt ſtill be there,
Or all the fat was in the fire.
Now after all, was it not hard,
That he ſhould meet with no reward,
That fitted out this Knight and Squire,
This monarch did ſo much admire?
That he ſhou'd never reimburſe
The man for th' equipage, or horſe,
Is ſure a ſtrange ungrateful thing,
In any body but a King.
But this good King, it ſeems, was told,
By ſome that were with him too bold,
If e'er you hope to gain your ends,
Careſs your foes, and truſt your friends.

Such

of his wit, and eaſineſs of his converſation, rendered him highly acceptable to all men: yet he was very delicate, as well as ſparing, in the choice of his acquaintance. After having lived to a good old age [K], admired by all, though perſonally known to but few, he died [L] the twenty-fifth of September 1680, and was buried at the expence of his good friend Mr. Longueville of the Temple [M], in the Church-yard of St. Paul's Covent-garden (m). He had no funeral monument for many years; till, in 1721, Mr. Barber, an Alderman of London, generouſly erected one to his memory, among the Poets, in Weſtminſter-abbey [N]. The Poem, intituled HUDIBRAS [O], by

Such were the doctrines that were taught,
Till this unthinking King was brought
To leave his friends to ſtarve and die,
A poor reward for loyalty!

Our author's fate in this reſpect is juſtly and pathetically lamented by Mr. Oldham, in his Satire againſt Poetry (15); in which he introduces the ghoſt of Spenſer diſſuading him from Poetry, upon experience and example, that poverty and contempt were its inſeparable companions. After mentioning the caſes of Homer and Cowley, he goes on:

(15) See Poems and Tranſlations by J. Oldham. Lond. 1683. p. 173.

On Butler who can think without juſt rage,
The glory and the ſcandal of the age?
Fair ſtood his hopes, when firſt he came to town,
Met every where with welcomes of renown;
Courted and lov'd by all, with wonder read,
And promiſes of princely favour fed.
But what reward for all had he at laſt,
After a life in dull expectance paſt?
The wretch, at ſumming up his miſpent days,
Of all his gains by verſe he could not ſave
Enough to purchaſe flannel and a grave.
Reduc'd to want, he in due time fell ſick,
Was fain to die, and be interr'd on tick;
And well might bleſs the fever that was ſent
To rid him hence, and his worſe fate prevent.

In like manner Mr. Dryden, in his Hind and Panther (16), makes the Hind (or Church of Rome) object to the Panther (or Church of England) her hard-heartedneſs in neglecting a Poet, who had ſtood up in her defence.

Unpitied Hudibras, your champion friend,
Has ſhewn how far your charities extend:
This laſting verſe ſhall on his tomb be read,
He ſham'd you living, and upbraids you dead.

[K] He lived to a good old age.] According to Anthony Wood and the Life-writer, he was ſixty-eight years of age when he died: but, according to Mr. Longueville, he was about fourſcore.

[L] His Death.] The Oxford Antiquary, and the writer of his Life, tell us, he died of a conſumption. Mr. Oldham ſays, he was carried off by a fever:

(17) See the Remark [J].

And well might bleſs the fever that was ſent, &c. (17).

But Mr. Longueville aſcribes his death only to old age; which may well be, if he arrived to fourſcore years. The ſame gentleman informs us, that Butler lived for ſome years in Roſe-ſtreet, Covent-garden, and probably died there.

[M] He was buried at the expence of Mr. Longueville of the Temple.] That gentleman (as we learn from his ſon Mr. Charles Longueville) would fain have buried him in Weſtminſter-Abbey, and ſpoke, with that view, to ſeveral perſons, who had been his admirers, offering to pay his part; but none of them would contribute: upon which Mr. Longueville buried him very privately at St. Paul's Covent-garden; himſelf, and ſeven or eight more, following him to the grave.

[O] His Poem, intituled, HUDIBRAS.] This incomparable performance is ſo well known to all who are the leaſt converſant in the Belles Lettres, that very little needs to be ſaid of it here. It is of the burleſque kind, being uſually ſtyled a Mock Heroic, or Mock Epic; and is pretty much of the nature of Homer's Margites; which, according to Ariſtotle, bore the ſame relation to Comedy, that the Iliad and Odyſſey do to Tragedy. The hint of this poem is taken from the inimitable Don Quixote; but, in other reſpects, it is perfectly an original, being intended as a general ſatire on thoſe times of anarchy and confuſion, during which the Poet lived. The Knight's name, and ſomething of his character, are borrowed from Spenſer's Fairy Queen (18):

(18) Book ii. Canto i, Stanza 17.

He that made love unto the eldeſt dame,
Was hight Sir Hudibras, an hardy man;
Yet not ſo good of deeds, as great of name,
Which he by many raſh adventures wan,
Since errant arms to ſhew he firſt began.
More huge in ſtrength, than wiſe in works he was,
And reaſon with fool-hardiſe over-ran:
Stern melancholy did his courage paſs;
And was (for terror more) all arm'd in ſhining braſs.

As to the verſification of this poem, I ſhall give the reader the ſentiments of two great judges of Poetry, Mr. Dryden and Mr. Addiſon. 'The ſort of verſe, 'which is called burleſque, conſiſting of eight ſyl-'lables, or four feet, is that which our excellent 'Hudibras has choſen.—The worth of his poem is 'too well known to need any commendation. His 'ſatire is of the Varronian kind, though unmixed 'with proſe. The choice of his numbers is ſuitable 'enough to his deſign, as he has managed it: but, 'in any other hand, the ſhortneſs of his verſe, and 'the quick returns of rhyme, had debaſed the ſtyle. 'And beſides, the double rhyme (a neceſſary com-'panion of burleſque writing) is not ſo proper for 'manly ſatire; for it turns earneſt too much into 'jeſt, and gives us a boyiſh kind of pleaſure. It 'tickles aukwardly with a kind of pain to the 'beſt ſort of readers: we are pleaſed ungratefully, 'and, if I may ſo ſay, againſt our liking; we thank 'him not for giving us that unſeaſonable delight, 'when we know he could have given us a better and 'more ſolid. He might have left that taſk to others, 'who, not being able to put in thought, can only 'make us grin with the excreſcence of a word of 'two or three ſyllables in the cloſe. It is indeed be-'low ſo great a maſter to make uſe of ſuch a little 'inſtrument. But his good ſenſe is perpetually ſhin-'ing through all he writes: it affords us not the 'time of finding faults. We paſs through the levity 'of the rhyme, and are immediately carried into 'ſome admirable uſeful thought. After all, he has 'choſen this kind of verſe, and has written the beſt 'in it; and had he taken another, he would always 'have excelled. As we ſay of a court-favourite, 'that whatever his office be, he ſtill makes it upper-'moſt, and moſt beneficial to himſelf (19).' Mr. Addiſon, ſpeaking of the ſeveral kinds of falſe wit, ſays: I muſt ſubjoin the double rhymes, which are uſed in doggrel poetry, and generally applauded by ignorant readers. If the thought of the couplet in ſuch compoſitions is good, the rhymes add little to it; and if bad, it will not be in the power of the rhyme to recommend it. I am afraid, that great numbers of thoſe, who admire the incomparable Hudibras, do it more on account of thoſe by which he acquired that high reputation as a Poet, which he continues to enjoy, was publiſhed at three different times. The firſt part came out in 1663, in octavo: afterwards came out the ſecond part; and both were printed together, with ſeveral additions and annotations. At length the third and laſt part was publiſhed, but without any annotations, as appears by the copy printed in 1678 (n). The great ſucceſs of this poem occaſioned ſeveral unſucceſsful imitations of it [P]; and ſome vain attempts have been made to tranſlate ſome parts of it into Latin [Q]. The Oxford Antiquary aſcribes to thoſe doggrel rhymes, than of the parts that really deſerve admiration. I am ſure, I have heard the more frequently quoted than the fineſt pieces of wit in the whole poem (20). But, notwithſtanding theſe cenſures, the ſhortneſs of our Author's verſe, and the quick returns of his rhymes, have been ſome of the principal means of raiſing and perpetuating the fame of this poem: for the turns of wit and ſatirical ſayings, being ſhort and pithy, are therefore more tenable by the memory; and this is one reaſon, why Hudibras is more frequently quoted in converſation, than the fineſt heroic poem. King Charles II. whom the judicious part of mankind will allow to have been a judge of wit, was ſo great an admirer of Hudibras (though he ſhamefully neglected its author) (†), that he would often pleaſantly quote it in converſation (21). And moſt of our Poets have teſtified their high opinion of Butler's genius; but none in a manner ſo much to his advantage as Mr. Prior in the following paſſage of his Alma:

But ſhall we take the Muſe abroad,
To drop her idly on the road,
And leave her ſubject in the middle,
As Butler did his bear and fiddle?
Yet he, conſummate Maſter, knew
When to recede, and where purſue:
His noble negligences teach
What others toils deſpair to reach.
He, perfect dancer, climbs the rope,
And balances your fear and hope:
If, after ſome diſtinguiſh'd leap,
He drops his pole, and ſeems to ſlip;
Strait gathering all his active ſtrength,
He riſes higher half his length.
With wonder you approve his ſlight,
And owe your pleaſure to your fright.
But, like poor Andrew, I advance,
Falſe mimic of my maſter's dance;
Around the cord awhile I ſprawl,
And thence, tho' low, in earneſt fall (22).

(22) Canto ii. init.

Nor has Hudibras wanted encomium from foreigners; among whom the French author of Diſſertation ſur la Poëſie Anglois (‡) expreſſes himſelf thus: 'The 'Engliſh have a Poet, whoſe reputation is equal to 'that of Scarron in French: I mean the Author of 'Hudibras, a comical Hiſtory in verſe, written in 'the time of Oliver Cromwell. It is ſaid to be a 'delicate ſatire on that kind of Interregnum; and 'that it is levelled particularly at the conduct of the 'Preſbyterians, whom the Author repreſents as a 'ſenſeleſs ſort of people, promoters of anarchy, and 'complete hypocrites. Hudibras, the hero of this 'poem, is a holy Don Quixote of that ſect, and a 'redreſſer of imaginary wrongs, that are done to his 'Dulcinea. The Knight has his Rozinante, his 'Burleſque Adventures, and his Sancho. But the 'Squire of the Engliſh Poet is of an oppoſite character to that of the Spaniſh Sancho; for, whereas 'the latter is a plain unaffected peaſant, the Engliſh 'Squire is a Taylor by trade; a Tartuff, or finiſhed 'hypocrite, by birth; and ſo deep a dogmatic Divine, that (‡) Gen. Dict. Vol. iv. p. 296.

He cou'd deep myſteries unriddle,
As eaſily as thread a needle,

'as it is ſaid in the poem. The author of Hudibras 'is preferable to Scarron, becauſe he has one fixed 'mark or object; and that, by a ſurpriſing effort of 'imagination, he has found the art of leading his 'readers to it, by diverting them.' M. de Voltaire highly extols this poem, and at the ſame time accounts for its never having been tranſlated into foreign languages. 'There is one Engliſh poem — 'the title whereof is Hudibras — it is Don Quixote, 'it is our Satire Menippée, blended together. I never 'met with ſo much wit in one ſingle book as in 'this: which at the ſame time is the moſt difficult 'to be tranſlated.—Who would believe, that a work, 'which paints in ſuch lively and natural colours the 'ſeveral foibles of mankind, and where we meet 'with more ſentiments than words, ſhould baffle 'the endeavours of the ableſt tranſlators? But the 'reaſon of it is this; almoſt every part of it alludes 'to particular incidents (†).' I ſhall only add, that ſome verſes in the poem of Hudibras were omitted, for reaſons of State, in the firſt impreſſion; ſuch as theſe following:

(†) Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, p. 212, 213. Lond. 1733. 8vo.

Did not the learned Glynn and Maynard,
To make good ſubjects traitors, ſtrain hard?
Was not the King, by proclamation,
Declar'd a traitor through the nation?

[P] There have been ſeveral unſucceſsful imitations of Hudibras.] Such as The Second Part of Hudibras; the Dutch and Scotch Hudibras; Butler's Ghoſt; the Occaſional Hypocrite; and ſome others. The Author of the firſt of theſe pieces, we are told, is ridiculed by Butler under the character of Whachum, towards the latter end of the ſecond part (23). I conjecture it muſt be that part of Whachum's character, which celebrates his ſkill in poetry. The verſes are admirable, and may ſerve as a ſpecimen of our Author's wit and humour.

Theſe laſt Latin verſes, which, in Butler's Life, are ſo incorrectly printed, as to be rendered almoſt nonſenſe, are here (it is hoped) reſtored to their genuine reading.

[R] The Poſthumous Works of Mr. Samuel Butler.] They are diſtributed into three volumes, in duodecimo, conſiſting of a great variety of pieces. The editor aſſures us, they are, 'the remains of that great 'and celebrated Genius Mr. Butler, Author of Hu- 'dibras,' and 'that a very great expence, and al- 'moſt incredible induſtry, had been laid out in col- 'lecting theſe pieces, which had been ſcattered through 'an infinite number of hands, and could not have 'been recovered but by the moſt intenſe application.' He adds, that 'they were written, as may be col- 'lected from the general arguments, partly during 'the rebellion, and partly at the latter end of King 'Charles the Second's reign, about which time the 'inimitable Author died.' We ſhall take notice here only of thoſe pieces in this collection, of which the publiſher has given ſome account. The Fable of the Lion and the Fox, he tells us, was obtained by the intereſt of an eminent Clergyman in Buckinghamſhire, who had been Chaplain to the old Earl of Caernarvon; who informed him, that Mr. Butler uſed to make long and frequent viſits to Aſket, the name of that Lord's ſeat; and that, at intervals, when he was diſengaged from my Lord's company, he wrote this piece, and ſeveral others. The Clergyman added, he believed the Fable of the Lion and the Fox was Mr. Butler's firſt eſſay in this kind of poetry, and that, after he had finiſhed it, he diſliked it, and threw it by, till Mr. Dichfield, who was then domeſtic Chaplain to the family, happened to get a copy, which he ſhewed to the clergy, and other gentlemen, that came to viſit my Lord, who generally took copies of it alſo, ſome of which are to be met with in their families at this time; and that the applauſe and credit Mr. Butler gained by this fable, induced him ſoon after to begin his Hudibras. With regard to the Memoirs of the years 49 and 50, the Editor aſſures us, he had ſeen ſeveral of Mr. Butler's Letters to his friends, in which was a part of them, together with the verſes, as they are now interſperſed and printed with them. The Earl of Pembroke's Speeches were intended as a burleſque on that nobleman's ſpeeches in the Houſe of Lords; which, we are told, were the common talk and ſport of the kingdom; and that many of the Wits, at that time, turned them into lampoons and ridicule; among whom Mr. Butler was one, who put them into the dreſs we now ſee them in, and ſent them incloſed in letters to his particular friends and acquaintance, from whoſe copies they were afterwards printed, without Mr. Butler's knowledge, and very much againſt his inclination. The Speeches of Alderman Atkins and Hugh Peters (the Editor tells us) were written by Butler, at the command of the Lord Carberry, to expoſe the intolerable profaneneſs and ſtupidity of the Faction. The Poem intitled Hudibras at Court, was communicated by the ſame hand as the Fable of the Lion and the Fox. The Editor ſays, it was doubtleſs intended as a Fourth Part of Hudibras, as is obvious to any perſon that compares it with the other three. How the Author came to drop the deſign, and to conclude the Firſt Canto with a ſevere Satire on the Court, is differently reported; but the moſt general and probable conjecture (he tells us) is, that, after a long and fruitleſs dependance on the promiſes of the King and the great Courtiers, full of reſentment, he reſolved to leave the Court, to which he could never again be reconciled to the day of his death. The pieces contained in the third volume of this collection, the publiſher aſſures us, were moſt of them written in Mr. Butler's own hand, as will appear by the originals in the cuſtody of the Printer. The Poem called Dunſtable-Downs, or the Inchanted Cave, and The Tale of the Cobler and Vicar of Bray, were given to the Editor by a gentleman, whoſe father was an intimate of Mr. Butler's, at the time he was Clerk to Sir Samuel Luke; and who aſſured him, the facts of both were true; and that Butler, who was then very young, wrote them whilſt he was with Sir Samuel, and, when he left that ſervice, gave his father the copies. The reſt of the pieces in this volume, excepting the Coffin for the good old Cauſe, which is generally ſuppoſed to be Sir Samuel's own, and publiſhed juſt before the expiration of the Rump, were collected from the Papers of Sir Roger L'Eſtrange, Dr. Midgley, Mr. Charles Booth, Amanuenſis to the late Duke of Buckingham, Lord Rocheſter, and Captain Julian, the famous Satire-monger of that time.

No Jeſuit e'er took in hand
To plant a Church in barren land;
Nor ever thought it worth the while
A Swede or Ruſs to reconcile.
For where there is no ſtore of wealth,
Souls are not worth the charge of health.
Spain in America had two deſigns,
To ſell their Goſpel for their mines:
For had the Mexicans been poor,
No Spaniard twice had landed on their ſhore.
'Twas gold the Catholic Religion planted,
Which, had they wanted gold, they ſtill had wanted. B.

 [The moſt diligent inveſtigation hath ſcarcely been able to collect any new facts concerning Butler's perſonal hiſtory, beſides thoſe which have been given by Anthony Wood, and the Writer of his Life, prefixed to the later Editions of his Hudibras. No additional circumſtances are furniſhed in this reſpect, either by the Editor of his Genuine Remains, or by Dr. Johnſon. The Doctor doth not think that there himself (q). A new edition of Mr. Butler's Hudibras was published in 1744, by Zachary Grey, LL.D. with large annotations, and a preface, in two volumes 8*vo*. (q) Life, &c.

is any certainty of Butler's having ever received a gratuity of three hundred pounds from King Charles the Second. If it be true, that such a benefaction was granted him by his Majesty, as is related in Note [I], the honourable manner in which it was applied by our Poet ought not to have been omitted. He did not take a single shilling of it himself, but requested his friend Mr. Longueville to convert the whole gratuity to the payment of some debts which he had contracted (29). That Butler was under no obligations to the Duke of Buckingham, is probable, not only from Major Pack's story, but from a character which we find of that Nobleman in our Author's Genuine Remains. This character is drawn with great severity. It is written, as Dr. Johnson observes, 'with a degree of acrimony, such as neglect and disappointment might naturally excite; and such as it would be hard to imagine Butler capable of expressing against a man who had any claim to his gratitude (30).

(30) Butler's Genuine Remains, Vol. ii. p. 72—75. Johnson's Life of Butler, p. 11.

Major Pack's story, in its essential circumstances, is confirmed by the anonymous Writer of a Pamphlet, published in 1713, intitled, 'Les Soupirs de la Grand Bretagne: or, The Groans of Great Britain.' 'The then Duke of Buckingham, says this Author, who was no niggard of his money on his whimsies, though a professed friend to poetry, could not be brought to do any thing for Butler. Mr. Wycherly had one night fixed him at the Cock in Suffolk-street, to a conversation with Mr. Butler, in order to do the latter a service. They had not been long together, but the Duke was infinitely pleased with the Poet: but in the midst of the business, he heard some squeaking fiddle and whores in another room, and broke from the Poet, and run to his whores. The former starved, and the latter had his money.' Butler,' says the same Writer, '(a species by himself) whilst he pleased the Court and City with his verses, perished for want. The Chancellor often bid him find out something to make him easy; which when he had done, it was sure to be disposed of before he could put in for it. But that Statesman comforted him, by telling him, that the Courtiers had a quarrel with him, since the King still answered them out of his book: but Butler replied, that he wished that his Majesty would think a little of the Author, since he was so conversant with his works.' We are farther informed, 'that Sir William Davenant, with a very ordinary capacity, and no genius, found friends and got money, whilst Butler could not attend at the levees of great men, and fawn on their valets (*).' It is necessary here to observe, that the notion of our Poet's having perished for want is groundless. Mr. Charles Longueville assured the Authors of the General Dictionary, that notwithstanding the many disappointments Mr. Butler met with, he never was reduced to any thing like want and beggary, and that he did not die in any person's debt.

(*) Les Soupirs de la Grand Bretagne, &c. p. 65, 66. We are indebted to Mr. Reed for the knowledge and use of this pamphlet.

It is said, that Butler did not shine in conversation till he had taken a chearful glass, though he was no intemperate drinker. Concerning the nature of his convivial talents, we find the following story in the British Biography. 'Before he was personally known to the Earl of Dorset, that Nobleman had a great desire to spend an evening with him as a private Gentleman; and with that view prevailed on Mr. Fleetwood Shepherd to introduce him into his company at a tavern which they used, in the character only of a common friend. This being done, Mr. Butler, we are told, whilst the first bottle was drinking, appeared very flat and heavy; at the second bottle extremely brisk and lively, full of wit and learning, and a most pleasant, agreeable companion; but before the third bottle was finished, sunk again into such stupidity and dulness, that hardly any body could have believed him to be the Author of Hudibras, a book abounding with so much wit, learning, and pleasantry. Next morning, Mr. Shepherd asked his Lordship's opinion of Mr. Butler, who answered, "He is like a nine-pin, little "at both ends, but great in the middle (31)." Dr. Johnson thus sums up our Poet's personal history.

(31) British Biography, ubi supra, p. 439, 440.

'In this mist of obscurity passed the life of Butler, a man whose name can only perish with his language. The date of his birth is doubtful; the mode and place of his education are unknown; the events of his life are variously related; and all that can be told with certainty is, that he was poor (32).' (32) Johnson, ubi supra, p. 15.

Soon after Mr. Alderman Barber had erected a Monument to our Poet's memory in Westminster Abbey, Mr. Samuel Wesley wrote this Epigram.

'While Butler, needy wretch, was yet alive,
No generous patron would a dinner give:
See him when starv'd to death, and turn'd to dust,
Presented with a monumental Bust.
The Poet's fate is here in emblem shown,
He ask'd for bread, and he receiv'd a stone (33).' (33) British Biography, ubi supra, p. 441.

The succeeding lines, on the same occasion, are supposed to have been written by Mr. Pope:

'Respect to Dryden Sheffield justly paid,
And noble Villiers honour'd Cowley's shade:
But whence this Barber? that a name so mean
Should, join'd with Butler's, on a tomb be seen.
This pyramid would better far proclaim,
To future ages, humbler Settle's name:
Poet and Patron then had been well pair'd,
The City Printer and the City Bard (34).' (34) Additions to Pope's Works, Vol. i. p. 13. Johnson's Poets, Vol. xxxiii. p. 367.

In 1759, Mr. Thyer, keeper of the public library at Manchester, published, in two volumes octavo, the Genuine Remains, in Verse and Prose, of Mr. Butler, from the original Manuscripts, formerly in the possession of W. Longueville, Esq. The authenticity of these pieces is decisively established by the learned Editor, who hath accompanied them with suitable Notes. From this publication it appears, that very few of the compositions which are found in what are called the posthumous Works of Mr. Samuel Butler are authentic. In the poetical part of the Genuine Remains, which occupies most of the first volume, some of the less perfect copies of verses might, without prejudice to the Author's reputation, have been omitted. One object of his satire and ridicule is the Royal Society, 'of which,' says Dr. Johnson, 'the enemies were for some time very numerous and very acrimonious; for what reason it is hard to conceive; since the philosophers professed not to advance doctrines, but to produce facts; and the most zealous enemy of innovation must admit the gradual progress of experience, however he may oppose hypothetical temerity (35).' The second volume consists of Characters (a species of wit much in fashion in the beginning of the last century), and of Thoughts upon various Subjects. The 'Characters' are strongly drawn, and have in them some admirable strokes of humour; and many of the 'Thoughts upon various Subjects' are equally ingenious and just. (35) Life of Butler, p. 14, 15.

Besides the large Notes with which Dr. Zachary Grey accompanied his Edition of Hudibras, he left at his decease a number of others in manuscript, probably designed for a future edition, which are now in the hands of Mr. Nichols. We have likewise, in our own possession, some Notes, found among Mr. Oldys's papers, principally tending to illustrate several of Butler's allusions to both ancient and modern Authors.

Besides the cause alleged by Monsr. Voltaire, in Note [O], why Hudibras is so difficult to be translated, there is another reason given for it by Dr. Towers, who observes, that much of the pleasure we receive from reading the work, arises not only from the thoughts, but from the humourous turn of the phrase; which it is impossible to transfer into a foreign language (36). Difficult, however, as the undertaking may be, it hath not been left unattempted; for there is a French translation of Hudibras, in three volumes 12*mo*, with Notes by the Translator, who was —— Townley, junior, Esq; of Townley, in Lancashire (37). Not having seen this work, we cannot give its character; but if the Author was a competent master of the French burlesque versification, he has probably succeeded the better for having been an English Gentleman, who was well acquainted with the manners and incidents described and alluded to by Butler. (36) Brit. Biography, Vol. v. p. 442. Note. (37) From the information of Mr. Nichols.

'Burlesque,'

'Burleſque,' ſays Mr. Shenſtone, 'may, perhaps, 'be divided into ſuch as turns chiefly upon the 'thought, and ſuch as depends more upon the ex-'preſſion: or we may add a third kind, conſiſting in 'thoughts ridiculouſly dreſſed in language much 'above or below their dignity. The Splendid Shil-'ling of Mr. Philips, and the Hudibras of Butler, 'are the moſt obvious inſtances. Butler, however, 'depended much upon the ludicrous effect of his 'double rhymes. In other reſpects, to declare my 'own ſentiments, he is rather a witty Writter than 'a humourous one (38).'

(38) Shenſtone's Works, Vol. ii. p. 182. third edition.

But the moſt capital criticiſm ever publiſhed on Hudibras, is that with which the world of taſte and literature hath lately been favoured by Dr. Johnſon. This is ſo ingenious, maſterly, and candid an appreciation of the excellencies and defects of the Poem, that our inſerting it entire will require no apology.

'The poem of Hudibras is one of thoſe compo-'ſitions of which a nation may juſtly boaſt; as the 'images which it exhibits are domeſtic, the ſenti-'ments unborrowed and unexpected, and the ſtrain 'of diction original and peculiar. We muſt not, 'however, ſuffer the pride which we aſſume as the 'countrymen of Butler to make any encroachment 'upon juſtice, nor appropriate thoſe honours which 'others have a right to ſhare. The poem of Hu-'dibras is not wholly Engliſh; the original idea is 'to be found in the hiſtory of Don Quixote; a book 'to which a mind of the greateſt powers may be in-'debted without diſgrace.

'Cervantes ſhews a man, who, having, by the 'inceſſant peruſal of incredible tales, ſubjected his 'underſtanding to his imagination, and familiariſed 'his mind by pertinacious meditation to think of 'incredible events and ſcenes of impoſſible exiſt-'ence, goes out in the pride of knighthood, to re-'dreſs wrongs, and defend virgins, to reſcue cap-'tive princeſſes, and tumble uſurpers from their 'thrones; attended by a ſquire, whoſe cunning, 'too low for the ſuſpicion of a generous mind, en-'ables him often to cheat his maſter.

'The hero of Butler is a Preſbyterian Juſtice, 'who, in the confidence of legal authority, and the 'rage of zealous ignorance, ranges the country to 'repreſs ſuperſtition and correct abuſes, accompa-'nied by an Independent clerk, diſputatious and 'obſtinate, with whom he often debates, but never 'conquers him.

'Cervantes had ſo much kindneſs for Don Quix-'ote, that however he embarraſſes him with abſurd 'diſtreſſes, he gives him ſo much ſenſe and virtue as 'may preſerve our eſteem: wherever he is, or what-'ever he does, he is made by matchleſs dexterity 'commonly ridiculous, but never contemptible.

'But for poor Hudibras, his Poet had no tender-'neſs: he chuſes not that any pity ſhould be ſhewn 'or reſpect paid him: he gives him up at once to 'laughter and contempt, without any quality that 'can dignify or protect him.

'In forming the character of Hudibras, and de-'ſcribing his perſon and habiliments, the Author 'ſeems to labour with a tumultuous confuſion of diſ-'ſimilar ideas. He had read the hiſtory of the mock 'knights errant; he knew the notions and manners 'of a Preſbyterian magiſtrate, and tried to unite the 'abſurdities of both, however diſtant, in one per-'ſonage. Thus he gives him that pedantic oſtenta-'tion of knowledge which has no relation to chi-'valry, and loads him with martial incumbrances 'that can add nothing to his civil dignity. He ſends 'him out a colonelling, and yet never brings him 'within ſight of war.

'If Hudibras be conſidered as the repreſentative 'of the Preſbyterians, it is not eaſy to ſay why his 'weapons ſhould be repreſented as ridiculous or uſe-'leſs; for, whatever judgment might be paſſed upon 'their knowledge or their arguments, experience had 'ſufficiently ſhown that their ſwords were not to be 'deſpiſed.

'The hero, thus compounded of ſwaggerer and 'pedant, of knight and juſtice, is led forth to 'action, with his ſquire Ralph, an Independent en-'thuſiaſt.

'Of the contexture of events planned by the Au-'thor, which is called the action of the poem, ſince 'it is left imperfect, no judgment can be made. It 'is probable that the hero was to be led through 'many luckleſs adventures, which would give occa-'ſion, like his attack upon the bear and fiddle, to 'expoſe the ridiculous rigour of the ſectaries; like 'his encounter with Sidrophel and Whacum, to 'make ſuperſtition and credulity contemptible; or, 'like his recourſe to the low retailer of the law, 'diſcover the fraudulent practices of different pro-'feſſions.

'What ſeries of events he would have formed, or 'in what manner he would have rewarded or pu-'niſhed his hero, it is now in vain to conjecture. His 'work muſt have had, as it ſeems, the defect which 'Dryden imputes to Spenſer; the action could not 'have been one; there could only have been a ſuc-'ceſſion of incidents, each of which might have hap-'pened without the reſt, and which could not all co-'operate to any ſingle concluſion.

'The diſcontinuity of the action might, however, 'have been eaſily forgiven, if there had been action 'enough; but I believe every reader regrets the 'paucity of events, and complains that in the poem 'of Hudibras, as in the hiſtory of Thucydides, there 'is more ſaid than done. The ſcenes are too ſeldom 'changed, and the attention is tired with long con-'verſation.

'It is indeed much more eaſy to form dialogues 'than to contrive adventures. Every poſition makes 'way for an argument, and every objection dictates 'an anſwer. When two diſputants are engaged up-'on a complicated and extenſive queſtion, the dif-'ficulty is not to continue but to end the contro-'verſy. But whether it be that we comprehend but 'few of the poſſibilities of life, or that life itſelf af-'fords little variety, every man who has tried knows 'how much labour it will coſt to form ſuch a com-'bination of circumſtances, as ſhall have at once the 'grace of novelty and credibility, and delight fancy 'without violence to reaſon.

'Perhaps the dialogue of this poem is not perfect. 'Some power of engaging the attention might have 'been added to it, by quicker reciprocation, by ſea-'ſonable interruptions, by ſudden queſtions, and by 'a nearer approach to dramatic ſpritelineſs; without 'which, fictitious ſpeeches will always tire, however 'ſparkling with ſentences, and however variegated 'with alluſions.

'The great ſource of pleaſure is variety. Uni-'formity muſt tire at laſt, though it be uniformity of 'excellence. We love to expect; and, when ex-'pectation is diſappointed or gratified, we want to 'be again expecting. For this impatience of the 'preſent, whoever would pleaſe, muſt make pro-'viſion. The ſkilful writer irritat, mulcet, makes a 'due diſtribution of the ſtill and animated parts. It 'is for want of this artful intertexture, and thoſe 'neceſſary changes, that the whole of a book may 'be tedious, though all the parts are praiſed.

'If unexhauſtible wit could give perpetual plea-'ſure, no eye would ever leave half-read the work 'of Butler: for what Poet has ever brought ſo many 'remote images ſo happily together? It is ſcarcely 'poſſible to peruſe a page without finding ſome aſſo-'ciation of images that was never found before. By 'the firſt paragraph the reader is amuſed, by the 'next he is delighted, and by a few more ſtrained 'to aſtoniſhment; but aſtoniſhment is a toilſome 'pleaſure: he is ſoon weary of wondering, and longs 'to be diverted.

"Omnia vult belle Matho dicere, dic aliquando
"Et bene, dic neutrum, dic aliquando male."

'Imagination is uſeleſs without knowledge: na-'ture gives in vain the power of combination, unleſs 'ſtudy and obſervation ſupply materials to be com-'bined. Butler's treaſures of knowledge appear pro-'portioned to his expence: whatever topic em-'ploys his mind, he ſhews himſelf qualified to ex-'pand and illuſtrate it with all the acceſſories that 'books can furniſh: he is found not only to have 'travelled the beaten road, but the bye-paths of li-'terature; not only to have taken general ſurveys, 'but to have examined particulars with minute in-'ſpection.

'If the French boaſt the learning of Rabelais, 'we need not be afraid of confronting them with 'Butler.

'But the moſt valuable parts of his performance 'are thoſe which retired ſtudy and native wit cannot 'ſupply.

'ſupply. He that merely makes a book from books 'may be uſeful, but can ſcarcely be great. Butler had 'not ſuffered life to glide beſide him unſeen or un-'obſerved. He had watched with great diligence 'the operations of human nature, and traced the 'effects of opinion, humour, intereſt, and paſſion. 'From ſuch remarks proceeded that great number of 'ſententious diſtichs which have paſſed into conver-'ſation, and are added as proverbial axioms to the 'general ſtock of practical knowledge.

'When any work has been viewed and admired, 'the firſt queſtion of intelligent curioſity is, how was 'it performed? Hudibras was not a haſty effuſion; 'it was not produced by a ſudden tumult of imagi-'nation, or a ſhort paroxyſm of violent labour. To 'accumulate ſuch a maſs of ſentiments at the call of 'accidental deſire, or of ſudden neceſſity, is beyond 'the reach and power of the moſt active and compre-'henſive mind. I am informed by Mr. Thyer of 'Mancheſter, the excellent Editor of this Author's 'reliques, that he could ſhew ſomething like Hudi-'bras in proſe. He has in his poſſeſſion the com-'mon-place book, in which Butler repoſited, not 'ſuch events or precepts as are gathered by reading; 'but ſuch remarks, ſimilitudes, alluſions, aſſem-'blages, or inferences, as occaſion prompted, or me-'ditation produced; thoſe thoughts that were gene-'rated in his own mind, and might be uſefully ap-'plied to ſome future purpoſe. Such is the labour 'of thoſe who write for immortality.

'But human works are not eaſily found without a 'periſhable part. Of the ancient poets every reader 'feels the mythology tedious and oppreſſive. Of 'Hudibras the manners, being founded on opinions, 'are temporary and local, and therefore become 'every day leſs intelligible and leſs ſtriking. What 'Cicero ſays of philoſophy is true likewiſe of wit and 'humour, that "time effaces the fictions of opi-"nion, and confirms the determinations of Nature." 'Such manners as depend upon ſtanding relations 'and general paſſions are co-extended with the race 'of man; but thoſe modifications of life, and pecu-'liarities of practice, which are the progeny of error 'and perverſeneſs, or at beſt of ſome accidental in-'fluence or tranſient perſuaſion, muſt periſh with 'their parents.

'Much therefore of that humour which tranſported 'the laſt century with merriment is loſt to us, who 'do not know the ſour ſolemnity, the ſullen ſuper-'ſtition, the gloomy moroſeneſs, and the ſtubborn 'ſcruples of the ancient Puritans; or, if we knew 'them, derive our information only from books, or 'from tradition, have never had them before our 'eyes, and cannot but by recollection and ſtudy un-'derſtand the lines in which they are ſatiriſed. Our 'grandfathers knew the picture from the life; we 'judge of the life by contemplating the picture.

'It is ſcarcely poſſible, in the regularity and com-'poſure of the preſent time, to image the tumult of 'abſurdity, and clamour of contradiction, that per-'plexed doctrine, and diſturbed both public and pri-'vate quiet, in that age, when ſubordination was 'broken, and awe was hiſſed away; when any un-'ſettled innovator who could hatch a half-formed 'notion produced it to the public; when every man 'might become a preacher, and almoſt every preacher 'could collect a congregation.

'The wiſdom of the nation is very reaſonably ſup-'poſed to reſide in the parliament. What can be 'concluded of the lower claſſes of the people, when 'in one of the parliaments ſummoned by Cromwell 'it was ſeriouſly propoſed, that all the records in the 'Tower ſhould be burnt, that all memory of things 'paſt ſhould be effaced, and that the whole ſyſtem 'of life ſhould commence anew?

'We have never been witneſſes of animoſities ex-'cited by the uſe of minced pies and plum porridge; 'nor ſeen with what abhorrence thoſe who could eat 'them at all other times of the year would ſhrink 'from them in December. An old Puritan, who 'was alive in my childhood, being at one of the 'feaſts of the church invited by a neighbour to par-'take his cheer, told him, that if he would treat 'him at an alehouſe with beer brewed for all times 'and ſeaſons, he ſhould accept his kindneſs, but 'would have none of his ſuperſtitious meats or 'drinks.

'One of the puritanical tenets was the illegality 'of all games of chance; and he that reads Gataker 'upon Lots, may ſee how much learning and reaſon 'one of the firſt ſcholars of his age thought neceſſary, 'to prove that it was no crime to throw a die, or play 'at cards, or to hide a ſhilling for the reckoning.

'Aſtrology, however, againſt which ſo much of 'this ſatire is directed, was not more the folly of 'the Puritans than of others. It had in that time a 'very extenſive dominion. Its predictions raiſed 'hopes and fears in minds which ought to have re-'jected it with contempt. In hazardous undertak-'ings, care was taken to begin under the influence 'of a propitious planet; and when the king was pri-'ſoner in Cariſbrook Caſtle, an aſtrologer was con-'ſulted what hour would be found moſt favourable 'to an eſcape.

'What effect this poem had upon the public, whe-'ther it ſhamed impoſture or reclaimed credulity, is 'not eaſily determined. Cheats can ſeldom ſtand 'long againſt laughter. It is certain that the credit 'of planetary intelligence wore faſt away: though 'ſome men of knowledge, and Dryden among them, 'continued to believe that conjunctions and oppoſi-'tions had a great part in the diſtribution of good or 'evil, and in the government of ſublunary things.

'Poetical Action ought to be probable upon cer-'tain ſuppoſitions, and ſuch probability as burleſque 'requires, is here violated only by one incident. 'Nothing can ſhew more plainly the neceſſity of do-'ing ſomething, and the difficulty of finding ſome-'thing to do, than that Butler was reduced to tranſ-'fer to his hero the flagellation of Sancho, not the 'moſt agreeable fiction of Cervantes; very ſuitable 'indeed to the manners of that age and nation, which 'aſcribed wonderful efficacy to voluntary penances; 'but ſo remote from the practice and opinions of the 'Hudibraſtic time, that judgment and imagination 'are alike offended.

'The diction of this poem is groſsly familiar, and 'the numbers purpoſely neglected, except in a few 'places, where the thoughts by their native excel-'lence ſecure themſelves from violation, being ſuch 'as mean language cannot expreſs. The mode of 'verſification has been blamed by Dryden, who re-'grets that the heroic meaſure was not rather choſen. 'To the critical ſentence of Dryden the higheſt re-'verence would be due, were not his deciſions often 'precipitate, and his opinions immature. When he 'wiſhed to change the meaſure, he probably would 'have been willing to change more. If he intended 'that, when the numbers were heroic, the diction 'ſhould ſtill remain vulgar, he planned a very hete-'rogeneous and unnatural compoſition. If he pre-'ferred a general ſtatelineſs both of ſound and words, 'he can be only underſtood to wiſh that Butler had 'undertaken a different work.

'The meaſure is quick, ſpritely, and colloquial, 'ſuitable to the vulgarity of the words and the levity 'of the ſentiments. But ſuch numbers and ſuch dic-'tion can gain regard only when they are uſed by a 'writer whoſe vigour of fancy and copiouſneſs of 'knowledge entitle him to contempt of ornaments, 'and who, in confidence of the novelty and juſtneſs 'of his conceptions, can afford to throw metaphors 'and epithets away. To another that conveys com-'mon thoughts in careleſs verſification, it will only 'be ſaid, "Pauper videri Cinna vult, et eſt pauper." 'The meaning and diction will be worthy of each 'other, and criticiſm may juſtly doom them to periſh 'together.

'Nor, even though another Butler ſhould ariſe, 'would another Hudibras obtain the ſame regard. 'Burleſque conſiſts in a diſproportion between the 'ſtyle and the ſentiments, or between the adventi-'tious ſentiments and the fundamental ſubject. It 'therefore, like all bodies compounded of hetero-'geneous parts, contains in it a principle of corrup-'tion. All diſproportion is unnatural, and from 'what is unnatural we can derive only the pleaſure 'which novelty produces. We admire it awhile 'as a ſtrange thing; but, when it is no longer ſtrange, 'we perceive its deformity. It is a kind of artifice, 'which by frequent repetition detects itſelf: and the 'reader, learning in time what he is to expect, lays 'down his book, as the ſpectator turns away from 'a ſecond exhibition of thoſe tricks, of which the 'only uſe is to ſhew that they can be played (39).]

(39) Johnſon's Life of Butler, p. 15—39.

 [BUTLER (JOSEPH), a Prelate of the moſt diſtinguiſhed character and abilities, was born at Wantage in Berkſhire, in the year 1692. His father, Mr. Thomas Butler, who was a ſubſtantial and reputable Shopkeeper in that town, obſerving in his ſon Joſeph (a) an excellent genius and inclination for learning, determined to educate him for the Miniſtry, among the Proteſtant Diſſenters of the Preſbyterian denomination. For this purpoſe, after he had gone through a proper courſe of grammatical literature, at the free grammar-ſchool of his native place, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Philip Barton, a Clergyman of the Church of England (b), he was ſent to a Diſſenting Academy, then kept at Glouceſter, but which was ſoon afterwards removed to Tewkeſbury. The principal Tutor of this Academy was Mr. Jones, a man of uncommon abilities and knowledge, who had the honour of training up ſeveral ſcholars, who became of great eminence, both in the eſtabliſhed Church and among the Diſſenters (c). At Tewkeſbury, Mr. Butler made an extraordinary progreſs in the ſtudy of divinity; of which he gave a remarkable proof, in the letters addreſſed by him, whilſt he reſided at Tewkeſbury, to Dr. Samuel Clarke, laying before him the doubts that had ariſen in his mind, concerning the concluſiveneſs of ſome arguments in the Doctor's 'Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God [A].' The firſt of theſe letters was dated November the 4th, 1713; and the ſagacity and depth of thought diſplayed in it immediately excited Dr. Clarke's particular notice. This condeſcenſion encouraged Mr. Butler to addreſs the Doctor again upon the ſame ſubject; which, likewiſe, was anſwered by him; and the correſpondence being carried on in three other letters, the whole was annexed to the celebrated treatiſe before mentioned, and the collection has been retained in all the ſubſequent editions of that work. The management of this correſpondence was entruſted, by Mr. Butler, to his friend and fellow-pupil, Mr. Secker, who, in order to conceal the affair, undertook to convey the letters to the poſt-office at Glouceſter, and to bring back Dr. Clarke's anſwers. When Mr. Butler's name was diſcovered to the Doctor, the candour, modeſty, and good ſenſe with which he had written, immediately procured him the friendſhip of that eminent and excellent man (d). Our young Student was not, however, during his continuance at Tewkeſbury, ſolely employed in metaphyſical ſpeculations and enquiries. Another ſubject of his ſerious conſideration was, the propriety of his becoming a Diſſenting Miniſter. Accordingly, he entered into an examination of the principles of Nonconformity; the reſult of which was, ſuch a diſſatisfaction with them, as determined him to conform to the eſtabliſhed Church. This intention was at firſt very diſagreeable to his father, who endeavoured to divert him from his purpoſe; and, with that view, called in the aſſiſtance of ſome eminent Preſbyterian Divines; but finding his ſon's reſolution to be fixed, he at length ſuffered him to be removed to Oxford, where he was admitted a Commoner of Oriel College, on the 17th of March, 1714 (e). At what time he took Orders doth not appear, nor who the Biſhop was by whom he was ordained; but it is certain, that he entered into the Church ſoon after his admiſſion at Oxford, if it be true, as is aſſerted, that he ſometimes aſſiſted Mr. Edward Talbot in the divine ſervice, at his living of Hendred near Wantage (f). With this gentleman, who was the ſecond ſon of Dr. William Talbot, ſucceſſively Biſhop of Ox-

[A] Concerning the concluſiveneſs of ſome arguments in the Doctor's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God.] In the firſt letter, our young Student, after making a modeſt apology for the liberty he had aſſumed, though a ſtranger, in addreſſing the Doctor, expreſſes a particular ſatisfaction on meeting with an attempt to demonſtrate the Being of a God, which, he obſerves, was more than had been done before. However, in peruſing the Demonſtration, there aroſe two difficulties to him, the chief of which was in Dr. Clarke's proof, that the ſelf-exiſtent Being muſt of neceſſity be but one (1). The other difficulty, which precedes this in the letter, aroſe from the Doctor's argument to prove the Infinity or Omnipreſence of the ſelf-exiſtent Being (2). With regard to this laſt difficulty, Mr. Butler declares, in the courſe of the correſpondence, that it was cleared up to his ſatisfaction. But, in his fifth letter, ſpeaking of the ſelf-exiſtent Being, he writes thus: 'Could we make the ſuppoſition of 'its ceaſing to be, yet ſpace and duration would ſtill 'remain unaltered.'—— 'I grant the ſuppoſition is 'abſurd: but how otherwiſe can we know whether 'any thing be a property of ſuch a ſubſtance, but by 'examining whether it would ceaſe to be, if the ſup'poſed ſubſtance ſhould do ſo?' He then proceeds as follows: 'Notwithſtanding what I have now ſaid, I 'cannot ſay that I believe your argument not con'cluſive; for I muſt own my ignorance, that I am 'really at a loſs about the nature of ſpace and du'ration. But did it plainly appear that they were 'properties of a ſubſtance, we ſhould have an eaſy 'way with the Atheiſts; for it would at once prove 'demonſtrably an eternal, neceſſary, ſelf-exiſtent 'Being; that there is but one ſuch; and that he 'is needful, in order to the exiſtence of all other 'things: which makes me think, that though it may 'be true, yet it is not obvious to every capacity; 'otherwiſe it would have been generally uſed as a 'fundamental argument to prove the Being of a 'God.' In anſwer to this letter, Dr. Clarke obſerves, that our Student's granting the abſurdity of the ſuppoſition he was endeavouring to make, was conſequently granting the neceſſary truth of his argument of ſpace and duration's neceſſarily remaining, even after they are ſuppoſed to be taken away; and by not doing this, it is plain they are not themſelves ſubſtances, and that the ſubſtance, on whoſe exiſtence they depend, will neceſſarily remain likewiſe, even after it is ſuppoſed to be taken away; which ſhews that ſuppoſition to be abſurd and contradictory. Upupon the whole, the Doctor remarks in the concluſion, that his correſpondent's difficulty aroſe from not ſufficiently conſidering the nature of abſolute neceſſity, which muſt neceſſarily exiſt every where. Thus ended this amicable controverſy. But we cannot conclude the ſubject without obſerving, in juſtice to Mr. Butler, that in his objections to Dr. Clarke's notion of the nature of ſpace and duration, which include his diſſatisfaction with the argument a prieri, he raiſed the firſt battery againſt that argument; and though, from modeſty, and a conſideration of his youth, he forebore to puſh his ſtrength to the utmoſt, yet he hath been followed by others, who have attacked it in ſo formidable a manner, that, in the opinion of many learned men, it hath been abſolutely demoliſhed (3).

ford, Saliſbury, and Durham, Mr. Butler formed an intimate friendſhip at Oriel College; which friendſhip laid the foundation of all his ſubſequent preferments, and procured for him a very honourable ſituation, when he was only twenty-ſix years of age. For it was in 1718, that, at the recommendation of Mr. Talbot, in conjunction with that of Dr. Clarke (g), he was appointed by Sir Joſeph Jekyll to be Preacher at the Rolls. This was three years before he had taken any degree at the Univerſity, where he did not go out Bachelor of Law till the 10th of June, 1721, which, however, was as ſoon as that degree could ſtatutably be conferred upon him (h). Mr. Butler continued at the Rolls till 1726, in the beginning of which year he publiſhed, in one volume octavo, 'Fifteen Sermons preached at that Chapel [B].' In the mean while, by [B] Publiſhed, in one volume, octavo, Fifteen Sermons preached at that Chapel.] The great demand for this volume, which was dedicated to Sir Joſeph Jekyll, obliged Mr. Butler to print a ſecond edition, reviſed and improved, in 1729, to which he prefixed a long preface; wherein, after apologizing for the abſtruſeneſs of the diſcourſes, and obſerving that this abſtruſeneſs aroſe from the nature of the truths advanced in them, he proceeds to give an abridgment and illuſtration of the principles laid down in his Sermons. This is done in ſo maſterly a manner, and affords ſuch a ſpecific view of his moral ſyſtem, that we cannot avoid making large extracts from the preface, if we would do juſtice either to the Author or to our Readers. 'There are, ſays he, two ways in 'which the ſubject of morals may be treated. One 'begins from enquiring into the abſtract relations of 'things: the other from a matter of fact, namely, 'what the particular nature of man is, its ſeveral 'parts, their œconomy or conſtitution; from whence 'it proceeds to determine what courſe of life it 'is, which is correſpondent to this whole nature. 'In the former method the concluſion is expreſſed 'thus, that vice is contrary to the nature and reaſon 'of things: in the latter, that it is a violation or 'breaking in upon our own nature. Thus they both 'lead us to the ſame thing, our obligations to the 'practice of virtue; and thus they exceedingly 'ſtrengthen and enforce each other. The firſt ſeems 'the moſt direct formal proof, and in ſome reſpects 'the leaſt liable to cavil and diſpute: the latter is in 'a peculiar manner adapted to ſatisfy a fair mind; 'and is more eaſily applicable to the ſeveral parti'cular relations and circumſtances in life.

'The following diſcourſes proceed chiefly in this 'latter method. The three firſt wholly. They 'were intended to explain what is meant by the na'ture of man, when it is ſaid that virtue conſiſts in 'following, and vice in deviating from it; and by 'explaining to ſhew that the aſſertion is true. That 'the ancient moraliſts had ſome inward feeling or 'other, which they choſe to expreſs in this manner, 'that man is born to virtue, that it conſiſts in fol'lowing nature, and that vice is more contrary to 'this nature than tortures or death, their works in 'our hands are inſtances. Now a perſon who found 'no myſtery in this way of ſpeaking of the ancients; 'who, without being very explicit with himſelf, kept 'to his natural feeling, went along with them, and 'found within himſelf a full conviction that what 'they laid down was juſt and true; ſuch an one would 'probably wonder to ſee a point, in which he never 'perceived any difficulty, ſo laboured as this is, in the 'ſecond and third ſermons; inſomuch, perhaps, as 'to be at a loſs for the occaſion, ſcope, and drift of 'them. But it need not be thought ſtrange, that 'this manner of expreſſion, though familiar with 'them, and, if not uſually carried ſo far, yet not 'uncommon amongſt ourſelves, ſhould want ex'plaining; ſince there are ſeveral perceptions daily 'felt and ſpoken of, which yet it may not be very 'eaſy at firſt view to explicate, to diſtinguiſh from 'all others, and aſcertain exactly what the idea of 'perception is. The many treatiſes upon the paſ'ſions are a proof of this; ſince ſo many would 'never have undertaken to unfold their ſeveral com'plications, and trace and reſolve them into their 'principles, if they had thought, what they were 'endeavouring to ſhew, was obvious to every one, 'who felt and talked of thoſe paſſions. Thus, though 'there ſeems no ground to doubt, but that the gene'rality of mankind have the inward perception ex'preſſed ſo commonly in that manner by the ancient 'moraliſts, more than to doubt whether they have thoſe 'paſſions; yet it appeared of uſe to unfold that in'ward conviction, and lay it open in a more explicit 'manner, than I had ſeen done; eſpecially when 'there were not wanting perſons, who manifeſtly miſ'took the whole thing, and ſo had great reaſon to 'expreſs themſelves diſſatisfied with it. A late Au'thor of great and deſerved reputation ſays, that to 'place virtue in following nature, is at beſt a looſe 'way of talk. And he has reaſon to ſay this, if 'what I think he intends to expreſs, though with 'great decency, be true, that ſcarce any other ſenſe 'can be put upon thoſe words, but acting as any of 'the ſeveral parts, without diſtinction, of a man's 'nature, happened moſt to incline him (*).

'Whoever thinks it worth while to conſider this 'matter thoroughly, ſhould begin with ſtating to 'himſelf exactly the idea of a ſyſtem, œconomy or 'conſtitution of any particular nature, or particular 'any thing: and he will, I ſuppoſe, find, that it is 'an one or a whole made up of ſeveral parts; but 'yet, that the ſeveral parts, even conſidered as a 'whole, do not complete the idea, unleſs in the no'tion of a whole, you include the relations and re'ſpects, which thoſe parts have to each other. Every 'work both of nature and of art is a ſyſtem: and as 'every particular thing, both natural and artificial, 'is for ſome uſe or purpoſe out of and beyond itſelf, 'one may add, to what has been already brought 'into the idea of a ſyſtem, its conduciveneſs to this 'one or more ends. Let us inſtance in a watch— 'Suppoſe the ſeveral parts taken to pieces, and placed 'apart from each other: let a man have ever ſo ex'act a notion of theſe ſeveral parts, unleſs he con'ſiders the reſpects and relations which they have to 'each other, he will not have any thing like the idea 'of a watch. Suppoſe theſe ſeveral parts brought 'together and any how united: neither will he yet, 'be the union ever ſo cloſe, have an idea which 'will bear any reſemblance to that of a watch. But 'let him view thoſe ſeveral parts put together in the 'manner of a watch; let him form a notion of the 'relations which thoſe ſeveral parts have to each 'other—all conducive in their reſpective ways, to 'this purpoſe, ſhewing the hour of the day; and 'then he has the idea of a watch. Thus it is with 'regard to the inward frame of man. Appetites, 'paſſions, affections, and the principle of reflection, 'conſidered merely as the ſeveral parts of our inward 'nature, do not at all give us an idea of the ſyſtem or 'conſtitution of this nature: becauſe the conſtitution 'is formed by ſomewhat not yet taken into conſider'ation, namely by the relations, which theſe ſeveral 'parts have to each other; the chief of which is the 'authority of reflection or conſcience. It is from 'conſidering the relations which the ſeveral appe'tites and paſſions in the inward frame have to each 'other; and above all, the ſupremacy of reflection 'or conſcience, that we get the idea of the ſyſtem or 'conſtitution of human nature. And from the idea 'itſelf it will as fully appear, that this our nature, 'that is, conſtitution, is adapted to virtue, as from the 'idea of a watch it appears, that its nature, that is, 'conſtitution or ſyſtem, is adapted to meaſure time. 'What in fact or event commonly happens, is no'thing to this queſtion. Every work of art is apt to be 'out of order: but this is ſo far from being accord'ing to its ſyſtem, that let the diſorder increaſe, and 'it will totally deſtroy it. This is merely by way 'of explanation, what an œconomy, ſyſtem, or con'ſtitution is. And thus far the caſes are perfectly pa'rallel. If we go further, there is indeed a differ'ence, nothing to the preſent purpoſe, but too im-

'portant an one ever to be omitted. A machine is 'inanimate and paſſive: but we are agents. Our 'conſtitution is put in our own power. We are 'charged with it: and therefore are accountable for 'any diſorder or violation of it.

'Thus nothing can poſſibly be more contrary to 'nature than vice; meaning by nature, not only the 'ſeveral parts of our internal frame, but alſo the 'conſtitution of it. Poverty and diſgrace, tortures 'and death, are not ſo contrary to it. Miſery and in-'juſtice are equally contrary to ſome different parts 'of our nature taken ſingly: but injuſtice is more-'over contrary to the whole conſtitution of the na-'ture.

'If it be aſked, whether this conſtitution be really 'what thoſe philoſophers meant, and whether they 'would have explained themſelves in this manner? 'the anſwer is the ſame, as if it ſhould be aſked, 'whether a perſon, who had often uſed the word 'reſentment and felt the thing, would have explained 'this paſſion exactly in the ſame manner, in which it 'is done in one of theſe diſcourſes? As I have no 'doubt, but that this is a true account of that paſſion, 'which he referred to, and intended to expreſs by 'the word reſentment; ſo I have no doubt, but that 'this is the true account of the ground of that con-'viction which they referred to, when they ſaid, vice 'was contrary to nature. And though it ſhould be 'thought that they meant no more than, that vice 'was contrary to the higher and better part of our 'nature; even this implies ſuch a conſtitution as I 'have endeavoured to explain. For the very terms, 'higher and better, imply a relation or reſpect of 'parts to each other; and theſe relative parts, being 'in one and the ſame nature, form a conſtitution, 'and are the very idea of it. They had a perception 'that injuſtice was contrary to their nature, and that 'pain was ſo alſo. They obſerved theſe two per-'ceptions totally different, not in degree, but in 'kind: and the reflecting upon each of them as they 'thus ſtood in their nature, wrought a full intuitive 'conviction, that more was due and of right be-'longed to one of theſe inward perceptions, than to 'the other; that it demanded in all caſes to govern 'ſuch a creature as man. So that upon the whole, 'this is a fair and true account of what was the 'ground of their conviction; of what they intended 'to refer to when they ſaid, virtue conſiſted in fol-'lowing nature: a manner of ſpeaking not looſe 'and undeterminate, but clear and diſtinct, ſtrictly 'juſt and true.

'Though I am perſuaded the force of this con-'viction is felt by almoſt every one; yet ſince, con-'ſidered as an argument, and put in words, it ap-'pears ſomewhat abſtruſe, and ſince the connection 'of it is broken in the three firſt ſermons, it may not 'be amiſs to give the reader the whole argument 'here in one view.

'Mankind has various inſtincts and principles of 'action, as brute creatures have; ſome leading moſt 'directly and immediately to the good of the com-'munity, and ſome moſt directly to private good.

'Man has ſeveral which brutes have not; particu-'larly reflection or conſcience, an approbation of ſome 'principles or actions, and diſapprobation of others.

'Brutes obey their inſtincts or principles of action, 'according to certain rules; ſuppoſe the conſtitution 'of their body, and the objects around them.

'The generality of mankind alſo obey their inſtincts 'and principles, all of them; thoſe propenſions we 'call good, as well as the bad, according to the ſame 'rules; namely, the conſtitution of their body, and 'the external circumſtances which they are in. '[Therefore it is not a true repreſentation of man-'kind, to affirm that they are wholly governed by 'ſelf-love, the love of power and ſenſual appetites: 'ſince, as on the one hand, they are often actuated 'by theſe, without any regard to right or wrong; 'ſo on the other, it is manifeſt fact, that the ſame 'perſons, the generality, are frequently influenced 'by friendſhip, compaſſion, gratitude; and even a 'general abhorrence of what is baſe, and liking of 'what is fair and juſt, takes its turn amongſt the 'other motives of action. This is the partial inade-'quate notion of human nature treated of in the firſt 'diſcourſe: and it is by this nature, if one may ſpeak 'ſo, that the world is in fact influenced, and kept in 'that tolerable order in which it is.]

'Brutes in acting according to the rules before 'mentioned, their bodily conſtitution and circum-'ſtances, act ſuitably to their whole nature. [It is, 'however, to be diſtinctly noted, that the reaſon 'why we affirm this, is not merely that brutes in 'fact act ſo; for this alone, however univerſal, does 'not at all determine, whether ſuch courſe of action 'be correſpondent to their whole nature: but the 'reaſon of the aſſertion is, that as in acting thus, 'they plainly act conformably to ſomewhat in their 'nature; ſo from all obſervations we are able to 'make upon them, there does not appear the leaſt 'ground to imagine them to have any thing elſe in 'their nature, which requires a different rule or 'courſe of action.]

'Mankind alſo in acting thus would act ſuitably 'to their whole nature, if no more were to be ſaid 'of man's nature, than what has been now ſaid; if 'that, as it is true, were alſo a complete, adequate 'account of our nature.

'But that is not a complete account of man's na-'ture. Somewhat further muſt be brought in to 'give us an adequate notion of it; namely, that one 'of thoſe principles of action, conſcience or reflec-'tion, compared with the reſt as they all ſtand to-'gether in the nature of man, plainly bears upon it 'marks of authority over all the reſt, and claims the 'abſolute direction of them all, to allow or forbid 'their gratification: a diſapprobation of reflection 'being in itſelf a principle manifeſtly ſuperior to a 'mere propenſion. And the concluſion is, that to 'allow no more to this ſuperior principle or part 'of our nature, than to other parts; to let it govern 'and guide only occaſionally in common with the 'reſt, as its turn happens to come, from the temper 'and circumſtances one happens to be in; this is not 'to act conformably to the conſtitution of man: nei-'ther can any human creature be ſaid to act con-'formably to his conſtitution of nature, unleſs he 'allows to that ſuperior principle the abſolute autho-'rity which is due to it. And this concluſion is 'abundantly confirmed from hence, that one may de-'termine what courſe of action the œconomy of 'man's nature requires, without ſo much as knowing 'in what degree of ſtrength the ſeveral principles 'prevail, or which of them have actually the greateſt 'influence.

'The practical reaſon of inſiſting ſo much upon 'this natural authority of the principle of reflection 'or conſcience is, that it ſeems in great meaſure 'overlooked by many, who are by no means the 'worſt ſort of men. It is thought ſufficient to ab-'ſtain from groſs wickedneſs, and to be humane and 'kind to ſuch as happen to come in their way. 'Whereas in reality the very conſtitution of our na-'ture requires, that we bring our whole conduct be-'fore this ſuperior faculty; wait its determination; 'enforce upon ourſelves its authority, and make 'it the buſineſs of our lives, as it is abſolutely 'the whole buſineſs of a moral agent, to conform 'ourſelves to it. This is the true meaning of that 'ancient precept, Reverence thy ſelf (4).

(4) Preface to Butler's Sermons, Glaſgow edition of 1769, p. viii.—xxii.

Here our Author takes occaſion to make ſome admirable remarks on a material deficiency, or omiſſion, in Lord Shafteſbury's 'Inquiry concerning Virtue,' which we ſhall refer to in our account of that noble Writer; and then Mr. Butler goes on as follows:

'The ſermon upon the Character of Balaam, and 'that upon Self-Deceit, both relate to one ſubject. 'I am perſuaded, that a very great part of the wick-'edneſs of the world, is, one way or other, owing 'to the ſelf-partiality, ſelf-flattery, and ſelf-deceit, 'endeavoured there to be laid open and explained. 'It is to be obſerved amongſt perſons of the loweſt 'rank, in proportion to their compaſs of thought, 'as much as amongſt men of education and improve-'ment. It ſeems, that people are capable of being 'thus artful with themſelves, in proportion as they 'are capable of being ſo with others. Thoſe who 'have taken notice that there is really ſuch a thing, on his death-bed, our Author had been preſented firſt to the Rectory of Haughton, near Darlingon, and afterwards to that of Stanhope in the ſame dioceſe. The benefice

'namely,

'namely, plain falſeneſs and inſincerity in men 'with regard to themſelves, will readily ſee the drift 'and deſign of theſe diſcourſes: and nothing, that 'I can add, will explain the deſign of them to him, 'who has not before-hand remarked, at leaſt, ſome-'what of the character. And yet, the admonitions 'they contain, may be as much wanted by ſuch a 'perſon, as by others; for it is to be noted, that a 'man may be entirely poſſeſſed by this unfairneſs of 'mind, without having the leaſt ſpeculative notion 'what the thing is.

'The account given of Reſentment in the eighth 'ſermon, is introductory to the following one upon 'Forgiveneſs of Injuries. It may poſſibly have ap-'peared to ſome, at firſt ſight, a ſtrange aſſertion, 'that injury is the only natural object of ſettled re-'ſentment, or that men do not in fact reſent delibe-'rately any thing but under this appearance of in-'jury. But I muſt deſire the reader not to take any 'aſſertion alone by itſelf, but to conſider the whole 'of what is ſaid upon it: becauſe this is neceſſary, 'not only in order to judge of the truth of it, but 'often, ſuch is the nature of language, to ſee the 'very meaning of the aſſertion. Particularly as to 'this, injury and injuſtice is, in the ſermon itſelf, 'explained to mean, not only the more groſs and 'ſhocking inſtances of wickedneſs, but alſo con-'tempt, ſcorn, neglect, any ſort of diſagreeable be-'haviour towards a perſon, which he thinks other 'than what is due to him. And the general notion 'of injury or wrong, plainly comprehends this, 'though the words are moſtly confined to the higher 'degrees of it.

'Forgiveneſs of injuries is one of the very few 'moral obligations which has been diſputed. But 'the proof that it is really an obligation, what our 'nature and condition require, ſeems very obvious, 'were it only from the conſideration that revenge is 'doing harm merely for harm's ſake. And as to 'the love of our enemies: reſentment cannot ſuper-'ſede the obligation to univerſal benevolence, unleſs 'they are in the nature of the thing inconſiſtent, 'which they plainly are not.

'This divine precept, to forgive injuries and love 'our enemies, though to be met with in gentile 'moraliſts, yet is in a peculiar ſenſe a precept of 'chriſtianity; as our Saviour has inſiſted more upon 'it, than upon any other ſingle virtue. One reaſon 'of this doubtleſs is, that it ſo peculiarly becomes an 'imperfect, faulty creature. But it may be obſerved 'alſo, that a virtuous temper of mind, conſciouſ-'neſs of innocence and good meaning towards every 'body, and a ſtrong feeling of injuſtice and injury, 'may itſelf, ſuch is the imperfection of our virtue, 'lead a perſon to violate this obligation, if he be 'not upon his guard. And it may well be ſuppoſed, 'that this is another reaſon why it is ſo much inſiſted 'upon by Him, who knew what was in man.

'The chief deſign of the eleventh diſcourſe is to 'ſtate the notion of ſelf-love and diſintereſtedneſs, 'in order to ſhew that benevolence is not more un-'friendly to ſelf-love, than any other particular af-'fection whatever. There is a ſtrange affectation in 'many people of explaining away all particular af-'fections, and repreſenting the whole of life as no-'thing but one continued exerciſe of ſelf-love. 'Hence ariſes that ſurpriſing confuſion and per-'plexity in the Epicureans of old, Hobbs, the au-'thor of Reflexions, Sentences, et Maximes Morales, and 'this whole ſet of writers; the confuſion of calling 'actions intereſted which are done in contradiction to 'the moſt manifeſt known intereſt, merely for the 'gratification of a preſent paſſion. Now all this 'confuſion might eaſily be avoided, by ſtating to 'ourſelves wherein the idea of ſelf-love in general 'conſiſts, as diſtinguiſhed from all particular move-'ments towards particular external objects; the ap-'petites of ſenſe, reſentment, compaſſion, curioſity, 'ambition, and the reſt. When this is done, if the 'words ſelfiſh and intereſted cannot be parted with, 'but muſt be applied to every thing; yet, to avoid 'ſuch total confuſion of all language, let the di-'ſtinction be made by epithets: and the firſt may be 'called cool or ſettled ſelfiſhneſs, and the other 'paſſionate or ſenſual ſelfiſhneſs. But the moſt na-'tural way of ſpeaking plainly is, to call the firſt 'only ſelf-love, and the actions proceeding from it, 'intereſted: and to ſay of the latter, that they are 'not love to ourſelves, but movements towards ſome-'what external: honour, power, the harm or good 'of another: and that the purſuit of theſe external 'objects, ſo far as it proceeds from theſe movements '(for it may proceed from ſelf-love), is no otherwiſe 'intereſted, than as every action of every creature 'muſt, from the nature of the thing, be; for no 'one can act but from a deſire, or choice, or pre-'ference of his own.

'Self-love and any particular paſſion may be 'joined together; and from this complication, it 'becomes impoſſible in numberleſs inſtances to de-'termine preciſely, how far an action, perhaps even 'of one's own, has for its principle general ſelf-love, 'or ſome particular paſſion. But this need create no 'confuſion in the ideas themſelves of ſelf-love and 'particular paſſions. We diſtinctly diſcern what one 'is, and what the other are: though we may be 'uncertain how far one or the other influences us. 'And though from this uncertainty, it cannot but 'be, that there will be different opinions concerning 'mankind, as more or leſs governed by intereſt; 'and ſome will aſcribe actions to ſelf-love, which 'others will aſcribe to particular paſſions; yet it is 'abſurd to ſay that mankind are wholly actuated by 'either; ſince it is manifeſt that both have their 'influence. For as, on the one hand, men form a 'general notion of intereſt, ſome placing it in one 'thing, and ſome in another, and have a conſider-'able regard to it throughout the courſe of their 'life, which is owing to ſelf-love; ſo, on the other 'hand, they are often ſet on work by the particular 'paſſions themſelves, and a conſiderable part of life 'is ſpent in the actual gratification of them, that is, 'is employed, not by ſelf-love, but by the paſſions.

'Beſides, the very idea of an intereſted purſuit 'neceſſarily preſuppoſes particular paſſions or ap-'petites; ſince the very idea of intereſt or happineſs 'conſiſts in this, that an appetite or affection enjoys 'its object. It is not becauſe we love ourſelves that 'we find delight in ſuch and ſuch objects, but be-'cauſe we have particular affections towards them. 'Take away theſe affections, and you leave ſelf-love 'abſolutely nothing at all to employ itſelf about; 'no end or object for it to purſue, excepting only 'that of avoiding pain. Indeed the Epicureans, who 'maintained that abſence of pain was the higheſt 'happineſs, might, conſiſtently with themſelves, 'deny all affection, and, if they had ſo pleaſed, every 'ſenſual appetite too: but the very idea of intereſt or 'happineſs other than abſence of pain, implies par-'ticular appetites or paſſions; theſe being neceſſary 'to conſtitute that intereſt or happineſs.

'The obſervation that benevolence is no more 'diſintereſted than any of the common particular 'paſſions, ſeems in itſelf worth being taken notice 'of; but is inſiſted upon to obviate that ſcorn which 'one ſees riſing upon the faces of people who are ſaid 'to know the world, when mention is made of a 'diſintereſted, generous or public-ſpirited action. 'The truth of that obſervation might be made ap-'pear, in a more formal manner of proof: for who-'ever will conſider all the poſſible reſpects and rela-'tions which any particular affection can have to ſelf-'love and private intereſt, will, I think, ſee de-'monſtrably, that benevolence is not in any reſpect 'more at varience with ſelf-love, than any other par-'ticular affection whatever, but that it is in every 'reſpect, at leaſt, as friendly to it.

'If the obſervation be true, it follows, that ſelf-'love and benevolence, virtue and intereſt, are not 'to be oppoſed, but only to be diſtinguiſhed from 'each other; in the ſame way as virtue and any 'other particular affection, love of arts, ſuppoſe, are 'to be diſtinguiſhed. Every thing is what it is, and 'not another thing. The goodneſs or badneſs of 'actions does not ariſe from hence, that the epithet, 'intereſted or diſintereſted, may be applied to them, 'any more than that any other indifferent epithet, 'ſuppoſe inquiſitive or jealous, may or may not be fice of Haughton was given to him in 1722, and that of Stanhope in 1725. At Haughton, there was a neceſſity for rebuilding a great part of the parſonage-houſe, and Mr.

'applied to them; not from their being attended 'with preſent or future pleaſure or pain; but from 'their being what they are: namely, what becomes 'ſuch creatures as we are, what the ſtate of the caſe 'requires, or the contrary. Or, in other words, 'we may judge and determine, that an action is 'morally good or evil, before we ſo much as con-'ſider, whether it be intereſted or diſintereſted. 'This conſideration no more comes in to determine, 'whether an action be virtuous, than to determine 'whether it be reſentful. Self-love in its due de-'gree is as juſt and morally good, as any affection 'whatever. Benevolence towards particular per-'ſons may be to a degree of weakneſs, and ſo be 'blameable: and diſintereſtedneſs is ſo far from 'being in itſelf commendable, that the utmoſt poſ-'ſible depravity, which we can in imagination con-'ceive, is that of diſintereſted cruelty.

'Neither does there appear any reaſon to wiſh 'ſelf-love were weaker in the generality of the world, 'than it is. The influence which it has, ſeems 'plainly owing to its being conſtant and habitual, 'which it cannot but be, and not to the degree or 'ſtrength of it. Every caprice of the imagination, 'every curioſity of the underſtanding, every affection 'of the heart, is perpetually ſhewing its weakneſs, 'by prevailing over it. Men daily, hourly ſacrifice 'the greateſt known intereſt, to fancy, inquiſitive-'neſs, love or hatred, any vagrant inclination. 'The thing to be lamented is, not that men have ſo 'great regard to their own good or intereſt in the 'preſent world, for they have not enough; but that 'they have ſo little to the good of others. And 'this ſeems plainly owing to their being ſo much en-'gaged in the gratification of particular paſſions un-'friendly to benevolence, and which happen to be 'moſt prevalent in them, much more than to ſelf-'love. As a proof of this may be obſerved, that 'there is no character more void of friendſhip, gra-'titude, natural affection, love to their country, 'common juſtice, or more equally and uniformly 'hard-hearted, than the abandoned, in, what is 'called, the way of pleaſure—hard-hearted and 'totally without feeling in behalf of others; except 'when they cannot eſcape the ſight of diſtreſs, and 'ſo are interrupted by it in their pleaſures. And 'yet it is ridiculous to call ſuch an abandoned courſe 'of pleaſure intereſted, when the perſon engaged 'in it knows before-hand, and goes on under the 'feeling and apprehenſion, that it will be as ruin-'ous to himſelf, as to thoſe who depend upon him.

'Upon the whole, if the generality of mankind 'were to cultivate within themſelves the principle of 'ſelf-love; if they were to accuſtom themſelves 'often to ſet down and conſider, what was the 'greateſt happineſs they were capable of attaining 'for themſelves in this life; and if ſelf-love were ſo 'ſtrong and prevalent, as that they would uniformly 'purſue this their ſuppoſed chief temporal good, 'without being diverted from it by any particular 'paſſion; it would manifeſtly prevent numberleſs 'follies and vices. This was in a great meaſure the 'Epicurean ſyſtem of philoſophy. It is indeed by 'no means the religious, or even moral inſtitution 'of life. Yet, with all the miſtakes men would fall 'into about intereſt, it would be leſs miſchievous, 'than the extravagancies of mere appetite, will, 'and pleaſure: for certainly ſelf-love, though con-'fined to the intereſt of this life, is, of the two, a 'much better guide than paſſion, which has abſo-'lutely no bound nor meaſure, but what is ſet to it 'by this ſelf-love, or moral conſiderations.

'From the diſtinction above made between ſelf-'love, and the ſeveral particular principles or affec-'tions in our nature, we may ſee how good ground 'there was for that aſſertion, maintained by the 'ſeveral ancient ſchools of philoſophy againſt the 'Epicureans, namely, that virtue is to be purſued 'as an end, eligible in and for itſelf. For, if there 'be any principles or affections in the mind of man 'diſtinct from ſelf-love, that the things thoſe princi-'ples tend towards, or that the objects of thoſe af-'fections are, each of them, in themſelves eligible, 'to be purſued upon its own account, and to be 'reſted in as an end, is implied in the very idea of 'ſuch principles or affection. They indeed aſſerted 'much higher things of virtue, and with very good 'reaſon; but to ſay thus much of it, that it is to be 'purſued for itſelf, is to ſay no more of it, than may 'truly be ſaid of the object of every natural affection 'whatever.

'The queſtion, which was a few years ago diſ-'puted in France, concerning the Love of God, 'which was there called enthuſiaſm, as it will every 'where by the generality of the world; this queſtion, 'I ſay, anſwers in religion, to that old one in morals 'now mentioned. And both of them, I think, are 'fully determined by the ſame obſervation, namely, 'that the very nature of affection, the idea itſelf, 'neceſſarily implies reſting in its object as an end.

'I ſhall not here add any thing further, to what I 'have ſaid in the two diſcourſes upon that moſt im-'portant ſubject, but only this: that if we are conſtitut-'ed ſuch ſort of creatures, as, from our very nature, to 'feel certain affections or movements of mind, upon 'the ſight or contemplation of the meaneſt inani-'mate part of the creation, for the flowers of the 'field have their beauty; certainly there muſt be 'ſomewhat due to him himſelf, who is the author 'and cauſe of all things; who is more intimately 'preſent to us, than any thing elſe can be, and 'with whom we have a nearer and more conſtant in-'tercourſe, than we can have with any creature: 'there muſt be ſome movements of mind and heart 'which correſpond to his perfections, or of which 'thoſe perfections are the natural object. And that 'when we are commanded to love the Lord our God, 'with all our heart, with all our mind, and with all 'our ſoul; ſomewhat more muſt be meant than 'merely, that we live in hope of rewards, or fear 'of puniſhments from Him; ſomewhat more than 'this muſt be intended: though theſe regards them-'ſelves are moſt juſt and reaſonable, and abſolutely 'neceſſary to be often recollected, in ſuch a world 'as this (5).'

(5) Preface to Butler's Sermons, Glaſgow edition of 1769, p. xxix—xlv.

From theſe extracts, our Readers will perceive, what excellent original matter is contained in Biſhop Butler's Sermons, and how juſtly they are entitled to the high encomiums which have been beſtowed upon them by the beſt judges. 'I did not doubt,' ſays Mrs. Cockburn, in a Letter to her Niece, that 'Dr. Butler would give you great ſatisfaction. He 'ſeems to have ſtudied human nature very deeply, 'its paſſions and affections; and has juſtly cleared it 'of that over-balance of ſelf-love, which ſome 'would make the motive of all our actions, ſetting 'that matter in a clearer light than it is uſually 'treated with. He likewiſe, as you obſerve, very 'rightly eſtabliſhes the authority of the principle of 'reflection, which ſtrongly obliges us to act according 'to its dictates, when conſidered as the guide aſſign-'ed us by the Author of our nature (6).' Lord Kaims, ſpeaking of devotion, as being natural to man, adds, in a note. 'See this principle beauti-'fully explained and illuſtrated in a Sermon upon 'the Love of God, by Doctor Butler, Biſhop of 'Durham, a writer of the firſt rank (7).' Many more teſtimonies might be produced to the excellency of our Prelate's diſcourſes; but it is needleſs to ac-cumulate teſtimonies in ſo plain a caſe. Every reader of Butler's Sermons muſt be ſenſible, that they afford an admirable proof of his ſagacity in treating moral queſtions. We cannot but think that what he hath advanced, on the ſeveral ſubjects diſcuſſed by him, is deciſive; and that he ought for ever to have ſilenced thoſe philoſophers who reſolve all human actions into the ſole principle of ſelf-love. It ſhould be remembered, that our Author's ſermons are chiefly to be conſidered as philoſophical and moral diſcourſes, addreſſed to a ſelect auditory; for they can by no means be regarded as general models of preaching. Pulpit compoſitions, being, for the moſt part, intended for the bulk of mankind, ought uſual-ly to be as plain and as clear as poſſible, both in ſen-timent and language; and this is attainable, without departing from elegance. Dr. Butler doth not ſeem naturally

Mr. Butler had neither money nor talents for that work. Mr. Secker, therefore, who had always the intereſt of his friends at heart, and had acquired a very conſiderable influence with Biſhop Talbot, perſuaded that Prelate to give Mr. Butler, in exchange for Haughton, the Rectory of Stanhope, which was not only free from any ſuch incumbrance, but was, likewiſe, of much ſuperior value, being indeed one of the richeſt parſonages in England. Whilſt our Author continued Preacher at the Rolls Chapel, he divided his time between his duty in town and country; but when he quitted the Rolls, he reſided, during ſeven years, wholly at Stanhope, in the conſcientious diſcharge of every obligation appertaining to a good pariſh prieſt. This retirement, however, was too ſolitary for his diſpoſition, which had in it a natural caſt of gloomineſs: and though his recluſe hours were by no means loſt either to private improvement or public utility, yet he felt at times, very painfully, the want of that ſelect ſociety of friends, to which he had been accuſtomed, and which could inſpire him with the greateſt chearfulneſs. Mr. Secker, therefore, who knew this, was extremely anxious to draw him out into a more active and conſpicuous ſcene, and omitted no opportunity of expreſſing this deſire to ſuch as he thought capable of promoting it. Having himſelf been appointed King's Chaplain in 1732, he took occaſion, in a converſation which he had the honour of holding with Queen Caroline, to mention to her his friend Mr. Butler. The Queen ſaid, ſhe thought he had been dead. Mr. Secker aſſured her he was not. Yet her Majeſty afterwards aſked Archbiſhop Blackburne, if he was not dead? His anſwer was, 'No, Madam, but he is buried (i).' Mr. Secker, continuing his purpoſe of endeavouring to bring his friend out of his retirement, found means, upon Mr. Charles Talbot's being made Lord Chancellor, to have Mr. Butler recommended to him for his Chaplain. His Lordſhip accepted and ſent for him; and this promotion calling him to town, he took Oxford in his way, and was admitted there to the degree of Doctor of Law, on the eighth of December, 1733. The Lord Chancellor, who gave him, alſo, a Prebend in the church of Rocheſter, had conſented that he ſhould reſide at his pariſh of Stanhope one half of the year (k).

Dr. Butler being thus brought back into the world, his merit and his talents ſoon introduced him to particular notice, and paved the way for his riſing to thoſe high dignities which he afterwards enjoyed. In 1736, he was appointed Clerk of the Cloſet to Queen Caroline; and, in the ſame year, he preſented to her Majeſty a copy of his excellent treatiſe, entitled, 'The Analogy of Religion, natural and revealed, to the 'Conſtitution and Courſe of Nature [C].' His attendance upon his Royal Miſtreſs, by naturally to have excelled either in perſpicuity or harmony of ſtyle. However, the obſcurity he hath been charged with aroſe principally from the nature of his ſubjects; and the difficulties which occur in his writings, are ſoon maſtered by a proper degree of attention. When the firſt edition of his Sermons was publiſhed, Mr. Secker took much pains to render the ſtyle more familiar, and the meaning more obvious. The ſame Gentleman gave our Author ſimilar aſſiſtance, in the preface to the ſecond edition of his Sermons, and in his 'Analogy (8).' The aid of ſuch a friend, who was himſelf remarkable for the ſimplicity and perſpicuity of his language, muſt have been of great advantage to theſe excellent works.

(8) Life of Abp. Secker, p. viii.

[C] The Analogy of Religion, natural and revealed, to the Conſtitution and Courſe of Nature.] The firſt edition, of 1736, was in quarto. The ſubſequent editions, the ſixth of which appeared in 1771, are in octavo. The work is inſcribed to the Lord Chancellor Talbot, in acknowledgment of the author's having been under the higheſt obligations to his Lordſhip, and the late Biſhop of Durham. The foundation of the mode of reaſoning that is carried on and completed in this treatiſe, was laid in our Author's Sermons, and particularly in the laſt of them, which is 'Upon the Ignorance of Man.' In that diſcourſe, he obſerves, that we may learn from our ignorance, firſt, with what temper of mind we ought to enquire into the ſubject of religion; namely, with expectation of finding difficulties, and with a diſpoſition to take up and reſt ſatisfied with any evidence whatever, which is real. And ſecondly, that our ignorance is the proper anſwer to many things, which are called objections againſt religion; particularly, to thoſe which ariſe from the appearances of evil and irregularity in the conſtitution of nature, and the government of the world (9). In the introduction to the Analogy, Dr. Butler, having made ſome excellent obſervations on the nature, the foundation, and the meaſure of probability, proceeds in the following manner: 'Hence, namely from analogical reaſoning, Origen has with ſingular ſagacity obſerved, 'that he who believes the Scripture to have proceeded 'from him who is the Author of nature, may well expect to find the ſame ſort of difficulties in it, as are 'found in the conſtitution of nature. And in a like 'way of reflection it may be added, that he who 'denies the Scripture to have been from God upon 'account of theſe difficulties, may, for the very rea'ſon, deny the world to have been formed by him. 'On the other hand, if there be an analogy or like'neſs between that ſyſtem of things and diſpenſa'tion of providence, which Revelation informs us of, 'and that ſyſtem of things and diſpenſation of pro'vidence, which experience together with reaſon in'form us of, i. e. the known courſe of nature; this 'is a preſumption, that they have both the ſame 'author and cauſe; at leaſt ſo far as to anſwer ob'jections againſt the former's being from God, 'drawn from any thing which is analogica lor ſimilar 'to what is in the latter, which is acknowledged to 'be from him: for an Author of nature is here ſup'poſed.

(9) Butler's Sermons, ubi ſupra, Vol ii. p. 113, 115.

'Forming our notions of the conſtitution and 'government of the world upon reaſoning, without 'foundation for the principles which we aſſume, 'whether from the attributes of God or any thing 'elſe; is building a world upon hypotheſis, like 'Des Cartes. Forming our notions upon reaſoning 'from principles which are certain, but applied to 'caſes to which we have no ground to apply them, '(like thoſe who explain the ſtructure of the human 'body, and the nature of diſeaſes and medicines, 'from mere mathematics without ſufficient data;) 'is an error much a-kin to the former: ſince what is 'aſſumed in order to make the reaſoning applicable, 'is hypotheſis. But it muſt be allowed juſt, to join 'abſtract reaſonings with the obſervations of facts, 'and argue from ſuch facts as are known, to others 'that are like them; from that part of the divine 'government over intelligent creatures which comes 'under our view, to that larger and more general go-

by her especial command, was from seven to nine in the evening every day; and though this particular relation to that excellent and learned Queen was soon determined by

'vernment over them, which is beyond it; and from 'what is present, to collect, what is likely, credible, 'or not incredible, will be hereafter.

'This method then of concluding and determining being practical, and what, if we will act at all, 'we cannot but act upon in the common pursuits of 'life; being evidently conclusive, in various degrees, proportionable to the degree and exactness 'of the whole analogy or likeness; and having so 'great authority for its introduction into the subject 'of religion, even revealed religion; my design is to 'apply it to that subject in general, both natural 'and revealed: taking for proved, that there is an 'intelligent Author of nature, and natural Governor 'of the world. For as there is no presumption 'against this prior to the proof of it; so it has been 'often proved with accumulated evidence; from 'this argument of analogy and final causes; from 'abstract reasonings; from the most ancient tradition and testimony; and from the general consent 'of mankind. Nor does it appear, so far as I can 'find, to be denied, by the generality of those who 'profess themselves dissatisfied with the evidence of 'religion.

'As there are some, who, instead of thus attending to what is in fact the constitution of nature, 'form their notions of God's government upon hypothesis: so there are others, who indulge themselves in vain and idle speculations, how the world 'might possibly have been framed otherwise than it 'is; and upon supposition that things might, in 'imagining that they should, have been disposed 'and carried on after a better model, than what appears in the present disposition and conduct of 'them. Suppose now a person of such a turn of 'mind, to go on with his reveries, till he had at 'length fixt upon some particular plan of nature, as 'appearing to him the best.——One shall scarce be 'thought guilty of detraction against human understanding, if one should say, even beforehand, that 'the plan which this speculative person would fix 'upon, though he were the wisest of the sons of 'men, probably would not be the very best, even 'according to his own notions of best; whether he 'thought that to be so, which afforded occasions 'and motives for the exercise of the greatest virtue, 'or which was productive of the greatest happiness, 'or that these two were necessarily connected, and 'run up into one and the same plan. However, it 'may not be amiss once for all to see, what would 'be the amount of these emendations and imaginary 'improvements upon the system of nature, or how 'far they would mislead us. And it seems there 'could be no stopping, till we came to some such 'conclusions as these: that all creatures should at 'first be made as perfect and as happy, as they were 'capable of ever being: that nothing, to be sure, 'of hazard or danger should be put upon them to 'do; some indolent persons would perhaps think 'nothing at all; or certainly, that effectual care 'should be taken, that they should, whether necessarily or not, yet eventually and in fact, always 'do what was right and most conducive to happiness, which would be thought easy for infinite 'power to effect: either by not giving them any 'principles which would endanger their going wrong; 'or by laying the right motive of action in every 'instance before their minds continually in so strong 'a manner, as would never fail of inducing them to 'act conformably to it: and that the whole method 'of government by punishments, should be rejected, 'as absurd; as an aukward round-about method of 'carrying things on; nay as contrary to a principal 'purpose, for which it would be supposed creatures 'were made, namely happiness.

'Now, without considering what is to be said in 'particular to the several parts of this train of folly 'and extravagance; what has been above intimated, 'is a full direct general answer to it, namely, that 'we may see before-hand that we have not faculties 'for this kind of speculation. For though it be admitted, that from the first principles of our nature, 'we unavoidably judge or determine some ends to 'be absolutely in themselves preferable to others, 'and that the ends now mentioned, or if they run 'up into one, that this one is absolutely the best; 'and consequently that we must conclude the ultimate end designed, in the constitution of nature 'and conduct of providence, is the most virtue and 'happiness possible: yet we are far from being able 'to judge, what particular disposition of things 'would be most friendly and assistant to virtue; or 'what means might be absolutely necessary to produce the most happiness in a system of such extent 'as our own world may be, taking in all that is past 'and to come, though we should suppose it detached 'from the whole of things. Indeed we are so far 'from being able to judge of this; that we are not 'judges what may be the necessary means of raising 'and conducting one person to the highest perfection 'and happiness of his nature. Nay even in the little 'affairs of the present life, we find men of different 'educations and ranks are not competent judges of 'the conduct of each other. Our whole nature 'leads us to ascribe all moral perfection to God, and 'to deny all imperfection of him. And this will for 'ever be a practical proof of his moral character, to 'such as will consider what a practical proof is; because it is the voice of God speaking in us. And 'from hence we conclude, that virtue must be the happiness, and vice the misery, of every creature; and 'that regularity and order and right cannot but 'prevail finally in a universe under his government. 'But we are in no sort judges, what are the necessary 'means of accomplishing this end.

'Let us then, instead of that idle and not very innocent employment of forming imaginary models 'of a world, and schemes of governing it, turn our 'thoughts to what we experience to be the conduct 'of nature with respect to intelligent creatures; 'which may be resolved into general laws or rules of 'administration, in the same way as many of the 'laws of nature respecting inanimate matter may be 'collected from experiments. And let us compare 'the known constitution and course of things, with 'what is said to be the moral system of nature; the 'acknowledged dispensations of providence, or that 'government which we find ourselves under, with 'what religion teaches us to believe and expect; 'and see whether they are not analogous and of a 'piece. And upon such a comparison, it will I 'think be found, that they are very much so: that 'both may be traced up to the same general laws, 'and resolved into the same principles of divine 'conduct.

'The analogy here proposed to be considered, is 'of pretty large extent, and consists of several parts; 'in some, more, in others, less, exact. In some 'few instances perhaps it may amount to a real practical proof; in others not so. Yet in these it is a 'confirmation of what is proved other ways. It will 'undeniably shew, what too many want to have 'shewn them, that the system of religion both natural 'and revealed, considered only as a system, and prior 'to the proof of it, is not a subject of ridicule, unless that of nature be so too. And it will afford an 'answer to almost all objections against the system 'both of natural and revealed religion; though not 'perhaps an answer in so great a degree, yet in a 'very considerable degree an answer, to the objections against the evidence of it: for objections 'against a proof, and objections against what is said 'to be proved, the reader will observe, are different 'things.

'Now the divine government of the world, implied in the notion of religion in general and of 'christianity, contains in it; that mankind is appointed to live in a future state; that there, every 'one shall be rewarded or punished; rewarded or 'punished respectively for all that behaviour here, 'which we comprehend under the words, virtuous 'or vicious, morally good or evil: that our present 'life is a probation, a state of trial, and of discipline, 'for that future one; notwithstanding the objections 'which men may fancy they have, from notions of 'necessity, against there being any such moral plan by her death in 1737, yet he had been ſo effectually recommended by her, as well as by the late Lord Chancellor Talbot, to his Majeſty's favour, that, in the next year, he was raiſed to the higheſt order of the church, by a nomination to the biſhopric of Briſtol; to which ſee he was conſecrated on the third of December, 1738. King George the Second not being ſatisfied with this proof of his regard to Dr. Butler, promoted him, in 1740, to the Deanry of St. Paul's, London; into which he was inſtalled on the 24th of May, in that year. Finding the demands of this dignity to be incompatible with his pariſh duty at Stanhope, he immediately reſigned that rich benefice. Beſides our Prelate's unremitted attention to his peculiar obligations, he was called upon to preach ſeveral diſcourſes on public occaſions, which were afterwards ſeparately printed, and have ſince been annexed to the later editions of the Sermons at the Rolls Chapel [D]. In 1746, upon the death of Dr. Egerton, Biſhop of Hereford, Dr. Butler was made Clerk of the Cloſet to the King; and in 1750, he received another diſtinguiſhed mark of his Majeſty's favour, by being tranſlated to the See of Durham. This was on the 16th of October, in that year, upon the deceaſe of Dr. Edward Chandler. Our Prelate, being thus appointed to preſide over a dioceſe with which he had long been connected, delivered his firſt, and, indeed, his laſt charge to his clergy, at his primary viſitation, in 1751. The principal ſubject of it was 'External Religion.' The Biſhop having obſerved, with deep concern, the great and growing neglect of ſerious piety in the kingdom, inſiſted ſtrongly on the uſefulneſs of outward forms and inſtitutions, in fixing and preſerving a ſenſe of devotion and duty in the minds of men. In doing this, he was thought by ſeveral perſons, to ſpeak too favourably of Pagan and Popiſh ceremonies, and to countenance, in a certain degree, the cauſe of ſuperſtition. Under that apprehenſion, an able and ſpirited Writer, who was underſtood to be a clergyman of the church of England, publiſhed, in 1752, a pamphlet, entitled, 'A ſerious Enquiry into the Uſe and Importance of external Religion: occaſioned by ſome Paſſages in the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of Durham's Charge to the Clergy of that Dioeceſe;——humbly addreſſed to his Lordſhip (l).' Many perſons, however, and, we believe, the greater part of the clergy of the dioceſe, did not think our Prelate's Charge ſo exceptionable as it appeared to this Author. The Charge, being printed at Durham, and having never been annexed to any of Dr. Butler's other works, is now become extremely ſcarce (m); and it is obſervable, that it is the only one of his publications which ever

'as this at all; and whatever objections may appear 'to lie againſt the wiſdom and goodneſs of it, as it 'ſtands ſo imperfectly made known to us at preſent: 'that this world being in a ſtate of apoſtacy and 'wickedneſs, and conſeqnently of ruin, and the 'ſenſe both of their condition and duty being greatly 'corrupted amongſt men, this gave occaſion for an 'additional diſpenſation of providence; of the ut'moſt importance; proved by miracles; but con'taining in it many things appearing to us ſtrange 'and not to have been expected; a diſpenſation of 'providence, which is a ſcheme or ſyſtem of things; 'carried on by the mediation of a divine perſon, the 'Meſſiah; in order to the recovery of the world; yet 'not revealed to all men, nor proved with the 'ſtrongeſt poſſible evidence to all thoſe to whom it is 'revealed; but only to ſuch a part of mankind, and 'with ſuch particular evidence as the wiſdom of God 'thought fit. The deſign then of the following 'treatiſe will be to ſhew, that the ſeveral parts prin'cipally objected againſt in this moral and Chriſtian 'diſpenſation, including its ſcheme, its publication, 'and the proof which God has afforded us of its 'truth; that the particular parts principally objected 'againſt in this whole diſpenſation, are analogous to 'what is experienced in the conſtitution and courſe 'of nature, or providence; that the chief objections 'themſelves which are alleged againſt the former, 'are no other, than what may be alleged with like 'juſtneſs againſt the latter, where they are found in 'fact to be inconcluſive; and that this argument 'from analogy is in general unanſwerable, and un'doubtedly of weight on the ſide of religion, not'withſtanding the objections which may ſeem to lie 'againſt it, and the real ground which there may be 'for difference of opinion, as to the particular de'gree of weight which is to be laid upon it. This 'is a general account of what may be looked for in 'the following treatiſe. And I ſhall begin it with 'that which is the foundation of all our hopes and 'of all our fears; all our hopes and fears, which 'are of any conſideration; I mean a future life (10).'

(10) Introduction to the Analogy, p. vi.—xvi.

From this extract, our readers may perceive, in a ſlight degree, what they are to expect from the Analogy: but for full ſatisfaction they muſt have recourſe to the work itſelf, which, for depth and originality of thought and reaſoning, is one of the moſt maſterly performances that ever appeared in the world. Whether it is in every reſpect unexceptionable, we do not determine. Some hints and remarks, on the argument from Analogy, in proof of religion, might occaſionally have been thrown out before; but Dr. Butler was the firſt who conſidered it in a direct treatiſe, and brought it to ſuch a ſtate of perfection. He deſerves, therefore, to be regarded as a diſcoverer (11). 'I have ſo great an opinion,' ſays Mrs. Cockburn, 'of the Author of the Analogy, that I no 'ſooner ſaw it advertiſed, than I made it my buſineſs 'to enquire after it, and procured the reading it 'twice. I think the deſign finely executed, eſpeci'ally in the firſt part, and all the objections of the 'Deiſts very well obviated (12).' To the 'Analogy,' two diſſertations are annexed, one on Perſonal Identity, and the other on the Nature of Virtue; and they are equally excellent with the reſt of the book.

Theſe ſeveral diſcourſes abound in that penetration and good ſenſe which diſtinguiſh Dr. Butler's other writings, and are highly worthy of a diligent peruſal.

proudced him a direct literary antagoniſt. By his promotion to the See of Durham, our worthy Biſhop was furniſhed with ample means of exerting the virtue of charity; a virtue which eminently abounded in him, and the exerciſe of which was his higheſt delight. But this gratification he did not long enjoy. He had been but a ſhort time ſeated in his new Biſhopric, when his health began viſibly to decline; and having been complimented, during his indiſpoſition, upon account of his great reſignation to the divine will, he is ſaid to have expreſſed ſome regret, that he ſhould be taken from the preſent world ſo ſoon after he had been rendered capable of becoming much more uſeful in it. In his laſt illneſs, he was carried to Briſtol, to try the waters of that place; but theſe proving ineffectual, he removed to Bath, where, being paſt recovery, he died on the 16th of June, 1752. His corpſe was conveyed to Briſtol, and interred in the Cathedral there, where a monument, with an inſcription, is erected to his memory (n). On the greatneſs of Biſhop Butler's intellectual character we need not enlarge; for his profound knowledge, and the prodigious ſtrength of his mind, are amply diſplayed in his incomparable writings. His piety was of the moſt ſerious and fervent, and perhaps ſomewhat of the aſcetic kind [E]. His benevolence was warm, generous, and diffuſive. Whilſt he was Biſhop of Briſtol, he expended, in repairing and improving the epiſcopal palace, four thouſand pounds, which is ſaid to have been more than the whole revenues of the Biſhopric amounted to, during his continuance in that See. Beſides his private benefactions, he was a contributor to the Infirmary at Briſtol, and a ſubſcriber to three of the Hoſpitals at London. He was, likewiſe, a principal promoter, though not the firſt founder, of the Infirmary at Newcaſtle, in Northumberland. In ſupporting the hoſpitality and dignity of the rich and powerful dioceſe of Durham, he was deſirous of imitating the ſpirit of his patron, Biſhop Talbot. In this ſpirit, he ſet apart three days every week for the reception and entertainment of the principal gentry of the country. Nor were even the clergy who had the pooreſt benefices neglected by him. He not only occaſionally invited them to dine with him, but condeſcended to viſit them at their reſpective pariſhes. By his will, he left five hundred pounds to the Society for propagating the Goſpel in foreign Parts, and ſome legacies to his friends and domeſtics. His executor and reſiduary legatee was his Chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Nathaniel Forſter, a divine of diſtinguiſhed literature, of whom an account will be given in its proper place. Biſhop Butler was never married (o). Soon after his deceaſe, the following lines, by way of Epitaph, were written concerning him; and were printed firſt, if we recollect aright, in the London Magazine.

[E] Perhaps ſomewhat of the aſcetic kind.] The Biſhop's diſpoſition, which had in it a natural caſt of gloomineſs, was ſuppoſed to give a tincture to his devotion. As a proof of this, and that he had even acquired ſomewhat of a ſuperſtitious turn of mind, it was alleged, that he had put a croſs in his Chapel at Briſtol. The croſs was a plain piece of marble inlaid. This circumſtance, together with the offence which ſome perſons had taken at his Charge delivered at Durham, might poſſibly give riſe to a calumny, that, almoſt fifteen years after his death, was advanced concerning him, in an obſcure and anonymous pamphlet, entitled, ‘ The Root of Proteſtant ‘ Errors examined.’ It was there ſaid, that our Prelate died in the communion of the church of Rome. Of this abſurd and groundleſs charge, we ſhall take no other notice, than to tranſcribe what the worthy and learned Biſhop of Cheſter hath written concerning it, in his Life of Archbiſhop Secker. ‘ This ſtrange ſlander, founded on the weakeſt ‘ pretences and moſt trivial circumſtances that can be ‘ imagined, no one was better qualified to confute ‘ than the Archbiſhop; as well from his long and ‘ intimate knowledge of Biſhop Butler, as from the ‘ information given him at the time by thoſe who attended his Lordſhip in his laſt illneſs, and were ‘ with him when he died. Accordingly, by an article in a news-paper, ſigned Miſopſeudes, his ‘ Grace challenged the author of that pamphlet to ‘ produce his authority for what he had advanced; ‘ and in a ſecond article defended the Biſhop againſt ‘ him; and in a third (all with the ſame ſignature) ‘ confuted another writer, who, under the name of ‘ A real Proteſtant, ſtill maintained that ridiculous ‘ calumny. His antagoniſts were effectually ſubdued, ‘ and his ſuperiority to them was publicly acknowledged by a ſenſible and candid man, who ſigned ‘ himſelf, and who really was, A diſſenting Miniſter. ‘ Surely, it is a very unwiſe piece of policy, in thoſe ‘ who profeſs themſelves enemies to Popery, to take ‘ ſo much pains to bring the moſt reſpectable names ‘ within its pale; and to give it the merit of having ‘ gained over thoſe who were the brighteſt ornaments ‘ and firmeſt ſupports of the Proteſtant cauſe (13).’

Prelate. The third is on the ſubject of tithes, and diſplays great good ſenſe and liberality of ſentiment. The Biſhop ſees no ſort of proof, that tithes, under the goſpel, are of divine right (14).

Since this article was ſent to the preſs, Mr. Mainwaring's ingenious Diſſertation on the Compoſition of Sermons, has fallen into our hands, in which he pays a great and juſt tribute of applauſe to Biſhop Butler. Part of what he has ſaid we ſhall tranſcribe. 'Newton and Locke, who reſcued learning from the 'ſlavery of ſyſtems, and taught men to think for 'themſelves, were both of the laity, and both friends 'to revealed religion. Since their time, another 'writer aroſe, whoſe vein of thinking is alike original, and whoſe works, though he had neither the 'gift of eloquence, nor the art of expreſſing himſelf with grace or eaſe, have done honour to his country.——The method of reaſoning he chiefly adopts, 'is an appeal to facts, of which all men are judges; 'and even when moſt abſtruſe or abſtracted, it is not 'perplexed, or fallacious. For metaphyſics, which 'had nothing to ſupport it but mere abſtraction, or 'ſhadowy ſpeculation, Biſhop Butler hath placed 'on the firm baſis of obſervation and experiment: 'and, by purſuing preciſely the ſame mode of rea'ſoning in the ſcience of morals, as his great prede'ceſſor Newton had done in the ſyſtem of nature, 'hath formed and concluded a happy alliance be'tween faith and philoſophy. The Sermons he pub'liſhed, excepting ſome few of a more popular caſt, 'are deep diſquiſitions on the plan of his Analogy, 'well-ſuited to a learned audience, in an age ſo fond 'of enquiry, although the impropriety of preaching 'them appeared to him to require ſome apology. 'But ſurely ſuch an exerciſe of the underſtanding, 'if the hearers are capable of it, muſt meliorate the 'heart. Beſides, I cannot but wiſh, that, as there 'is ſo great an abundance of the practical ſort, ſome 'ſermons were written chiefly with a view to readers; 'and thoſe too perſons of improved taſte, and cultivated minds (16).

BYNG (GEORGE), Lord Viſcount Torrington, and Rear-Admiral of Great Britain, was deſcended from an ancient family in the county of Kent; an account whereof ſee in the note [A]. He was born in the year 1663; and in 1678, at the age of fifteen, went a volunteer at ſea, with the King's warrant, given him at the recommendation of the Duke of York (a). In 1681, he quitted the ſea-ſervice, upon the invitation of General Kirk, Governor of Tangier, and ſerved as a cadet in the grenadiers of that garriſon; till on a vacancy that quickly happened, the General, who always patronized him with great friendſhip, made him Enſign of his own company, and ſoon after a Lieutenant. In 1684, after the demolition of Tangier, the Earl of Dartmouth, General of the ſea and land forces, appointed him Lieutenant of the Orford; from which time he conſtantly kept to the ſea-ſervice, remaining likewiſe an officer in the army ſeveral years after. In 1685, he went Lieutenant of his Majeſty's ſhip the Phœnix, to the Eaſt-Indies, where engaging and boarding a Zinganian pirate, who maintained a deſperate fight, moſt of thoſe that entered with him were ſlain, himſelf greatly wounded; and, the pirate ſinking, he was taken out of the ſea, with ſcarcely any remains of life. In 1688, being Firſt-Lieutenant to Sir John Aſhby, in the fleet commanded by the Earl of Dartmouth, and fitted out to oppoſe the deſigns of the Prince of Orange, he was in a particular manner entruſted and employed in the intrigues then carrying on, amongſt the moſt conſiderable officers of the fleet, in favour of that Prince, and was the perſon confided in by them, to carry their ſecret aſſurances of obedience to [A] An account whereof ſee in the note.] It appears on record, that this family was a long time ſeated in Kent, as the viſitation of that country, in the office of Arms, ſhews. John Byng, Eſq; (ſon and heir of Thomas Byng, who was living in the reign of King Henry VII.) in the year 1535 (1), 28th of Henry VIII, having married Agnes, daughter to ——— Spencer, of the county of Eſſex, had iſſue, two ſons and three daughters. Robert, the eldeſt ſon, the direct anceſtor of the preſent Lord Viſcount Torrington, was ſeated at Wrotham in Kent; and Thomas, the youngeſt, was of St. Peter's College in Cambridge, Maſter of Clare-hall, and Doctor of the Civil Laws: in 1572, the 14th of Elizabeth, he was Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, as alſo in 1578. In 18 Eliz. he was in commiſſion with William Lord Burleigh, Lord High-Treaſurer of England, Richard Biſhop of Ely, and others, to viſit St. John's College in Cambridge. In 36 Eliz. 1594, he was conſtituted Regius Profeſſor of the Civil Law in the ſame Univerſity: he was ſeated at Grandcheſter in Cambridgeſhire, and in 1571 was married to Catherine, daughter of ——— Randall, Eſq; by whom he had ſeveral ſons; of whom, Andrew the ſecond was Archdeacon of Norwich, the King's Hebrew Profeſſor at Cambridge, and was particularly recommended by King James I. to be Maſter of Corpus Chriſti College in that Univerſity, by his letter of the 26th of March, 1618, as knowing perſonally (he ſays) his great worth, and as he would be an honour and ornament to the Univerſity, if they made choice of him. Henry, the eldeſt ſon of Thomas, was Serjeant at Law, and Counſel to the Univerſity of Cambridge, as was alſo his ſon after him.

But to return to Robert Byng, Eſq; of Wrotham, anceſtor of Admiral Byng; he ſerved for the Borough of Abingdon, in the firſt Parliament of Queen Elizabeth, anno 1559, and, in the 34th year of her reign, was Sheriff of the county of Kent (2). He married to his firſt wife, Frances, daughter and heireſs of Richard Hill, Eſq; by whom he had iſſue three ſons, George, John, and Francis, whereof the two laſt died without iſſue; and by his ſecond wife, Mary, daughter of William Maynard, Eſq; he had iſſue three ſons, of which, William was Governor of Deal-Caſtle; and a daughter, Anne, married to David Polhill, of Orford in Kent, Eſq. The ſaid Robert Byng, Eſq; of Wrotham, died on the ſecond of September, 1595 (as appears by Inquiſition of the Court of Wards), ſeiſed of the manors of Wrotham, Charlton Ruſthale, in Spelhurſt, by Tunbridge; Stodmer-hill and Stock-hill, manors in Yalding; and Stanſtead manor, with Leybone Wood in Leybone, leaving iſſue, George Byng, his ſon and heir, who was choſen Member of Parliament for Rocheſter in Kent, 27 Eliz. and for the port of Dover, in the firſt year of King James I. He died in 1616, and was ſucceeded by George Byng his ſon and heir, born at Wrotham in 1594, who, in 1617, married Catharine, daughter of Sir John Hewett of Headly Hall, in the county of York, by whom he had iſſue, a ſon John, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to —— Man, of the county of Kent, Eſq. John Byng, his ſon and heir, conveying away Wrotham, was the laſt of this family there. He married Philadelphia, the daughter of ——— Johnſon of Loans in Surry, by whom he had ſeveral children, of which, George, the Lord Viſcount Torrington, was the eldeſt.

his Highneſs, to whom he was privately introduced at Sherborne, by Admiral Ruſſel, afterwards Earl of Orford. After his return to the fleet, the Earl of Dartmouth ſent him with Capt. Aylmer and Capt. Haſtings, to carry a meſſage of ſubmiſſion to the Prince at Windſor, and made him Captain of the Conſtant Warwick, a fourth rate man of war. In 1690, he commanded the Hope, a third rate, and was ſecond to Sir George Rooke in the battle of Beachy. In the years 1691 and 1692, he was Captain of the Royal Oak, and ſerved under Admiral Ruſſel, who commanded in chief his Majeſty's fleet. In 1693, that great officer diſtinguiſhed him in a particular manner, by promoting him to the rank of his firſt Captain, in which ſtation he ſerved in the years 1694 and 1695, in the Mediterranean, where the deſigns of the French againſt Barcelona were prevented; and alſo the next year 1696, in the channel, to oppoſe the intended invaſion of King James, with a French army from the coaſt of France, which upon the appearance of the fleet was laid aſide. In 1702, a war breaking out, he accepted the command of the Naſſau, a third rate, and was at the taking and burning the French fleet at Vigo. In the year 1703, he was made Rear-Admiral of the Red, and ſerved in the fleet commanded by Sir Cloudeſly Shovel in the Mediterranean, who detached him with a ſquadron of five men of war (b), to Algiers, where he renewed the peace with that government. In his return home he was in danger of being loſt, in the great ſtorm which he met with in the Channel. In 1704, he ſerved in the grand fleet ſent into the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir Cloudeſly Shovel, in ſearch of the French fleet; and it was he who commanded the ſquadron that attacked and cannonaded Gibraltar (c); and by landing the ſeamen, whoſe valour was very remarkably diſtinguiſhed on this occaſion, the garriſon capitulated the third day. He was in the battle of Malaga, which followed ſoon after; and for his behaviour in that action, Queen Anne conferred on him the honour of knighthood (d). Towards the latter end of this year, the French having had two ſtrong ſquadrons in the Soundings, beſides great numbers of privateers, which very much annoyed our trade, Sir George Byng ſailed the latter end of January from Plymouth, with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, and a great fleet of rich outward bound merchant ſhips; which after he had ſeen in ſafety out of their ſoundings, he directed the ſquadron as he judged beſt for (e) annoying the enemies privateers; in which he was ſo ſucceſsful, by his well ſtationing his cruizers, that he took twelve of their largeſt privateers in about two months time, with the Thetis, a French man of war of forty-four guns, and alſo ſeven French merchant ſhips, moſt of them richly laden from the Weſt-Indies (f). The number of men taken on board was 2070, and of guns 334. This remarkable ſucceſs made a great noiſe at that time, and was publiſhed by particular directions from the Court. It gave ſuch a blow to the French privateers, that they ſcarcely ventured into the Channel all the year after. In 1705, he was made Vice-Admiral of the Blue, and, upon the election of a new Parliament, was returned a Burgeſs for Plymouth; which place he repreſented in every ſucceeding Parliament, to the year 1721, when he was created a Peer; and one of his ſons was afterwards conſtantly choſen there. During this ſummer he commanded in chief a ſquadron in the Channel, and blocked up the French fleet in Breſt, with a much inferior ſtrength (g). In 1706, the Emperor being cloſely beſieged in Barcelona by ſea and land, by the Duke of Anjou, and the place reduced to great extremity, and our fleet in the Mediterranean being too weak to relieve it, Sir George Byng was appointed to command a ſquadron of twenty ſhips (h) from England, to go to its relief; in which ſervice he uſed ſuch diligence and activity, and joined our fleet with ſuch unexpected diſpatch, that the ſaving of that important place was entirely owing to it, the French having in three days afterwards raiſed the ſiege. He aſſiſted at the other enterpriſes of that campaign, and commanded the ſhips detached for the reduction of Carthagena and Alicant, which he accompliſhed, although at this laſt place there were above 160 guns facing the ſea, many of which our Admiral with only five ſhips diſmounted, and drove the enemy from them (i). After this, he was appointed to command a winter ſquadron, of eighteen men of war and two fire-ſhips, to guard the coaſt of Portugal, according to the treaty with that Prince, and to cruize in the propereſt ſtations for annoying the enemy. In the beginning of the year 1707, Sir George was ordered with a ſquadron to Alicant, with neceſſaries for the army in Spain; and having accordingly ſailed the thirtieth of March, when he arrived off Cape St. Vincent, he had the melancholy news of the defeat of our army at the battle of Almanza, under the command of the Earl of Galway, who ſent to the Admiral, to acquaint him with the diſtreſs he was in, and deſired, that whatever he brought for the uſe of the army, might be carried to Tortoſa in Catalonia, to which place his Lordſhip deſigned to retreat; and that, if poſſible, he would ſave the ſick and wounded men at Denia, Gandia, and Valencia, where it was intended every thing that could be got together, ſhould be got on board (k). This ſervice the Admiral performed; and having ſent the ſick and wounded to Tortoſa, and being ſoon after joined by Sir Cloudeſly Shovel from Liſbon, they proceeded together to the coaſt of Italy, with a fleet of forty-three men of war and fifty tranſports (l), to ſecond Prince Eugene and the Duke of Savoy in the ſiege of Toulon; at which Sir George Byng ſerved in the ſecond poſt under Sir Cloudeſly Shovel (m), and narrowly eſcaped eſcaped ſhipwreck in his return home, when that great officer was loſt; for the Royal Anne, in which Sir George Byng bore his flag, was within a ſhip's length of the Rocks called the Biſhop and his Clerks, upon which the Admiral ſtruck; yet he was providentially ſaved by his own and his officers preſence of mind, who in a minute's time ſet the ſhip's top-ſails, even when one of the rocks was under her main chains (n). In 1708, he was made Admiral of the Blue, and commanded the ſquadron that was fitted out to oppoſe the invaſion deſigned againſt Scotland by the Pretender, with a French army from Dunkirk. This ſquadron conſiſted of twenty-four men of war, with which Sir George Byng and Lord Durſley ſailed from Deal for the French coaſt, on the twenty-ſeventh of February, and having anchored in Gravelin pits, Sir George went into a ſmall frigate, and ſailed within two miles of the Flemiſh Road, and there learnt the ſtrength and number of the enemies ſhips (o). On the Admiral's anchoring before Gravelin, the French officers laid aſide their embarkation, but upon expreſs orders from Court, were obliged to reſume it; and on the ſixth of March, actually ſailed out of Dunkirk; but being taken ſhort by contrary winds, came to an anchor till the eighth, and then continued their voyage. Sir George Byng, at the time the French fleet ſet ſail, had been obliged, for ſecurity, to go to an anchor under Dungeneſs; and in his return to Dunkirk, was informed the French were ſailed, but could get no account where; though he was ſtrongly inclined to believe they were deſigned for Scotland. Upon this, it was reſolved in a Council of War, to purſue the enemy to the road of Edinburgh; and accordingly, having firſt detached Rear-Admiral Baker, with a ſmall ſquadron, to convoy the troops that were ſent from Oſtend, the Admiral proſecuted his expedition with the reſt (p). On the thirteenth of March, the French were diſcovered in the Frith of Edinburgh, where they made ſignals, but to no purpoſe, and then ſteered a N. E. courſe, as if they intended to have gone to St. Andrews. Sir George Byng purſued them, and took the Saliſbury, an Engliſh prize then in their ſervice, with ſeveral perſons of great quality on board, many land and ſea officers in the French ſervice, of very great diſtinction, five companies of the regiment of Bearn, and all the ſhip's company, conſiſting of 300 men (q). After this, Sir George Byng, finding it impoſſible to come up with the enemy, returned with the fleet to Leith, where he continued till he received advice of the French getting back to Dunkirk, and then proceeded to the Downs, purſuant to the orders he received from the Miniſtry. Before the Admiral left Leith Road, the Lord Provoſt and Magiſtrates of Edinburgh, to ſhew the grateful ſenſe they had of the important ſervice he had done them, by thus drawing off the enemy before they had time to land their forces, and thereby preſerving not only the city of Edinburgh, but even the whole kingdom, from the fatal effects of a rebellion and invaſion, reſolved to preſent him with the freedom of their city, by ſending, in their name, Sir Patrick Johnſton, their late Repreſentative in Parliament, with an inſtrument called a burgeſs ticket, incloſed in a gold box, having the arms of the city on the ſide, and theſe words engraved upon the cover: 'The Lord Provoſt, Baillies, and Town-Council of Edinburgh, did preſent theſe 'letters of Burgeoiſe, to Sir George Byng, Admiral of the Blue, in gratitude to him 'for delivering this iſland from a foreign invaſion, and defeating the deſigns of a 'French fleet, at the mouth of the Frith of Edinburgh, the thirteenth of March '1708.' This preſent was accompanied with a letter from the Lord Provoſt, wherein he deſired the Admiral to accept it as a mark of their high reſpect to him, who had delivered them from ſuch great fear and apprehenſions of danger, for which his memory ſhould be honoured by them (r). When Sir George Byng was afterwards created Lord Torrington, this action of his is particularly mentioned in the preamble to his patent of creation, much to his honour, as the reader will ſee hereafter. Upon Sir George Byng's arrival in London, he was moſt graciouſly received by the Queen his Sovereign, and by his Royal Highneſs Prince George of Denmark, Lord High-Admiral; and the Queen was pleaſed to offer him the place of one of the Prince's Council in the Admiralty, which, however, he then declined (s). One would have imagined, that this ſurpriſing ſucceſs muſt have ſatisfied every body; and that after defeating ſo extraordinary a ſcheme, as at that time this was allowed to be, and reſtoring public credit, as it were in an inſtant, there ſhould have been an univerſal tribute of applauſe paid to the Admiral, by all ranks and degrees of people. Yet this was ſo far from being the caſe, that Sir George Byng had ſcarcely ſet his foot in London, before it was whiſpered that the Parliament would enquire into his conduct; which took riſe from a very fooliſh perſuaſion, that having once had ſight of the enemy's fleet, he might, if he pleaſed, have taken every ſhip of them as well as the Saliſbury. The truth of the matter was, that the French having amuſed the Jacobites in Scotland, with a propoſal about beſieging the caſtle of Edinburgh, Sir George Byng was particularly inſtructed, by all means to prevent that, by hindering the French from landing in the neighbourhood. This he effectually did, and by doing it, anſwered the end for which he was ſent (t) [B]. But the ſame malicious people, who firſt propagated

[B] Anſwered the end for which he was ſent.] To give a more particular and circumſtantial narration of this important affair, we muſt have recourſe to Sir George Byng's own account, contained in two letters written gated this ſtory, invented alſo another, viz. that Sir George was hindered from taking the French fleet, by his ſhips being foul; which actually produced an enquiry in the Houſe of Commons, and an addreſs to the Queen, to direct that an account might be laid before them, of the number of ſhips that went on the expedition with Sir George Byng, and when the ſame were cleaned; which at laſt, however, ended in a reſolution, that the thanks of the Houſe ſhould be given to the Prince, as Lord High-Admiral, for his great care in ſo expeditiouſly ſetting forth ſo great a number of ſhips, whereby the fleet under Sir George Byng was enabled, ſo happily, to prevent the intended invaſion (u). This was a very wiſe and well concerted meaſure, ſince it fully ſatisfied the world of the falſehood of theſe reports, and, at the ſame time, gave great ſatisfaction to the Queen and her Royal Conſort, the Prince of Denmark, who both conceived that his Royal Highneſs's character was affected, as Lord High-Admiral. In the middle of the ſummer of the year 1708, a reſolution was taken, to make a deſcent on, or at leaſt to alarm, the coaſt of France, by way of retaliation for the affront ſo lately offered us; and Sir George Byng as Admiral, and Lord Durſley as Vice-Admiral of the Blue, were appointed to command the fleet deſtined for that purpoſe.

written to the Miniſtry by him from on board the Medway, dated the 13th and 15th of March, and which, together with a letter written by the French General to the King his maſter, ſhew the real deſigns of the French, and the great judgment and foreſight of our Admiral in diſappointing them, and will make a complete journal of this famous expedition. We ſhall do this in as few words as poſſible.

'On the 13th of March, in the morning, the 'French fleet was diſcovered in the mouth of the 'Frith of Edinburgh, off of which place Sir George 'Byng anchored the night before, and ſent a boat 'on ſhore to the Iſle of May, from whence he had 'an account that they came to an anchor the 12th in 'the afternoon, and had ſent a ſhip up to Leith with 'a flag at main-top-maſt-head; but by that time ſhe 'could get before the town, they heard guns fired in 'the manner of ſalutes, which were ours, for coming to an anchor. This ſhip, judged to be about 'ſixty guns, came down in the morning, and was 'within two leagues of our ſquadron. The French 'ſquadron ſtanding from Sir George Byng, he purſued them with all the ſail he could, ſometimes 'with hopes of coming up with them, but they 'were lighter ſhips than ours: two of our ſhips indeed, the Ludlow-Caſtle and Dover, being cleaner 'and better ſailers than the reſt, came up with part 'of the enemy's ſquadron, paſſing by ſome of their 'ſmaller, to reach bigger ſhips, in hopes of ſtopping 'them till they could be ſtrengthened. They engaged two or three of the French, one of which 'was the Saliſbury, of fifty guns, formerly taken 'from us: theſe they endeavoured to cut off from 'the reſt of the fleet; but a very dark night coming 'on, they loſt ſight of all but the Saliſbury, and ſhe 'falling in amongſt the headmoſt of ours, was taken. 'The Admiral learned from the officers of this ſhip, 'that there were twelve battalions on board their 'ſquadron, commanded by the Count de Gace, and 'that the Pretender, the Lord Middleton, Lord 'Perth, the Macdonalds, Captain Trevannion, 'and ſeveral other officers and gentlemen, were on 'board the Mars, in which ſhip was Monſieur Fourbin, who commanded the ſquadron. The morning after this chaſe there were but eighteen of the 'enemy's ſhips ſeen, and they as far off as they could 'be diſcovered from the maſt-head; ſo that the Admiral having no proſpect of coming up with them, 'he lay off and on near Buchaneſs, all the day, to 'gather his ſhips together. The next morning it 'blew hard north-eaſterly, which made a great ſea, 'and he judging the French could not ſeize the ſhore 'to make any attempt, bore up for Leith, which 'was thought moſt reaſonable, not only to ſecure, 'but to give countenance and ſpirit to, her Majeſty's 'faithful ſubjects, and diſcourage thoſe who might 'have a deſign to join the enemy. The 16th, a 'Council of War was held in the road of Leith, 'when it was conſidered where the French might 'probably attempt to land, or which way our ſquadron might proceed, with moſt probability of preventing any deſign they might have. It was 'thought, that if our ſquadron ſhould go northward, 'and the wind come up ſtrong weſterly, it might 'hinder their gaining the Frith of Forth; and that 'ſince the enemy were probably driven to the ſouth-'ward of it (which they thought was of the greateſt 'conſequence to ſecure), and were at firſt found at 'anchor in the Frith, it was reaſonable to believe 'they intended for Edinburgh, the metropolis; ſo 'it was determined to remain in Leith road, until 'there ſhould be advice of their returning on the 'coaſt, or that an anſwer could be received to the 'expreſs diſpatched to the Lord High-Admiral; but 'that, in the mean while, ſcouts ſhould be kept out 'between the Frith and Aberdeen, and all poſſible 'means uſed to gain intelligence from the ſhore; for 'which purpoſe the Admiral deſired the Earl of Leven 'to ſend ſome truſty perſons northwards towards the 'Frith of Murray. The 23d of March he received 'orders to ſend five ſhips and the priſoners taken in 'the Saliſbury, into the river Humber, and the 'Downs, and with the ſquadron to proceed to ſea 'and guard the coaſt of Scotland; whereupon it was 'reſolved, that as ſoon as the priſoners could be 'removed, the ſquadron ſhould proceed off Buchaneſs, and that there the Admiral ſhould ſend on 'ſhore for intelligence of the enemy, and that if he 'could not get any, he ſhould ply it up again towards the Frith of Edinburgh. Not being able to 'get any advice, either by ſea or land, of the 'French ſquadron, and proviſions growing ſhort in 'his own, he received orders, in the beginning of 'April, to return to the Downs, but to leave three 'ſhips to cruize on the coaſt of Scotland, to prevent 'correſpondence between diſaffected perſons of that 'kingdom, and France. Accordingly the Admiral 'appointed the ſhips for that ſervice, and arrived in 'the Downs the 16th of April with three third rates, 'thirteen fourths, of which the Saliſbury prize was 'one, two fifths, a ſixth, and fire ſhip, having appointed ſome frigates to convoy recruits from Scotland to Holland (3).'

The account which the French General, Monſieur de Gace, wrote the King his maſter, agrees pretty well with the above (4). He ſays, they ſailed from Dunkirk the 19th of March in the evening, and caſt anchor in the mouth of the Frith of Edinburgh the 23d in the afternoon, N. S. The next day, as they were ready to enter the Frith, they diſcovered our ſquadron; upon which the Admiral, M. Fourbin, reſolved to bear off by the favour of a land breeze, which (ſays he) 'very luckily carried us from the 'enemy:' That we purſued them pretty cloſe all that day, and that four of our beſt ſailers (we ſay only two) attacked ſome of their ſternmoſt ſhips, and took the Saliſbury, after a ſtout reſiſtance: That their fleet being diſperſed, and we near them, M. Fourbin ſteered falſe during the night; which had a good effect, for the next day they found themſelves with twenty ſail, at a good diſtance from us; whereupon it was propoſed, that ſince they had been prevented landing in the Frith of Forth, they ſhould try if they could reach Inverneſs and land there; to which the Pretender readily agreed, and they actually ſet ſail, and ſteered a whole day northwards, with a favourable wind; but at night there aroſe a ſtrong contrary wind, which continued all the next day, with great violence; and they, having no pilots to guide them, and fearing many other inconveniences, reſolved to return to Dunkirk, where they arrived the 7th of April, N. S. Thus ended this purpoſe [C]. The ſame year, Sir George Byng had the honour of conducting the Queen of Portugal to Liſbon [D], where a commiſſion was ſent him, appointing him to be Admiral of the White (w); and her Portugueſe Majeſty preſented him with her picture ſet in diamonds, to a very great value (x). In the year 1709, he commanded, in chief, her Majeſty's ſquadron in the Mediterranean, during which he attempted the relief of the city and caſtle of Alicant, and, which was a greater enterpriſe, had a deſign upon Cadiz; in both which, it was very far from being his fault that he did not ſucceed, having himſelf done all that could be expected from him, or he had power to do, to render theſe important deſigns ſucceſsful [E]. After his return home from this command, this affair of the invaſion, which made ſo great a noiſe at that time, and which has been handed down in ſo many different lights to poſterity; and which, though happily put an end to in time, yet had begun to have very bad effects, by ſinking our public ſecurities, occaſioning a prodigious run upon the Bank, and diſturbing our foreign remittances ſo much, that all thinking people were convinced of the great riſk a nation runs, that engages in a foreign war, while loaded with debts at home.

[C] Sir George Byng was appointed to command the fleet deſtined for that purpoſe.] Our Admiral ſailed on the 27th of July, from Spithead, with the fleet, and tranſports having the troops on board, intended for the deſcent, commanded by Lieutenant-General Erle, and came the next day to anchor off Deal. The 29th, they ſtood over to the coaſt of Picardy, as well to alarm, as to amuſe the enemy, and to be ready for farther orders. The firſt of Auguſt the fleet ſailed again, and anchored the next day in the bay of Boulogne, where they made a feint of landing their troops: the third, they ſtood in pretty nigh the ſhore, to obſerve the condition of the enemy. The fourth, they weighed, but anchored again about noon in the bay of Eſtaples. Here a detachment of troops was landed; but the project on ſhore, which this deſcent was to have ſeconded, being laid aſide, an expreſs brought new orders from England, upon which the troops were re-embarked. The ſeventh, they ſtood over again to the coaſt of England, and being joined by more tranſports in Dover road, arrived the eleventh in the bay of La Hogue. The twelfth, they deſigned to have landed; but upon viewing the coaſt, they found ſo many troops brought together, to oppoſe a deſcent, and ſo many forts and batteries on ſhore, that it was deemed impracticable. The fourteenth, the fleet ſet ſail again for the weſtward; but the wind coming about the next day, they altered their courſe, and lay before Cherbourg, but found no proſpect of doing any thing there. The ſame day the Lord Durſley, in the Oxford, with ſix other men of war, and marines, ſailed to the weſtward to cruize in the Soundings. The ſeventeenth, the reſt of the fleet returned to the bay of La Hogue; but the men growing ſickly, and proviſions falling ſhort, Sir George Byng returned to Spithead, on the 28th (5).—After thus alarming the French coaſts, and creating the enemy inexpreſſible trouble, the Duke of Marlborough deſired that the troops on board this ſquadron might be landed at Oſtend, which was accordingly performed on the 23d of September, at ſo critical a juncture, that it is thought if they had not arrived, the city of Liſle could ſcarcely have been taken (6). Many things were given out with relation to this expedition, the true deſign of which was, to diſturb the French naval armaments on their coaſts, and to oblige the French Court to march great bodies of men to protect their maritime towns, which neceſſarily occaſioned the diminiſhing their army in Flanders. The French Hiſtorians, however, magnify the great advantage they obtained, by repelling this invaſion.

[D] Sir George Byng had the honour of conducting the Queen of Portugal to Liſbon.] Her Majeſty was ſtyled, before her marriage, the Arch-ducheſs Mary-Anne of Auſtria, daughter of the Emperor Leopold, and ſiſter to the Emperor Joſeph. Her marriage with the King of Portugal was thought to be highly advantageous to the common cauſe, and was, therefore, very grateful to our Court, who readily offered to ſend her Majeſty to Liſbon, on board a Britiſh ſquadron, after having been firſt eſpouſed by proxy, at Vienna (*). In the beginning of the month of September, ſhe ſet out for Holland, where Rear-Admiral Baker attended, with a ſmall ſquadron, in order to bring her over; which he accordingly did, on the 25th of that month, and landed her at Portſmouth, where ſhe ſtaid ſome days at the houſe of Thomas Ridge, Eſq; and the Queen being then at Windſor, ſent inſtantly the Duke of Grafton to compliment her Majeſty, on her part; as his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Denmark did the Lord Delawar, on his. Colonel Godfrey, who had married the Duke of Marlborough's ſiſter, was ſent to Portſmouth, to defray the expences of the Queen of Portugal's houſehold, while ſhe continued there, and accordingly he kept eight tables all the time; and her Majeſty, in teſtimony of her grateful ſenſe of the honours paid her by our Court, beſides her preſent to Admiral Byng, made one to the Duke of Grafton of a diamond ring worth twelve thouſand crowns. On the 6th of October, about three in the afternoon, the Queen of Portugal went on board the Royal Anne, where her Majeſty was received by Sir George Byng, and on her going off, the Governor ſaluted her with all the cannon of the place; and the next morning at ſeven o'clock, the fleet weighed and put to ſea, when all the cannon of the town were again diſcharged. Sir George Byng proceeded with a fair wind, and, after a very quick and eaſy paſſage, brought her Majeſty ſafely into the river of Liſbon, on the 16th of the ſame month. The King of Portugal, with ſeveral magnificent barges, went on board the Royal Anne, to welcome the Queen; and returning from thence, their Majeſties landed at the bridge of the palace, under a magnificent triumphal arch, from whence they proceeded through a vaſt crowd of people, to the Royal Chapel, where they received the nuptial benediction. The Queen having generouſly expreſſed her great ſatisfaction as to the entertainment ſhe had received, during her ſtay in England, undoubtedly the King was very liberal in his magnificent preſents to the Admiral, and others, who conducted her (7). Sir George Byng, the very next day after his arrival at Liſbon, had intelligence that ſome French ſhips of conſiderable force had been ſeen upon the coaſt, which were ſuppoſed to be waiting for ſome of the homeward bound Brazil fleet, which were then miſſing. Upon this, he immediately ſailed in queſt of them, though without ſucceſs, excepting that the news of his being at ſea forced them to retire, and thereby ſecured the ſafe return of thirty-four ſhips, which dropped in by degrees. About the middle of November, Sir George received orders to proceed to Port-Mahon, in order to winter there, and to leave Sir John Jennings at Liſbon, with a ſmall ſquadron; but before he left that place, he received the Queen's orders to wear the Union Flag in the Mediterranean, the Prince of Denmark (through whoſe hands it ſhould otherwiſe have gone as Lord High-Admiral) being dead (8). He ſailed on the 27th of December with ſix ſhips of the line, two fire-ſhips, and three other attendants; and having ſent five ſhips to Alicant, to aſſure the Governor of the caſtle there, of his aſſiſtance, he arrived himſelf about Cape Palos the 3d of January, when ſtanding in for Alicant, the wind came off from the land ſo freſh, that he could not fetch the bay, ſo that he bore away to Port-Mahon; but when he had got within four leagues of that place, which was on the 5th, a ſtorm aroſe, which ſeparated moſt of the ſquadron, forcing him almoſt as high as Sardinia: but on the 12th he got into Port-Mahon, where he found moſt of the ſquadron (9).

[E] Having done all in his power to render theſe deſigns ſucceſsful.] There were many accidents which occurred to fruſtrate our Admiral's great deſigns, as will appear from a ſhort view of his proceedings during his command in the Mediterranean. In our laſt note, we command, he was made one of the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Lord High-Admiral (y), in which poſt he continued till ſome time before the Queen's death; when not falling in with the meaſures of thoſe times, he was removed: but, on the acceſſion of his late Majeſty King George, he was reſtored to that employment (z). In the year 1715, upon the breaking out of the rebellion, he was appointed to command a ſquadron in the Downs, in that critical juncture, with which he kept ſuch a watchful eye along the French coaſt, by examining ſhips, even in their ports, and obtaining orders from the Court of France, for the putting on ſhore at Havre de Grace, great quantities of arms and ammunition which he had detected, were ſhipped there for the Pretender's ſervice (a); that, in reward of his ſervices, the King created him a Baronet, November 14, 1715 (b); gave him a ring of great value, and other marks of his royal favour (c). In the year 1717, a diſcovery having been made, of an invaſion intended againſt we left him in the harbour of Port-Mahon, where he was extremely diſtreſſed for want of naval ſtores, which were on board the Arrogant, a ſhip that had been miſſing from his arrival in that harbour, in queſt of which he detached ſhips to Majorca and Cagliari; and, at the ſame time, diſpatched orders to Sir Edward Whitaker, who was on the coaſt of Italy, to join him with his ſquadron, in caſe the Emperor's troops, that were deſigned for Catalonia, were not as yet ready. All the month of February 1709, was ſpent in tedious expectations; but at laſt, about the middle of March, Sir Edward Whitaker arrived with about 3500 men (10), to the great joy of Sir George Byng and General Stanhope, who had long waited for theſe forces, in order to attempt ſomething for the relief of Alicant, then beſieged by an army of 12000 men; and for the ſafety of which, King Charles had expreſſed unuſual concern (11). Accordingly, the ſquadron, conſiſting of eleven ſhips of the line of battle (12), having put to ſea, arrived before Alicant on the 5th of April in the morning, and ſtood into the bay, anchoring againſt the batteries and lines which the enemy had thrown up along the coaſt; and while the cannon were playing againſt thoſe works, General Stanhope intended to puſh on ſhore; but the wind blowing very ſtrong, occaſioned a great ſea, which rendered it impracticable; and the large ſhips being in leſs than four fathom water, were obliged to weigh their anchors, and make out of cannon-ſhot. The weather continuing very bad till the 7th, and it not being known what extremities the garriſon might be under, and the enemy increaſing conſiderably in ſtrength, the General ſent a flag of truce on ſhore, with propoſals for ſurrendering the caſtle, to which the garriſon had before retired; which being agreed to, and our men embarked, Sir George Byng proceeded with the troops towards Barcelona, having detached ſome ſhips to cruize for the Turkey fleet, others with tranſports for corn to Barbary, and three ſhips he left to clean at Port-Mahon. In his way to Barcelona, he landed General Stanhope with the troops at Tarragona, and returned with the garriſon of the caſtle of Alicant, to Port-Mahon (13). The whole ſquadron having joined at Barcelona, in June, a Council of War was held, in which it was determined, that ſince the King of Spain, as the poſture of affairs then was, could not come to any reſolution as to the fleet's aſſiſting in the reduction of thoſe parts of Spain ſtill in the poſſeſſion of the enemy, to ſail to a ſtation ten leagues off Cape Toulon, not only for intercepting their trade, but to alarm them as much as poſſible; and it being neceſſary that a ſquadron ſhould be on the coaſt of Portugal, Sir John Jennings was ſent with thirteen ſhips to Liſbon (14). Sir George Byng arrived before Toulon the 24th of June, in which harbour he ſaw only eight ſhips rigged, and one large man of war on the careen, the reſt being diſarmed. After thus inſulting Toulon, he returned to Barcelona road, where he found moſt of the ſhips arrived from the ſervices upon which he had ſent them; and ſome of them, particularly the Centurion and Dunkirk, had been ſo fortunate as to take a great many prizes. The Admiral, upon his arrival at Barcelona, found the Court of Spain, at the inſtance of Cardinal Grimani, very deſirous to have the reduction of Sicily attempted, and was informed by General Stanhope, that it was her Majeſty's pleaſure, that part of the fleet ſhould aſſiſt in the deſign upon Cadiz: but the Dutch ſhips having been ſeparated in bad weather, and ours being too few to anſwer theſe and other ſervices the Court propoſed, he ſuſpended, for ſome time, the coming to any reſolution, being every day in expectation of the ſhips of the States-General: but at length he formed a diſpoſition of her Majeſty's ſhips, and appointed Sir Edward Whitaker for the ſervice of Sicily, while he himſelf deſigned to proceed on the other with General Stanhope. The 26th of July, the Court of Spain having notice of the enemy's penetrating into the Lampourdan, with intention, as was apprehended, to beſiege Gironne; and there being a want of ſhips to protect the coaſts of Catalonia, and hinder the enemy having ſupplies by ſea, as alſo a ſquadron to bring over the prizes with corn from Porto Farina, which they were in great want of, and ſome ſhips to go to Italy for money to ſubſiſt the troops; the Court ſeemed to lay aſide the deſign on Sicily, and Sir George Byng ſent five ſhips for the aforeſaid veſſels with corn (15). Thus the warmth, impatience, and irreſolution of the Court of Spain, obliged the Admiral to drop his great deſigns; for, without regard to what had been reſolved, or even for what themſelves had demanded before, they were continually deſiring ſomething new to be done for them, without conſidering that it was impoſſible our ſhips could perform one ſervice, without neglecting another. Thus, upon an apprehenſion that the enemy would attack Gironne, the Engliſh ſhips were deſired to intercept their proviſions. Soon after they were diſtreſſed for want of proviſions themſelves, and then the moſt neceſſary thing that could be done, was to ſend for the prizes, laden with corn, from Port Farina. By that time this was reſolved on, money grew ſcarce, and then his Catholic Majeſty hoped that the Engliſh ſhips would go and fetch it immediately from Italy. The manner in which theſe demands were made, and the apprehenſions the officers were under, of complaints being ſent home, induced them to comply with every thing, as far as was in their power; ſo that, of neceſſity, the expedition againſt Sicily was laid aſide. Our Admirals, however, ſtill flattered themſelves, that ſomething might be done at Cadiz, where it was known the people were in want of bread, and were, beſides, highly diſcontented with the French government (16). On the 27th of July, the Dutch ſquadron arrived from Leghorn, upon which Sir George Byng called a Council of War, and laid before them, the Queen's orders, the deſires of his Catholic Majeſty, and the project formed by themſelves for attempting Cadiz: but the Commander in Chief of the Dutch ſhips excuſed himſelf, declaring, that they were victualled only till the end of Auguſt, which diſabled him from undertaking any ſervice beyond the 20th of that month. It was then agreed, that Sir George Byng ſhould proceed to Cadiz, and the Dutch be employed in ſuch other ſervices as the King of Spain might have for them. Sir George arriving at Gibraltar, expected to have found there Rear-Admiral Baker's ſquadron, and the troops deſigned for the attempt on Cadiz; but not gaining any intelligence of him, or of Sir John Jennings, and finding that important enterprize could not be executed, he reſolved to return to England, where he ſafely arrived on the 25th of September, leaving Sir Edward Whitaker with a ſquadron of ſixteen ſhips in the Mediterranean, to protect the coaſts of Catalonia, and cruize off the coaſt of Roſes, to prevent the carrying to the enemy any ſupplies of proviſions or ammunition, and to intercept againſt this kingdom, by Charles XII. King of Sweden [F], orders were iſſued for forming a ſquadron, conſiſting of twenty-one ſhips of the line (d), beſides frigates, for the Baltic, the command of which was given to Sir George Byng, who was to have had two Admirals under him, with an additional force. But before thoſe ſhips were ready, the Miniſtry altered their deſign; and Sir George, in obedience to his freſh orders, ſailed on the thirtieth of March for Copenhagen (e), and on the eleventh of April arrived in the road of that place. The next day he had an audience of the King, and aſſiſted at ſeveral conferences which were held the ſucceeding week, in order to ſettle the operations by ſea, and the command of the confederate fleet, in caſe the ſeveral ſquadrons ſhould join (f). Sir George next detached five ſhips of the line to cruize in the Categat, between Gottenburgh and the point of Schagen, to cover the trade from the Swediſh privateers. The Daniſh cruizers being, likewiſe, employed for the ſame purpoſe, the paſſage was ſo effectually ſecured, that no ſhips could paſs out of that port. Sir George himſelf only waited for a fair wind to ſail with the reſt of the Britiſh ſquadron into the Baltic, where the Swedes, however, had abſolutely laid aſide whatever deſign they had formed, either to our prejudice, or againſt the general peace of Europe. On the ſeventh of May, however, our Admiral ſailed from Copenhagen, having under his convoy a great number of merchant ſhips, bound for ſeveral ports of the Baltic, and being joined by the Daniſh fleet, commanded by Vice-Admiral Gabel, they ſailed together towards Carlſcroon, but were obliged by contrary winds to return. As no enemy appeared, and the ſeaſon began to advance, Sir George Byng thought of returning home with the fleet; and accordingly, on the ſecond of November, he paſſed the Sound, with nine Engliſh men of war, three frigates, and three veſſels of ſmall burthen, leaving behind him ſix men of war to act in conjunction with the Daniſh fleet; and on the fifteenth of the ſame month, arrived ſafe at the mouth of the Thames; where leaving his ſquadron, he came up to London, and was graciouſly received by his Majeſty (g). We are now to enter upon the moſt important ſcene of action our Admiral was ever engaged in; and which he conducted with equal honour and reputation to himſelf, and the Britiſh Flag. This was the famous expedition of the Engliſh fleet to Sicily, in the year 1718, for the protection of the Neutrality of Italy, and the defence of the Emperor's poſſeſſions (according to the obligations England was under by treaty) againſt the invaſion of the Spaniards, who had the year before ſurpriſed Sardinia, and had this year landed an army in Sicily. It comes not within our province to enquire into the policy of the Councils which produced theſe meaſures: it is ſufficient for us to relate plain matters of fact, by which it will appear, that Sir George Byng performed, upon this occaſion, all that could be expected from the tercept their veſſels of corn from the Levant, and the coaſt of Barbary. This wiſe diſpoſition of the Admiral's had the deſired effect; for in the bay of Roſes, our fleet diſcovered the grand convoy intended for the French ſervice in the Lampourdan, conſiſting of forty large veſſels laden with corn and other proviſions, of which we took thirty, and hindered the reſt from putting to ſea; by which the enemy was greatly diſtreſſed, and King Charles's army ſo happily ſupplied with proviſions, as to be able to keep the field, which otherwiſe they could not have done (17). Some Dutch accounts ſay, Sir Edward Whitaker actually went into the bay of Roſes, and took fifty corn veſſels, and offered King Charles to aſſiſt in reducing that port; but his advice was not followed.

[F] It having been diſcovered that an invaſion was intended againſt this kingdom.] This deſign was chiefly carried on between Baron Gortz, Miniſter and favourite of the King of Sweden, and Count Gyllemberg, the Swediſh Miniſter in England, who had lived here ſome years, and married an Engliſh lady. They had for ſome time carried on a correſpondence together, and concerted meaſures with the Engliſh rebels in France, and ſeveral perſons in England, for raiſing a rebellion, in favour of the Pretender, to be ſupported by foreign force. It is not certainly known how this conſpiracy came to be diſcovered: but on the 29th of January, Mr. Secretary Stanhope, by the King's command, communicated to the Privy Council the information his Majeſty had received concerning this plot; upon which ſeveral perſons were ſecured, and amongſt the reſt, Count Gyllemberg, with all his papers; and Baron Gortz was, at his Britannic Majeſty's requeſt, arreſted in Holland, where he acted as Miniſter from the King of Sweden. Mr. Secretary Stanhope laid before the Houſe of Commons, copies of letters that paſſed between Gyllemberg, Gortz, Baron Sparr, the Swediſh Ambaſſador at Paris, and others, by which it appeared, that their intention was to tranſport 12,000 men, a ſufficient train of artillery, arms for 10 or 12,000 men more, with requiſite ſtores of ammunition; that there had been remitted to them, ſeveral ſums of money from perſons in the deſign; that amongſt others, the Duke of Ormond was concerned, and had written to Gortz, that the King his maſter (meaning the Pretender) had ordered him to let Gortz know, that he expected ſhortly a ſupply of money, and would remit ſixty thouſand pounds to his Swediſh Majeſty, and begs him to look upon it only as a token of what was to come after, &c. The pretence for this invaſion was, to maintain the Engliſh liberties, and ſupport the Church of England. In order to ſatisfy the world of the truth of this affair, the letters and papers relating thereto were made public; and the Parliament ſoon after ſhewed the warmeſt reſentment and indignation at the inſolence of this attempt. It was indeed amazing, that a Prince, who was already overwhelmed by ſo many and ſo powerful enemies, ſhould think of adding to their number, by an attempt of this kind. But whoever conſiders the genius and ſpirit of the late Charles XII. will eaſily conceive, that it was natural enough for him to embrace any expedient which ſeemed to promiſe the diſſolving of that confederacy by which he was diſtreſſed. But his deſign was not only rendered abortive by this unexpected diſcovery, which put it abſolutely out of his power to carry it into execution, but it, likewiſe, brought upon him new difficulties, in conſequence of our King's reſentment of ſuch behaviour, which preſently diſcovered itſelf, by the vigorous reſolutions taken here: for a bill was brought to prohibit commerce with Sweden (18), during ſuch time as his Majeſty ſhould think it neceſſary, for the ſafety and peace of his kingdom (19), which paſſed both Houſes, and had the Royal Aſſent; and ſoon after a proclamation was publiſhed to the ſame end; and a formidable ſquadron was ſent into the Baltic under the command of Admiral Byng, which effectually removed all apprehenſions the nation was under from the Swedes.

wiſdom and ſkill of an Engliſh Admiral; and that this expedition effectually anſwered its end, which ought to be conſidered as an honour to his memory, whether that end ſhall be thought right or wrong; which is mere political diſpute, and neither can or ought to affect the character of the Admiral in the leaſt. It was about the middle of March, in the year 1717-18, that Sir George Byng was appointed Admiral and Commander in Chief of the ſquadron intended for the Mediterranean: in May following he received his inſtructions, which ſee in the note [G]. The ſhips being got to their rendezvous at Spithead, Sir George Byng repaired down to Portſmouth, to take them under his command; and on the fifteenth of June 1718, ſailed from thence with twenty ſhips of the line of battle, two fire-ſhips, two bomb-veſſels, an hoſpital-ſhip, and a ſtore-ſhip. Being got into the ocean, he ſent the Rupert to Liſbon for intelligence; and arriving the thirtieth off Cape St. Vincent, he diſpatched the Superb to Cadiz, with a gentleman who carried a letter from him to Colonel Stanhope (afterwards Earl of Harrington) the King's Envoy at Madrid, wherein he deſired that Miniſter to acquaint the King of Spain with his arrival in thoſe parts, in his way to the Mediterranean, and to lay before him the inſtructions he was to act under with his ſquadron; of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter [H]. The Admiral

[G] He received his inſtructions, which ſee in the note.] They were dated the 26th of May, and are to the following purpoſe (20): 'That he ſhould, upon his arrival in the Mediterranean, acquaint the Court of Spain, and likewiſe the Viceroy of Naples, and the Governor of Milan, that he was ſent into that ſea in order to promote all meaſures that might beſt contribute to the compoſing the differences ariſen between the two Crowns, and for preventing any further violation of the Neutrality of Italy, which he was to ſee preſerved. That he was to make inſtances with both parties, to forbear all acts of hoſtility, in order to the ſetting on foot, and concluding, the proper negociations of peace: But, in caſe the Spaniards ſhould ſtill inſiſt to attack the Emperor's territory in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy for that purpoſe, or ſhould endeavour to make themſelves maſters of the iſland of Sicily, which muſt be with a deſign to invade the kingdom of Naples, he was then, with all his power, to hinder and obſtruct the ſame. But if they were already landed, he was to endeavour amicably to diſſuade them from perſevering in ſuch an attempt, and to offer them his aſſiſtance to withdraw their troops, and put an end to further acts of hoſtility. But if his friendly endeavours ſhould prove ineffectual, he was then to defend the territories attacked, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ſhips or convoys, or (if neceſſary) by oppoſing them openly.' It is evident that theſe inſtructions were not of the cleareſt kind: but it ſeems, that they were explained to the Admiral before-hand, by thoſe who had then the direction of affairs, as appears by a letter written by Mr. Secretary Craggs to Sir George Byng, immediately before his embarkation. It is preſerved by the accurate Hiſtorian of this expedition, above cited, in his appendix, of his original edition; from whence we have tranſcribed it, as a full proof, that Sir George acted according to the verbal explication of his written orders by the Miniſters.

'SIR, Cockpit, May 27, O. S. 1718.

'I Incloſe to you his Majeſty's inſtructions, as well with relation to your conduct in the Mediteranean, as to the treaty with the Moors.

'After what paſſed yeſterday between my Lord Sunderland, my Lord Stanhope, you, and me, when we were together at Lord Stanhope's lodgings, there remains nothing for me, but to wiſh you a good voyage, and good ſucceſs in your undertakings: I do it very heartily, and am with great truth,

'SIR,

'Your moſt obedient

'Humble ſervant,

'J. CRAGGS.'

[H] Of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter.] This letter of Admiral Byng's, Mr. Stanhope ſhewed to the Cardinal Alberoni, who, upon reading it, told him with ſome warmth, 'That his maſter would run all hazards, and even ſuffer himſelf to be driven out of Spain, rather than recall his troops, or conſent to any ſuſpenſion of arms;' adding, 'That the Spaniards were not to be frighted; and that he was ſo well convinced of their fleet's doing their duty, that if the Admiral ſhould think fit to attack them, he ſhould be in no pain for the ſucceſs.' Mr. Stanhope, having in his hand a liſt of the Britiſh ſquadron, deſired his Eminence to peruſe it, and to compare its ſtrength with that of their own ſquadron; which the Cardinal took and threw on the ground with much paſſion. Mr. Stanhope, with great temper, intreated him, 'To conſider the ſincere attention the King his maſter had always had to the honour and intereſts of his Catholic Majeſty, which it was impoſſible for him to give greater proofs of than he had done, by his unwearied endeavours, through the whole courſe of the preſent negociation, to procure the moſt advantageous conditions poſſible for Spain, in which he had ſucceeded even beyond what any unprejudiced perſon could have hoped for; and that, though by the treaty of Utrecht for preſerving the Neutrality of Italy, which was entered into at the requeſt of the King of Spain himſelf; as alſo by that of Weſtminſter, the 25th of May, 1716, his Majeſty found himſelf obliged to defend the Emperor's dominions when attacked, he had hitherto acted only as a mediator, though even ſince the enterprize againſt Sardinia, by his treaties, he became a party in the war, and for this year laſt paſt, had been ſtrongly called upon by the Emperor to comply with his engagements; and that, even now, when it was impoſſible for him to delay any longer the ſending his fleet into the Mediterranean, it plainly appeared by the Admiral's inſtructions, which he communicated to his Eminence, and by the orders he had himſelf received, that his Majeſty had nothing more at heart, than that his fleet might be employed in promoting the intereſts of the King of Spain, and hoped his Catholic Majeſty would not, by refuſing to recall his troops, or conſent to a ceſſation of arms, put it out of his power to give all the proofs of ſincere friendſhip he always deſigned to cultivate with his Catholic Majeſty.' All that the Cardinal could be brought to promiſe, was, to lay the Admiral's letter before the King, and to let the Envoy know his reſolution upon it in two days: but it was nine before he could obtain and ſend it away; the Cardinal probably hoping, that the Admiral would delay, in expectation of it, in ſome of the ports of Spain, and thereby give time for their fleet and forces to ſecure a good footing in Sicily. The anſwer was written under the Admiral's letter, in theſe words: 'His Catholic Majeſty has done me the honour to tell me, that the Chevalier Byng may execute the orders which he has from the King his maſter.' 'Eſcurial, July 15th, 1718.' 'The Cardinal Alberoni.' Mr. Stanhope ſeeing things tending to a rupture, gave private and early notice of his apprehenſions to the Engliſh Conſuls and Merchants ſettled in the Spaniſh ſea-ports, adviſing them to ſecure their effects againſt the dangers that might ariſe from a breach between the two crowns; and ſet out himſelf for Madrid, in order to make new propoſitions to his Catholic Majeſty, to prevent things coming to extremities; in which negociation he actually laboured till very near the time that hoſtilities were begun; but to no purpoſe: for Cardinal Alberoni

Admiral purſuing his voyage with unfavourable winds, it was the eighth of July before he made Cape Spartel, where the Superbe and Rupert rejoined him, and brought him advice of the mighty preparations the Spaniards had made at Barcelona, and of their fleet ſailing from thence the eighteenth of June to the eaſtward. In paſſing by Gibraltar, Vice-Admiral Cornwall came out and joined him, with the Argyle man of war and Charles galley. The ſquadron wanting water, and the wind continuing contrary, they anchored off Cape Malaga; where having completed their watering in four days, they proceeded to Minorca, where the Admiral was to land four regiments of foot which he carried out from England, in order to relieve the ſoldiers there in garriſon, who were to embark and ſerve on board the ſquadron (b). On the twenty-third of July, he anchored with the ſquadron off Port Mahon. Here he received advice, that the Spaniſh fleet had been ſeen the thirtieth of June, within forty leagues of Naples, ſteering S. E. upon which he diſpatched away expreſſes to the Governor of Milan, and the Viceroy of Naples, to inform them of his arrival in the Mediterranean. From Port Mahon he ſailed the twenty-fifth of July, and arrived the firſt of Auguſt in the Bay of Naples (i); into which the fleet ſailing with a gentle gale, conſiſting of twenty-one ſail of the line of battle, moſt of them great ſhips, and three of them bearing flags, afforded ſuch a ſpectacle as had never been ſeen in thoſe parts before. The whole city was in a tumult of joy and exultation. The ſhore was crowded with multitudes of coaches and people; and ſuch an infinite number of boats came off, ſome with proviſions and refreſhments, others out of curioſity and admiration, that the ſea between the fleet at anchor and the ſhore, was, literally, covered. The Viceroy, Count Daun, being ill with the gout, and having ſent his compliments to the Admiral, he went on ſhore, attended by the Flag-officers and Captains, in their boats, and was ſaluted at his landing, by all the cannon round the city and caſtles, and was conducted to Court, through an infinite throng of people, with the greateſt acclamations of joy, and all the honours and ceremonies paid to a Viceroy [I]. Here the Admiral entered into a conference with Count Daun, from whom he learned that the Spaniſh army, conſiſting of about 30,000 men, commanded by the Marquis de Lede, had landed the ſecond of July in Sicily, and had ſoon made themſelves maſters of the city and caſtles of Palermo, and of great part of the iſland; that they had taken the town of Meſſina, and were then carrying on the ſiege of the citadel, &c. After the conference, the Admiral was ſplendidly entertained at dinner, and then lodged at the palace of the Duke de Matalona, which had been magnificently fitted up for his reception. The next morning Sir George Byng and Count Daun had another conference, on the meaſures to be taken in that conjuncture of affairs; when it was agreed, that the Viceroy ſhould ſend 2000 German foot, in tartans, to Meſſina, to relieve the citadel, and Fort St. Salvador, under the protection of the Admiral (k), who accordingly ſailed with them the ſixth of Auguſt from Naples, and arrived the ninth in view of the Fare of Meſſina. Here Sir George, deſirous of trying every method of negociation, before he proceeded to the extremity of his orders, diſpatched his firſt Captain to Meſſina, with a letter to the Marquis de Lede, wherein, after acquainting him upon what account he was ſent there, he propoſed a ceſſation of arms in Sicily for two months, in order to give time to the ſeveral Courts to conclude on ſuch reſolutions as might reſtore a laſting peace; but added, that if he was not ſo happy as to ſucceed in this offer of his ſervice, he ſhould then be obliged to uſe all his force, to prevent farther attempts to diſturb the dominions his Maſter ſtood engaged to defend. The General returned for anſwer, that he had no powers to treat, and conſequently could not agree to a ſuſpenſion of arms, but muſt follow his orders, which directed him to ſeize upon Sicily for his Maſter the King of Spain. According to the beſt accounts the Admiral could receive, he was led to conclude, that the Spaniſh fleet was ſailed from Malta, in order to avoid him; and, therefore, upon receiving the Marquis's anſwer, he immediately weighed, with intention to come with his ſquadron before Meſſina, in order to encourage and ſupport the garriſon in the citadel: but, as he ſtood about the Point of the Fare towards Meſſina, he ſaw two Spaniſh ſcouts in the Fare; and being informed at the ſame time by a felucca, which came off from the Calabrian ſhore, that they ſaw from the hills the Spaniſh fleet lying by; the Admiral altered his deſign, and ſending away the German troops to roni was ſo bent on executing his own ſcheme (21), that he rejected all propoſals that were made him, with great firmneſs (22), and reſolution.

[I] He was conducted to Court through an infinite throng of people, with the greateſt acclamations of joy, &c.] The imperial Viceroy of Naples preſented Sir George with a ſword ſet with diamonds, and a very rich ſtaff of command; and to the Admiral's ſon he alſo made a preſent of a very fine ſword; and likewiſe ſent refreſhments to the fleet, conſiſting of an hundred oxen, three hundred ſheep, ſix hundred pounds of ſugar, ſeventy hogſheads of wine, forty hogſheads of brandy, and ſeveral other things (23). We need not wonder, that the German government was extremely well pleaſed at the Admiral's arrival, or that they paid him every honour in their power, ſince it is very certain, that his coming ſo luckily preſerved that kingdom for the houſe of Auſtria, that had otherwiſe, in all probability, ſhared the fate of Sicily, which the Marquis de Lede had conquered, almoſt as ſoon as he landed (24): or rather his landing gave the people an opportunity of declaring for that power, which, though it had loſt its ſovereignty over them, had ſtill preſerved their affection. And at Naples, though the common people were generally in the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, there was a ſtrong party, among the Sicilian Nobility, for Spain; and the whole country was ill provided for defence.

Reggio, under the convoy of two men of war, he ſtood through the Fare with his ſquadron, with all the ſail he could, after their ſcouts, imagining they would lead him to theirs, which accordingly they did; for before noon he had a fair view of their whole fleet lying by, and drawn into a line of battle, conſiſting of twenty-ſeven ſail of men of war, ſmall and great, beſides two fire-ſhips, four bomb-veſſels, ſeven gallies, and ſeveral ſhips laden with ſtores and proviſions, commanded by the Admiral Don Antonio de Caſtaneta, and under him four Rear-Admirals, Chacon, Mari, Guevara, and Cammock. On the ſight of the Engliſh ſquadron, they ſtood away large, but in good order of battle. The Admiral followed them all the reſt of that day, and the ſucceeding night, with calm and fair weather. The next morning early (the eleventh), the Engliſh being got pretty near up with them, the Marquis de Mari, Rear-Admiral, with ſix Spaniſh men of war, and all the gallies, fireſhips, bomb-veſſels, and ſtore-ſhips, ſeparated from their main fleet, and ſtood in for the Sicilian ſhore; upon which the Admiral detached Captain Walton, of the Canterbury, with five more ſhips after them; and the Argyle and Canterbury, getting within gun-ſhot of the headmoſt ſhip, about ſix in the morning, the Argyle fired a ſhot to bring her to; which ſhe not minding, the Argyle fired another, and the Canterbury being ſomewhat nearer, fired another, upon which the Spaniſh ſhip fired her ſtern chaſe guns at the Canterbury, and then the engagement began. The Admiral purſuing the main body of the Spaniſh fleet; the Orford, Cayt. Falkingham, and the Grafton, Capt. Haddock, came up firſt with them about ten of the clock, at whom the Spaniards fired their ſtern chaſe guns. The Admiral ſent orders to thoſe two ſhips not to fire, unleſs the Spaniards repeated their firing; which they doing, the Orford attacked the Santa Roſa, of ſixty guns, and took her. The St. Carlos, of ſixty guns, ſtruck next, without much oppoſition, to the Kent, Capt. Mathews. The Grafton attacked warmly the Prince of Aſturias, of ſeventy guns, formerly called the Cumberland, in which was Rear-Admiral Chacon; but the Breda and Captain coming up, Capt. Haddock left her much ſhattered, for them to take, and ſtretched a-head after another ſhip of ſixty guns, which had kept firing on his ſtarboard bow, during his engagement with the Prince of Aſturias. About one of the clock, the Kent, and ſoon after the Superbe, Capt. Maſter, came up with, and engaged the Spaniſh Admiral, of ſeventy-four guns, who, with two more ſhips, fired on them, and made a running fight, till about three; and then the Kent bearing down upon him, and under his ſtern, gave him her broadſide, and fell to leeward. Afterwards the Superbe putting for it to lay the Admiral aboard, fell on his weather quarter; upon which the Spaniſh Admiral ſhifting his helm, the Superbe ranged up under his lee quarter, on which he ſtruck to her. At the ſame time the Barfleur, in which was the Admiral, being a-ſtern of the Spaniſh Admiral within ſhot, and inclining on his weather quarter, Rear-Admiral Guevara and another ſixty gun ſhip, which were to windward, bore down upon him, and gave him their broadſides, and then clapt upon a wind, ſtanding in for the land. Admiral Byng immediately tacked and ſtood after them, until it was almoſt night; but it being little wind, and they galing away out of his reach, he left purſuing them, and ſtood into the fleet, which he joined two hours after night. The Eſſex took the Juno of thirty-ſix guns, the Montague and Rupert took the Volante of forty-four guns, and Rear-Admiral Delaval, in the Dorſetſhire, took the Iſabella of ſixty guns. This action happened off Cape Paſſaro, at about ſix leagues diſtance from the ſhore. The Engliſh received but little damage. The ſhip that ſuffered moſt was the Grafton, which being a good ſailer, her Captain engaged ſeveral ſhips of the enemy, always purſuing the headmoſt, and leaving thoſe ſhips he had diſabled or damaged, to be taken by thoſe that followed him. The Admiral lay by ſome days at ſea, to refit the rigging of his ſhips, and to repair the damages the prizes had ſuſtained; and the eighteenth, received a letter from Capt. Walton, who had been ſent in purſuit of the Spaniſh ſhips that eſcaped. The Captain was one whoſe natural talents were fitter for atchieving a gallant action, than deſcribing one, and his letter on this occaſion, is ſingular enough in its kind to deſerve notice. It runs thus:

'SIR,

'WE have taken and deſtroyed all the Spaniſh ſhips and veſſels which were upon the coaſt, the number as per margin.

'Auguſt 16, 1718. G. WALTON.'

Theſe ſhips that Capt. Walton thruſt into his margin, would have furniſhed matter for ſome pages, in a French relation: for, from the account they referred to, it appeared that he had taken four Spaniſh men of war; one of ſixty guns, commanded by Rear-Admiral Mari; one of fifty-four, one of forty, and one of twenty-four guns, with a bomb-veſſel, and a ſhip laden with arms; and burned four men of war, one of fifty-four, two of forty, and one of thirty guns, with a fire-ſhip and a bomb-veſſel. He was knighted for this action, and made a flag officer ſome time after. Such is the account of this famous action by our Admiral (l). The Spaniards publiſhed, likewiſe, an account on their ſide, which was printed in Holland, and circulated with great induſtry duſtry throughout all Europe, in order to make ſuch impreſſions as might ſerve their purpoſe, and incline the world to believe, that their fleet had not been attacked and beaten fairly, but had been ſurpriſed and deſtroyed, without that kind of notice, which the laws of nature and nations require, to diſtinguiſh force of arms from piratical violence. It is but juſt in any caſe, to hear both parties; and as the Spaniſh relation contains many particulars that are wanting in the Admiral's, which is indeed too general, and as the Hiſtorian of this expedition has not taken notice of the account given by the Spaniards, it is, therefore, requiſite to give it a place here; for by a compariſon of it with our Admiral's account, many particulars come to be explained, which otherwiſe might have been buried in obſcurity. See, therefore, the note, where it comes more properly [K]. As ſoon as Admiral Byng had obtained a full account of the whole tranſaction,

[K] See therefore the note, where it comes more properly.] The account itſelf being very long, we ſhall ſhorten it as much as we can, by curtailing it of ſome particulars which are the ſame with the Admiral's. The ſubſtance, therefore, is as follows: 'The Spaniſh 'Admirals not knowing the intentions of the Engliſh, whether they came as friends or enemies, endeavoured to penetrate into their deſigns, and ſent two light frigates to get intelligence of them; and when the Engliſh ſquadron advanced into the Faro, it was ſaluted by all the Spaniſh ſhips and veſſels which were there. The officer ſent by Admiral Byng to the Marquis de Lede, with propoſals for a ceſſation of arms, affirming, that his fleet was not to commit any act of hoſtility, but only to ſecure the tranſports under the Admiral's protection from inſults; yet, though it was believed that a courier was ſent by the Marquis to Madrid, with the Admiral's propoſals, the Engliſh ſquadron took the opportunity of night to ſurpriſe the Spaniſh ſquadron, which had retired towards Cape Paſſaro, but did not make much ſail, that it might not be thought they ſuſpected any hoſtilities. During this a calm happened, by which the ſhips of both ſquadrons fell in one among another; and the Spaniſh Admiral perceiving this accident, cauſed the ſhips of the line to be towed, in order to ſeparate them from the Engliſh, and join them in one body, without permitting the gallies to begin any act of hoſtility, which they might have done to advantage, during the calm. The weather changed, when the Marquis de Mari was near land, and conſequently ſeparated from the reſt, making the rear-guard, with ſeveral frigates and other tranſport veſſels, which made up his diviſion, and endeavoured, though in vain, to join the main body of the Spaniſh ſquadron, while the Engliſh filled their ſails to gain the wind, and cut off the diviſion of the Marquis de Mari; and having at laſt ſucceeded in it, they attacked him with ſix ſhips, and obliged him to ſeparate from the reſt of the ſquadron, and to make towards the coaſt, where they ſtood it againſt ſeven ſhips of the line, as long as the ſituation permitted; and being no longer able to reſiſt, the Marquis de Mari ſaved his men, by running his ſhips a-ground, ſome of which were burned by his own order, and others taken by the enemy.— Seventeen ſhips of the line, the remainder of the Engliſh ſquadron, attacked ten Spaniſh ſhips, which continued making towards Cape Paſſaro; and as they retired in a line, becauſe of the inequality of their ſtrength, the Engliſh attacked thoſe that compoſed the rear-guard, with four or five ſhips, and took them: this happened ſucceſſively to others, which being attacked ſeparately by five, ſix, or ſeven of the enemy's, were taken after a bloody and obſtinate fight. Thus the Royal St. Philip, Admiral Caſtaneta, was attacked by the whole diviſion of the Engliſh Admiral, conſiſting of ſeven ſhips of the line, and a fire-ſhip. The fight began at two in the afternoon, by a ſhip of ſeventy guns, and another of ſixty, which gave him two broadſides; but he defended himſelf ſo well that they retired, and two other ſhips, one of eighty, the other of ſeventy guns, renewed the attack; and the eighty gun ſhip retired very much ſhattered, without going into the line: but the others making towards the Spaniſh Admiral, they fired upon him, while it was impoſſible for him to hurt them, and ſhot away all his rigging, without leaving him one entire ſail, while two others, one of ſixty, the other of thirty guns, attacked the ſtarboard of his ſhip, to oblige him to ſurrender, and the Engliſh Admiral carried a fire-ſhip to reduce him by the flames, which, however, the Spaniſh Commander prevented, and maintained the fight till towards night, having loſt two hundred men, and himſelf received a ſhot which pierced his left leg, and wounded his right heel: Yet he continued to defend himſelf till a cannon-bullet having cut a maſt in two, the pieces of which fell upon him and left him half dead, he was forced to ſurrender. While the Royal Philip was engaged with the Engliſh, Rear-Admiral Guevara came up, and attacked Admiral Byng's ſhips, and very much damaged them. The Prince of Aſturias, Rear-Admiral Chacon, was attacked at the ſame time by three ſhips of equal force, againſt which he defended himſelf valiantly, avoiding being boarded, till being wounded, and having loſt moſt of his men, he was obliged to ſurrender his ſhip, which was all ſhot through and through, after having ſhot down the maſts of an Engliſh ſhip that retired out of the fight. The St. Roſa frigate defended herſelf above three hours, againſt five Engliſh ſhips, who did not take her till they had broke all her ſails and maſts. The Volante fought three hours and an half, againſt three Engliſh ſhips, and having loſt her ſails, and put up others that were in ſtore, was juſt going to board one of the enemy's ſhips; but being ſhot through by ſix cannon-bullets, and the water coming in, the Captain was obliged to ſurrender, becauſe the ſhip's crew forced him. The Juno was engaged alſo by three Engliſh ſhips; yet maintained the fight above three hours, not ſurrendering till moſt of her men were killed, and the ſhip juſt falling in pieces. The Pearl fought three hours againſt three ſhips, and after having ſhot down the maſts of one of them, which immediately retired, was reſcued by Rear-Admiral Guevara. The Iſabella was purſued all night by ſeveral Engliſh ſhips, and after a defence of four hours, ſurrendered the next day. The Surprize frigate fought three hours againſt three Engliſh ſhips, when moſt of her men being killed, her Captain wounded, and all her rigging ſpoiled, ſhe was forced to ſurrender. The other light ſhips and frigates retired to Malta and Sardinia, as did alſo Admiral Guevara. The marines in every ſhip, who were compoſed of the nobility of Spain, ſignalized and diſtinguiſhed themſelves with great valour. The ſeven gallies having done all that was poſſible to join the Spaniſh ſhips, having a freſh gale of wind, retired to Palermo. Beſides the above ſhips which the Engliſh took out of the main body of the Spaniſh ſquadron, they alſo took the Royal, the St. Iſidore and the Eagle, two frigates. This is the account of the ſea-fight between the Spaniſh and Engliſh ſquadrons, the laſt of which by ill faith, and the ſuperiority of their ſtrength, had the advantage to beat the Spaniſh ſhips ſingly, one by one; and it is to be believed, by the defence the Spaniards made, that if they had acted jointly, the battle would have ended more happily for them. Immediately after the fight, a Captain of the Engliſh ſquadron came, in the name of Admiral Byng, to make a compliment of excuſe to the Marquis de Lede, giving him to underſtand, that the Spaniards had been the aggreſſors, and that this action ought not be looked upon as a rupture, becauſe the Engliſh did not take it as ſuch. To which it was anſwered, That Spain will reckon it as a formal rupture, and that they would do the Engliſh all the damages and hoſtilities imaginable.'

tranſaction, he diſpatched away his eldeſt ſon to England, who arriving at Hampton-Court in fifteen days from Naples, brought thither the agreeable confirmation of what public fame had before reported, and upon which, the King had already written a letter to the Admiral with his own hand, which the reader may ſee in note [L]. Mr. Byng met with a moſt gracious reception from his Majeſty, who made him an handſome preſent, and ſent him back with plenipotentiary powers to his father, to negociate with the ſeveral Princes and States of Italy, as there ſhould be occaſion; and with his royal grant to the officers and ſeamen, of all prizes taken by them from the Spaniards. The Admiral, in the mean time, proſecuted his affairs with great diligence, procured the Emperor's troops free acceſs into the fortreſſes that were ſtill held out in Sicily, ſailed afterwards to Malta, and brought out the Sicilian gallies, under the command of the Marquis de Rivaroles, and a ſhip belonging to the Turkey company, which had been blocked up there by Rear-Admiral Cammock, with a few ſhips which he had ſaved after the late engagement, and then ſailed back again to Naples, where he arrived on the ſecond of November; and ſoon after received a gracious letter from the Emperor, written with his own hand, accompanied with a picture of his Imperial Majeſty, ſet round with very large diamonds, as a mark of the grateful ſenſe he had of the ſervices rendered by his Excellency to the Houſe of Auſtria. See the letter in note [M]. As for

There are many things in this relation more agreeable to Spaniſh humour than to truth; and there is no queſtion to be made, but that both accounts retain ſome tincture of the paſſions and prejudices of thoſe who drew them up; and it is no leſs certain, that what was commonly reported at that time, of the bad behaviour of the Spaniards, and of their making but a weak defence, was but indifferently founded: For the truth is, that their fleet, though ſtrong in appearance, was every way inferior to ours; their ſhips being old, their artillery none of the beſt, and in number of guns, one hundred and ſixteen ſhort of ours, and their ſeamen moſt of them not to be depended upon (25). Yet it is agreed on all hands, that their Admirals defended themſelves very gallantly; and, indeed, their defeat may, in a great meaſure, be charged upon their irreſolution at the beginning, and their not taking good advice when it was given them, we mean that of Rear-Admiral Cammock, who was (to ſpeak impartially) a much better ſeaman than any who bore command in the Spaniſh fleet (26). He knew perfectly well the ſtrength of both parties, and ſaw plainly that nothing could ſave the Spaniards, but a wiſe diſpoſition; and, therefore, in the laſt Council of War held before the battle, he propoſed that they ſhould remain at anchor in the road of Paradiſe, ranging their ſhips in a line of battle, with their broadſides to the ſea; which meaſure would certainly have given the Admiral infinite trouble to attack them; for the coaſt there is ſo bold, that their biggeſt ſhips could ride with a cable a-ſhore; and farther out, the currents are ſo various and rapid, that it would have been hardly practicable to get up to them, but impoſſible to anchor, or lie by them in order of battle. Beſides, they lay ſo near the ſhore, and could have received ſuch aſſiſtance of ſoldiers from the army, to man and defend them; and the annoyance the Spaniards might have given them from the ſeveral batteries they could have planted along the ſhore, would have been ſuch, that the only way of attacking the ſhips, ſeemed to be by boarding and grappling with them at once, to prevent being caſt off by the currents, which would have been a very hazardo s undertaking, wherein the Spaniards would have had many advantages, and the Engliſh Admiral have run the chance of deſtroying his fleet, or buying a victory, if he ſucceeded, very dear (27). But the Spaniſh Admirals were too much perſuaded of their own ſtrength, and the courage of their ſeamen, or elſe they fooliſhly depended upon their not being attacked by our fleet. Whatever the motive was, they ſlighted this ſalutary counſel, and were thereby undone.

The

for the prizes that had been taken, they were ſent to Port-Mahon, where, by ſome unlucky accident, the Royal Philip took fire, and blew up, with moſt of the crew on board; but the Spaniſh Admiral had been before ſet on ſhore in Sicily, with ſome other priſoners of diſtinction, where he ſoon after died of his wounds. The Spaniſh Court, exceſſively provoked at this unexpected blow, which had, in a manner, totally deſtroyed the naval force they had been at ſo much pains to raiſe, were not ſlow in expreſſing their reſentments. On the firſt of September, Rear-Admiral Guevara, with ſome ſhips, entered the Port of Cadiz, and made himſelf maſter of all the Engliſh ſhips that were there; and at the ſame time, all the effects of the Engliſh Merchants were ſeized in Malaga, and other ports of Spain, which, as ſoon as it was known here, produced repriſals on our part; and in December following, a declaration of war againſt Spain [N]. Sir George Byng ſtaid at Naples, adviſing and aſſiſting the Viceroy in concerting the neceſſary meaſures to be taken againſt the enemy, till the third of February following, and then ſailed to Port-Mahon, to refit his ſhips, and put them in a condition to go on early with the operations of the campaign; leaving his eldeſt ſon at Naples, to manage his correſpondence with the Viceroy, and to inform the Court of England of all occurrences in thoſe parts; and left Capt. Mathews with a ſquadron, at Pentemelia, to obſerve Rear-Admiral Cammock, and hinder his eſcaping out of Meſſina to the ſouthward [O]. The Admiral having refitted moſt of his ſquadron at Port-Mahon, ſailed early

The Admiral was alſo honoured with a letter of congratulation upon his victory, from the Queen of Denmark, written by her Majeſty's Great Maſter of the Houſehold, September 26, 1718.

[N] And in December following, a declaration of war againſt Spain.] As to the expediency of this meaſure, as well as of the Sicilian expedition, there were very warm debates in Parliament: and this laſt engroſſed all converſation, from the time of the ſtroke given to the Spaniſh fleet in the Mediterranean; ſome looking upon that as one of the nobleſt exploits ſince the Revolution. But the generality of people conſidered it in quite another light; and when an addreſs was moved for, to juſtify that meaſure, it was warmly oppoſed in both Houſes of Parliament, but without effect. Perhaps, there never was a meaſure more maliciouſly aſperſed, and miſrepreſented, than this of the attacking the Spaniſh fleet. It was confidently, and generally reported, and for many years believed, that Sir George Byng attacked and deſtroyed that fleet, without any orders or inſtructions for his ſo doing; and without giving the leaſt intimation to the Court of Spain: and under this heavy imputation did the Admiral lie, for ſeveral years, till the affair was cleared up, by publiſhing an authentic account of the whole, and the Admiral's orders and inſtructions, and the ſteps he took for giving notice of them to the Court of Spain; from whence it appears, that he had expreſs orders for what he did, and that all his meaſures were in purſuance of thoſe orders. As to the action itſelf, off Paſſaro, the following letter may be alone ſufficient to juſtify the Admiral. It was written by the Earl Stanhope, then Secretary, to Sir George Byng, and is as follows:

'Bayonne, September 2, 1718.

'BEING arrived here laſt night, in ſix days from 'Madrid, I do, in purſuance of the commands I 'have from his Majeſty, take this firſt opportunity of 'acquainting you, that nothing has paſſed at Ma'drid, which ſhould divert you from purſuing the 'inſtructions you have.

'If the news which I learn at Bayonne, that the 'Citadel of Meſſina is taken, be not true, or if, not'withſtanding the Spaniards have that port, their 'fleet, by contrary winds, or any other accident, 'ſhould not have got into the harbour, and that you 'have an opportunity of attacking them, I am per'ſuaded you will not let ſuch an occaſion ſlip; and 'I agree perfectly in opinion with what is recom'mended to you by Mr. Secretary Craggs, that the 'firſt blow you give ſhould, if poſſible, be deciſive.'

[O] To obſerve Rear-Admiral Cammock, and hinder his eſcaping out of Meſſina to the ſouthward.] Captain Mathews ſucceeded in this command; for he had the good fortune to run one of Cammock's ſhips a-ſhore, of ſixty-four guns, called the St. Roſelia; and another called the St. Pedre of ſixty guns, was caſt away in Tarento Bay. Admiral Cammock himſelf, endeavouring to get away to Spain in a ſmall frigate of twenty-two guns, was chaſed the 6th of February by a ſhip of Captain Mathews's ſquadron; and eſcaped with much difficulty in his boat to Catalonia; but the frigate was taken, with all his effects and papers, amongſt which was a commiſſion from the Pretender, appointing him Admiral of the white ſquadron.

This unhappy man was a native of Ireland, and being bred at ſea, had raiſed himſelf to the poſt of a Captain, and ſerved in our navy in Queen Anne's war, with a good character: but aſſociating himſelf with thoſe who were enemies to the houſe of Hanover, and becoming obnoxious to the government, on the acceſſion of that family to the crown, he abandoned his country, and entered into the ſervice of Spain, where he was promoted to the rank of a Rear-Admiral, and ſerved in that poſt in the expedition againſt Sicily. He was a man of a bold, enterprizing genius, of which he gave a remarkable inſtance or two, in the courſe of this expedition, which, as they are not at all foreign to our purpoſe, we ſhall relate, eſpecially as they were the actions of a native of this kingdom, though a degenerate one. The Germans being beſieged in Melazzo, a town in Sicily, and having no proviſions but what came by ſea from Calabria and other ports of Naples, Admiral Byng appointed Captain Walton to cruize with a ſquadron upon that ſtation, to hinder Rear-Admiral Cammock from coming out of the Fare, and to ſecure the paſſage of the veſſels with proviſions from the German camp, to which none had then arrived in a month; and Captain Walton being blown off his ſtation, Cammock took hold of this opportunity to get out of Meſſina, as the weather abated; and appearing before Tropea, with Engliſh colours, ſent a letter on ſhore to the Governor, under a fictitious name of one of the Engliſh Captains, acquainting him that he was come there by Admiral Byng's orders, to convoy the embarkations with proviſions to Melazzo; and preſſed him to diſpatch them away, the place being in the utmoſt diſtreſs. Had this ſtratagem ſucceeded, it would have entirely ruined the Emperor's affairs in Sicily: but the Governor happening to be a wary man, and obſerving the letter to be written on Genoa paper, from that ſingle circumſtance conceived a ſuſpicion, which made him refuſe to ſend the embarkation out to him. In the mean time, Admiral Byng, then at Naples, being made ſenſible of the extremities the Germans were reduced to, had no other way left, than to fill four men of war with proviſions, directing their Captains to attempt at all hazards to get to Melazzo, which three of them did, with much difficulty and danger (the fourth being diſabled by bad weather), and came providentially to the relief of the garriſon, at a time they muſt have otherwiſe ſurrendered to the enemy, or periſhed by famine. A few days after, Captain Walton recovered his ſtation, upon the ſight of whom Admiral Cammock retired into Meſſina.

The other project of Admiral Cammock's ſeemed leſs likely to ſucceed than the former: for after the deſtruction of the Spaniſh fleet, he aſſured Don Joſeph Patinho, who had the abſolute direction and management of the Spaniſh expedition, excepting the military early in the ſpring from thence to Naples [P], where he adjuſted every thing with the Viceroy, and the German General, for the reduction of Sicily; in which he acted with ſuch zeal, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Imperial army was tranſported into the iſland, and ſo well ſupplied with all things neceſſary, from our fleet (which at the ſame time attended the motions of the enemy's army ſo cloſely), that it may be truly ſaid, the ſucceſs of that expedition was as much owing to the Engliſh Admiral, as to the German General; and that the Engliſh fleet did no leſs ſervice than the army. It was entirely owing to the Admiral's advice, and to his aſſiſtance, and ſupplies of cannon, powder, and ball, from his own ſhips, that the Germans retook the city of Meſſina, in the ſummer of the year 1719; after which the Admiral landed a body of Engliſh grenadiers, who very quickly made themſelves maſters of the Tower of Faro, by which having opened a free paſſage for their ſhips, he came to an anchor in Paradiſe-Road. This was a ſtep of great conſequence; for the officers of the Spaniſh men of war, which were in the Mole, perceiving this, began to deſpair of getting out to ſea, and unbent their ſails, unrigged their ſhips, and reſolved to wait their fate with that of the citadel; which gave the Admiral great ſatisfaction, who now found himſelf at liberty to employ his ſhips in other ſervices, which had been for a long time employed in blocking up that port. But while things were in this proſperous condition, a diſpute aroſe among the Allies, about the diſpoſition of the Spaniſh ſhips, when, after the citadel's being taken, they ſhould of courſe fall into their hands. This diſpute was happily ended [Q], by the Admiral's propoſing to erect a battery, and deſtroy them as they lay in the baſon; which was done accordingly, and thereby the ruin of the naval power of Spain completed. The Imperial Court had formed a deſign of conquering Sardinia, out of which they had been driven by the Spaniards: but our Admiral judged it more for the ſervice of the Houſe of Auſtria, that the army ſhould be immediately tranſported into Sicily, which might expedite the conqueſt of both iſlands; and according to his adtary part, that he could put moſt of the Engliſh fleet into his hands, in lieu of that he had loſt; in confidence of which, he wrote a letter to Sir George Byng, to let him know, that he had the Pretender's commands to aſſure him, if he would bring over the greateſt part of his fleet to Meſſina, or to any port in Spain, he would create him Duke of Albemarle, with a royal bounty of one hundred thouſand pounds to ſupport the honour and dignity of that rank; and that every Captain ſhould have ten thouſand pounds, and the ſeamen a gratuity of two months wages; that Signor Patinho would ſatisfy him of the King of Spain's ſecurity for the performance of this agreement, and that no body elſe but the Dukes of Ormond and Mar were in the ſecret.—Whether he wrote by direction or not, does not appear, but the letter met with the contempt it deſerved.——He likewiſe ſent another letter to Captain Walton, with the promiſe of a reward of ten thouſand pounds, a commiſſion of Admiral of the Blue, and to be made an Engliſh Peer, if he would bring his ſhips into Meſſina; which the honeſt Captain brought to the Admiral, with vehement expreſſions of abhorrence and indignation.

[P] The Admiral ſailed early in the ſpring to Naples.] During the Admiral's ſtay at Naples, an accident happened, ſingular enough to deſerve notice. The Viceroy of Naples, who ſtudied every way to make the place agreeable to the Admiral, on the feſtival of St. Januarius, had appointed him a box near his own, to behold that famous ceremony. The blood continued a long time without liquifying, at the approach of the head of that ſaint. The vaſt concourſe of people began to ſhew ſigns of concern: they fell firſt to praying, afterwards proceeded to groans and lamentations; and, at length, ſuch a confuſed murmuring and uneaſineſs were perceived among them, that the Viceroy, being apprehenſive of ſome bad conſequences, ſent Count Hamilton to the Admiral, to beg he would not take it ill, if he deſired him to retire, not knowing what effect it might have upon the populace, if they ſhould take it into their heads to attribute the failing of the miracle to the ſaint's being diſpleaſed at his preſence: the Admiral had no ſooner quitted his box, and was ſtepping into the Viceroy's coach, but he heard a prodigious ſhout of, é falto, é falto, it is done, it is done, and ſuch joy and exultation appeared in every countenance, as if they had been delivered from ſome terrible calamity.

[Q] This diſpute was happily ended, &c.] Signor Scarampi began the diſpute, and firſt ſtarted the queſtion, claiming the two beſt, of ſixty and ſixty-four guns, new ſhips, which had belonged to his maſter, the King of Sardinia, and were ſeized by the Spaniards in the port of Palermo. He grounded his right on the Convention made at Vienna, the 29th of December, 1718, in which it was ſaid, 'That as 'to the ſhips belonging to the King of Sardinia, if 'they had been taken in port, they ſhall be reſtored 'him; but that this ſhall be referred to Admiral 'Byng to anſwer.' To this the Admiral replied, 'That this Convention having been only a ground-'work for another to be made at Naples, he could 'be directed by none, but that which had been made, 'in conſequence thereof, in April 1719, between 'the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis de Breille, 'Miniſter of Sardinia, and himſelf, in which no 'mention is made of thoſe ſhips; and as for the re-'ference to his opinion, he did freely declare, he 'could not think the King of Sardinia had any ſha-'dow of title to them; that they had been taken by 'the enemy, were now fitted and armed at their ex-'pence, and under their colours; that they would 'put out to ſea, if he did not hinder them, and at-'tack all the Engliſh ſhips they met with, and, if 'ſtronger, take them; ſo that they could not con-'ſider them in any light than that which they 'were, the ſhips of an enemy.' Count de Mercy next put in his claim for the Emperor, alleging, 'That as thoſe ſhips would be found within the port 'of a town taken by his maſter's arms, according to 'the right of nations they belonged to him.' The Admiral replied, 'That it was owing to his keeping 'two ſquadrons on purpoſe, and at a great hazard, 'to watch and obſerve thoſe ſhips, that they were 'now confined within the port, which if he was to 'withdraw, they would ſtill be able to get to ſea, 'and he ſhould have a chance of meeting with, and 'taking them.' But, reflecting afterwards with himſelf, that poſſibly the garriſon might capitulate for the ſafe return of thoſe ſhips into Spain, which he was determined never to ſuffer: that, on the other hand, the right of poſſeſſion might breed an inconvenient diſpute among the Princes concerned: and if it ſhould prove, that they did not belong to England, it were better they belonged to no body; he propoſed to Count Mercy to erect a battery, and deſtroy them as they lay in the baſon; who urged, that he had no orders concerning thoſe ſhips, and muſt write to Vienna for inſtructions about it. The Admiral replied, with ſome warmth, that he could not want a power to deſtroy every thing that belonged to the enemy; and inſiſted on it with ſo much firmneſs, that the General being concerned in intereſt, not to carry matters to a diſagreement, cauſed a batttery to be erected, notwithſtanding the proteſtation of Signor Scarampi, which in a little time ſunk and deſtroyed them.

vice, the expedition againſt Sardinia was laid aſide, and the reduction of Sicily firſt attempted. At Meſſina, the Admiral received another moſt gracious letter from the Emperor, wherein he ſignified to him, 'his approbation of a project that was the effect 'of his zeal and activity; the ſatisfaction he had in his wiſe conduct, and for his love 'and attachment to his Imperial perſon and auguſt houſe; and on all occaſions he 'ſhould give him marks of his affection and eſteem, and of his good remembrance of 'the ſervices he had done him.' The Admiral, in order to ſucceed in his ſcheme, and at the ſame time to procure artillery for carrying on the ſiege of the citadel of Meſſina, went over to Naples in Auguſt, and finding that the government was abſolutely unable to furniſh the military ſtores that were wanting, he very generouſly granted the cannon out of the Britiſh prizes, and procured, upon his own credit, and at his own riſk, powder and other ammunition from Genoa; and ſoon after went thither himſelf, in order to haſten the embarkation of the troops intended for Sicily, which was made ſooner than could have been expected, merely by his incredible labour and diligence, and in ſpite of the delays affected by the Count, afterwards Baſhaw, Bonneval, who was appointed to command them. At Genoa alſo, the Admiral received great honours and reſpect. At his arrival, the town ſaluted his flag with twenty-one guns, and his perſon with ten guns; and the Republic ſent off ſix Deputies, three of the old, and three of the new nobility, to compliment him upon his arrival. After a ſtay of about three weeks, he ſailed with the tranſports for Sicily, and arrived before Meſſina October the eighth, which ſo elevated the ſpirits of the army then beſieging the citadel, that upon the firſt ſight of the fleet, they made a vigorous attack upon a half-moon, and carried it. The admiral repairing a-ſhore to the General's quarters, was embraced by him and all the general officers, with the moſt tender marks of affection and gratulation; the whole army being overjoyed to ſee a man who always brought them relief and ſucceſs, and every good that attended them. In ten days after the Admiral's arrival at Meſſina, the citadel ſurrendered to the Germans; after which, Sir George Byng re-embarked a great part of the army, and landed them upon another part of the iſland [R], by which means they diſtreſſed the enemy to ſuch a degree, that the Marquis de Lede, commander of the Spaniſh forces, propoſed to evacuate the iſland; to which the Germans were very well inclined, and ſent to Vienna for inſtructions: but the Admiral proteſted againſt it, and declared, that the Spaniſh troops ſhould never be permitted to quit Sicily and return home, till a general peace was concluded; and ſent his eldeſt ſon to Vienna, with inſtructions, if the Imperial Court liſtened to the propoſals of the Spaniſh General, to declare, that his father could never ſuffer any part of the Spaniſh army to depart out of the iſland, till the King of Spain had acceded to the Quadruple Alliance, or till he received poſitive inſtructions from England for doing ſo. In this, Sir George Byng certainly acted as became a Britiſh Admiral; who, after having done ſo many ſervices for the Imperialiſts, might ſurely inſiſt on their doing what was juſt with reſpect to us, and on holding the Spaniſh troops in the uneaſy ſituation they now were, till they gave ample ſatisfaction to the Court of London, as well as to that of Vienna. The Admiral had the detention of the Spaniards in his own hands, ſince the Germans could do nothing in that matter without him; and our demands on the Court of Spain were as much for the intereſt of the common cauſe as for our own; ſo that though the ſteadineſs of Admiral Byng deſerves commendation, yet there ſeemed to be no great praiſes due to the German complaiſance. After this, the Spaniſh General laid a ſnare to ſeparate the Admiral from the Germans, by propoſing an agreement with him, for a ſeparate ceſſation of hoſtilities, but without effect [S]. But ſoon afterwards, when the Germans, with the aſſiſtance of the [R] And landed them upon another part of the iſland.] Here the Admiral once more ſaved the Imperial army, by his admirable foreſight, judgment, and thought, in which he ſhewed a great ſuperiority over the Generals of the allies, who, even after the reduction of Meſſina, finding they could not ſubſiſt their army, nor undertake any action where they were, went to the Admiral, their old deliverer, and told him in a very deſponding manner, that they had reſolved to tranſport the army to Calabria and Syracuſa, for ſubſiſtence during the winter, and prayed his aſſiſtance. The Admiral replied, 'He hoped their affairs were 'not ſo deſperate as they apprehended; that he had 'been employing his thoughts for their ſervice, and 'believed he ſhould be able to extricate them out of 'their preſent circumſtances; that he was for tranſporting their army to Trapani, which would be 'turning the difficulty upon the Spaniards, by obliging the Spaniards to make uneaſy marches, and to 'keep the field in the winter; that they would 'thereby be able to enlarge their quarters, the granaries of corn would fall into their hands, and they 'would keep the city of Palermo in awe, till the 'ſeaſon would permit their attempting to reduce it, 'which would bring the war to a ſpeedy iſſue: That 'as the whole army could not be tranſported at once, 'he would ſend his Secretary to Tunis, the neareſt 'African port to Trapani, and employ him and the 'Engliſh Conſul there, to buy up whatever corn 'was neceſſary for ſubſiſting one part of the army 'at Trapani, till the reſt was arrived, for which 'ſervice, as he knew they had no money, he would 'employ his own caſh and credit, depending upon 'their honour for repayment.' Count de Mercy penetrating immediately into the facility and advantageous conſequences of this ſcheme, roſe up, and embracing the Admiral in a kind of tranſport, acknowledged, 'That he had hit upon the only method 'practicable, not only for the preſervation of the 'army, but even for puſhing on the war with ſucceſs.' And the ſcheme was accordingly executed ſucceſsfully.

[S] Propoſing an agreement for a ſeparate ceſſation of hoſtilities, but without effect.] The affair was this: The Marquis de Lede ſent to the Admiral a Spaniſh Gazette, wherein was publiſhed a treaty of ſuſpenſion of arms at ſea, concluded at the Hague, between the Miniſters of Great Britain, France, and Spain; and, therefore,

the Admiral, had begun the ſiege of Palermo, before which the Spaniards lay encamped, and juſt as the two armies were upon the point of engaging, a courier arrived in that lucky inſtant, from Spain, with full powers for the Spaniſh General to treat and agree about the evacuation of Sicily and Sardinia, in conſequence of the King of Spain's acceſſion to the Quadruple Alliance; upon which the two armies were drawn off, a ſuſpenſion of arms agreed on, the Germans put into the poſſeſſion of Palermo, and the Spaniards embarked for Barcelona; and the Admiral, after he had ſettled all affairs in Sicily, ſailed in Auguſt 1720, to Cagliari in Sardinia, where he aſſiſted at the conferences, with the Miniſters and Generals of the ſeveral powers concerned, wherein was regulated the manner of ſurrendering the iſland by the Spaniſh Viceroy to the Emperor, and the ceſſion of the ſame from the Emperor to the Duke of Savoy: and at the inſtance of this Prince, the Admiral did not depart, till he had ſeen the whole fully executed, the Spaniſh troops returned into Spain, and the Duke of Savoy put into quiet poſſeſſion of his new kingdom of Sardinia, in exchange for Sicily, according to the Quadruple Alliance; in all which affairs, the Admiral arbitrated ſo equally between them, that even the King of Spain expreſſed his great ſatisfaction in his conduct, to the Britiſh Court; and his behaviour was ſo acceptable to the Duke of Savoy, that his acknowledgments to him were accompanied with his picture ſet in diamonds. Thus ended the war of Sicily, wherein the fleet of Great Britain bore ſo illuſtrious a part, that the fate of the iſland was wholly governed by its operations; both competitors agreeing, that the one could not have conquered, nor the other have been ſubdued, without it. Never was any ſervice conducted, in all its parts, with greater zeal, activity, and judgment, nor was ever the Britiſh Flag in ſo high reputation and reſpect in thoſe diſtant parts of Europe. King George the Firſt, who had named the Admiral for that expedition, and knew his abilities, uſed to ſay to his Miniſters, when they applied for inſtructions to be ſent to him for his guidance on certain important occaſions, That he would ſend him none, for he knew how to act without any; and, indeed, all the meaſures which he took abroad were ſo exact and juſt, as to ſquare with the councils and plan of policy at home. In our relation of this expedition, we have entirely followed the account of it publiſhed in 1739, and have, by a bare recital of facts, without farther enquiries, ſhewn how well Sir George Byng executed his inſtructions: for in this conſiſts the merit of an Admiral, and for which alone he is anſwerable, and not at all for the rectitude of thoſe inſtructions. If this be not granted, we muſt never expect to be well ſerved at ſea: ſince the Admiral who takes upon him to interpret his inſtructions, will never want excuſes for his conduct, be it what it will; and if this be once granted, Sir George Byng muſt be allowed to have done his duty as well as any Admiral ever did; for to his conduct it was entirely owing that Sicily was ſubdued, and his Catholic Majeſty forced to accept the terms preſcribed him by the Quadruple Alliance. He it was, who firſt enabled the Germans to ſet foot in that iſland; by him they were ſupported in all they did; and by his counſels they were directed, or otherwiſe they had been expelled the iſland, even after the taking of Meſſina, as we have ſhewn above (m). The cauſe of the Emperor being become the cauſe of his Maſter, he ſerved the intereſt of that Prince, with a zeal and fidelity that ſtood a pattern to his own ſubjects. He lived in ſuch harmony with the Imperial Viceroys and Generals, as has been ſeldom ſeen among fellow-ſubjects united in command, the want of which has proved the ruin of many important expeditions. He was incapable of performing his duty in a cold or negligent manner, and when any ſervice was committed to his management, he devoted his whole time and application to it: nor could any fatigue or indiſpoſition of body, ever divert or interrupt his attention from any point that required preſent diſpatch. To this it might be in a great meaſure owing, that he was never unfortunate in any undertaking, nor miſcarried in any ſervice that was entruſted to his direction. For whoever will trace upwards to the ſprings and cauſes of public or private events, will find (excepting where the immediate finger of Providence is viſible) therefore, he propoſed a ſeparate ceſſation of arms, and proteſted againſt any violences the Admiral ſhould commit, contrary to the plain inſtructions of their ſovereign. But the Admiral replied, that he could pay no regard to a pretended convention publiſhed in a foreign news-paper, and even in which there was a clauſe, that nothing in it ſhould derogate from what ſhould be agreed between him and the Marquis, for what concerns the Mediterranean-ſea: That as the Spaniſh Miniſter had ſigned the Quadruple Alliance ever ſince the 17th of February laſt, it was ſtrange the Marquis had received no orders for treating about the evacuation of the iſland, which was the neceſſary conſequence of it; and that as the time for doing this was elapſed, till he had ſecurity that the Marquis really intended it, he could not agree to a ſuſpenſion of arms. This was an adventurous proceeding in the Admiral: for his inſtructions from England directed him to come to a ſuſpenſion of arms with Spain, without ſtaying for ſettling the terms of evacuation, which might take up time. But his penetration ſhewed him, that if a ſuſpenſion took place at ſea, the Spaniards might introduce what ſuccours and troops they pleaſed into the iſland, which would unravel all they had been doing, and if any interruption happened in the negociations on foot, put the Spaniards in a better ſtate of proſecuting the war, and perhaps protracting it another year. He was jealous of their artifices, and found they took every advantage to evade the evacuation of the iſland; and, therefore, as the convention for a ceſſation of arms at ſea, ſigned at the Hague, February 29th, left him at liberty of treating as he thought proper, he determined to remain united with the Germans, which he prudently ſaw was the quickeſt way to bring the Spaniards to a compliance, and to come into real meaſures for evacuating the iſland. The event juſtified his precaution, and his conduct received at home the approbation it deſerved.

that what is uſually called ill-luck, is generally the effect of negligence or imprudence. He always proceeded upon ſolid principles, and left nothing to Fortune that could be accompliſhed by foreſight and application. His firmneſs and plain dealing were ſo apparent to the foreigners who treated with him upon buſineſs, that it contributed much to the diſpatch and ſucceſs of his tranſactions with them: for they could depend upon wha the ſaid; and as they ſaw he uſed no arts or chicanery himſelf, and had too diſcerning a ſpirit to ſuffer them to paſs unobſerved in others, they often found it their beſt policy to leave their intereſts in his hands and management, being very ſure of a moſt impartial and punctual performance of whatever he engaged in. His reputation was ſo thoroughly eſtabliſhed in this particular, that in the frequent diſputes and altercations which aroſe between the Savoyards and Germans in the courſe of the war, and between the latter and the Spaniards at the concluſion of it, wherein little faith or confidence was given to the promiſes or aſſeverations of each other, he was the common umpire between them, always ſhunning and oppoſing any extravagant or unjuſt demands (which the over-bearing temper of the German General was apt to ſuggeſt, where he had the ſuperior hand) and reconciling, as much as poſſible, the violences of war with the rules of honour and juſtice (n). After performing ſo many ſignal ſervices, when the Admiral departed from Italy to attend King George the Firſt, by his own command, at Hanover, his Majeſty, among many moſt gracious expreſſions of favour and ſatisfaction, told him, That he had found out the ſecret of obliging his enemies as well as friends, and that the Court of Spain had mentioned, with great acknowledgment, his fair and friendly behaviour, in the proviſion of tranſports and other neceſſaries for the embarkation of their troops, and in protecting them from many vexations and oppreſſions that had been attempted. No wonder that a man endowed with ſuch talents, and ſuch a diſpoſition, left behind him, in Italy and other foreign parts, the character of a great Soldier, an able Stateſman, and an honeſt Man. During his Majeſty's ſtay at Hanover, he began to reward the eminent ſervices of Sir George Byng, by making him Treaſurer of the Navy, and Rear-Admiral of Great Britain; and, on his return to England, one of his moſt honourable Privy-Council (o): and ſoon after, in 1721, he was created a Peer of Great Britain, by the Title of Viſcount Torrington, and Baron Byng of Southill in Bedfordſhire (p) [T]; and, in 1725, he was made one of the Knights of the Bath, upon the revival of that Moſt Ancient and Honourable Order. When his late Majeſty came to the Crown, he was pleaſed to place him at the Head of his naval affairs, as Firſt Lord Commiſſioner of the Admiralty, in which high ſtation he died at his houſe in the Admiralty, of an aſthma, in January 1733, in the ſeventieth year of his age, and lies buried at Southill in Bedfordſhire. His Lordſhip was but of a tender conſtitution, though well ſupplied with ſpirits, which did not diſplay themſelves ſo much in gaiety of converſation (for he was modeſt in his nature) as in activity in all the duties and functions of life or buſineſs, in which he was indefatigable; and, by a continued habit of induſtry, he had hardened and inured a body, not naturally ſtrong, to patience under any fatigue. He had made no great proficiency in ſchool-learning (which the early age of going to ſea ſeldom admits of); but his great diligence, joined with excellent natural parts, and a juſt ſenſe of honour, made him capable of conducting difficult negociations and commiſſions, with proper dignity and addreſs. During the time he preſided in the Admiralty, he laboured in improving the naval force of this kingdom, in procuring encouragement for ſailors, who, in him, loſt a true friend; and in promoting the ſcheme for eſtabliſhing a corporation for relief of widows and children of commiſſion and warrant officers in the Royal Navy; and in every other ſervice to his country that he was capable of. His Lordſhip married, in 1691, Margaret, daughter of James Maſter, of Eaſt Langden in the county of Kent, Eſq; by whom he had eleven ſons and four daughters, of which there ſurvived him, Pattee, George, Robert, John, Edward, and Sarah married to the eldeſt ſon of Sir John Oſborne of Chickſand in Bedfordſhire, Bart. and mother of the late Sir Danvers Oſborne. The Lord Torrington was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Pattee, who was abroad with his father in the expedition to Sicily, and after his death was continued Treaſurer of the Navy, and appointed one of his Majeſty's Moſt Honourable Privy-Council. He was afterwards made Vice-Treaſurer of Ireland, and Captain of the Yeomen of the Guards: and dying, in 1746, without iſſue, was ſucceeded by his brother the Honourable Brigadier George Byng, the late Lord Viſcount Torrington.

[T] By the title of Viſcount Torrington, &c.] The preamble to his Lordſhip's patent is as follows, greatly to the honour of his memory: 'As the grandeur and 'ſtability of the Britiſh empire depend chiefly upon 'knowledge and experience in maritime affairs, we 'eſteem thoſe worthy of the higheſt honours, who, 'acting under our influence, exert themſelves in 'maintaining our dominion over the ſea. It is for 'this reaſon that we have determined to advance to 'the dignity of Peerage, our truſty and well beloved 'Counſellor, Sir George Byng, Knight and Baronet, 'who being deſcended from an ancient family in 'Kent, and educated from his youth in the ſea ſervice, hath through ſeveral poſts arrived at the high'eſt ſtation and command in our navy, by the ſtrength 'of his own abilities, and a merit diſtinguiſhed by 'our predeceſſors and ourſelves, in the many import'ant ſervices, which he has performed with remark'able fidelity, courage, and ſucceſs. In the late vi'gorous wars, which raged ſo many years in Europe; 'wars fruitful of naval combats and expeditions, 'there was ſcarcely an action of any conſequence 'wherein he did not bear a principal part, nor were 'any dangers or difficulties ſo great, but he ſur'mounted them by his exquiſite conduct, and a good 'fortune that never failed him. Particularly, when 'a ſtorm was gathering in France, and it was un'certain upon what part of the coaſt it ſhould fall, 'with the greateſt ſagacity and diligence, he flew to 'the very place of danger, reſcuing our capital city 'of Scotland, from the threatened attack of a French 'ſquadron, which had many rebels and numerous 'forces on board; and by his very appearance, de'feated the vain hopes of the enemy, compelling 'them to relinquiſh their enterprize, and to ſeek 'their ſafety by a flight towards their own ports, not 'without loſs. With no leſs vigilance he repreſſed 'not long ſince the like machinations of the ſame 'traitors in the ports of France, who were ſo diſ'concerted at his preſence, as to abandon the ſchemes 'they had projected; for which ſervice we conferred 'on him the dignity of a Baronet, the firſt mark of 'our royal favour. Moreover, lately, when new 'contentions were ſpringing up in Italy, and the diſ'cord of Princes was on the point of embroiling Eu'rope again in a war, he did, with ſingular felicity 'and conduct, interpoſe with our ſquadron, cruſhing 'at one blow the laboured efforts of Spain, to ſet up 'a power at ſea, and advanced the reputation of our 'arms in the Mediterranean to ſuch a pitch, that our 'flag gave law to the contending parties, and enabled 'us to reſettle the tranquillity that had been diſ'turbed. It is juſt, therefore, we ſhould diſtinguiſh 'with higher titles, a ſubject who has ſo eminently 'ſerved us and his country, both as monuments of 'his own merit, and to influence others to a love 'and purſuit of Virtue. Know ye therefore, &c.'

 [In the two laſt editions of Collins's Peerage (28), it is ſaid, that Sir George Byng was born at Wrotham, in Kent, on the 27th of January, 1663. Upon what authority this additional circumſtance, of the place of his birth, is grounded, we cannot tell; as no ſuch aſſertion occurs in the early editions of Collins. Smith, the Author of the ancient and preſent State of the City and County of Cork in Ireland, and who is generally eſteemed an accurate Writer, ſays, that Sir George Byng, Viſcount Torrington, was born at Weſt Carbery in that County (29). It is certain that John Byng, Eſq; his Lordſhip's father, diſpoſed of the family eſtate at Wrotham; nor doth it appear where he afterwards ſettled. It is poſſible that he might be one of the adventurers who, before the Reſtoration, purchaſed forfeited eſtates in Ireland, or he might have ſome other reaſon for removing to that kingdom; which will account for what Smith relates concerning the birth of Sir George Byng.] K.

 [BYROM (John), a poetical Writer, and the inventor of a new Short Hand, was born at Kerſall, near Mancheſter, in 1691; and was a younger ſon of Mr. Edward Byrom, a Linen-draper; who was deſcended from a genteel family in Lancaſhire. Young Byrom having received the firſt rudiments of his education at his native place, was removed to Merchant Taylors School in London, in which excellent ſeminary his genius ſoon began to diſplay itſelf, and where he made ſuch an extraordinary progreſs in claſſical learning, that he was deſtined for the univerſity. Accordingly, at the age of ſixteen, he was ſent to Cambridge, and, on the 6th of July 1708, was admitted a Penſioner of Trinity College, under the tuition of Mr. Baker (a). In the Univerſity, he gave no greater ſhare of attention to logic and philoſophy than was neceſſary to qualify him for his degrees. The bent of his inclination was to poetry; and the firſt public ſpecimen of his talents in this way, appeared in his beautiful and natural Paſtoral, 'Colin to Phœbe [A], which was printed in the eighth volume of the Spectator, and has [A] His beautiful and natural Paſtoral, 'Colin to Phœbe.'] It is inſerted in the Spectator, No. 603, for October 6, 1714. Though it is ſo well known, it would be doing injuſtice to the Author not to introduce it in this place.

I.

'My time, O ye Muſes, was happily ſpent,
'When Phebe went with me wherever I went;
'Ten thouſand ſweet pleaſures I felt in my breaſt:
'Sure never fond ſhepherd like Colin was bleſt!
'But now ſhe is gone, and has left me behind,
'What a marvellous change on a ſudden I find!
'When things were as fine as could poſſibly be,
'I thought 'twas the Spring; but alas! it was ſhe.

II.

'With ſuch a companion to tend a few ſheep,
'To riſe up and play, or to lie down and ſleep:
'I was ſo good-humour'd, ſo cheerful and gay,
'My heart was as light as a feather all day;
'But now I ſo croſs and ſo peeviſh am grown,
'So ſtrangely uneaſy, as never was known.
'My fair one is gone, and my joys are all drown'd,
'And my heart——I am ſure, It weighs more than a pound.

III.

'The fountain, that wont to run ſweetly along,
'And dance to ſoft murmurs the pebbles among;
'Thou know'ſt, little Cupid, if Phebe was there,
'Twas pleaſure to look at, 'twas muſic to hear:
'But now ſhe is abſent, I walk by its ſide,
'And ſtill, as it murmurs, do nothing but chide;
'Muſt you be ſo cheerful, while I go in pain?
'Peace there with your bubbling, and hear me complain.

IV.

'My lambkins around me would oftentimes play,
'And Phebe and I were as joyful as they,
'How pleaſant their ſporting, how happy their time,
'When ſpring, love, and beauty were all in their prime!

V.

'My dog I was ever well pleaſed to ſee
'Come wagging his tail to my fair one and me;
'And Phebe was pleas'd too, and to my dog ſaid,
'Come hither, poor fellow; and patted his head.
'But now, when he's fawning, I with a ſour look
'Cry, Sirrah! and give him a blow with my crook:
'And I'll give him another; for why ſhould not Tray
'Be as dull as his maſter, when Phebe's away?

VI.

'When walking with Phebe, what ſights have I ſeen!
'How fair was the flower, how freſh was the green!
'What a lovely appearance the trees and the ſhade,
'The corn-fields and hedges, and ev'ry thing made!
'But now ſhe has left me, tho' all are ſtill there,
'They none of them now ſo delightful appear:
'Twas naught but the magic, I find, of her eyes,
'Made ſo many beautiful proſpects ariſe.

VII.

'Sweet muſic went with us both all the wood thro',
'The lark, linnet, throſtle, and nightingale too;
'Winds over us whiſper'd, flocks by us did bleat,
'And chirp went the graſshopper under our feet.
'But now ſhe is abſent, though ſtill they ſing on,
'The woods are but lonely, the melody's gone:
'Her voice in the concert, as now I have found,
'Gave ev'ry thing elſe its agreeable ſound.

VIII.

'Roſe, what is become of thy delicate hue?
'And where is the violet's beautiful blue?
'Does ought of its ſweetneſs the bloſſom beguile?
'That meadow, thoſe daſies, why do they not ſmile?

'Ah!

has always been very much admired. It is, indeed, the beſt of his poems, and has been the chief ground of his poetical reputation. He is ſaid, likewiſe, to have written, in the ſame volume of the Spectator, two ingenious letters on dreams (b). At Cambridge, Mr. Byrom proceeded to take both his Degrees in Arts;—and, in 1714, he was choſen Fellow of his College, the pleaſantry and ſweetneſs of his temper, and the general ſobriety and modeſty of his manners, having recommended him to the particular notice and favour of Dr. Bentley, the Maſter. His Fellowſhip, however, he did not long hold; being obliged to quit it, by the ſtatutes of the college, in 1716, on account of his not having entered into holy orders. Not long after, being indiſpoſed, he went to Montpelier, for the recovery of his health. During his reſidence in France, he met with Father Malebranche's 'Search after Truth,' and ſome pieces of Mademoiſelle Antoinette Bourignon; the conſequence of which was, that he came home ſtrongly poſſeſſed with the viſionary philoſophy of the former, and the enthuſiaſtic extravagances of the latter. He was particularly fond of Malebranche's notion of ſeeing all things in God (c); and it is evident, from his poems, that, in the latter part of his life, he was attached to Jacob Behmen. Upon his return to London, he had thoughts of applying to the practice of phyſic, but did not proceed ſo far as to take a degree in that ſcience; though, from that time, he uſually went, among his acquaintance, under the title of Dr. Byrom. Whilſt Mr. Byrom was in this undetermined ſtate with regard to his choice of a profeſſion, his mind was rendered ſtill more unſettled by a love affair. Two daughters of his uncle, Mr. Joſeph Byrom, a mercer at Manchеſter, having occaſion to viſit London, our poet became deeply enamoured of the younger of them, Miſs Elizabeth Byrom. He made known his paſſion to her before ſhe left London, and ſoon after followed her to Manchеſter, where, for a conſiderable length of time, he proſecuted his addreſſes with ſo much ardour, as to obtain the lady's conſent. But he was not equally ſucceſsful with her parents, who, being in opulent circumſtances, were extremely averſe to the match. Notwithſtanding this, he ventured to marry his couſin; and receiving no ſupport from her father, what little fortune he had of his own was ſoon exhauſted. In this exigence he had recourſe to his new Method of writing Short-hand [B], which he had invented when he reſided at Cambridge. He firſt taught it at Manchеſter; and, after ſome time, leaving his wife, by her own conſent, to the care of her relations in that place, he came to London, where he continued his inſtructions in the ſame art, for ſeveral years, by which means he obtained a competent ſubſiſtence. What rendered his ſituation leſs diſagreeable was, that his buſineſs being chiefly confined to the winter months, he had leiſure to ſpend the ſummer ſeaſon at Manchеſter with his family, which uſually received an annual increaſe. On the 29th of March, 1723-4, Mr. Byrom, under the title of M.A. was choſen a Fellow of the Royal Society. At length, the family eſtate at Kerſall devolved to him, by the death of his elder brother, Mr. Edward Byrom, without iſſue. After this acceſſion of fortune, the buſineſs of teaching ſhort-hand was not ſo aſſiduouſly purſued; and our author was at liberty fully to enjoy that conjugal felicity for which he had the higheſt reliſh, and which was rendered exquiſite by the undeviating fidelity of his wife, whoſe affection had never been leſſened by any events (d). During the latter part of his life, he

IX.

'How ſlowly time creeps, till my Phebe return!
'While amidſt the ſoft zephyr's cool breezes I burn;
'Methinks if I knew whereabouts he would tread,
'I could breathe on his wings, and 'twould melt

(1) Byrom's Miſcellaneous poems, vol. i. p. 1, 4.

[B] He had recourſe to his new Method of writing Short-hand.] This invention was owing to the following incident: Some manuſcript ſermons being communicated to him, written in ſhort-hand, he eaſily diſcovered the true reading; but obſerving the method to be clumſy and ill contrived, he ſet about inventing a better. The reſult of this was, his own method, which is very beautiful and eaſy, and is uſually known by the title of Byrom's Short-hand. Whilſt he was employed in teaching it, he received a challenge from Weſton, a famous competitor in the ſame art, the irregularity and defects of whoſe method he had often humorouſly expoſed. This challenge to a trial of ſkill was accepted; and in the conteſt, Mr. Byrom came off completely victorious, which increaſed the number of his pupils, among whom were ſeveral gentlemen of rank and quality; and particularly Lord Stanhope, afterwards the famous Earl of Cheſterfield. Our author occaſionally read a lecture to his ſcholars, upon the hiſtory and utility of ſhort-hand; which, being interſperſed with the ſtrokes of wit that were natural to him, was very entertaining. About the ſame time he became acquainted with that irregular genius, Dr. Byfield, with whom he uſed to have ſkirmiſhes of humour and repartee, at the Rainbow coffee-houſe, near Temple-Bar. Upon that chymiſt's deceaſe, who was the inventor of the Sal volatile oleoſum, Mr. Byrom wrote the following ſhort epitaph, impromptu:

Hic jacet Dr. Byfield, diu volatilis, tandem fixus.

employed himſelf almoſt entirely in writing a variety of pieces in verſe [C]; ſome of which are of a witty and humorous nature, but ſtill more are on ſerious ſubjects. Many of them are diſcuſſions of learned and critical queſtions. It was remarkable in Mr. Byrom, that he had ſo accuſtomed himſelf to the language of poetry, that he always found it the eaſieſt way of expreſſing his ſentiments upon every occaſion. He himſelf uſed to give this reaſon to his friends, for treating ſuch ſubjects in ſo uncommon a method; 'and it is to be preſumed, ſays the editor of his poems, that, if they are not 'found deficient in other reſpects, the novelty of the manner will rather be a recommendation than otherwiſe (e).' It may, however, be greatly doubted, whether our author's

(e) Preface to Byrom's Poems, p. ii.

[C] Employed himſelf in writing a variety of pieces in verſe.] Theſe were collected together in 1773, and printed at Mancheſter, in two volumes, 12mo. The firſt piece in the Collection, is 'Colin to 'Phœbe;' our opinion of which we have already given. There is another poem, entitled, 'Careleſs Content,' which partakes ſomething of the elegant ſimplicity and beauty of the 'Colin to 'Phœbe.' In general, Mr. Byrom deſerves rather the character of a ready verſifier, than of a poet; and many of his pieces are ſuch indifferent performances, that the ſuppreſſion of them would have been no loſs to the world. Some of his humorous copies of verſes are agreeable and pleaſing. As one ſpecimen of them, we ſhall inſert part of his Tale of the 'Three Black Crows.'

'Two honeſt tradeſmen, meeting in the Strand,
'One took the other, briſkly, by the hand;
'Hark-ye, ſaid he, 'tis an odd ſtory this
'About the crows!—I don't know what it is,
'Replied his friend.—No! I'm ſurpriſed at that;
'Where I come from it is the common chat;
'But you ſhall hear; an odd affair indeed!
'And, that it happen'd, they are all agreed:
'Not to detain you from a thing ſo ſtrange,
'A Gentleman, that lives not far from Change,
'This week, in ſhort, as all the Alley knows,
'Taking a puke, has thrown up three black crows.
'Impoſſible!—Nay but it's really true;
'I have it from good hands, and ſo may you——
'From whoſe, I pray—So having nam'd the man,
'Straight to enquire his curious comrade ran.
'Sir, did you tell—relating the affair——
'Yes, Sir, I did; and if it's worth your care,
'Aſk Mr. Such-a-one, he told it me,
'But, by the bye, 'twas two black crows, not three—
'Reſolv'd to trace ſo wond'rous an event,
'Whip, to the third, the Virtuoſo went,
'Sir—and ſo forth—Why yes; the thing is fact,
'Tho' in regard to number not exact;
'It was not two black crows, 'twas only one,
'The truth of that you may depend upon.
'The Gentleman himſelf told me the caſe——
'Where may I find him?—Why in ſuch a place.
'Away goes he, and having found him out,
'Sir, be ſo good as to reſolve a doubt——
'Then to his laſt informant he referr'd,
'And begg'd to know, if true what he had heard;
'Did you, Sir, throw up a black crow—Not I——
'Bleſs me! how people propagate a lie!
'Black crows have been thrown up, three, two, and one;
'And here, I find, all comes, at laſt, to none!
'Did you ſay nothing of a crow at all?——
'Crow—crow—perhaps I might, now I recall
'The matter over—And, pray Sir what was't?
'Why I was horrid ſick, and, at the laſt,
'I did throw up, and told my neighbour ſo,
'Something that was—as black, Sir, as a crow (3).'

'With monthly medley courts the curious age;
'Hear a poor paſſive Participle's caſe,
'And, if thou can'ſt, reſtore me to my place.
'Till juſt of late, good Engliſh has thought fit
'To call me written, or to call me writ;
'But what is writ, or written, by the vote
'Of writers now, hereafter muſt be wrote:
'And what is ſpoken too, hereafter ſpoke;
'And meaſures never to be broken, broke.
'I never could be driven, but, in ſpite
'Of Grammar, they have drove me from my right.
'None could have riſen to become my foes;
'But what a world of enemies have roſe!
'Who have not gone, but they have went about,
'And, torn as I have been, have tore me out.
'Paſſive I am, and would be, and implore
'That ſuch abuſe may be henceforth forbore,
'If not forborn, for, by all Spelling Book,
'If not miſtaken, they are all miſtook:
'And, in plain Engliſh, it had been as well
'If what has fall'n upon me, had not fell.
'Since this attack upon me has began,
'Who knows what lengths in language may be ran?
'For if it once be grew into a law,
'You'll ſee ſuch work as never has been ſaw;
'Part of our ſpeech, and ſenſe, perhaps, beſide,
'Shakes when I'm ſhook, and dies when I am di'd.
'Then let the præter, and imperfect tenſe
'Of my own words to me remit the ſenſe:
'Or, ſince we two are oft enough agreed,
'Let all the learned take ſome better heed;
'And leave the vulgar to confound the due
'Of Præter Tenſe, and Participle too (4).'

Our author's Epilogue to Hurlothrumbo, has much wit in it. It was compoſed with the friendly intention of pointing out to Mr. Johnſon * the extravagance and abſurdity of his play. But Mr. Johnſon was ſo far from perceiving the ridicule, that he received it as a compliment, and had it both ſpoken and printed (5). Mr. Byrom's Epigram on the feuds between Handel and Bononcini, was greatly admired; and Mr. Melmoth, who erroneouſly aſcribes it to Dr. Swift, has ſpoken of it with applauſe (6). The Epigram is as follows:

It is ſaid that our author, before his death, committed his lighter verſes to the flames, among which might probably be ſome that were better than many of his pieces which have been preſerved (8). A pleaſant poem, not printed in his works, on his purchaſing, at an auction, a picture of Father Malebranche, is inſerted by Mr. Nichols, in one of the volumes of his Supplement to Johnſon's Poets (9). Among Mr. Byrom's critical diſſertations in verſe, is a Letter to Lord Willoughby, late Preſident of the Society of Antiquaries, concerning the patron of England. In this Letter our author contends, that we are all miſtaken in taking St. George of Cappadocia, or even any George, whether real or emblematical, for the patron of the Order of the Garter, or of the kingdom of England in general; ſince, in all probability, Pope Gregory the Great, under whoſe auſpices the Engliſh Saxons were converted to Chriſtianity by St. Auguſtine of Canterbuty, is our true and proper patron, and not St. George, whoſe name, by ſome means or other, has crept into the books, and into the patronage of the kingdom, to the author's mode of carrying on religious controverſies, and writing literary diſſertations in verſe, will, on a peruſal, give much ſatisfaction to a judicious mind. Mr. Byrom died at Mancheſter, on the 28th of September, 1763, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age. As the general tenor of his life was innocent and inoffenſive, ſo he bore his laſt illneſs with reſignation and chearfulneſs. The great truths of Chriſtianity had made, from his earlieſt years, a deep impreſſion upon his mind; and hence it was, that he had a peculiar pleaſure in employing his pen upon ſerious ſubjects. With reſpect to his lighter pieces, he might juſtly apply to them that diſtich of Ovid, which is made the motto to Mr. Waller's works,

'Non ego mordaci diſtrinxi carmine quenquam;
'Nulla venenato eſt litera mixta joco (f).']

the excluſion of that of St. Gregory (10). At the end of his Diſſertation, Mr. Byrom calls upon a Willis, a Stukeley, an Ames, or a Pegge, to conſider the matter. Accordingly, Mr. Pegge, in his obſervations on the Hiſtory of St. George, has fully examined, and, indeed, entirely confuted our poet's hypotheſis (11). His character is thus delineated by Mr. Pegge. 'My late worthy friend, Mr. Byrom, 'whoſe memory I ſhall always revere, was undoubt-'edly a man of parts and learning, but rather too 'fond ſometimes of a paradox, Amongſt his other 'qualifications, he had a particular knack at verſi-'fication, and has accordingly delivered his ſenti-'ments on this ſubject, as well as on all others, in 'a metrical garb; for, I preſume, we can ſcarcely 'call it a poetical one (12).

[CABOT (SEBASTIAN), a navigator of great eminence and abilities, was born at Briſtol about the year 1477 (a). He was ſon of John Cabot, a Venetian pilot [A], who reſided much in England, and particularly in the city of Briſtol; and who was greatly celebrated for his ſkill in navigation. Young Cabot was early inſtructed by his father in arithmetic, geometry, coſmography, and thoſe branches of knowledge which were beſt calculated to form an able and ſkilful ſeaman: and by the time he was ſeventeen years of age, he had already made ſeveral trips to ſea, in order to add to the theoretical knowledge which he had acquired, a competent ſkill in the practical part of navigation (b). The firſt voyage of any importance in which he was engaged, appears to have been that made by his father, for the diſcovery of unknown lands; and alſo, as it is ſaid, of a north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt Indies. John Cabot was encouraged to this attempt by the diſcoveries of Columbus. It was in 1493, that Columbus returned from his firſt expedition; and in 1495, John Cabot obtained from King Henry VII. letters patent, empowering him and his three ſons, Lewis, Sebaſtian, and Sanctius, to diſcover unknown lands, and to conquer and ſettle them, for which they were to be admitted to many privileges; the king reſerving to himſelf one-fifth part of the neat profits; and with this ſingle reſtraint, that the ſhips they fitted out ſhould be obliged to return to the port of Briſtol (c). It was not till the year after theſe letters patent were granted, that any preparations were made for fitting out veſſels for the intended voyage; and then John Cabot had a permiſſion from his Majeſty, to take ſix Engliſh ſhips in any haven of the realm, of the burden of two hundred tons and under, with as many mariners as ſhould be willing to go with him. Accordingly, one ſhip was equipped at Briſtol, at the King's expence; and to this the merchants of that city, and of London, added three or four ſmall veſſels, freighted with proper commodities (d).

John Cabot, attended by his ſon Sebaſtian, ſet ſail with this fleet in the ſpring of the year 1497. They ſailed happily on their north-weſt courſe, till the 24th of June in the ſame year, about five in the morning, when they diſcovered the iſland of Baccalaos [B], now much better known by the name of Newfoundland. The very day on which they made this important diſcovery, is known by a large map, drawn by Sebaſtian Cabot, and cut by Clement Adams, which hung in the privy gallery at Whitehall; whereon was this inſcription under the author's picture: "Effigies Seb. Caboti, "Angli, Filii Jo. Caboti, Venetiani, Militis aurati, &c." and on this map was likewiſe the following account of the diſcovery, the original of which was in Latin: "In the year of "our Lord 1497, John Cabot, a Venetian, and his ſon Sebaſtian, with an Engliſh "fleet, ſet out from Briſtol, and diſcovered that iſland which no man before had at- "tempted. This diſcovery was made on the four and twentieth of June, about five "o'clock in the morning. This land he called Prima Viſta (or Firſt Seen), becauſe it "was that part of which they had the firſt ſight from the ſea. The iſland, which lies

[A] Son of John Cabot, a Venetian pilot.] Dr. Campbell obſerves, that 'the Venetians, throughout this whole century, and indeed for ſome ages before, were by far the moſt general traders in Europe; and had their factories in moſt of the northern kingdoms and ſtates, for the better managing their affairs. In England, eſpecially, many of them ſettled, at London and Briſtol particularly; and, in this laſt place, dwelt John Gabota, Gabot, or, as our writers uſually call him, John Cabot.—He had been long in England, ſince his ſon Sebaſtian, who was born at Briſtol, was old enough to accompany him in his firſt voyage: he was, it ſeems, a man perfectly ſkilled in all the ſciences requiſite to form an accompliſhed ſeaman, or a general trader; and having heard much of Columbus's expedition, he addreſſed himſelf to the King, with propoſals for making like diſcoveries, in caſe he met with due encouragement (1).'

(1) Lives of the Britiſh Admirals, vol. i. p. 258. edit. 1779.

John Cabot had other ſons beſides Sebaſtian, who were likewiſe inſtructed in the art of navigation, and became alſo eminent men, and ſettled abroad, one in Genoa, the other at Venice (2).'

"out

" out before the land, he called the iſland of St. John, probably becauſe it was diſ-
" covered on the feſtival of St. John the Baptiſt. The inhabitants of this iſland wore " beaſts ſkins [C], and eſteemed them as the fineſt garments." To this Purchas adds, " In their wars they uſed bows, arrows, pikes, darts, wooden clubs, and ſlings.
" They found the ſoil barren in ſome places, and yielding little fruit; but it was full " of white bears and ſtags, far larger than thoſe of Europe. It yielded plenty of fiſh,
" and thoſe of the larger kind, as ſeals and ſalmon. They found ſoles there above a " yard in length, and great abundance of that kind of fiſh which the ſavages called " baccalaos. They alſo obſerved there partridges, as likewiſe hawks and eagles; but " what was remarkable in them, they were all as black as ravens (e)."

(e) Lediard's Naval Hiſtory, vol. i. p. 86.

The accounts of this voyage made by John Cabot, accompanied by his ſon Sebaſtian, are, in ſome reſpects, involved in much obſcurity; and Sebaſtian is ſuppoſed to have made ſome voyages of diſcovery without his father, in the reign of Henry VII. of which no narrations have been preſerved [D]. However, it appears that John Cabot, after the diſcovery of Newfoundland, ſailed down to Cape Florida, and then returned with three Indians, and a good cargo to England, where he was well received (f). The diſcovery that he and his ſon had made was, indeed, as Dr. Campbell obſerves, very important; " ſince, in truth, it was the firſt time the continent of America had been
" ſeen; Columbus being unacquainted therewith till his laſt voyage, which was the " year following, when he coaſted along a part of the iſthmus of Darien (g)."

(f) Campbell, ubi ſupra, p. 259, 260.

(g) Ibid. p. 260.

After the voyage in which Newfoundland was diſcovered, there is a conſiderable chaſm in the life of Sebaſtian Cabot; for we have no diſtinct accounts of what he performed for the ſpace of twenty years together, though he probably performed ſeveral voyages during that period. Nor have we any account at what time, or in what place, his father, John Cabot, died; though it is ſuppoſed to have been in England (h). The next tranſaction concerning Sebaſtian Cabot, of which we meet with any mention, was in the eighth year of the reign of King Henry VIII. and our accounts relative to this are not very clear. But it ſeems he had entered into a cloſe connexion with Sir Thomas Pert, then vice-admiral of England, and who procured him a good ſhip of the king's, in order to make diſcoveries. It is ſuppoſed, however, that he had now changed his route, and intended to have paſſed by the South to the Eaſt Indies; for he ſailed firſt to Brazil, and, miſſing there of his purpoſe, ſhaped his courſe for the iſlands of Hiſpaniola and Porto Rico, where he carried on ſome traffic, and then returned, failing abſolutely in the deſign upon which he went; not through any want either of courage, or of conduct in himſelf, but from the timidity of his coadjutor [E] Sir Thomas Pert (i).

(i) Ibid. p. 313.

It was this diſappointment which is ſuppoſed to have induced Sebaſtian Cabot to leave England, and go over into Spain. There he was treated with great reſpect, and appointed Pilot-major, or chief Pilot of Spain; and by his office entruſted with the reviewing of all projects for diſcovery; which, at that period were numerous and important. His great capacity and reputation as a navigator, induced many opulent merchants to treat with him, in the year 1524, about a voyage to be undertaken at their expence,

[C] The inhabitants of this iſland wore beaſts ſkins.] Fabian ſays, in his Chronicle, that there were brought unto King Henry VII. 'three men taken 'in the new 'found iſland: theſe, ſays he, were cloathed in 'beaſts ſkins, and did eat raw fleſh, and ſpake ſuch 'ſpeech that no man could underſtand them, and in 'their demeanor like brute beaſts, whom the king 'kept a time after; of the which, upon two years 'after, I ſaw two apparelled after the manner of 'Engliſhmen, in Weſtminſter palace, which that 'time I could not diſcern from Engliſhmen, till I 'learned what they were; but as for ſpeech, I heard 'none of them utter one word (5).'

(5) Campbell, ubi ſupra, p. 261.

[D] Is ſuppoſed to have made ſome voyages of diſcovery without his father, in the reign of Henry VII. &c.] Dr. Campbell obſerves, that 'a very intelligent Spaniſh writer, who is very exact in his chronology, tells us, that when Cabot ſailed at the expence of King Henry VII. in order to make diſcoveries towards the north, he paſſed beyond cape Labrador, ſomewhat more than fifty-eight degrees 'north latitude, then turning towards the weſt, he 'ſailed along the coaſt to thirty-eight degrees; 'which agrees very well with our accounts of John 'Cabot's voyage: but Ramuſio, the Italian collector, who had the letter of Sebaſtian Cabot before 'him when he wrote, ſpeaks of a voyage wherein he 'ſailed north and by weſt to ſixty-ſeven degrees and 'an half, and would have proceeded farther, if he 'had not been hindered by a mutiny among his 'ſailors. The writers in thoſe days had no preciſion; they ſet down facts very confuſedly, without 'much attending to circumſtances; and were ſtill 'leſs ſolicitous about dates, which gives thoſe who 'come after them much trouble, and yet ſeldom 'attaining any certainty; which, I muſt acknowledge, is the caſe here. It is, however, probable, 'that Sebaſtian made more than one, perhaps more 'than two voyages into theſe parts, by virtue of 'King Henry VIIth's commiſſion (6).' Whatever voyages he made during this period, no account of them is preſerved: though Mr. Lediard obſerves, that 'it is not to be doubted, but a man ſo curious, and of ſo much knowledge and experience, as 'it appears Sebaſtian was, kept a particular detail 'of what he had ſeen, and what had happened to 'him during his voyages. But by what accident, 'or neglect, the world has been deprived of it, is 'unknown (7).'

(7) Naval Hiſtory, ut ſupra.

[E] From the timidity of his coadjutor.] 'If manly courage had not been wanting in theſe our 'days, at ſuch time as our Sovereign Lord, of noble 'memory, King Henry VIII. about the ſame year 'of his reign, furniſhed and ſent out certain ſhips 'under the governance of Sebaſtian Cabot, yet living, and one Sir Thomas Pert, whoſe faint heart 'was the cauſe that the voyage took none effect: if, 'I ſay, ſuch manly courage had not at that time 'been wanting, it might happily have come to paſs, 'that the rich treaſury called Perularia, (which is 'now in Spain, in the city of Seville, and ſo named, for that in it is kept the infinite riches brought 'thither from the new-found land of Peru) might 'long ſince have been in the Tower of London, to 'the King's great honour, and wealth of this 'realm (8).'

by the new found paſſage of Magellan to the Moluccos; and Cabot accordingly agreed to engage in the voyage (k). He ſet ſail from Cadiz, with four ſhips, about the beginning of April 1525, firſt to the Canaries, then to the Cape Verd Iſlands, and from thence to Cape St. Auguſtine, and the iſland of Patos, or Geeſe; and near Bahia de Todos los Santos, or the bay of All Saints, he met a French ſhip. When he came to the iſland juſt mentioned, he was in great want of proviſions; but the Indians treated him with much kindneſs, and ſupplied him with proviſions for all his ſhips. This he returned by an act of baſe ingratitude, carrying off with him by force four ſons of the principal perſons of the iſland (l). He then proceeded to the river of Plate, having left aſhore, on a deſart iſland, Martin Mendez, his Vice-admiral, Captain Francis de Rojas, and Michael de Rojas, becauſe they cenſured his conduct (m). He was now prevented from proſecuting his original deſign, of going to the Spice Iſlands, both by a ſcarcity of proviſions, and a mutiny among his men (n). He ſailed, however, up the river of Plate; and, about thirty leagues above the mouth, he found an iſland which he called St. Gabriel, about a league in compaſs, and half a league from the continent towards Brazil. There he anchored; and, rowing with the boats three leagues higher, diſcovered a river he called San Salvador, or St. Saviour, very deep, and a ſafe harbour for the ſhips on the ſame ſide; whither he brought up his veſſels, and unloaded them, becauſe there was not much water at the mouth of the river. Having built a fort, and left ſome men in it, he determined to proceed up that river with boats, and a flat-bottomed caravel, in order to make diſcoveries; for he thought his voyage might thereby be rendered beneficial, though he did not paſs through the Straits to the Spice Iſlands. When he had advanced thirty leagues, he came to a river called Zarcarana; the inhabitants in the neighbourhood of which he found to be intelligent, and not unfriendly; and here he erected another fort, calling it Santi Spiritus, i. e. of the Holy Ghoſt, and his followers by another name, viz. Cabot's Fort. He then diſcovered the ſhores of the river Parana, where he found ſeveral iſlands and rivers, and at length came to the river Paraguay, in the neighbourhood of which he found people tilling the ground; a circumſtance which had not occurred to him before in that part of the world. But here the natives oppoſed him with ſo much vigour, that he advanced no farther, though he had killed many of the Indians; but they ſlew twenty-five of his Spaniards, and took three of them, who went out to gather palmetos (o).

While Sebaſtian Cabot was thus employed, James Garcia, with the ſame view of making diſcoveries, had entered the river of Plate, without knowing that the other was there before him. He had been ſent from Galicia with two veſſels, and came to an anchor in the ſame place where Cabot's ſhip lay, about the beginning of the year 1527. Directing his courſe towards the river Parana, he arrived at the fort built by Cabot; and about one hundred and ten leagues from this fort, he found Cabot himſelf in the port of St. Anne. After a ſhort ſtay there, they returned together to the fort of the Holy Ghoſt, from whence they ſent meſſengers into Spain. Thoſe who were diſpatched by Cabot, were Francis Calderon and George Barlow, who gave a very favourable account of the fine countries bordering on the river La Plata, ſhewing how large a tract of land he had not only diſcovered, but ſubdued; and producing gold, ſilver, and other valuable commodities, as evidences in favour of their commander's conduct. They then demanded on his behalf, that a ſupply ſhould be ſent of proviſions, ammunition, goods proper to carry on a trade, and a competent recruit of ſeamen and ſoldiers. But the merchants, by whom Cabot's ſquadron was fitted out, would not agree to theſe requiſitions, rather chooſing to reſign their rights to the crown of Caſtile. The King then took the whole upon himſelf; but was ſo dilatory in his preparations, that Cabot, who had been five years employed in this expedition, being quite tired out, determined to return home; which he accordingly did, embarking the remainder of his men, and all his effects, on board the largeſt of his ſhips, and leaving the reſt behind him. He arrived at the Spaniſh court, where he gave an account of his expedition, in the ſpring of the year 1531. But he was not well received: for he had created himſelf enemies, by the rigour with which he had treated his Spaniſh mutineers; and he had alſo diſappointed the expectations of his owners, by not proſecuting his voyage to the Moluccos. Notwithſtanding theſe unfavourable circumſtances, he found means to keep his place, and continued in the ſervice of Spain many years after, till at length he reſolved to return again to England (p). What were his particular inducements to this, we meet with no certain account.

It is conjectured, that it was about the latter end of the reign of King Henry VIII. when Cabot returned to England, where he reſided at Briſtol. In the beginning of the following reign, he was introduced to the Duke of Somerſet, then Lord Protector, who received him into great favour, and by whom he was made known to King Edward VI. That young prince, who was very ſolicitous to acquire knowledge, and who had much more ſkill in maritime affairs than could have been expected from his years, took great pleaſure in the converſation of Cabot, to whom a penſion was granted, by letters patent, dated January 6, 1549, of 166*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* a year (q): and, according according to Hakluyt, this annuity was allowed him as Grand Pilot of England. From this time he continued highly in the King's favour, and was conſulted upon all affairs relative to trade, and particularly in the great caſe of the merchants of the Steel-yard [F], in 1551 (r).

In May 1552, the King granted a licence, together with letters of ſafe conduct, to ſuch perſons as ſhould embark on board three ſhips, to be employed for the diſcovery of a paſſage, by the North, to the Eaſt-Indies. Sebaſtian Cabot was at that time Governor of the company of Merchant-adventurers: and this enterprize was undertaken by his advice, and the countenance of the Court obtained for it by his intereſt (s). When the neceſſary preparations were made for this voyage, Cabot delivered to the commander in chief thoſe directions, by which he was to regulate his conduct; the title of which ran thus: "Ordinances, inſtructions, and advertiſements, of and for the direc-"tion of the intended voyage for Cathay; compiled, made, and delivered by the right "worſhipful Sebaſtian Cabot, Eſq; Governor of the myſtery and company of the "Merchant-adventurers for the diſcovery of regions, dominions, iſlands, and places "unknown, the 9th of May, in the year of our Lord God 1553 (t)." Theſe inſtructions are preſerved in Hakluyt's Collection of Voyages; and Dr. Campbell obſerves, that they "are the cleareſt proofs of Cabot's ſagacity and penetration, and the fulleſt "juſtification of ſuch as did repoſe their truſt in him (u):" and it appears, that in conſideration of his expence and trouble in this affair, his Majeſty made him a preſent of two hundred pounds (w).

It has been ſuppoſed, that there were two undertakings of this kind; "one under "the immediate protection of the Court, which did not take effect; and the other by "a joint ſtock of the merchants, which did (x)." But this ſeems hardly probable; for we meet with no diſtinct account of any other expedition to the northern ſeas being undertaken at this time, but that in which Sir Hugh Willoughby commanded, which produced the important diſcovery of the trade to Archangel; and this voyage was evidently undertaken under the direction of Sebaſtian Cabot [G].

He

[F] The great caſe of the merchants of the Steel-yard.] Dr. Campbell ſays, 'Theſe merchants are 'ſometimes called of the Hanſe, becauſe they came 'from the Hanſe-towns, or free cities in Germany; 'ſometimes Almains, from their country: they ſet-'tled here in or before the reign of Henry III. and 'imported grain, cordage, flax, hemp, linen cloth, 'wax, and ſteel; whence the place in Dowgate-'ward, where they dwelt, was called the Steel-'yard, which name it ſtill retains. The Kings of 'England encouraged them at firſt, and granted 'them large privileges; amongſt others, that of ex-'porting our woollen cloths: they had likewiſe an 'Alderman, who was their chief magiſtrate; and in 'conſideration of various grants from the city, 'they ſtood bound to repair Billingſgate, and were 'likewiſe under other obligations. By degrees, 'however, the Engliſh coming to trade themſelves, 'and importing many of the commodities in which 'theſe Germans dealt, great controverſies grew 'between them; the foreigners, on all occaſions, 'pleading their charter, which the Engliſh mer-'chants treated as a monopoly, not well warranted 'by law.

'At laſt the company of Merchant-adventurers, 'at the head of which was our Sebaſtian Cabot, on 'the 29th of December, 1551, exhibited to the 'Council an information againſt theſe merchants of 'the Steel-yard, to which they were directed to put 'in their anſwer. They did ſo; and after ſeveral 'hearings, and a reference to the King's Solicitor-'General, his counſel learned in the law, and the 'Recorder of London, a decree paſſed on the 24th 'of February, whereby theſe merchants of the Steel-'yard were declared to be no legal corporation: yet 'licences were afterwards granted them from time 'to time, for the exportation and importation of 'goods, notwithſtanding this decree, which remain-'ed ſtill in full force and virtue. The great offence 'objected to them was, that whereas, by their char-'ter, they were allowed to export goods at one and 'a quarter per cent. cuſtom, which gave them a great 'advantage, they, not content with this, in direct 'violation of that charter, covered other foreign 'merchants ſo, that in one year they exported forty-'four thouſand cloths, and all other ſtrangers but 'one thouſand one hundred. Theſe merchants of 'the Steel-yard being immenſely rich, ventured 'now and then upon ſuch tricks as theſe; and 'then, by paying a round ſum, procured a renewal 'of their charter (9).'

Three ſhips had been equipped for this expedition, and they ſailed for Graveſend on the 18th of May, 1553. They were 'under the command of 'Sir Hugh Willoughby, an Engliſh knight, and 'Richard Chancellor, Vice-commodore, with or-'ders to endeavour to find out a paſſage to the 'north-eaſt, through the Tartarean ſea to China. 'Thoſe three ſhips purſued their voyage together, 'without any ſiniſter accident, till they came to the 'height of Wardhuys and Lapland, where Richard 'Chancellor being ſeparated from the reſt by foggy 'and ſtormy weather, he cruiſed up and down on 'thoſe ſeas, in hopes to meet with them again, till 'at laſt he arrived accidentally in the bay of St. 'Nicholas, under the Muſcovite juriſdiction, but 'unfrequented by any Europeans before. Being got 'into the acquaintance of ſome Muſcovites, he re-'ſolved to wait in perſon on the then great Duke 'John Baſilovitz; who being then engaged in the 'Livonian war, which had much interrupted the 'Eaſtland trade, was very willing to encourage the 'Engliſh, by granting them conſiderable privileges 'for the promoting of trade, which has been ſince 'carried on by the Engliſh to their no ſmall ad-'vantage.'

'Sir Hugh Willoughby, after he had been toſſed 'up and down for a long time, did at laſt (accord-'ing to the Diary writ by his own hand) viz. on 'the 14th of Auguſt, come to an anchor near a 'country ſituate under the ſeventy-ſecond degree; 'which country ſince has been ſtiled in many maps, 'Sir Hugh Willoughby's country. From thence he 'purſued his voyage along thoſe coaſts, till the ſud-'den approaching winter obliged him to enter a cer-'tain harbour, where to paſs the winter. He ſent 'abroad three of his men to the ſouth-weſt, to view 'the country, and to endeavour to diſcover ſome of 'the inhabitants: but thoſe returning without ſuc-'ceſs, within three days after, he ordered three 'others to the weſt ſide; but theſe alſo failing in their

He was alſo Governor of the Ruſſia Company. A charter was granted by King Philip and Queen Mary, in the firſt year of their reign, to the merchants of Ruſſia, ſince ſtiled the Ruſſia Company; whereby Cabot was made Governor for life, on account of his being principally concerned in fitting out the firſt ſhips employed in that trade. Letters patent were likewiſe iſſued, dated St. James's, November 27, 1555, in the ſecond and third years of Philip and Mary; wherein their Majeſties granted him an annuity of one hundred ſixty-ſix pounds thirteen ſhillings and four-pence, during his natural life (y). He was very active in the affairs of the Ruſſia Company; and in the Journal of Stephen Burroughs, it is obſerved, that on the 27th of April, 1556, he went down to Graveſend, and there going on board the Serch-thrift, a ſmall veſſel fitted out under the command of Mr. Burroughs for Ruſſia, he gave generouſly to the ſailors; and, on his return to Graveſend, he extended his alms very liberally to the poor, deſiring them to pray for the ſucceſs of this voyage. It is alſo mentioned, as an evidence of his chearful temper, that he cauſed a grand entertainment to be made at the ſign of the Chriſtopher, at Graveſend, on this occaſion; and, as Mr. Burroughs ſays, "for the "very joy he had to ſee the towardneſs of our intended diſcovery, he entered into "the dance himſelf (z)" This is the laſt circumſtance related of Cabot; who is ſuppoſed to have died ſome time in the following year, when he was probably near eighty; though his age cannot now be exactly aſcertained. He was a very able and ſkilful navigator, and had a very high reputation in his own time: and Dr. Campbell obſerves of him, that "by his capacity and integrity, he contributed not a little to the ſervice of "mankind in general, as well as of this kingdom; for it was he who firſt took notice "of the variation of the compaſs, which is of ſuch mighty conſequence in navigation, "and concerning which the learned have buſied themſelves in their inquiries ever "ſince (a)."] T.

CÆSAR (JULIUS), a learned Civilian in the end of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth century, was born near Tottenham in Middleſex (a) in the year 1557 [A]. His father was Cæſar Adelmar (b), phyſician to Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth; lineally deſcended from Adelmar Count of Genoa, and Admiral of France, in the year of Chriſt 806, in the reign of Charles the Great. This Cæſar Adelmar's mother was daughter to the Duke de Ceſarini, from whom he had the name of Cæſar (c); which name, Mary I. Queen of England, ordered to be continued to his poſterity [B]: and his father was Peter Maria Dalmarius, of the city of Trevigio in Italy, Doctor of Laws, ſprung from thoſe of his name living at Cividad del Friuli (d). Julius, who is the ſubject of this article, had his education in the univerſity of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 17, 1575, as a Member of Magdalen-Hall (e). Afterwards he went and ſtudied in the Univerſity of Paris; where, in the beginning of 1581, he was created Doctor of the Civil Law, and had letters teſtimonial for it, under the ſeal of that Univerſity (f), dated the 22d of April, 1581 [C]. He was admitted to the ſame degree at Oxford, March the 5th, 1583; and alſo became Doctor of the Canon Law (g). In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, he was Maſter of Requeſts, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and Maſter of St. Catherine's Hoſpital near the Tower (h). On the 22d of January 1595, he was preſent at the confirmation of Richard Vaughan Biſhop of Bangor, in the church of St. Mary le Bow, London (i). Upon King James's acceſſion to the throne, having before diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his merit and abilities, he was knighted by that Prince, at Greenwich, May 20, 1603 (k). 5th of July 1607, ſworn of his Majeſty's Privy Council (m). January 16th, in the eighth of King James I. he obtained a reverſionary grant of the office of Maſter of the Rolls after Sir Edward Phillips, Knight (n); who departing this life, September 11, 1614 (o), was ſucceeded accordingly by Sir Julius, on the 1ſt of October following (p); and he thereupon reſigning his place of Chancellor of the Exchequer, had for ſucceſſor in it, Sir Fulk Greville, Knight (q). In 1613, he was one of the Commiſſioners, or Delegates, employed in the buſineſs of the divorce, between the Earl of Eſſex and his Counteſs (r); and gave ſentence for that divorce. About the ſame time, he built a chapel at his houſe, on the north ſide of the Strand in London, which was conſecrated, May 8, 1614 (s). As he had been Privy Counſellor to King James I. ſo was he alſo to his ſon, King Charles I. (t); and appears, moreover, to have been Cuſtos Rotulorum of the county of Hertford (u). We are likewiſe informed by one author (w), that he was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter. After having thus paſſed through many honourable employments, and continued, in particular, Maſter of the Rolls for above twenty years, he departed this life, April 28, 1636, in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age (x). He lies buried in the church of Great St. Helen's within Biſhopſgate, London (y), under a fair, but uncommon monument, deſigned by himſelf; being in form of a deed, and made to reſemble ruffled parchment (z), in alluſion to his office, as Maſter of the Rolls [D]. [E] So that he might ſeem to be Almoner-General of the nation.] Dr. Fuller gives the following inſtance of his uncommon charity. 'A gentleman once borrowing his coach (which was as well known to poor people as any hoſpital in England) was ſo rendezvouzed about with beggars in London, that it coſt him all the money in his purſe to ſatisfy their importunity, ſo that he might have hired twenty coaches on the ſame terms (5).'

[F] He entertained for ſome time in his houſe the Lord Francis Bacon, &c.] We are told by an ill-natured writer (6), That the Lord Bacon, 'after he was out of his place, pinned himſelf for very ſcraps on that noble gentleman, Sir Julius Cæſar's hoſpitality, ſo that at laſt he was forced to get the King's warrant to remove him out of his houſe; yet in his proſperity, the one being Chancellor, and the other Maſter of the Rolls, did ſo ſcorne and abuſe him, as he would alter any thing the other did.' But Mr. Stephens aſſures us (7), that the Lord Bacon was not reduced to ſuch low circumſtances, as is commonly imagined, but had ſomething conſiderable even at the time of his death.

Beſides, he obſerved a ſure principle of riſing, namely, that great perſons eſteem better of ſuch they have done great courteſies to, than thoſe they have received great civilities from; looking upon this as their diſparagement, the other as their glory. Sir Julius Cæſar's manuſcripts, bound up in ſeveral volumes, were long preſerved at Benington in Hertfordſhire, the ſeat of his poſterity (c). The Lord Clarendon mentions a ſtory that has relation to him (d), which the reader may not perhaps be diſpleaſed to ſee in the note [G]. [G] The Lord Clarendon mentions a ſtory that has a relation to him, &c.] It is as follows: "Sir Julius "Cæſar was then Maſter of the Rolls, (in the reign "of King Charles I.) and had inherent in his office "the indubitable right and diſpoſition of the Six "Clarks places, all which he had for many years, "upon any vacancy, beſtowed to ſuch perſons as he "thought fit. One of thoſe places was become void, "and deſigned by the old man to his ſon Robert "Cæſar, a Lawyer of a good name, and exceeding-"ly beloved. The Lord Treaſurer * (as he was "vigilant in ſuch caſes) had notice of the Clark's "expiration ſo ſoon, that he procured the King to "ſend a meſſage to the Maſter of the Rolls, expreſſ-"ly forbidding him to diſpoſe of that Six Clark's "place, till his Majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be further "made known to him. It was the firſt command "of that kind that had been heard of, and was felt "by the old man very ſenſibly. He was indeed very "old, and had out-lived moſt of his friends; ſo that "his age was an objection againſt him; many per-"ſons of quality being dead, who had, for recom-"pences of ſervice, procured the reverſion of his "office. The Treaſurer found it no hard matter ſo "far to terrify him, that for the King's ſervice, (as "was pretended) he admitted for a Six Clark a per-"ſon recommended by him (Mr. Fern, a dependant "upon him) who paid ſix thouſand pounds ready "money; which, poor man! he lived to repent in a "jayl. This work being done at the charge of the "poor old man, who had been a Privy Counſellor "from the entrance of King James, had been Chan-"cellor of the Exchequer, and ſerved in other of-"fices; the depriving him of his right made a "great noiſe: and the condition of his ſon (his fa-"ther being not likely to live to have the diſpoſal "of another office in his power) who, as was ſaid "before, was generally beloved, and eſteemed, was "argument of great compaſſion; and was livelily, "and ſucceſsfully repreſented to the King himſelf; "who was graciouſly pleaſed to promiſe, that," 'If the old man chanced to die before any other of 'the ſix Clarks, that office, when it ſhould fall, 'ſhould be conferred on his ſon, whoſoever ſhould 'ſucceed him as Maſter of the Rolls; which might 'well be provided for:' "And the Lord Treaſurer "obliged himſelf (to expiate the injury) to procure "ſome declaration to that purpoſe, under his Ma-"jeſty's ſign manual; which, however eaſy to be "done, he long forgot, or neglected. One day, "the Earl of Tullibardin, who was nearly allied to "Mr. Cæſar, and much his friend, being with the "Treaſurer, paſſionately aſked him, Whether he had "done that buſineſs? To whom he anſwered with a "ſeeming trouble," 'That he had forgotten it, 'for which he was heartily ſorry; and if he would 'give him a little note in writing, for a memorial, 'he would put it amongſt thoſe which he would 'diſpatch with the King that afternoon.' "The "Earl preſently writ in a little paper, Remember "Cæſar; and gave it to him; and he put it into "that little pocket, where, he ſaid, he kept all his "memorials which were firſt to be tranſacted. "Many days paſſed, and Cæſar never thought of. "At length, when he changed his cloaths, and he "who waited on him in his chamber, according to "cuſtom, brought him all the notes and papers "found in thoſe he had left off, which he then com-"monly peruſed; when he found this little billet, "in which was only written, Remember Cæſar, and "which he had never read before, he was exceed-"ingly confounded, and knew not what to make, "or think of it. He ſent for his boſom-friends,— "and after a ſerious and melancholic deliberation, "it was agreed, that it was the advertiſement of "ſome friend, who durſt not own the diſcovery; "that it could not ſignify nothing, but that there "was a conſpiracy againſt his life, by his many and "mighty enemies: and they all knew Cæſar's fate, "by contemning or neglecting ſuch animadverſions." Therefore they adviſed him to pretend to be indiſpoſed, that he might not ſtir abroad all that day, and that none might be admitted to him, but perſons of undoubted affection: and that at night ſome ſervants ſhould watch with the porter.—"Shortly after, the "the Earl of Tullibardin aſking him, Whether he "had remembered Cæſar? The Treaſurer quickly "recollected the ground of his perturbation, and "could not forbear imparting it to his friends, and "ſo the whole jeſt came to be diſcovered." (8) From a Correſpondent.

The benefactions which Dr. Henry Cæſar left by his will were, a thouſand pounds towards augmenting the places of the Minor Canons, Singing-men, Choriſters, Schoolmaſters, &c. of the Church of Ely, and a thouſand pounds more, to found two Fellowſhips, and four Scholarſhips, in ſome College in Cambridge. It was Sir Charles Cæſar, nephew and ſole executor to the Dean, who made choice of Jeſus College for the foundation, and there placed the Fellows and Scholars. In 1639, he was prevailed upon by Archbiſhop Laud, to lend the two thouſand pounds to his Majeſty King Charles the Firſt, for which he had a privy ſeal, and a tally for repayment of principal and intereſt, out of the Augmentation Office. Neither the intereſt nor principal were ever paid. Notwithſtanding this, Sir Charles Cæſar, his relict, Dame Jane Cæſar, and his eldeſt ſon, Sir Henry Cæſar, generouſly continued, during their lives, to pay the annuities at Ely and Cambridge. But upon the death of Sir Henry, in 1668, all attempts to recover the money being found ineffectual, Dean Cæſar's noble and piouſly intended benefaction came to nothing (9).

In December 1757, Sir Julius Cæſar's Collection of Manuſcripts, which till that time had been preſerved in the family, was ſold by public auction. The produce of the ſale was three hundred and fifty-ſix pounds and ſix-pence. In one of the lots was a paper, entitled, 'A ſhort Memorial, or Chronicle, 'concerning Sir Julius Cæſar, his father, mother, 'wives, and children, from his birth, anno 1557 to '1635, the ſeventy-ninth year of his age, written 'by himſelf (10).' The lot now mentioned was thought to have been purchaſed for the Britiſh Muſeum; but this doth not appear to have been the caſe; for, upon the moſt diligent enquiry, we find that there is no ſuch manuſcript as Sir Julius Cæſar's Chronicle in that noble Repoſitory.] K.

CALAMY (EDMUND) an eminent Nonconformiſt Divine, in the XVIIth century. He was the ſon of a Citizen of London, and born there in February 1600. July 4, 1616, he was admitted of Pembroke-hall, in the Univerſity of Cambridge (a). In 1619, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and, in 1632, that of Bachelor of Divinity (b). He ſhewed himſelf pretty early no friend to the Arminian party, which was the reaſon, that he could not obtain a Fellowſhip in that Society, even when he ſeemed to be entitled to it from his ſtanding, as well as from his learning and unblemiſhed character. At laſt, however, he ſo far conquered all prejudices, that he was elected Tanquam Socius of that Hall (c) [A]. Dr. Felton, the pious and learned Biſhop of Ely, had ſo great a regard to his diligence in ſtudy, and unaffected zeal for religion, that he made him his Chaplain (d), and paid him, during his reſidence in his family, uncommon marks of reſpect [B]. His Lordſhip gave him likewiſe as a mark of his favour, the Vicarage of St. Mary's in Swaffham-Prior, in Cambridgeſhire, in which capacity of Vicar he did much good, though he did not reſide on his cure by reaſon of its ſmall diſtance from the Epiſcopal place (e). But after the death of the Biſhop, in 1626, Mr. Calamy being choſen one of the Lecturers of St. Edmund's-Bury, in Suffolk, he reſigned his Vicarage, and applied himſelf wholly to the diſcharge of his function at Bury (f). He continued there ten years, and, as ſome writers ſay, was during the greateſt part of that time a ſtrict Conformiſt (g). Others, and indeed himſelf, ſay the contrary [C]. The truth ſeems to be, that he was unwilling to oppoſe ceremonies, or to create a diſturbance in the Church about them, ſo long as this might be avoided with a ſafe conſcience (h); but when Biſhop Wren's articles, and the reading of the book of Sports, came to be inſiſted on, he thought himſelf obliged to alter his conduct, and not only avoid conforming for the future, but alſo to apologize publicly for his former behaviour, which he did with equal modeſty

[A] Elected Tanquam Socius of that Hall.] This was peculiar to Pembroke-hall. The reader may ſee the occaſion of erecting it in another place (1). Beſides the Society of the Fellows, the Tanquam Socius had Poma, i. e. his dividend in the garden; Pupilli, i. e. leave to take pupils: and Pileus, i. e. the honour of the cap; together with a certain ſtipend, but no ſhare in the government of the houſe. Yet take it altogether, though there was leſs profit, there was at leaſt as much honour in being Tanquam Socius, as in being Fellow; for it was an evident ſign, that, though the College conferred only this, they thought him on whom they conferred it worthy of the other, ſince they might otherwiſe have ſaved themſelves this expence. The Tanquam Socius held his office but for three years, unleſs he was rechoſen (2). As for our author, he was within that ſpace, better provided for.

[B] Uncommon marks of reſpect.] The Biſhop gave directions, that Mr. Calamy ſhould not be called down to family prayers, or upon any other occaſion, without half an hour's notice, that his ſtudies might not be abruptly interrupted. That there was good reaſon for this, the reader muſt admit, when he is told, that during the whole time Mr. Calamy lived with this Prelate, he ſtudied at the rate of ſixteen hours a day. He read over the controverſies of Bellarmine entirely, and all the anſwers written by Chamier, Whitaker, Raynolds, and others, who, by parts, undertook the refuting his voluminous work. Mr. Calamy likewiſe peruſed many of the Schoolmen, particularly Thomas Aquinas, whoſe ſums he had read with diligence and thoroughly maſtered: he went through the works of St. Auguſtine five times, beſides peruſing many other eminent writers, ancient and modern, and excluſive of the daily ſtudy of the Holy Scriptures and the Commentators upon them. This laborious courſe acquired him a large fund of ſolid and uſeful learning, and enabled him to diſcharge with great ability, the ſeveral offices to which he was afterwards called; and yet he never affected quotations, but contented himſelf with a plain and familiar manner of ſpeaking, which ſavoured not at all of the ſchools. He was always extremely grateful towards his patron while living, and ſpoke

[C] And indeed himſelf, ſay the contrary.] The famous Anthony Wood, has taken pains to ſhew, that our author altered his opinion as to Church-government and ceremonies (4); and Mr. Walker hints, that he was once as high in his opinions as Archbiſhop Laud (5): their teſtimonies however, will not affect his character much, if the authorities they produce be fairly anſwered. The author of a quarto pamphlet, printed at Oxford, in 1643, entituled, Sober ſadneſs; or Hiſtorical Obſervations upon the Pretences, Proceedings, and Deſigns of a prevailing Party, in both Houſes of Parliament, &c. ſays, 'That 'Mr. Calamy complied with Biſhop Wren, his Dioceſan, preached in his ſurplice and hood, read 'prayers at the rails, bowed at the name of JESUS, 'and undertook to ſatisfy and reduce ſuch as ſcrupled 'thoſe ceremonies (6).' One Mr. Henry Burton, in a quarto pamphlet, printed at London, in 1646, aſſerts pretty nearly the ſame. The title of his pamphlet was, 'Truth ſtill Truth, though ſhut out of doors; in anſwer to which, Mr. Calamy publiſhed A juſt and neceſſary Apology againſt an unjuſt Invective, publiſhed by Mr. Burton, in a late book of his, entituled, &c. wherein he affirms, 'That during the 'time he was at St. Edmund's-Bury, he never bow-'ed to or towards the Altar, to or towards the Eaſt, 'never read that wicked book of Sports upon the 'Lord's day, never read prayers at the high altar, 'at the upper end of the church where the people 'could not hear. I have often, continued he, preach-'ed againſt innovations; and once I did it at a 'public viſitation, and was called in queſtion for 'my labour: I never juſtified the oath ex officio, nor 'ever proſecuted any man or woman at the high 'commiſſion; I never to my beſt remembrance 'preached at any time for the juſtification of any in-'novations. In ſome few things, I did, I confeſs, 'conform, according to the light I then had, out 'of the uprightneſs of my heart, &c. (7).' Whoever conſiders this, and that Mr. Calamay was only Lecturer at St. Edmund's-Bury, will readily incline to think, that theſe writers were miſtaken as to his Conformity, or might perhaps be miſled by repreſentations modeſty and freedom (i) [D]. He came now to be conſidered as an active Nonconformiſt, and being in great favour with the Earl of Eſſex, he preſented him to the living of Rochford in Eſſex, a Rectory of conſiderable value, and yet it proved a fatal preſent to Mr. Calamy; for removing from one of the beſt and wholeſomeſt airs in England, that of St. Edmund's-Bury, into the hundreds of Eſſex, he contracted ſuch an illneſs as broke his conſtitution, and left behind it a dizzineſs in his head, which he complained of as long as he lived (k). Upon the death of Dr. Stoughton, he was choſen miniſter of St. Mary Aldermanbury, which brought him up to London, 1639 (l). The controverſy concerning Church-government was then at its greateſt height, in which Mr. Calamy had a very large ſhare. In the month of July 1639, he was incorporated of the Univerſity of Oxford, which, however, did not take him off from the party in which he was engaged (m). In 1640, he was concerned in writing that famous book, called Smectymnuus, which himſelf ſays, gave the firſt deadly blow to Epiſcopacy (n). It was indeed, though a warm, a very well written piece, and therefore we find frequent references thereto in all the defences and apologies for Nonconformity, which have been ſince publiſhed [E]. In 1641, he was appointed by the Houſe of Lords a member of the Sub-committee for Religion (o), which conſiſted of very eminent Divines, whoſe conduct however has been differently cenſured [F]. He made a great figure in the Aſſembly ſentations made in his favour to Biſhop Wren by ſome kind friends, who were willing to preſerve him in his dioceſan's good graces.

[D] With equal modeſty and freedom.] With this view he tells us himſelf, he made a recantation and retractation ſermon at Bury, in the hearing of thouſands; and afterwards ſpeaking of the countenance he gave to the legal applications, againſt what was eſteemed tyranny in the Biſhops of thoſe times, he ſays, 'My houſe was the retreat of godly miniſters 'in the worſt of times. Here was the Remonſtrance 'framed againſt the Prelates; here were all meet-'ings; I was the firſt that openly before a Com-'mittee of Parliament, did defend, that Biſhops 'were not only not an order diſtinct from Preſby-'ters, but that in Scripture, a Biſhop and Preſby-'ter were all one (8).' In the ſame piece he takes abundance of pains to ſhew, that all this was from conſcientious motives, not from any pique to particular perſons, or prejudice ariſing from his own diſappointments, or deſpair of preferment. He likewiſe aſſerts, that it was before the turn of the times, and conſequently flowed not from a ſpirit of popularity. Others, however, have not ſcrupled to affirm the contrary, and that Robert, Earl of Eſſex, ſaid he would be loſt, if he was not taken off, and therefore gave him the Rectory of Rochford (9). Yet Mr. Calamy muſt be allowed to know himſelf as well as his patron; but it is our buſineſs to report all things fairly.

[E] Which have been ſince publiſhed.] The title of the book, at length, runs thus. An Anſwer to a book, entituled, AN HUMBLE REMONSTRANCE; in which the Original of Liturgy and Epiſcopacy is diſcuſſed, and Queries propounded concerning both: The Parity of Biſhops and Preſbyters in Scripture demonſtrated, the Occaſion of their Imparities in Antiquity diſcovered; the Diſparity of the ancient and our modern Biſhops manifeſted; the Antiquity of Ruling Elders in the Church vindicated: The Prelatical Church bounded. Written by SMECTYMNUUS. London, 1641, 4*to.* containing with the Appendix ninety-four pages. The word Smectymnuus is compoſed of the initial letters of its authors names, which were Stephen Marſhal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurſtow. This piece, which is certainly written with great fierceneſs of ſpirit, and much aſperity in language, contains eighteen ſections, in the laſt of which, the differences between the Prelatiſts and Puritans, are aggravated with great bitterneſs. Then follow ſixteen queries, the laſt of which runs thus. 'Whether, having proved, 'that God never ſet ſuch a government in his 'Church as our Epiſcopal government is, we may 'lawfully any longer be ſubject to it, be preſent at 'their courts, obey their injunctions, and eſpecially 'be inſtruments in publiſhing and executing their 'Excommunications and Abſolutions (10).' The book is ſhut up by an Appendix, wherein is contained an Hiſtorical Narration of thoſe bitter fruits, Pride, Rebellion, Treaſon, Unthankfulneſs, &c. which have iſſued from Epiſcopacy, while it hath ſtood under the continual influences of ſovereign goodneſs. The whole ends thus. 'The inhuman 'butcheries, blood-ſheddings, and cruelties of Gar-'diner, Bonner, and the reſt of the Biſhops in 'Queen Mary's days are ſo freſh in every man's 'memory, as that we conceive it a thing altogether 'unneceſſary to make mention of them. Only 'we fear leaſt the guilt of the blood then ſhed 'ſhould yet remain to be required at the hands of 'this nation, becauſe it hath not publickly endea-'voured to appeaſe the wrath of God, by a ſolemn 'and general humiliation for it. What the practices 'of the Prelates have been ever ſince, from the be-'ginning of Queen Elizabeth to this very day, 'would fill a volume like Ezekiel's roll, with la-'mentation, mourning, and woe to record. For it 'hath been their great deſign to hinder all further 'Reformation; to bring in doctrines of Popery, Ar-'minianiſm, and Libertiniſm; to maintain, pro-'pagate, and much increaſe the burden of human 'ceremonies; to keep out and beat down the preach-'ing of the word, to ſilence the faithful preachers 'of it, to oppoſe and perſecute the moſt zealous 'profeſſors, and to turn all religion into a pompous 'outſide: and to tread down the power of godli-'neſs. Inſomuch, as it is come to an ordinary pro-'verb, that when any thing is ſpoiled, we uſe to 'ſay, The Biſhop's foot is in it: And in all this, and 'much more which might be ſaid, fulfilling Biſhop 'Bonner's prophecy, who, when he ſaw, that in 'King Edward's Reformation, there was a reſerva-'tion of Ceremonies and Hierarchy, is credibly re-'ported to have uſed theſe words; Since they have 'begun to taſte our broth, it will not be long ere they 'will eat of our beef (11).' Dr. Joſeph Hall, Biſhop of Exeter, who wrote the Humble Remonſtrance, publiſhed a Vindication of it in anſwer to this book; and to this the Smectymneans replied. Now to ſhew the credit of this work, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that Dr. Wilkins, afterwards the famous Biſhop of Cheſter, in his Eccleſiaſtes, or a Diſcourſe concerning the Gift of Preaching, ſets down this as a capital work againſt Epiſcopacy (12). As ſuch it is mentioned by Dr. Calamy, in his Poſtſcript to the Preface of his Abridgment of Baxter's Life, in which Poſtſcript, he profeſſes to inſtruct the inquiſitive reader as to the books moſt proper to be read, in order to have a true notion of the merits of Nonconformity; and in the ſame light we find this work conſidered by Mr. Neal, in his Hiſtory of the Puritans (13).

(13) Vol. ii. p. 398.

[F] Has been differently cenſured.] Dr. Calamy gives this account of the matter. 'He was, ſays he, one 'of thoſe Divines, who, anno 1641, met by order 'of Parliament in the Jeruſalem Chamber, with ſe-'veral Biſhops and Doctors, in order to the accom-'modating Eccleſiaſtical matters; in which meeting, 'by mutual conceſſions, things were brought into a 'very

Assembly of Divines, though he is not mentioned in Fuller's catalogue (p), and distinguished himself therein, both by his learning and moderation. He likewise preached several times before the House of Commons, for which his memory has been very severely treated (q) [G]. He was at the same time one of the Cornhill Lecturers, and no man had a greater interest in the city of London, in consequence of his ministerial abilities, than he (r). He preached constantly in his own parish church for twenty years, not only to a numerous but most worthy audience, composed of the most eminent citizens, and even persons of great quality. He steadily and strenuously opposed the sectaries, and gave many pregnant instances of his dislike to those violences which were committed afterwards, on the King's being brought from the Isle of Wight (s). He opposed the beheading of his Sovereign King Charles I. with constancy and courage [H]. Under the usurpation of Cromwell, he was passive, and lived

'very hopeful posture; but the whole design was 'spoiled by the bringing into the House the bill 'against Bishops (14).' In this he agrees with the Church Historian, Fuller (15), and other writers of those times. What Archbishop Laud thought of this project may be gathered from this remark in his Diary. 'A Committee for Religion settled in the Upper 'House of Parliament. Ten Earls, ten Bishops, ten 'Barons. So the lay votes will be double to the 'Clergy. This Committee will meddle with doctrine 'as well as ceremonies, and will call some Divines to 'them to consider of the business, as appears by a 'letter hereto annexed, sent by the Lord Bishop of 'Lincoln to some Divines, to attend this service. 'Upon the whole matter, I believe this Committee 'will prove the national synod of England, to the 'great dishonour of the Church. And what else 'may follow upon it, God knows (16).' Dr. Heylyn gives us a farther account of this matter (17). 'Though a Convocation were at that time sitting, 'yet to increase the miseries of a falling Church, 'it is permitted, that a private meeting should be 'held in the Deanry of Westminster, to which some 'orthodox and conformable Divines were called, as a 'foil to the rest, which generally were of Presbyterian 'or Puritan principles. By them it was proposed, 'that many passages in the Liturgy should be ex-'punged, and others altered for the worse: That 'decency and reverence in officiating God's public 'service should be brought within the compass of 'innovations: That doctrinal Calvinism should be 'entertained in all parts of the Church; and all their 'sabbath speculations, though contrary to Calvin's 'judgment, superadded to it. But before any thing 'could be concluded in those weighty matters, the 'Commons set their bill on foot against root and 'branch, for putting down all Bishops and Cathedral 'Churches, which put a period to that meeting 'without doing any thing.'

[G] Very severely treated.] Mr. Archdeacon Echard, in his History of England, in giving our author's character, speaks thus, That he was so much an incendiary, and promoter of the rebellion and Scots invasion, that his actions cannot be vindicated (18). This gave such offence to his grandson, Dr. Edward Calamy, that he wrote and published a letter to the Archdeacon, wherein he observes, that our author was no Chaplain in the army; no enemy to a Liturgy, freed from passages liable to just objections; and was rather for reforming Episcopacy, according to Archbishop Usher's platform, than eradicating it. He then objects to what Mr. Echard says, as to our author's being a frequent Preacher before the House of Commons; for, says Dr. Calamy, there are but three sermons of his preached before that House. 'The first is intituled, 'England's Looking-Glass, on Jerem. xviii, 7, 8, 9, '10. preached on a solemn fast, December 22, 1641. 'Printed at London, in 4*to*. The design of which 'sermon is to shew, that national repentance will 'divert, and national sins draw down, national 'judgments. The second was intituled, God's free 'Mercy to England, on Ezek. xxxvi. 32. at a solemn 'fast, February 23, 1641. Printed at London 1642, 'in 4*to*. the intent of which is to represent England's 'mercies, as a motive and means of England's humi-'liation and reformation. His third was intituled, 'England's Antidote against the Plague of Civil War, 'on Acts xvii. 30. preached October 22, 1644; 'and printed at London 1645, in 4*to*.' These three sermons the Doctor farther affirms to be plain practical sermons; and adds that, 'Though there are 'some complaints intermingled of several hardships, 'which many worthy persons met with before this 'Parliament, and motions made for further rectify-'ing things that were amiss; yet there is nothing 'tending to inflame and widen the differences 'between King and Parliament: no pushing them 'on to rigour and severity; no inclination discovered 'to have the Constitution altered, or any of our 'foundations overthrown (19).' After producing this defence, it is but just to observe, that some passages have been taken notice of in these very sermons, which have been considered as exceptionable. As for instance. 'But now mark the doctrine; 'when God begins to build and plant, if that 'nation do evil, God will unbuild what he has 'built, and pluck up what he has planted, and 'repent of the good, &c. For you must know, that 'God repents as well of his mercies, as of his judg-'ments: when God made Saul King, and he proved 'stubborn and disobedient, he repented that he had 'made him King (20).' And again, in the following passage: 'If there be found any amongst you 'that drive on the designs of Oxford, and are found 'at Westminster only to betray their country, the 'Lord unmask such, and the Lord give them repent-'ing hearts: this is to build up houses with the 'blood of three kingdoms, this is to sell your souls 'for preferment; and it is just with God, that such 'not only lose their souls, but lose their preferments 'also, as Judas, that sold his master, hung him-'self (21).' And as to the Scots invasion, the reader may consider the following paragraph from Mr. Calamy's speech at Guildhall, October 6, 1643. 'If 'you would have a peace with Popery, a peace with 'slavery, if you would have a Judas peace, or a 'Joab his peace, you know the story. He kissed 'Amasa, and then killed him: If you would have a 'peace, that may bring a massacre with it, a French 'peace; if you would have such a peace, it may be 'had easily. But if you would have a peace that 'may continue the Gospel among you, such as the 'godly in the kingdom desire, I am confident such a 'peace cannot be had, without contributing towards 'bringing in the Scots (22).' Besides these, Anthony Wood mentions two other sermons, the first intituled, The Nobleman's Pattern of true and real Thankfulness, preached at a solemn Thanksgiving, June 15, 1643, on Joshua xxiv. 15. and printed the same year at London, in 4*to*. The second intituled, An Indictment against England, because of herself-murdering Divisions, preached before the House of Lords at their fast, December 25, (so that they fasted upon Christmas-day) 1644, on Matth. xii. 25. printed at London, in 1645, in 4*to* (23).

[H] With constancy and courage.] There is a famous paper often referred to, in order to shew the innocency of the Presbyterians, with respect to the beheading of the King, which is intituled, A serious and faithful Representation of the Judgments of Ministers of the Gospel within the Province of London, contained in a Letter from them to the General and his Council of War, delivered to his Excellency by some of the Subscribers, January 18, 1648. To this piece there are between forty and fifty subscribers, but the name of Mr. Calamy is not among them; the reason of which was, lived as privately as he could; yet he gave no reaſon to ſuſpect, that he was at all a well wiſher to that government (t) [I]. When the times afforded a favourable opportunity, he neglected not promoting the return of King Charles II. and actually preached before the Houſe of Commons on the day they voted that great queſtion (u), which, however, has not hindered ſome from ſuggeſting their ſuſpicions of his Loyalty [K]. After this ſtep was taken, he, Mr. Aſh, and other eminent Divines, were ſent over to compliment the King in Holland, by whom they were extremely well received (w). When his Majeſty was reſtored, Mr. Calamy retained ſtill a conſiderable ſhare in his favour, and in June 1660, was appointed one of his Chaplains in Ordinary, and was offered the Biſhoprick of Coventry and Litchfield, which he refuſed (x) [L]. When the Convocation came to be choſen, he and Mr. Baxter were elected, May 2, 1661, for London; but the Biſhop of that dioceſe having the power of chuſing two out of four, or four out of ſix, elected within a certain circuit, Dr. Sheldon, who was then Biſhop, was ſo kind as to excuſe both of them; which, perhaps, was owing to the ſhare they had in the Savoy Conference (y). After the miſcarrying of that deſign, Mr. Calamy made uſe of all his intereſt to procure the paſſing of an act agreeable to the King's declaration at Breda: but when this was fruſtrated, and the Act of Uniformity paſſed, he took a reſolution of ſuffering for his conſcience rather than ſuffer in it, and accordingly preached his farewel ſermon at Aldermanbury, Auguſt 17, 1662 (z). He made, however, a laſt effort three days afterwards, by preſenting a petition to his Majeſty to continue in the exerciſe of his miniſterial office. This petition was ſigned by many of the London Clergy, and Dr. Manton and Dr. Bates aſſiſted at the preſenting it, when Mr. Calamy made a long and moving ſpeech; but neither it nor the petition had any good effect, though the King expreſſed himſelf in favour of Toleration [M]. He remained in his pariſh, and came conſtantly to church, was, that this Repreſentation was drawn up to enforce what he and ſome other miniſters of the ſame perſuaſion had delivered in two conferences; the firſt, with the General and his Council; the ſecond, with the chief officers of the army, as the paper itſelf recites (24). This evidently ſhews, that whatever warm expreſſions might eſcape our author in his ſermons, he was undoubtedly loyal. Some indeed have affected to treat this paper, as a matter of no great ſignificancy: but Mr. Collier in his Church Hiſtory (25), after making a very faithful extract of it, ſays very honeſtly and fairly, that it was an inſtance of handſome plain dealing, and a bold reprimand of a victorious army.

[I] A well wiſher to that government.] The following ſtory, which Harry Neville, who was one of the Council of State, aſſerted of his own knowledge, is a full proof of this, and at the ſame time a very curious paſſage in itſelf. 'Cromwell having a deſign 'to ſet up himſelf, and bring the crown upon his 'own head, ſent for ſome of the chief city Divines, 'as if he made it a matter of conſcience to be deter-'mined by their advice. Among theſe was the 'leading Mr. Calamy, who very boldly oppoſed the 'project of Cromwell's ſingle government, and offered 'to prove it both unlawful and impracticable. 'Cromwell anſwered readily upon the firſt head of 'unlawful, and appealed to the ſafety of the nation 'being the ſupreme law: but, ſays he, pray Mr. 'Calamy, why impracticable? He replied; Oh it is 'againſt the voice of the nation, there will be nine 'in ten againſt you. Very well, ſays Cromwell; 'but what if I ſhould diſarm the nine, and put the 'ſword in the tenth man's hand, would not that do 'the buſineſs (26)?'

(26) See the Life of Cromwell, p. 133.

[K] Their ſuſpicions of his Loyalty.] Dr. Calamy in his letter to Archdeacon Echard, juſtified his grandfather's Loyalty very warmly: but in anſwer to that letter, it is aſſerted, that in 1659, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Baxter, and five or ſix more of the ſame character, made the following ſpeech, by one of their number to General Monk. 'I hear a report, Sir, 'that you have ſome thoughts of calling back the 'King. But it is my ſenſe, and the ſenſe of theſe 'gentlemen here with me, that it is a thing you 'ought not to do upon any terms: for prophaneneſs 'is ſo inſeparable from the royal party, that if ever 'you bring the King back, the power of godlineſs 'will moſt certainly depart from this land (27).' This is a little improbable in itſelf, and it muſt be owned, that there is no conſiderable authority to juſtify this ſtory. On the other hand, Mr. Baxter tells us, that the chief men who turned the General's reſolution to reſtore his Majeſty, were Mr. Clarges and Sir William Morris; the firſt his brother-in-law, the latter his kinſman, together with the petitions and affections of the city, principally moved by Mr. Calamy and Mr. Aſh, two ancient, leading, able Miniſters, with Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Dr. Jacomb, and other Miniſters of London, who concurred; and theſe were encouraged by the Earl of Mancheſter, the Lord Hollis, the Earl of Angleſey, and many of the then Council of State (28).

(28) Narrative of the moſt remarkable Paſſages of his Life and Times, Part ii. p. 214.

[L] Which he refuſed.] The account given us of this matter by his grandſon, is to this purpoſe. He refuſed a Biſhoprick, becauſe, he could not have it upon the terms of the King's declaration; but kept his temper and moderation after he was ejected. I have been credibly informed, that Biſhop Wilkins had ſuch an opinion of his inſight into the controverſy about Church-government, that he heartily wiſhed he could have conformed, that he might have confronted the bold and confident aſſertors of the Jus Divinum of Epiſcopacy in the Convocation, in which he was not allowed to ſit, tho' he was choſen one of the Clerks for the city (29). And yet the author of the Modern Pleas, &c. ſays, 'I have been credibly 'informed (not to ſay, that I am able to make it 'good) that Mr. Calamy did, before his Majeſty 'and diverſe Lords of the Council, profeſs, that 'there was not any thing in the Conſtitution of the 'Church, to which he could not conform, were it 'not for the ſcandalizing of others (30).' But Mr. Baxter anſwers, we muſt teſtify, ſome of us that were in his company, from firſt to laſt, we heard him over and over proteſt, That he took ſeveral things in Conformity to be intolerable ſins. And he wrote the Preface to our Reply; he may be judged of by that (31).

[M] In favour of Toleration.] The whole of this tranſaction does extraordinary honour to the memory of our author. In his ſpeech he intimated, that thoſe of his perſuaſion were ready to enter the liſt with any for their fidelity to his Majeſty, and did little expect to be dealt with as they had been; and they were now come to his Majeſty's feet, as the laſt application they ſhould make, &c. His Majeſty promiſed he would conſider of their buſineſs; and the very next day the matter was fully debated in Council, his Majeſty himſelf being preſent, who was pleaſed to declare, that he intended an indulgence, if it were at all feaſible. The great friends of the ſilenced Miniſters, church, though another was in the pulpit, which proved an occaſion of much trouble to him; for on December 28, 1662, the expected Preacher not coming in time, ſome of the principal perſons in the pariſh prevailed upon Mr. Calamy to ſupply his place, which, with ſome importunity, he did; but delivered himſelf with ſuch freedom, that he was ſoon after, by the Lord Mayor's warrant, committed to Newgate for his ſermon (a). But the caſe itſelf being thought hard, and ſome doubt ariſing how far the commitment was legal, his Majeſty in a few days diſcharged him (b). As this affair has made a great noiſe, and much has been ſaid on both ſides, we will give the reader an opportunity of informing himſelf with what degree of juſtice [N]. He lived to ſee London in aſhes, the ſight of which broke his heart. He was driven through the ruins in a coach to Enfield, and was ſo ſhocked at the diſmal appearance, that he could never wear off the impreſſion, but kept his chamber ever after, and died October 29, 1666, within two months after this accident happened (c). He was, though a very learned man, yet a plain and practical Preacher, and one who was not afraid to ſpeak his ſentiments freely of and to the greateſt men, and of this the reader will meet with

Miniſters, who had encouraged their hopes by a variety of ſpecious promiſes, were allowed, upon this occaſion, freely to ſuggeſt their reaſons againſt putting the act in execution, and they argued very ſtrenuouſly. But Dr. Sheldon, Biſhop of London, in a warm ſpeech, declared, That it was now too late to think of ſuſpending that law, for that he had already, in obedience to it, ejected ſuch of his Clergy as would not comply with it, on the Sunday before; and ſhould they now be reſtored, after they were thus exaſperated, he muſt expect to feel the effects of their reſentment, and ſhould never be able to maintain his epiſcopal authority among ſuch a Clergy, who would not fail to inſult him as their enemy, being countenanced by the Court; nor could the reſolutions of the Council-board juſtify his contempt of a law, which had paſſed with ſuch an unanimous conſent, and upon ſuch mature deliberation, of both Houſes: Should the ſacred authority of this law be now ſuſpended, it would render the Legiſlature ridiculous and contemptible; and if the importunity of ſuch diſaffected people were a ſufficient reaſon to humour them, neither the Church nor State would ever be free from diſtractions and convulſions. So that, upon the whole, it was carried, that no indulgence at all ſhould be granted (32). Dr. Samuel Parker, Biſhop of Oxford, has given us a farther account of this matter, which cannot be diſagreeable to the reader. 'By this ſeaſonable interpoſition, ſays his Lordſhip, 'the Biſhop freed the Church of England from theſe 'plagues for many years. For thus it happened 'luckily, happily, and proſperouſly, and, indeed, 'very providentially, that the Schiſmaticks entan-'gled themſelves in their ſchiſm by covenant and 'agreement, entering into a new aſſociation, being 'deceived by the large promiſes of the London 'Teachers, that they would not obey the law, and 'thence imagining that they ſhould defend them-'ſelves by their multitude. And whereas the 'Courtiers would have perſuaded the King, that 'there would be Preachers wanting in the city of 'London upon that Sunday, the very prudent 'Biſhop of that Dioceſe, who had computed the 'number of the faction, had ready at hand an equal 'number of orthodox Divines, and thoſe eloquent 'and learned, who, the ſign given, did, as it were, 'come out of ambuſh, and take poſſeſſion of the 'pulpits. And though from that time the Schiſ-'maticks tried all their art, that they might be re-'ceived again into the boſom of the Church, yet he 'guarded every paſs and avenue with ſuch diligence, 'that when they ſaw their attempts ſo often baffled, 'they at length ſat down, being no farther trouble-'ſome with their ſchiſm, than barely that they were 'Schiſmaticks as long as he lived (33).'

[N] With what degree of juſtice] The account given of this matter by Dr. Calamy runs thus. 'He 'was impriſoned in terrorem, for preaching occaſion-'ally after Bartholomew day; but ſoon releaſed, 'when it was ſeen what a reſort of perſons of all 'qualities there was to him in Newgate, and how 'generally the ſeverity was reſented. Our late 'Hiſtorian repreſents his preaching, at that time, as 'ſeditious. But it was purely occaſioned by a diſap-'pointment, as to the Preacher expected; and the 'diſcourſe, as I have been informed by thoſe that 'very well knew it to be true, was unpremeditated. 'That hard word, therefore, might have been ſpared. 'As circumſtances then were, there might well be a 'concern ſtirring for ſerious religion, which was in 'no ſmall danger. And had this author waved that 'reflection, his work would not have loſt any of its 'beauty (34).' This reflection of Biſhop Kennet's the reader will the better judge of when he ſees it in his own words. 'Had he taken a practical ſubject, 'and kept to it, no notice would have been taken of 'that one occaſional neceſſity, as it were, of preach-'ing. But it looked like a plot, or formed deſign, 'that he ſhould chuſe a ſubject of Eli's Concern for 'the Ark of God; and ſo applied the danger of the 'Church and Religion to the preſent times, that he 'could not be thought leſs a ſeditious, than a diſ-'abled Preacher (35).' It appears from hence, that it was not either the occaſion of his preaching, or the ſubject, ſtrictly ſpeaking, which induced the Biſhop to make uſe of ſo harſh a word, but the application. Now to judge of this, recourſe muſt be had to the ſermon, which has been printed, and therein two paſſages have been taken notice of as ſufficient to excuſe Biſhop Kennet's cenſure. The firſt paſſage is this: You have had, ſays Mr. Calamy, three famous ſucceſſors; Dr. Taylor for ſeven years, Dr. Stoughton for ſeven years, and myſelf, I have been with you almoſt four and twenty years, and may not God now unchurch you, by ſuffering you to want a faithful Miniſter to go in and out before you. This is one reaſon, upon which account I may ſafely ſay, the Ark of God is in danger; and Aldermanbury may truly fear the loſs of the Ark (36). The ſecond paſſage runs thus: I read that among the Romans, when any man was accuſed for his life, all his relations put on mourning apparel, and they followed him to his trial in mourning, thereby to ſhew their love to the party in danger. Now did you love the Goſpel, the Miniſters of the Goſpel, and the ordinances of Chriſt, you would all put on mourning, and lament for the Goſpel, the Ark of God, that is in danger; and becauſe you do not, it is a ſign you have no love for the Goſpel (37). But the thing did not end here; for as this commitment was ill taken on one ſide, ſo his diſcharge, by the King's expreſs command, was as warmly reſented by the other: For in the next ſeſſions of Parliament, complaint thereof was made in the Houſe of Commons; upon which it was ſignified to the Houſe, that his releaſe from impriſonment was not owing to the ſole command of the King, but to a deficiency in the act of Parliament, that had not fully provided for his longer reſtraint. Whereupon there was this entry made in their Journal. Die Jovis, Febr. 19, 1662. Upon complaint made to this Houſe, that Mr. Calamy being committed to priſon, upon breach of the act of Uniformity, was diſcharged upon pretence of ſome defect in the act:—Reſolved, That it be referred to a Committee to look into the Act of Uniformity, as to the matter in queſtion, and to ſee whether the ſame be defective, and wherein. And ſoon after a Committee was appointed, to bring in the reaſons of the Houſe for their advice to the King againſt a Toleration, with an addreſs to his Majeſty. And ſo an effectual door was opened to all the rigour and ſeverity that followed (38).

a remarkable inſtance in the notes [O]. His writings, though they were not numerous, are ſufficient to ſupport his reputation, and to make his abilities known to poſterity [P]. He was twice married. By his firſt wife he had a ſon and daughter; and by his ſecond ſeven children, ſome of whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention in ſucceeding articles.

[O] A remarkable inſtance in the notes.] Dr. Calamy tells us, that our author, at the time of the Reſtoration, had the greateſt intereſt in court, city, and country, of any of the Miniſters, and, therefore, was extremely careſſed at firſt; but he ſoon ſaw whither things were tending. Among other evidences of it, this is one: That having General Monk for his auditor in his own church, a little after the Reſtoration, on a ſacrament-day, he had occaſion to ſpeak of filthy lucre: 'And why, ſaid he, is it called 'filthy, but becauſe it makes men do baſe and filthy 'things? Some men, ſaid he, will betray three 'kingdoms for filthy lucre's ſake.' Saying which, he threw his handkerchief, which he uſually waved up and down while he was preaching, towards the General's pew (39).

[P] His abilities known to poſterity.] As we have already mentioned ſeveral pieces written by him, this note ſhall only ſerve as a ſupplement, and take in thoſe that we have had no opportunity to account for, viz. The great Danger of Covenant refuſing and Covenant-breaking, &c. preached before the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, Miniſters, &c. of London, on 2 Tim. iii. 3. printed at London 1646, in 4to. A Sermon to the native citizens of London, entituled, The City Remembrancer. A Farewel Sermon on 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. to his pariſh of St. Mary Aldermanbury, Aug. 17, 1662. And five Sermons, entituled, The Godly Man's Ark, or a City of Refuge in the Day of his Diſtreſs, the 8th edition of which was printed at London, 1683, in 12mo. He had a hand in drawing up the Vindication of the Preſbyterian Government and Miniſtry, printed at London 1650; and the Jus Divinum Miniſterii Evangelici Anglicani, printed in 1654. Since his death, there was a treatiſe of Meditation printed in a clandeſtine way, not by his ſon, nor from his manuſcript, but from ſome imperfect notes taken by an auditor. C.

 [We never read the famous book called Smectymnuus; controverſies of the kind to which it relates being now little attended to, and eſpecially thoſe controverſies that, in the earlier part of the laſt century, were carried on with ſo much bitterneſs of ſpirit. It was, however, a production of no ſmall importance in its day; and, if we may judge from the ſhort extract given of it in note E, it was drawn up in a ſtile of compoſition ſuperior to what was poſſeſſed by the Puritans in general, and, indeed, by many other Writers, at that period.

Mr. Beardmore, a pupil of Dr. Tillotſon's, who wrote ſome Memorials of that excellent Prelate, ſays, that Mr. Tillotſon told him, in the year 1661, that the good old man, Mr. Calamy, deliberated about the Biſhoprick offered him by King Charles the Second a conſiderable time, profeſſing to ſee the great inconvenience of the Preſbyterian parity of Miniſters (40).

(40) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 388.

Mr. Calamy's popularity was ſo great, that his impriſonment in Newgate made no ſmall noiſe. Dr. Wilde, a Nonconformiſt Poet of that period, publiſhed a Copy of Verſes upon the occaſion, which was ſpread through all parts of the kingdom. A certain Popiſh lady happening to paſs through the city during Mr. Calamy's confinement, found it difficult to get along Newgate-ſtreet, on account of the many coaches that attended there. Being ſurprized at this incident, curioſity led her to enquire into the occaſion of the ſtoppage, and the appearance of ſuch a number of coaches, in a place where ſhe thought nothing of that kind was to be expected. The ſtanders by, who ſeemed greatly concerned and diſturbed, informed her, that one Mr. Calamy, a perſon generally beloved and reſpected, was impriſoned there for a ſingle ſermon. This ſo ſtruck the lady, that ſhe took the firſt opportunity of waiting upon the King at Whitehall, and frankly told him the whole affair; expreſſing, at the ſame time, her apprehenſions, that, if ſuch ſteps were taken, his Majeſty would loſe the affections of the city, which might be attended with very ill effects. It was partly in conſequence of this repreſentation that Mr. Calamy was ſoon diſcharged from priſon, by the King's expreſs order (41).] K.

CALAMY (EDMUND) eldeſt ſon to the Reverend Mr. Edmund Calamy, of whom in the preceding article, was born at Sir Edmund's-Bury, in Suffolk, about the year 1635. In his junior years he was carefully inſtructed by his father, and when he had acquired a ſufficient fund of learning, he was transferred to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was entered of Sidney-College, March 28, 1651. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1654-5. Then he removed to Pembroke-Hall, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, in 1658 (a). He became afterwards Fellow of that College; and on April 20, 1659, was preſented to the living of Moreton in Eſſex, which he held till he was removed by the Act of Uniformity in 1662 (b) [A]. After his ejectment he retired to London, and kept a Meeting privately in his houſe in Aldermanbury. When King Charles II. publiſhed his declaration for Indulgence, he ſet up a public Meeting in Currier's Hall, near Cripplegate. But when the Diſſenters were again perſecuted, he had recourſe to his former method; and though he was very

[A] By the Act of Uniformity in 1662.] We have ſome very curious particulars in relation to this gentleman's acquiring, holding, and loſing this living. He was admitted to it by an inſtrument dated at Whitehall the 20th of April, 1659, ſetting forth, That he had been preſented to the rectory of Moreton, in the county of Eſſex, by the Right Honourable Edward Earl of Mancheſter, John Lord Roberts, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Bart. Anthony Tuckney, Doctor in Divinity, Maſter of St. John's College, in Cambridge, Simeon Aſh, Clerk, and Edmund Calamy, the elder, Clerk, Feoffees in truſt of Robert Earl of Warwick, deceaſed, the patron thereof, and that he had a teſtimonial of his holy life and good converſation: wherefore he was admitted as the legal incumbent by the Commiſſioners for approbation of public Preachers; which inſtrument is ſigned by Philip Nye, Regiſter, and ſealed with the common ſeal of the Board before-mentioned. He afterwards gave four bonds to the Protector Richard, for the payment of the firſt fruits and tenths, each bond for nine pounds, the firſt payable October 1, 1659, and the laſt April 1, 1661. He ſhewed his loyalty to King Charles II. by contributing freely to the bene volence in 1661, yet this did not hinder his being turned out, in the year following, for Nonconformity (1).

aſſiduous in his duty, yet he eſcaped impriſonment, notwithſtanding warrants were frequently out againſt him; but he had the misfortune, with ſeveral other of his brethren, to fall under a Crown-Office proſecution, which put him to a great deal of trouble and expence (c). As he was a perſon of much learning and unaffected piety, ſo he was very careful to avoid whatever might draw upon him the imputation of party. In the earlier part of life he declined taking the Covenant, and through the whole courſe of it ſhewed a ſpirit of moderation and charity agreeable to his calling. He was, though a Nonconformiſt, a man of very free notions, and one who never pretended to confine the Church of Chriſt within the bounds of any particular ſect. He had a great contempt for the goods of this world, and was ſuch a lover of obſcurity and retirement, that though he was a very able as well as painful Preacher, and was known to have done much good in the ſpace of three and twenty years that he exerciſed the Miniſtry in London, yet he would never be prevailed on to appear in print, but ſatisfied himſelf with the conſciouſneſs of having performed his duty (d). Having thus led a private and peaceable, though not a quiet life, he exchanged it for a better in the month of May 1685, being taken off by a conſumption. He left behind him a ſon and four daughters (e).

CALAMY (BENJAMIN) an eminent Divine of the Church of England, in the XVIIth Century. He was the ſon of the famous Mr. Edmund Calamy, Miniſter of Aldermanbury before-mentioned, by a ſecond wife, and received the firſt tincture of learning at St. Paul's School, from whence he was ſent, when very young, to the Univerſity of Cambridge, and there entered of Catherine-Hall. In the year 1664-5, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; in 1668, that of Maſter of Arts, and became alſo Fellow of that Hall, and a very eminent Tutor there. April 25, 1677, he was choſen in the room of Dr. Simon Ford, Miniſter of St. Mary Aldermanbury; and ſoon after appointed one of his Majeſty's Chaplains in Ordinary. In 1680, he took his degree of Doctor in Divinity (a). In 1683, he preached in that church his famous ſermon, which he afterwards publiſhed under the title of, A Diſcourſe about a ſcrupulous Conſcience, of which we may truly ſay, that never any piece of its kind or ſize, gained more credit to its author, or was more taken notice of by the public (b) [A]. This ſermon

(a) From the University Regiſter.

[A] More taken notice of by the public.] This ſermon is in every reſpect very extraordinary. In the title page, we have this motto from a piece of Mr. Baxter's. 'Conſider this, it is the judgment of ſome, 'that thouſands are gone to hell, and ten thouſands 'upon their march thither, that in all probability 'had never come there, if they had not been tempted 'from the pariſh churches, for the enjoyment of 'communion in a purer Church (1).' It was dedicated to Sir George Jefferies, Knight and Baronet, Chief Juſtice of Cheſter, afterwards Lord Jefferies and High-Chancellor of England. And in this dedication there are ſome very ſingular paſſages. In the firſt place, he acknowledges Sir George for his patron, and profeſſes, that it was by his intereſt and favour he was placed in this pariſh. He then proceeds thus. 'Upon how many this plain, homely 'diſcourſe may have good effect, I cannot gueſs: 'how many it will anger and diſpleaſe, I am not at 'all concerned: and though I may be thought by 'ſome ill adviſed, in publiſhing ſuch a ſermon, yet 'every one will commend and juſtify my diſcretion 'in prefixing your name before it; for ſo great an 'awe have the enemies of our Church and government of your Loyalty and fidelity to both, of 'your undaunted zeal and activity for both, that 'they will not dare loudly to condemn what you are 'pleaſed to protect. They will be juſtly afraid of 'quarrelling with me, when they know I have engaged you on my ſide. I am very ſenſible, that in 'the age we live, ſome are ſo extraordinary wiſe and 'wary, as to cenſure and diſcourage all men that 'ſpeak roundly and act vigorouſly for the King and 'Church, as being more forward and buſy than is 'needful; but I am alſo as ſenſible, that if ſome 'men had not ſhewn more courage and honeſty than 'thoſe prudent perſons, both would have been by 'this time in far greater danger, than at this preſent, thanks be to God, they are. For my own 'part no one is more favourable to a truly tender 'conſcience than myſelf, let it be as nice and ſcrupulous as it can well, ſo it be about the ſubſtantial 'matters of piety towards God, juſtice between man 'and man, due obedience to ſuperiors, and when 'it makes us more exactly careful of our undoubted 'duty in all inſtances: but when men are ſcrupulous 'only on one ſide, about things commanded by lawful authority, and make no ſcruple of diſobedience, 'ſchiſm, faction, and diviſion; when men ſet up 'their private humour, fancy, or opinion, in oppoſition to eſtabliſhed laws; when they become peeviſh, 'pragmatical, and ungovernable; nay, when men's 'conſciences prove ſo generally tender and ſcrupulous, as to doubt of and ſuſpect the rights of the 'Crown (for that conſcience that is ſo tender againſt 'the Church, is alſo uſually as tender againſt the 'King) ſuch wayward, ſkittiſh conſciences ought to 'be well bridled and reſtrained, or elſe they will be 'not only intolerably troubleſome, but extreamly 'miſchievous, both to Church and State.' The ſermon itſelf is very warm in the cauſe of Conformity, and, perhaps, there never were more arguments uſed, or thoſe better proſecuted, than we meet in this diſcourſe. At the end of it, we find the following quotation, from a book of his father's, to ſhew, that ſuch as were Nonconformiſts then, were zealous for Conformity, when themſelves were in poſſeſſion of the churches: the paſſage is this. 'Take heed of 'ſeparating from the public aſſemblies of the Saints. 'I have found by experience, that all our Church 'calamities have ſprung from this root. He that 'ſeparates from the public worſhip, is like a man 'tumbling down a hill, and never leaving till he 'comes to the bottom of it. I could relate many 'ſad ſtories of perſons profeſſing godlineſs, who out 'of diſlike to our Church-meetings, began at firſt 'to ſeparate from them, and after many changes and 'alterations, are turned, ſome of them Anabaptiſts, 'ſome Quakers, ſome Ranters, ſome direct Atheiſts. 'But I forbear: you muſt hold communion with all 'thoſe Churches with which Chriſt holds communion. 'You muſt ſeparate from the ſins of Chriſtians, but 'not from the ordinances of Chriſt. Take heed of 'unchurching the Churches of Chriſt, leſt you prove 'Schiſmatics inſtead of being true Chriſtians (2).' Whoever peruſes this diſcourſe, and conſiders the time ſermon he preached a ſecond time at Bow Church with great effect, and this excited a zealous Nonconformiſt, one Mr. Thomas De Laune, who had been formerly a ſchool-maſter, to write againſt it; which he did in ſuch a manner as drew upon him a fatal impriſonment, which he endeavoured by all means to aſcribe to Dr. Calamy, though his complaints on this head had little or no foundation (c) [B]. In 1683, Dr. Calamy was admitted to the Vicarage of St. Lawrence Jewry, with St. Mary Magdalen Milk-ſtreet annexed, to which he was collated by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, in the room of Dr. Benjamin Whichcot. June 18, 1685, he was, on the deceaſe of Dr. John Wells, inſtalled into the Prebend of Harleſton, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul (d). Theſe preferments are abundant proofs of his merit, and of his great intereſt in the city of London, which he maintained not by attaching himſelf to any party, but by living in great intimacy with the beſt men of all parties. He was particularly acquainted with Alderman Corniſh, who was his pariſhioner, and for whom he had ſo great a reſpect, that he gave teſtimony in his favour when he was tried for High-Treaſon, October 16, 1685, which was no ordinary mark of friendſhip in thoſe times (e) [C]. It is thought, that a ſenſe of public calamities had a great ſhare in time in which it was publiſhed, and the nature of theſe arguments from their own writers, will eaſily diſcern the cauſes of that ſpirit which was raiſed againſt Dr. Calamy, on account of his preaching it: a ſpirit, perhaps, that nothing could have overcome but the innocency of his life, his readineſs to converſe with the worthieſt men of all parties, and his willingneſs to do good to ſuch as differed from him in opinion.

[B] Had little or no foundation.] The title of this book runs thus, De Laune's Plea for the Nonconformiſts; ſhewing the true State of their Caſe, and how far the Conformiſt's Separation from the Church of Rome, for their Popiſh Superſtitions, &c. introduced into the Service of God, juſtifies the Nonconformiſt's Separation from them for the ſame. In a Letter to Dr. Benjamin Calamy, upon the Sermon called, Scrupulous Conſcience, inviting hereto. To which is added, A PARALLEL SCHEME OF THE PAGAN, PAPAL, AND CHRISTIAN RITES AND CEREMONIES. To this there is added, another piece, intituled, A Narrative of the Tryal and Sufferings of Thomas De Laune, for writing, printing, and publiſhing a late book called, A Plea for the Nonconformiſts, with ſome modeſt Reflections thereon. Directed to Dr. Calamy; in obedience to whoſe Call that work was undertaken. By Thomas De Laune. Printed for the Author 1683. In this warm book, the author takes it all along for granted, that Dr. Calamy's printing his ſermon, was a challenge to the Nonconformiſts in general, and to every man who thought himſelf able to defend Nonconformity in particular, though there is certainly nothing in the ſermon which can warrant ſuch an opinion. The book is written too in very fierce language, and a high charge of idolatry is brought againſt the Church. After the letter, follows another ſhort treatiſe, bearing the title of, The Image of the Beaſt; ſhewing by a parallel or ſcheme, what a Conformiſt the Church of Rome is to the Pagan, and what a Nonconformiſt to the Chriſtian Church, in its Rites, Service, and Ceremonies, the better to exemplify the true and falſe Church. By T. D. For the publiſhing this book, he was taken into cuſtody, on November 29, 1683, and the next day committed to Newgate by a warrant from Sir Thomas Jenner, then Recorder of London. After his commitment, he wrote a long letter to Dr. Calamy, wherein, after having often told him, that he wrote in obedience to his call, and that he was impriſoned entirely on his account, he concludes thus. 'As truth ſeeks no corners, nor ſuborners, and as 'real beauty will not be beholden to the artificial 'dawbings of a pencil; ſo the Chriſtian Religion '(where profeſſed in its naked ſimplicity) needs no 'other argument to beget proſelytes, than its own 'lovely and illuſtrious features, altogether plain, 'honeſt, and every way amiable, void of all mere-'tricious gawdery, or that majeſtical pomp, which 'pleaſes only the external ſenſe. I have no malig-'nity againſt any perſon whatſoever, much leſs 'againſt your Church, or any of its members: all 'I deſire is, that ſcrupulous conſciences, who trouble 'not the peace of the nation, ſhould be dealt withal '(at leaſt) as weak brethren, according to Rom. 'xiv. 1. and not ruined by penalties, for not ſwal-'lowing what is impoſed under the notion of de-'cency and order, though excentric to the ſcheme 'we have of it in our only rule of faith. Sir, I 'entreat you to excuſe this trouble from a ſtranger, 'who would fain be convinced by ſomething more 'like Divinity than Newgate, where any meſſage 'from you ſhall be welcome to your humble ſer-'vant, T. D. (3).' To this epiſtle, Mr. De Laune tells us, Dr. Calamy anſwered, if he has been impriſoned on account of anſwering my book, I will do him any ſervice that becomes me. Some other letters he ſent him, to pretty near the ſame purpoſe, which did not hinder his being tried at the Old Baily for a Libel, on the 16th of January following, and upon conviction he was fined one hundred marks, ordered to find ſecurity for a year, and his book to be burnt before the Royal Exchange. By this fatal ſentence, himſelf, his wife, and children periſhed in Newgate, no body caring to lay down ſeventy-five pounds for him, though he was a man of much knowledge and learning (4). His ſufferings gave very great concern to Dr. Calamy, who was a man of much humanity, and he did all he could to ſerve him; but it not appearing that his book was more an anſwer to Dr. Calamy than to Dr. Stillingfleet, or any other writer in defence of Conformity, and as the Doctor's words were ſtrangely wreſted and abuſed in his Narrative, Dr. Calamy's charitable applications, which were hearty and frequent, had the leſs weight.

[C] No ordinary mark of friendſhip in thoſe times.] The caſe of Alderman Corniſh is very well known, and the violence with which he was treated even at his trial. He thought it neceſſary there to prove his being a Churchman, and not an Occaſional Conformiſt. With this view he would have called Dr. Sharp, then Dean of Norwich, or Dr. Tillotſon, then Dean of Canterbury, but neither thought proper to appear; he had then recourſe to Dr. Calamy. The circumſtances of the thing are very remarkable, and therefore we will inſert the whole paſſage as it ſtands in the printed trial.

'Mr. Corniſh. My Lord, I deſire I may have the 'Miniſter of the pariſh, Dr. Calamy, for my con-'ſtancy at my pariſh-church, and receiving the Sa-'crament, according to the rites of the Church of 'England; that I am, to all appearance, a perſon 'that does as well affect the government as any man. 'L. C. J. Jones. I doubt you are all appearance. 'Dr. Calamy. My knowledge of Mr. Corniſh hath 'been ſince I came to be Miniſter of the pariſh, 'which is about two years; a little above two years: 'whenever he was in town he did uſe to come to 'church as conſtantly as any one, and come with 'his family to prayers, and did come to the Sacra-'ment; and he did not only come at Eaſter, to ſave 'himſelf from a preſentment, but at our monthly 'communion; and ſince I have been Miniſter of the 'place, I have often converſed with him: All that 'I can ſay, is, that I never heard him ſay a diſre-'ſpectful word of the government. L. C. J. Jones. I 'hope in bringing his laſt illneſs upon our author, who fell into a declining ſtate in the autumn of the year laſt mentioned, and died of a pleuritic fever in the month of January 1686. He was a man equally valuable for the abilities which he poſſeſſed, and the uſes to which he applied them. He was a ſincere ſon of the Church of England, and very intent on gaining over Diſſenters of all ſorts to her communion; but withal he had an extenſive charity, and a juſt averſion to perſecution. He was heartily loyal, but without bitterneſs or paſſion; and his loyalty occaſioned his grief, when he ſaw thoſe ſteps taken which could end in nothing but public confuſion. His own virtues, however, exempted him in a great meaſure from envy and ſcandal, even in the worſt of times; inſomuch, that the greateſt men of all ſects and all parties amongſt us, readily joined in paying a juſt tribute of praiſe to his memory (f) [D]. Though few in his ſituation were either better or more frequent Preachers, yet he left behind him very little in print. Some ſermons of his were after his deceaſe publiſhed by his brother, which ſerved only to raiſe a greater regret in the world for the loſs of ſo worthy a perſon, and of ſo many of his excellent performances as were buried in oblivion. His ſermons are ſtill valued as well for the beauty of their language as the excellent ſentiments contained in them [E].

'hope he took you to be a man of another kidney?
'Dr. Calamy. I marked his words, becauſe of the 'character I had heard of him. Mr. Att. Gen. Pray
'what was the character he had before thoſe two 'years? Dr. Calamy. That was what was pub-
'lick (5).' The Chief Juſtice, in ſumming up this part of the evidence, obſerved to the Jury, that Mr. Corniſh laid great ſtreſs on his being a Churchman, of which he had given no evidence beyond two years, which being ſince the trial of the Lord Ruſſel, it was to be preſumed he took up this character as a thing neceſſary then to purge off ſuſpicions. Mr. Corniſh objected to this, that he had been a conſtant Churchman for ſeven years, but that Dr. Calamy could ſpeak only ſince the time of his coming into the pariſh, his predeceſſor, Dr. Whichcot, being dead. After Mr. Corniſh received ſentence of death, Dr. Calamy viſited him in Newgate, but excuſed himſelf from attending him at the place of execution, by ſaying plainly, that, He could as well die with him, as behold his death in ſuch circumſtances. Dr. Calamy forbore not uſing all the intereſt he had to ſave him, to the very laſt, and upon this occaſion it is reported, that Sir George Jefferies ſhould have given him this anſwer: Dear Doctor, ſet your heart at reſt, and give yourſelf no further trouble, for I can aſſure you, that if you could offer a mine of gold as deep as the Monument is high, and a bunch of pearls as big as the flames at the top of it, it would not purchaſe his life (6).

[D] A juſt tribute of praiſe to his memory.] His Funeral Sermon was preached by Dr. William Sherlock, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, January 7, 1685-6. In this ſermon the Doctor tells us that, 'when a prevailing faction threatened both Church 'and State, and the fears of Popery were thought a 'ſufficient juſtification of the moſt illegal and irre-
'ligious methods to keep it out; when it was ſcan-
'dalous to ſpeak a word either for the King or the 'Church; when cunning men were ſilent; and 'thoſe, who affected popularity, ſwam with the 'ſtream; then this great and good man durſt reform
'Schiſm and Faction; durſt teach men to conform 'to the Church, and to obey and honour the King;
'durſt vindicate the deſpiſed Church of England,
'and the hated doctrine of Paſſive Obedience, though
'one was thought to favour Popery, and the other
'to introduce ſlavery. But he was above the power'ful charms of names, and liked truth never the 'worſe becauſe it was miſcalled. His public ſer-
'mons preached in thoſe days, and printed by 'public authority, are laſting proofs of this; and
'yet he was no Papiſt neither, but durſt reprove
'the errors of Popery, when ſome others, who 'made the greateſt noiſe and outcry about it, grew
'wiſe and cautious. This was like a truly honeſt
'and faithful ſervant, to oppoſe the growing diſ-
'tempers of the age, without any regard either to 'unjuſt cenſures, or apparent danger (7). And yet
'he did not needleſly provoke any man: he gave
'no hard words, but thought it ſevere enough to
'confute mens errors, without upbraiding or re-
'proaching their perſons. His converſation was 'courteous and affable to all men; ſoft and eaſy,
'as his principles were ſtubborn. He could yield
'any thing but the truth, and bear with any thing
'but the vices of men. He would, indeed, have 'been the wonder of his age, had he not lived in 'ſuch an age, as, thanks be to God, can ſhew many
'ſuch wonders; and yet, in ſuch an age as this,
'he made an illuſtrious figure. Though he had his 'equals, he had not many ſuperiors (8). Thus he 'lived, and thus this good man died, for thus was
'he found doing when his Lord came.' Dr. Baſil Kennet, in his Preface to the Tranſlation of the Critical Works of M. Rapin, gives us, at once, a fine panegyric on our author and Dean Sherlock. He is ſpeaking there of the eloquence of the Engliſh pulpit, which leads him to this obſervation. 'As
'this age applauds the unexhauſted ſtore of things
'and words in Dr. Barrow, the next will acknow'ledge that one of his learned ſucceſſors began the 'reputation of Mr. Boyle's Lecture. The refined 'thought, and choice manner, which we admire in
'the writings of the late Dean of Sarum, thoſe who 'come after us will affirm to have been continued in 'other ornaments of the ſame Church. Nor will
'the reſpect which is ſo juſtly paid to the clear vein
'of argument, and excellent ſpirit of Dr. Calamy,
'be denied to the natural perſuaſiveneſs, the eaſy
'and popular reaſon, of the friend who performed
'the good office at his funeral.' The celebrated Mr. Anthony Wood ſtyles Dr. Calamy a loyal perſon, an excellent preacher, and a zealous man for the Church of England (9). Archdeacon Echard ſpeaks of him thus: 'His ſermons ſeem to have been com-
'poſed for the generality of mankind, in which 'there is both ſtrength and perſpicuity, and diſco'ver a genius able to penetrate into the ſecret re-
'ceſſes of human nature, for which he was particu'larly obſerved by King Charles's Court, when he 'preached at Newmarket. Wherefore it is a pity 'that we have no more of them in print (10).' Biſhop Burnet reckons him with Teniſon, Sharpe, Patrick, Sherlock, Fowler, Scot, Clagget, Cudworth, Williams, and many others, of whom he ſays, that 'though he knew them not ſo particularly as to 'give all their characters, yet they deſerved a 'high one, and were, indeed, an honour both to 'the Church, and to the age in which they liv'ed (11).' In the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience we find a great variety of paſſages from his ſermons (12); and as that book is compoſed chiefly from the works of our moſt eminent Divines, it proves him to be ſuch in the opinion of its compilers.

CALAMY (JAMES), ſon to Edmund Calamy, B. D. before-mentioned, by a ſecond wife, and younger brother to Dr. Benjamin Calamy, of whom in the preceding article. He was educated at Catherine-Hall, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where, in 1672, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in 1676, that of Maſter (a). Having received holy Orders, and being highly conſidered on account of his father's reputation, he was preſented to the Rectory of Northill, in Bedfordſhire, where he continued till the year 1707, when he was preſented by his intimate friend, Dr. Blackall, Biſhop of Exeter, to that of Cheriton-Biſhops in Devonſhire; and had at the ſame time a Prebend in the Church of Exeter beſtowed on him. He was a man of great learning, but much greater modeſty, which is the reaſon that he left nothing behind him in print, except his Dedication of his brother's ſermons. He led a ſingle life, and on December 14, 1714, was ſurprized by a ſudden death (b). C.

CALAMY (EDMUND), a very eminent divine among the Nonconformiſts, grandſon to Mr. Edmund Calamy, Miniſter of Aldermanbury, by his eldeſt ſon, Mr. Edmund Calamy, Miniſter of Moreton in Eſſex (a). He was born at his father's houſe in Aldermanbury, April 5, 1671, and after acquiring a competent portion of learning in ſeveral private ſchools, and at Merchant-Taylors, under the celebrated Mr. Hartcliffe, he removed to a private Academy at Wickham-Brook in Suffolk. There he was under the tuition of Mr. Samuel Cradock, a very eminent and worthy perſon, who had been Fellow of Emanuel College in Cambridge, and by whoſe aſſiſtance Mr. Calamy went through a courſe of Logic, Natural Philoſophy, and Metaphyſics (b). He ſtudied with ſuch diligence as to merit particular marks of favour from Mr. Cradock, as before from Mr. Hartcliffe; and by his natural ſweetneſs of temper, and great candour in converſation, he eſtabliſhed ſuch friendſhips with his contemporaries, as were both uſeful and honourable to him in the ſucceeding part of his life (c) [A]. In March 1688, being juſt turned of ſeventeen, he went over to the Univerſity of Utrecht, where he ſtudied Philoſophy under De Vries, Civil Law under Vander Muyden, both celebrated Profeſſors, and attended the Lectures of the moſt learned Grævius, upon Sophocles and Puffendorf's Introduction. Here Mr. Calamy purſued his ſtudies with ſtill greater diligence than before, making it a rule to ſpend one whole night in a week amongſt his books (d). His application and proficiency recommended him to the favour of all who knew him there, and eſpecially to the notice and friendſhip of two of his countrymen, who came afterwards to fill very high ſtations, both in Church and

A Thankſgiving-ſermon, on Eccleſ. x. 20. There was a volume of poſthumous Sermons, in number thirteen, publiſhed by his brother, of whom we are to ſpeak in the next article, with his Funeral Sermon, by Dr. Sherlock, prefixed. This volume has run through many editions, and at this day continues to be read and admired.

 [It is evident from Dr. Benjamin Calamy's Dedication to Sir George Jefferies, that the Doctor was not only a warm ſon of the Church of England, but that he did not underſtand the principles of Toleration. The language he uſes, of pretending to be favourable to truly tender conſciences, provided they do not go certain lengths, is the language of all bigots. Neither do his compliments to Sir George Jefferies reflect any great credit upon our author: for, though Sir George had not then been guilty of thoſe enormous actions, which afterwards rendered his character ſo eminently diſgraceful, he had always ſhewn himſelf to be a violent and unworthy man. The advantage which Dr. Calamy took of his father's reaſoning was fair enough, as an argumentum ad homines. The Preſbyterians, when in power, uſed the ſame intolerant language, which, before and afterwards, was done by ſome members of the eſtabliſhed Church.

Though Mr. De Laune was, in certain reſpects, a warm man, what he wrote to Dr. Calamy ſhews him to have had ſome degree of temper; and his requeſt was undoubtedly reaſonable. That himſelf, his wife, and his children, (if the fact be ſtrictly true) ſhould periſh in Newgate, for want of ſeventy-five pounds, is not only a diſgrace to the general ſpirit of the times, but caſts peculiar diſhonour on the Nonconformiſts of that period. Though there was probably ſomething in his diſpoſition which occaſioned his having but few friends, a man of his knowledge, learning, and integrity, ought not to have been ſo fatally neglected. Perhaps the only apology which can be made for the Diſſenters of King Charles the Second's reign is, that whilſt ſo many of their miniſters were in a perſecuted ſtate, it was impoſſible for every caſe of diſtreſs to be duly regarded.

Dr. Edmund Calamy (13) gives a good character of his uncle Benjamin, and repreſents him as having behaved with great reſpect and kindneſs to his brother and nephew, notwithſtanding the difference of their opinions. From the ſame authority we learn, that Dr. Benjamin Calamy became more moderate in his ſentiments, towards the cloſe of his life.] K.

(13) In a Manuſcript.

[A] In the ſucceeding part of his life.] At Merchant-Taylors ſchool he entered into a cloſe friendſhip with Mr. Dawes (1), afterwards Sir William Dawes, and Archbiſhop of York; as alſo with Mr. Hugh Boulter, afterwards Primate of Ireland, and a moſt worthy perſon. At Wickham-Brook he became acquainted with Mr. Timothy Godwin, one eminent in all kinds of learning, but eſpecially for his knowledge of the Greek tongue. At that time Mr. Godwin was deſigned for the ſtudy of Phyſic; but his inclinations took afterwards another turn, and he applied himſelf ſo happily to Divinity, that he roſe by degrees to the Archbiſhopric of Caſhel. With theſe great men Mr. Calamy ever after maintained his friendſhip as long as he, and they, lived; which is a very full proof of his merit, as the contracting ſuch acquaintances is a high inſtance of his penetration and judgment. A perſon of leſs ſagacity would not have diſcovered theſe ſeeds of worth in them; and a man of leſs honour or integrity would have forfeited their eſteem, eſpecially if the wide difference in their opinions be conſidered.

State.

State [B]. By degrees his abilities gained him ſo great reputation, that the famous Mr. William Carſtairs, Principal of the College of Edinburgh, invited him to accept of a Profeſſor's chair in that kingdom, having himſelf been ſent over to Holland on purpoſe to find a perſon qualified for ſuch an office. But Mr. Calamy declined this offer, and ſoon after returned into England (e). On his arrival, he went firſt to Oxford, carrying with him, letters from Profeſſor Grævius to Dr. Pocock, Regius Profeſſor of Hebrew, and to Dr. Edward Bernard, Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in that Univerſity. Theſe worthy perſons received him with great civility, and obtained leave for him to proſecute his ſtudies in the Bodleian library. He made the utmoſt uſe of this and all the other advantages he enjoyed at Oxford, particularly the improving converſation of the moſt learned Mr. Henry Dodwell, with whom he was intimately acquainted (f). Mr. Calamy had by this time determined to apply himſelf particularly to Divinity, which he did with great ſteadineſs and induſtry. After ſtudying the Scriptures thoroughly, and acquiring conſiderable knowledge in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and the works of the primitive Fathers, he began to enquire into later controverſies, particularly, that between the Church of England and the Nonconformiſts; and after a long and ſober examination of what had been written on both ſides, he reſolved to join himſelf to the latter. In conſequence of this choice, he preached ſometimes in Oxford, and more frequently in the adjacent villages, till in the year 1692, he was invited to aſſiſt Mr. Matthew Sylveſter at his Meeting-houſe in Black-Friars (g). There he continued to preach two years before he received Preſbyterian Ordination. At length, on June 22, 1694, he was ordained at Dr. Anneſley's Meeting-houſe in Little St. Helen's (h). He was ſoon after invited to become aſſiſtant to Mr. Daniel Williams in Hand-alley. October 20, 1702, he was appointed one of the Lecturers at Salter's-Hall; and in 1703, he was choſen to ſucceed Mr. Vincent Alſop, as Paſtor of a great congregation in Weſtminſter (i). He had recommended himſelf in a very particular manner to the whole Diſſenting intereſt, firſt by the care he had taken in publiſhing Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times, and then in making a very uſeful Abridgment of it, which he afterwards improved into a much larger and more valuable work [C]. This, however, expoſed him to ſome attacks, in which his book was treated with great marks of deference and reſpect. In his anſwers, Mr. Calamy ſhewed the higheſt regard to decency, and to the dignity of his ſubject, ſo that very few diſputes of this nature have been managed with greater clearneſs and ſtrength of argument, or with leſs offence [D]. With theſe he maintained his friendſhip as long as they lived (2).

[C] A much larger and more valuable work.] The Hiſtory of this celebrated performance runs thus. In 1696, it was thought proper to put to the preſs Mr. Baxter's Narrative of the moſt memorable paſſages of his Life and Times, a large folio; to render which more uſeful, our author drew up the Table of Contents, made ſome remarks on the work itſelf, and added to it an Index. This led him to reflect ſeriouſly on the authority and uſefulneſs of the book; and to ſee the expediency of continuing it; for Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory came no lower than 1684. Upon this plan Mr. Calamy, with great induſtry and labour, compoſed the piece of which we are now ſpeaking, and publiſhed it under the following title; An Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his Life and Times. With an Account of many others of thoſe worthy Miniſters who were ejected after the Reſtoration of King Charles II. Their Apology for themſelves and their Adherents; containing the Grounds of their Nonconformity and Practice, as to ſtated and occaſional Communion with the Church of England; and a Continuation of their Hiſtory till the year 1691. By Edmund Calamy, Edm. Fil. & Nepos. London 1702, 8vo. This work made a great noiſe in the world, and as it gave offence to ſome, ſo it gave great ſatisfaction to others, inſomuch that, as its author tells us, he received thanks for it from ſeveral quarters, and ſuch notices and helps towards compleating his deſign, that he had quickly materials enough for a ſecond edition, which he afterwards publiſhed, and in the Preface thereto, gives us the following account of the alterations and additions. 'In this ſecond edition, beſides ſeveral not 'inconſiderable marginal additions all along by way 'of confirmation and elucidation; and an account 'of ſeveral controverſial writings on both ſides, in'ſerted in their proper places, and remarks on thoſe 'paſſages in the third volume of the Complete Hiſtory 'of England, in folio, which unkindly reflect on 'the perſons, or cauſe, of the Nonconformiſts, there 'is a continuation of the Hiſtory through King William's reign, and Queen Anne's, down to the paſſing the Occaſional Bill the laſt year. Theſe additions make up a full third part of the preſent 'volume. They contain, among other things, 'ſome account of the conceſſions of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners in 1689; the carriage of the 'Diſſenters after their liberty, their differences 'among themſelves, and their treatment from their 'brethren of the Church of England: The whole 'controverſy about Occaſional Conformity: The differences of thoſe of the eſtabliſhed Church among 'themſelves, about the nature, power, and privileges of convocations, &c. with a faithful repreſentation of the ſubſtance of ſeveral treatiſes about 'Toleration, Church-power, Liberty, and divers Eccleſiaſtical Matters, that were publiſhed from 1688 'to 1711. And, in the cloſe, I have ſubjoined 'the Reformed Liturgy, which was drawn up and 'preſented to the Biſhops in 1661; that the world 'may judge how fairly the ejected miniſters have 'been often repreſented as irreconcileable enemies 'to all Liturgies.' This edition he publiſhed in 1713, in two volumes 8vo. and dedicated it to the then Duke of Devonſhire, to whom, when Marquis of Hartington, he had dedicated the firſt edition.

[D] Or with leſs offence.] 'Mr. Ollyffe in 1703, 'publiſhed his Defence of Miniſterial Conformity to the 'Church of England, in anſwer to the Miſrepreſentations of the Terms thereof, by Mr. Calamy, in the

His reputation being much increaſed by the ſkill and learning he had ſhewn in this diſpute, he was invited into Scotland, whither he went in 1709, and was entertained wherever he came with the higheſt marks of reſpect, and had the dignity of Doctor in Divinity conferred on him by the Univerſities of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glaſgow (k). In 1718, he wrote a Vindication of his grandfather, and ſeveral other worthy perſons, againſt the reflections thrown upon them by Mr. Archdeacon Echard, in his Hiſtory (l) [E]. In 1728, he completed his great deſign of preſerving the Hiſtory of ſuch Miniſters, Lecturers, Maſters, and Fellows of Colleges, &c. as were ejected and ſilenced after the Reſtoration: a work of prodigious induſtry and labour, and which is alone ſufficient to tranſmit his memory with honour to poſterity, as it has ſupplied the learned world with a noble collection of memoirs, which otherwiſe in all probability had been diſſipated and loſt (m) [F]. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by many other learned and uſeful

To this piece our author drew up a Reply, both as to the argumentative and hiſtorical part of it, but forbore printing it, as himſelf tells us (3), that he might not give his antagoniſt any diſturbance in the purſuit of that political conteſt, in which he was ſo happily engaged, and ſo much to the ſatisfaction of the true lovers of his country.

 [Dr. Calamy left behind him a Manuſcript, entitled, 'An hiſtorical Account of my own Life, 'with ſome Reflections on the Times I have lived 'in.' This Manuſcript, which conſiſts of three volumes in folio, we have had the opportunity of peruſing, by the favour of Edmund Calamy, of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, Eſq; Barriſter at Law, the Doctor's grandſon. In the Introduction, the Author gives a copious and learned Diſſertation on thoſe who had written works of the ſame kind before him, and explains the reaſons of his own undertaking, leaving his Narrative as a legacy to thoſe who came after him, to be received and diſpoſed of as they ſhould think fit. The Hiſtory commences with an account of his grandfather, and of the reſt of his family, and is carried on to the end of 1731, which was the year preceding Dr. Calamy's death. In the courſe of the work, the Doctor intermixes public affairs with thoſe of a more private nature. In his relation of public affairs, he is often large and particular, though little could be extracted from this part which is new; as it belongs to a period that has been ſo diligently inveſtigated, and concerning which we have had, of late years, ſuch a variety of publications. Under the head of more private affairs, are included many things reſpecting the Diſſenters, and the perſons with whom the Author was particularly acquainted and connected; nor doth he omit taking ſome notice of almoſt every man of conſequence and literature in his time. He relates, likewiſe, ſeveral ſtories that appeared to him to be curious, or which he thought might be uſeful in a religious view.

From this work a much larger Life of Dr. Calamy might he compoſed, than is given by our learned predeceſſor. But as the article contains an accurate narration of the main facts relative to the Doctor, and is drawn up with great juſtice and candour, we ſhall content ourſelves with adding a few occaſional circumſtances, and with inſerting a complete liſt of our Author's writings.

The firſt public event that made an impreſſion upon him, when a boy, was the Popiſh Plot; and he gives a lively account of the terror with which the inhabitants of London were ſeized at that time, People who were obliged to go out upon buſineſs, and eſpecially at night, did it under the moſt alarming apprehenſions, that they ſhould be murdered before their return. Dr. Calamy afterwards ſaw Dr. Titus Oats whipped in King James the Second's reign; and having celebrated Oats's invincible reſolution, and his having been an inſtrument in the hand of God, for the preſervation of the nation, he adds, 'And yet after all, he was but a ſorry 'foul-mouthed wretch, as I myſelf can atteſt, from 'what I once heard from him, when I was in his 'company.

useful writings, as well as by a constant and painful Ministry, which made his loss greatly regretted, not only by the Dissenters, but also by the moderate members of the established Church, both clergy and laity, with many of whom he lived in great intimacy. He

'company. And I have been informed at West-'minster, that he was a frequent auditor of my 'predecessor, Mr. Alsop, and moved for leave to 'come to the Lord's Table with his Society; but 'that an honest man of the Congregation, upon 'that occasion, spoke freely against him, as one so 'irregular in his life, as to be very unfit for Church 'Communion. The Doctor, afterwards meeting 'Mr. Alsop, told him that that man had sadly abus-'ed him; and, upon that account, he vehemently 'complained, as one that was injuriously dealt with. 'And Mr. Alsop cried out, "Prove him a liar, "Doctor, prove him a liar;" which it would have 'been well for him if he could have done. But he 'really bore a very indifferent character at West-'minster. And, notwithstanding all the service he 'had done, there were so many things concurring 'to lessen his credit, that I must confess I am the 'less surprised that the Parliament after the Revolu-'tion should leave him under a brand, and incapa-'citate him for being a witness for the future.'

Our Author's Ordination in 1694, was the first public transaction of that kind which had taken place amongst the Dissenters since the passing of the Act of Uniformity. Hitherto these services had been carried on in the presence only of the ordainers, and the ordained. Mr. Calamy, who was determined that his own Ordination should be conducted as publicly as possible, found a considerable difficulty in executing his design. The famous Mr. John Howe declined engaging in it, from the fear of giving offence to Government; and Dr. Bates excused himself, for some other reason. At length, however, the matter was accomplished, and six young ministers besides were ordained at the same time. These were Mr. Joseph Bennet, Mr. Thomas Reynolds, Mr. Joseph Hill, Mr. William King, Mr. Ebenezer Bradshaw, and Mr. Joshua Bayes. The ordainers were Dr. Samuel Annesly, Mr. Vincent Alsop, Mr. Daniel Williams, Mr. Thomas Kentish, Mr. Stretton, and Mr. Matthew Sylvester. The whole service lasted from ten o'clock in the morning till past six in the evening. The dissenting Clergy have since found out the means of reducing these solemnities within a much shorter compass.

In Dr. Calamy's Manuscript a good deal is said concerning the French Prophets, who made so great a noise in the beginning of the present century, and a very particular account is given of John Lacy, Esq; a Gentleman of the Doctor's Congregation, who became a noted follower of these enthusiasts, and who himself pretended to divine inspiration. Our Author had an opportunity of seeing Mr. Lacy in one of his fits; part of the description of which we shall transcribe. 'I went into the room 'where he sat, and walked up to him, and asked 'him how he did, and took him by the hand, and 'lifted it up, and it fell down flat upon his knees, 'as it lay before. He took no notice of me, nor 'made me any answer; but I observed the humming noise grew louder and louder by degrees, 'and the heaving in his breast increased, till it came 'up to his throat, as if it would have suffocated 'him, and then he at last proceeded to speak, or as 'he would have it taken, the spirit spake in him. 'The speech was syllabical; and there was a distinct 'heave and breath between each syllable: but it 'required attention to distinguish the words. I shall 'here add it, as far as my memory serves.

'Thou—hast—been—my—faith—ful—Ser—'vant:—And—I—have—ho—nou—red—Thee:—'But—I—do—not—take—it—well—that—Thou 'sligh—test—and—op—po—sest—my—Ser—vants '—and—Mes—sen—gers.—If—Thou—wilt—fall '—in—with—these—my—Ser—vants,—Thou—'shalt—do—great—Things—in—this—Dis—pen—'sa—ti—on:—And—I—will—use—Thee—as—'a—glo—ri—ous—In—stru—ment—to—my—'praise;—and—I—will—take—care—of—Thee—'and—Thine.—But—if—Thou—go—est—on—to '—op—pose—my—Ser—vants,—Thou—wilt—fall '—un—der—my—se—vere—Dis—plea—sure.—'When the Speech was over, the humming and 'heaving gradually abated; and I again took him 'by the hand, and felt his pulse, which moved 'pretty quick; but I could not perceive by his 'hands any thing like sweating, or more than com-'mon heat.'

Some time after this, Mr. Lacy, without giving the least notice, got up one morning, left his Lady in bed, quitted his house and children, and, taking a few necessaries with him, went to live among the Prophets. Here he took to himself for a wife, one Betty Grey, who had been a snuffer of candles in the playhouse, but now passed for a person inspired. This transaction, in one of his inspirations, which Dr. Calamy saw, he called a quitting Hagar, and betaking himself to Sarah; and declared, that he did it by the order of the Spirit. At length, Mr. Lacy retired with this woman, by whom he had several children, into Lancashire, where he died in 1730. He persisted in his prophetic notions to the last, and never discovered any concern for his wife and children whom he had deserted. It appears, from the account of a law-suit, in which Mr. Lacy was concerned, that he was a great rogue, as well as a great enthusiast. But the union of roguery and enthusiasm is no surprizing thing; the History of the World proving, that such an union hath subsisted in a multitude of instances.

There was another person deeply engaged with the French Prophets, whose abilities and character were far superior to those of Mr. Lacy; and of whom, therefore, we doubt not, but that it will be agreeable to our readers that we should take some notice; which we are the better enabled to do, by a very seasonable communication from our learned and worthy friend, Dr. Johnstone, of Kidderminster, in Worcestershire. The person we mean was, Nicolas Fatio Duilier, a native of Switzerland, who was born about the year 1662; and who, in early youth, became as remarkable for his proficiency in literature, as he was afterwards for his enthusiasm. Bishop Burnet, in the first letter of his Travels, dated September, 1685, speaks of him as an incomparable mathematician and philosopher, who, though only twenty-two years old, was already become one of the greatest men of his age, and seemed born to carry learning some sizes beyond what it had hitherto attained. Whilst Dr. Calamy studied at the University of Utrecht, Monsr. Fatio resided in that city, as Tutor to two young Gentlemen, Mr. Ellys and Mr. Thornton, and conversed freely with the English. At this time he was generally esteemed to be a Spinozist; and his discourse, says Dr. Calamy, very much looked that way. Afterwards, it is probable, that he was Professor of Mathematics at Geneva. About the latter end of the last, or the beginning of the present century, he came into England, and was honoured with the Friendship of the most eminent mathematicians of that age. Sir Isaac Newton, in particular, was intimately acquainted with him. Dr. Johnstone has in his possession a manuscript, written by Fatio, containing Commentaries and Illustrations of different parts of Sir Isaac's Principia. When Monsr. Fatio attached himself to the new Prophets, he became their chief secretary, and committed their warnings to writing, many of which were published. The connection of such a man with these enthusiasts, and their being supported, likewise, by another person of reputed abilities, Maxamilian Misson, a French Refugee, occasioned a suspicion, though without reason, that there was some deep contrivance and design in the affair. On the second of December, 1707, Monsr. Fatio stood in the pillory at Charing-Cross, with the following words affixed to his hat: 'Nicolas Fatio, convicted 'for abetting and favouring Elias Marion, in his 'wicked

He died, June 3, 1732, in the ſixtieth year of his age, having been twice married, and leaving ſix children behind him (n). His funeral ſermon was preached by Mr. Daniel Mayo (o), in which he has given us a great and very deſerved character of Dr. Calamy, viz.

'wicked and counterfeit prophecies, and cauſing 'them to be printed and publiſhed, to terrify the 'Queen's people.' Nearly at the ſame time, a like ſentence was executed upon Elias Marion, one of the pretended Prophets, and John d'Andè, another of their abettors (4). This mode of treatment did not convince Monſ. Fatio of his error; and, indeed, the deluſion of a man of ſuch abilities, and ſimplicity of manners, was rather an object of compaſſion than of public infamy and puniſhment. Oppreſſed with the deriſion and contempt thrown upon himſelf and his party, this worthy enthuſiaſt retired, at laſt, into the country, and ſpent the remainder of a long life in ſilence and obſcurity. He died at Worceſter in 1753, being upwards of ninety years of age. When he became the dupe of fanaticiſm, he ſeems to have given up his philoſophical ſtudies and connections. Monſ. Fatio, beſides being deeply verſed in all branches of Mathemical Literature, was a great proficient in the learned and oriental languages. He had read much, alſo, in books of Alchymy. To the laſt, he continued a firm believer in the reality of the inſpiration of the French Prophets. Dr. Wall of Worceſter, who was well acquainted with him, communicated many of the above particulars to Dr. Johnſtone, in whoſe hands are ſeveral of Fatio's fanatical Manuſcripts and Journals.

After the firſt proſecution of the French Prophets, and when Mr. Emms, one of their followers, had not riſen from the dead, as they had foretold, that he would do in a particular day, Government determined to proceed more ſeverely againſt them. Accordingly, orders were given to the Attorney General to proſecute Sir Richard Bulkeley, and others, who were ringleaders in the affair. However, before any farther meaſures were purſued, Lord Godolphin and Mr. Harley ſent a Gentleman to Dr. Calamy, to conſult him upon the ſubject. The Doctor anſwered, that he was abundantly convinced, after having fully conſidered the matter, that it was much the beſt for Government to ſit ſtill, and not give the leaſt diſturbance to the new Prophets, or their abettors. This advice he enforced by ſuch ſtrong reaſons, that it was attended to and followed; the conſequence of which was, that, in a little time, theſe enthuſiaſts ſunk into contempt, and dwindled away to nothing. Sir Richard Bulkeley, who was very ſhort and crooked, expected, under the new diſpenſation, to be made ſtrait and handſome in a miraculous way; but, to his great diſappointment and mortification, he died before the miracle was accompliſhed. Sir Richard, like Monſ. Fatio, was a man of learning, though not in an equal degree.

Dr. Calamy, in his Manuſcript, gives a large and entertaining account of his journey to Scotland, and mentions moſt of the Profeſſors and Literary Men who flouriſhed in North Britain at that period. He was treated with diſtinguiſhed honour wherever he came, and was highly pleaſed with his Tour, and with the Scotch nation. Being at Edinburgh during the meeting of the General Aſſembly, and hearing one day the Caſe of an Appeal from a Miniſter againſt the Synod of Aberdeen, who had condemned the Appellant of inſufficiency in his anſwers to a great number of queſtions that had been propoſed to him, the following little incident occurred, which we ſhall relate in Dr. Calamy's own words. 'The Aſſembly ſeemed to be at a loſs what to do with this man. 'The Moderator, ſtooping down, and whiſpering 'me in the ear, as the queſtions were read over, aſked me, What my apprehenſions were as to this 'affair? I frankly anſwered him, that we in England ſhould reckon this way of proceeding the Inquiſition revived; at which he could not help ſmiling. Lord Forbes, who ſat on the bench above 'me, aſked me, what that was that paſſed between 'the Moderator and me, at which he ſmiled? and I 'freely told him, and he immediately fell to laughing. The Lord Preſident, who ſat in the ſeat 'above him, enquiring of him what he laughed at, 'and he giving him an account, he joined alſo in 'the laugh. And at laſt the Commiſſioner, who 'could not help obſerving this, ſtooped down, and 'whiſpered the Lord Preſident of the Seſſion, and 'aſked him what was the occaſion of all this laughing; and being told it, could not forbear joining in it himſelf. In ſhort, it was whiſpered from 'one to another, till it went round the whole Aſſembly: and I heard of it afterwards at Aberdeen.' Mr. Whiſton, in the Memoirs of his own Life and Writings, gives an imperfect relation of this incident (5).

In the great diſputes which were carried on among the Diſſenters in 1718, and the following years, concerning Subſcription to the First Article of the Church of England, relative to the Doctrine of the Trinity, Dr. Calamy acted a neutral part. He diſtinctly foreſaw the quarrel, and its conſequences; and, before it roſe to an height, took up a reſolution to have no hand in it. He was, indeed, at one private meeting; but ſaw ſo much there, as determined him to engage no farther, though he was earneſtly preſſed, both by the Subſcribers, and thoſe who were afterwards called the Non-ſubſcribers, to give them his company. We believe that moſt of the preſent race of Diſſenting Clergy, will think that Dr. Calamy loſt ſome credit, by not being one of the ſeventy-three miniſters who carried it againſt ſixty-nine, for the Bible, in oppoſition to human formularies.

Our Author's publications, of which he hath given a diſtinct account in his Manuſcript, were as follows: 1. A Funeral Sermon for Mr. Samuel Stephens, a young Miniſter, 4to. 1694. 2. A practical Diſcourſe on Vows, with a ſpecial Reference to Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper, 8vo. 1694. Reprinted in a ſmaller form in 1704. 3. A Funeral Sermon for Mrs. Williams, wife of the Reverend Mr. Daniel Williams, 8vo. 1698. 4. A Sermon to the Society for the Reformation of Manners, 12mo. 1699. 5. A Diſcourſe concerning the Riſe and Antiquity of Cathedral Worſhip, in a Letter to a Friend. This piece, which was afterwards inſerted in the Phœnix, was publiſhed without the Author's name. 6. Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory, mentioned in the article. Biſhop Burnet, in a converſation with Mr. Calamy, thanked him for this work, and told him that he had read it with pleaſure. 7. Divine Mercy exalted, or Free Grace in its Glory. A Sermon at Salter's Hall, 1702. 8. Firſt Part of the Defence of moderate Nonconformity, 1703. 9. Second Part of the Defence of moderate Nonconformity, 1704. The Introduction, which was concerning the true ſtate of the Controverſy between the Church and the Diſſenters, was ſo much approved of by Mr. Locke, that he ſent a meſſage to our Author, informing him, that he thought it ſuch a Defence of Nonconformity as could not be anſwered; and that, in adhering to the principles there laid down, he had no occaſion to be afraid of any antagoniſt. 10. Third Part of the Defence of moderate Nonconformity, 1705. 11. A Caveat againſt the new Prophets, with a ſingle ſheet, in Anſwer to Sir Richard Bulkeley's Remarks on the ſame, 1707-8. Queen Anne ſent her thanks to Mr. Calamy for this Tract, and for the ſervice he had done the public by it. The piece happening to be preſented to her Majeſty by Mrs. Hill, afterwards Lady Maſham, the Ducheſs of Marlborough took offence at it, and was not ſatisfied till the Author had convinced her that his book's paſſing into the hands of the Queen, through that Lady's conveyance, was entirely without his deſign or knowledge. 12. A Funeral Sermon for the Reverend Mr. Matthew Sylveſter, 1707-8. 13. Ditto, for Mrs. Frances Lewis, 1707-8. 14 Ditto, for Mr. Michael Watts, 1707-8. 15. CALDERWOOD (David), a very famous Divine of the Church of Scotland, and an eminent writer in behalf of the Preſbyterians, in the beginning of the XVIIth century. It is not a little ſtrange, conſidering the great figure our author made in his own time, and the high reputation his writings have been in ſince his death, that we find no mention made of him by ſuch as have profeſſed a deſire of preſerving the memories of eminent men of that country. All we are able to learn of him is, that he was deſcended from a very good family in that kingdom, and being from his youth deſigned for the Miniſtry, he applied himſelf with great diligence to the ſtudy of Divinity, more eſpecially to that of the Scriptures in their original tongues, with the aſſiſtance of the beſt commentaries, the works of the Fathers, the Councils, and the beſt writers on Church Hiſtory, ancient and modern (a). His great learning, even when he was but a young man, rendered him highly eſteemed, as his warm zeal for the eſtabliſhed Church of Scotland, as it then ſtood without Biſhops, made him extremely welcome to moſt of the Miniſters; ſo that he was ſettled about the year 1604, at Crelling, not far from Jedburgh, in the South of Scotland (b), where, by a very regular and unblameable life, as well as a very pious and diligent application to the duties of his function, he became much beloved, and greatly reverenced by all ſuch as concurred with him in opinion. King James the VIth of that country, and Firſt of Great-Britain, being inclined to bring the Church of Scotland to a conformity with that of England, at leaſt as near as poſſible, laboured earneſtly to reſtore the epiſcopal authority, and to enlarge the power of the Biſhops that were then in that kingdom (c). Againſt this many of the Miniſters ſet themſelves with great heat and vehemence, and none more earneſtly than Mr. David Calderwood, who at the time Mr. James Law, then Biſhop of Orkney, came to viſit the Preſbyteries of the Merſe and Tiviotdale, declined his juriſdiction, by a paper under his hand, dated May 5, 1608 (d), which was the firſt public mark he gave of that oppoſition, which he afterwards ſupported with ſo much warmth, and which was the occaſion of all his ſubſequent troubles and misfortunes. The King, who was ſtrongly bent on carrying his deſign into execution, made uſe, for that purpoſe, of the Earl of Dunbar, then Lord High-Treaſurer of Scotland, whom he ſent into that kingdom, attended by Dr. Abbot, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and two other Divines, with inſtructions to take all imaginable pains, to perſuade both the Miniſtry and Laity, of his Majeſty's ſincere deſire to promote the good of the Church, and of his zeal for the Proteſtant Religion (e). The Divines, before mentioned, diſcharged their duty with all the induſtry imaginable, and the Lord-Treaſurer ſhewed his fidelity to his Maſter, by doing all that was poſſible for him to do in promoting this great work, for which he hath been tranſmitted in very different lights to poſterity (f) [A]. It does not appear that Mr. Calderwood aſſiſted at the General Aſſemby held at Glaſgow, June 8, 1610, in which the Earl of Dunbar preſided as Commiſſioner; but it appears plainly from his own writings, that he looked upon every thing tranſacted there as null and void (g). Another General Aſſembly was held on the thirteenth of Auguſt, 1616, with great ſolemnity, at Aberdeen, where many things were done, againſt which exceptions were taken by Mr. Calderwood and his party. In May 1617, King James went to Scotland, and on the ſeventeenth of June following, the Parliament met at Edinburgh, and at the ſame time the Clergy had their meeting in one of the churches, to hear and adviſe with the Biſhops; which kind of aſſembly it ſeems was contrived in imitation of the Convocation in England, with which Mr. David Calderwood was ſo little ſatisfied, that he declared his mind there publickly, which was, that he did not take any ſuch meetings to reſemble a Convocation; and finding himſelf oppoſed by Dr. Whitford and Dr. Hamilton, who were friends to the Biſhops, he took his leave of them in theſe words: 'It is abſurd to ſee men ſitting in ſilks and ſattins, and 'to cry poverty in the Kirk, when purity is departing (h).' In the mean time the Parliament proceeded in diſpatching ſeveral matters relating to eccleſiaſtical as well as civil concerns; upon which many of the Miniſters reſolved to form a proteſtation, which was ordered to be put into writing by Mr. Archibald Simpſon. This was accordingly done, and the paper was ſigned by him on the behalf of the Miniſters, who ſigned another ſeparate roll, which was delivered to him as his juſtification. The proteſt was then put into the hands of Mr. Peter Hewat, who had a ſeat in Parliament, and was to preſent it; but another copy of it remained in the hands of Mr. Archibald Simpſon, to be preſented in caſe any accident happened to the former. This affair ſoon made a great noiſe, and Dr. Spotſwood, Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, ſeeing Mr. Hewat at Court, deſired to look upon the proteſt, and upon ſome diſpute between them it was torn. The other copy was actually preſented, by Mr. Simpſon, to the Clerk Regiſter, who refuſed to read it before the States in Parliament. Soon after, that aſſembly was diſſolved, and Mr. Simpſon was ſummoned before the High Commiſſion Court, where the roll of names, which he had received for his juſtification, was demanded from him; and upon his declaring that he had given it to Mr. Harriſon, who had ſince delivered it to Mr. David Calderwood, he was ſent priſoner to the Caſtle of Edinburgh, and Mr. Calderwood ſummoned to appear before the High Commiſſion Court at St. Andrew's, on the eighth of July following, there to exhibit the ſaid roll, and to anſwer for his mu-

[A] For which he hath been tranſmitted in very different lights to poſterity.] This great Stateſman, and able Miniſter, George Hume Earl of Dunbar, was not only in great favour with the King his maſter, but ſtood much better with the Engliſh nation than almoſt any of the King's countrymen beſide. It was for this reaſon that the King created him, firſt, Baron Hume of Berwick, which was an Engliſh honour (1), and afterwards Earl of Dunbar in Scotland; and as he was Lord High-Treaſurer of this kingdom, ſo he was, at the ſame time, Chancellor of the Exchequer in England (2). He was looked upon as the only man capable of managing Church affairs in Scotland, and was therefore ſent down Commiſſioner, in 1606, to the Aſſembly that was held at Linlithgow. He alſo held a Parliament at Perth, and his conduct there is, by a Reverend Prelate (3), much commended. At this time he procured the ſettling conſtant Moderators, which was a great ſtep to the reſtoring of epiſcopal authority: but Sir James Balfour (4) tells us, that his Lordſhip diſtributed the ſum of forty thouſand marks amongſt the moſt needy, and the moſt clamorous, of the miniſters, and thereby carried this point, as appeared afterwards in his accounts. But however he carried it, it highly recommended him to his maſter, who ſent him down again to Scotland in 1608, where he did him farther ſervice, for which he was, on his return, made Knight of the Garter. In 1610, he went down the third time to complete his work, and upon his coming back to Court, had many acknowledgments made him, both by the King and by the Clergy. But if we may truſt Mr. Calderwood, in the midſt of all his proſperity, one of the great men of his party foretold his end: his account of the matter runs thus (5). 'A little after the Aſ-'ſembly holden at Glaſgow, James Colvine, a Scot-'tiſh gentleman, viſiting Mr. Andrew Melvine in 'the Tower, found him ſo penſive and melancholy, 'that he got no ſpeech of him for a ſpace: at length 'he brake forth in theſe words. That man (meaning Dunbar) that hath overthrown that Kirk, and 'the liberties of Chriſt's kingdom there, ſhall never 'have that grace to ſet his foot in that kingdom again. 'As he foretold ſo it came to paſs, and Dunbar end-'ed his life the next January following at White-'hall.' The Lord-Treaſurer was in a very bad ſtate of health when he came back from Scotland, and continued declining till the 29th of January 1611, when he departed this life; and his body being carried down to Scotland, was buried in the collegiate church of Dunbar, where a magnificent monument was erected to his memory (6). Our author's character of him, and account of his deceaſe, is very ſingular. 'The Earl of Dunbar, ſays he, a chief 'inſtrument employed for the overthrow of the diſ-'cipline of our Kirk, departed this life at White-'hall, the penult of January. So he was pulled 'down from the height of his honour, when he was 'about to ſolemnize magnificently his daughter's 'marriage with the Lord Walden. He purpoſed to 'keep St. George's day after in Berwick, where 'he had almoſt finiſhed a ſumptuous and glorious 'palace, which ſtandeth yet as a monument to 'teſtify, that the curſe which was pronounced againſt 'the rebuilders of Jericho was executed upon him. 'Of all that he conquered in Scotland, there is not 'left to his poſterity ſo much as a foot breadth of 'land (7).' We have a very different character of this nobleman from the pen of an eminent prelate (8). 'He was a man, ſays that learned author, 'of deep wit, few words, and, in his Majeſty's ſer-'vice, no leſs faithful than fortunate: the moſt 'difficult affairs he compaſſed without any noiſe, and 'never returned, when he was employed, without 'the work performed he was ſent to do.' The reader will judge from hence, of the difficulties that occur in writing Scotch lives.

tinous and ſeditious behaviour (i) [B]. He accordingly went thither, and on the twelfth of July, the King came to that city in perſon, and ſoon after Mr. Peter Hewat and Mr. Archibald Simpſon, were deprived and impriſoned for the ſhare they had in this tranſaction. After this Mr. Calderwood was called upon, to anſwer for the concern he had in this affair, and as we have his own account of the matter, it is probable that the reader will be better pleaſed to ſee it in his own words, than in any dreſs we can give it [C]. The iſſue of this buſineſs was, that the King being provoked by the inflexible

[B] To anſwer for his mutinous and ſeditious behaviour.] It is neceſſary to give the reader, though in as few words as poſſible, an account of the reaſon of this proteſt. The Miniſters had an account that a bill was depending in Parliament, by which, power was given to the King, with the advice of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and ſuch a competent number of the Miniſtry, as his Majeſty in his wiſdom ſhould think expedient, to conſider and conclude, as to matters decent for the external policy of the Church, not repugnant to the word of God, and that ſuch concluſions ſhould have the ſtrength and power of the eccleſiaſtical laws. Againſt this, the Miniſters proteſted for four reaſons. Firſt, Becauſe their Church was ſo perfect, that inſtead of needing reformation, it ought to be a pattern to others. Secondly, General Aſſemblies, as now eſtabliſhed by law, and which ought always to continue, might, by this means, be overthrown. Thirdly, Becauſe it might be a means of creating ſchiſm, and diſturbing the tranquillity of the Church. Fourthly, Becauſe they had received aſſurances, that no attempts ſhould be made to bring them to a conformity with the Church of England. They deſired therefore, that for theſe, and other reaſons, all thoughts of paſſing any ſuch law may be laid aſide; but in caſe this be not done, they proteſt for themſelves, and their brethren who ſhould adhere to them, that they can yield no obedience to this law when it ſhall be enacted, becauſe it is deſtructive of the liberty of the Church, and therefore ſhall ſubmit to ſuch penalties, and think themſelves obliged to undergo ſuch puniſhments, as may be inflicted for diſobeying that law. This was the foundation of the proſecution againſt Mr. Calderwood: but, however, this proteſtation, though not read, had its effect; for notwithſtanding the bill, or, as the Scottiſh phraſe is, the article before-mentioned, had the conſent of Parliament, yet the King thought fit to cauſe it to be laid aſide, that there might be no foundation for receiving or reading the Miniſters proteſtation, and ſoon after called a General Aſſembly at St. Andrew's (9).

(9) Spotſwood's Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland, p. 535, 535.

[C] In his words, than in any dreſs we can give it.] We have this conference between our author and King James, largely and fully ſtated by him; and it gives a very clear view of the conduct of the Miniſters in Scotland at that time, of which we have only ſhort hints in our hiſtories; ſo that we cannot well judge who is in the right, or who in the wrong; and therefore it is hoped the length of this paſſage will not render it tedious to the reader. ‘ Mr. David Cal‘ derwood was called on, and the concluſion of the ‘ libels, or indictments, were read. To the firſt head he ‘ anſwered, That underſtanding that Mr. Archibald
‘ Simpſon was warded, or impriſoned in the caſtle
‘ of Edinburgh, for not preſenting the roll of the ‘ names, he delivered it to him again. Neither had ‘ he time to ſeek any new ſubſcriptions, nor could ‘ he, becauſe he had not the proteſtation to preſent ‘ to the ſubſcriber. The King demanded, what he ‘ had to anſwer to the other point, the aſſiſting of ‘ that mutinous meeting? He anſwered, Sir, when ‘ that meeting ſhall be condemned as mutinous, then ‘ it is time for me to anſwer for my particular aſſiſt-‘ ance. The Secretary ſaid unto him, Mr. David, ‘ acknowledge your own raſhneſs. In the mean ‘ time, thoſe that were ſtanding about put upon ‘ him, and buzzed in his ear, ſaying, Do this;
‘ come in the King's will, you will find it beſt; his ‘ Majeſty will pardon you. He anſwered to the Se‘ cretary, That which they had done, was done
‘ with deliberation. What moved you to proteſt?
‘ ſaid the King. An article concluded among the
‘ the Lords of the articles, anſwered Mr. David.
‘ But what fault was there in it? aſked the King. It ‘ cutteth off our General Aſſemblies, anſwered Mr.
‘ David. After the King had enquired how long he ‘ had been a Miniſter, he ſaid to him, Hear me, ‘ Mr. David, I have been an older keeper of Gene‘ ral Aſſemblies than you. A General Aſſembly
‘ ſerveth to preſerve doctrine in purity, from error
‘ and hereſy, the Kirk from ſchiſm, to make con‘ feſſions of faith, to put up petitions to the King in ‘ Parliament. But as for matters of order, rites, ‘ and things indifferent in Kirk policy, they may be ‘ concluded by the King with advice of Biſhops, and ‘ a choice number of Miniſters. Next, what is a ‘ General Aſſembly but a convened number of Mi‘ niſters? He anſwered, as to the firſt point, Sir,
‘ a General Aſſembly ſhould ſerve, and our General ‘ Aſſemblies have ſerved theſe fifty-ſix years, not on‘ ly from preſerving doctrine from error and hereſy, ‘ &c. but alſo to make canons and conſtitutions of ‘ all rites and orders belonging to the Kirk. As for ‘ the ſecond point, as by a competent number of ‘ Miniſters may be meant a General Aſſembly, ſo
‘ alſo may be meant a fewer number of Miniſters ‘ than may make up a General Aſſembly. It was ‘ ordained in the General Aſſembly, with your Ma‘ jeſty's own conſent, your Majeſty being preſent, ‘ that there ſhould be Commiſſioners choſen out of ‘ every Preſbytery, not exceeding the number of ‘ three, to be ſent to a General Aſſembly, and ſo
‘ the competent number of Miniſters is already de‘ fined. What needeth farther then, ſaid the King,
‘ but to have proteſted for a declarature, what was ‘ meant by a competent number? He anſwered, in ‘ pleading for the liberty of the General Aſſembly,
‘ we did that in effect. Then the King having the ‘ proteſtation in his hand, challengeth him for ſome
‘ words of the laſt clauſe. He anſwered, Whatſoever ‘ was the phraſe of ſpeech, they meant no other ‘ thing but to proteſt, that they would give paſſive ‘ obedience to his Majeſty, but could not give active ‘ obedience to any unlawful thing which ſhould flow
‘ from that article. Active and paſſive obedience!
‘ ſaith the King. That is, we will rather ſuffer
‘ than practiſe, ſaid Mr. David. I will tell thee
‘ what is obedience, man, ſaid the King. The ‘ Centurion, when he ſaid to his ſervants, To this ‘ man, go, and he goeth; to that man, come, and ‘ he cometh: That is obedience. He anſwered, To ‘ ſuffer, Sir, is alſo obedience, howbeit not of that ‘ ſame kind; and that obedience alſo was not abſo-
‘ lute, but limited with exception of a countermand
‘ from a ſuperior power. Mr. David, let alone; ‘ confeſs your error, ſaid the Secretary. He an‘ ſwered, My Lord, I cannot ſee that I have com‘ mitted any fault. Then ſaid the King, Well, ‘ Mr. Calderwood, I will let you ſee that I am ‘ gracious and favourable: That meeting ſhall be ‘ condemned before ye be condemned; all that are ‘ in the roll ſhall be filed before ye be filed, provid‘ ing ye will conform. Sir, I have anſwered my li‘ bel; replied Mr. David, I ought to be urged with ‘ no farther. The King ſaid, It is true, man, ye ‘ have anſwered to your libel; but conſider I am ‘ here, I may demand of you when and what I will.
‘ He anſwered, Surely, Sir, I get great wrong if I
‘ be compelled to anſwer here in judgment to any ‘ more than my libel. Anſwer! Sir, ſaid the King, ‘ ye are a refractor: the Biſhop of Glaſgow your ‘ Ordinary, and Biſhop of Cathneſs the Moderator
‘ of your Preſbytery, teſtify ye have keeped no or‘ der, ye have repaired neither to Preſbyteries nor ‘ Synods, and in no wiſe conform? He anſwered,
‘ Sir, I have been confined theſe eight or nine years;
‘ ſo my conformity or not conformity, in that point, ‘ could flexible temper and ſharp anſwers of Mr. Calderwood, firſt committed him priſoner; and then the Privy Council, according to the power which at that time they exerciſed, directed him to baniſh himſelf out of the King's dominions before Michaelmas following, and not to return without licence; and upon his giving ſecurity for this purpoſe, he was diſcharged out of priſon, and ſuffered to return to his pariſh, but he was forbidden to preach (k). He followed the King however to Carliſle, to obtain a prorogation of the time of his baniſhment, which he could not do, and then he applied to the Council, and to the Biſhops, who promiſed to write in his favour; but, as he would not acknowledge his offence, or promiſe conformity for the future, he was obliged to quit the kingdom, which he accordingly did, and retired to Holland; but Mr. Archibald Simpſon made his ſubmiſſion, and was reſtored. We have no account of the manner in which he paſſed his time in Holland, or how our author was provided for there; but, it is certain, that he adhered to his former principles ſteadily, and in the year 1623, he publiſhed his famous book, intituled, Altare Damaſcenum (l) [D]. This made a great account, is pleaſed to add, that his Majeſty was not out in his judgment, the patrons of Epiſcopacy having never yet anſwered it, how much ſoever their cauſe requires it (12).

The old edition of this celebrated Treatiſe being become extremely ſcarce, and being withal, from the manner in which it was printed, very imperfect and incorrect, a new one was publiſhed above ſixty years ago, under the following title: ALTARE DAMASCENUM: ſeu Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Politia, Eccleſiæ Scoticanæ obtruſa, a Formaliſta quodam delineata; illuſtrata & examinata, ſub nomine olim Edwardi Didoclavii, Studio & Opera Davidis Calderwood. Cui locis ſuis interſerta Confutatio Paræneſeos Tileni ad Scotos Genevenſis ut ait Diſciplinæ Zelotas. Et adjecta Epiſtola Hieronymi Philadelphi de Regimine Eccleſiæ Scoticanæ ejuſque, Vindiciæ contra Calumnias Johannis Spotſvodi Fani Andreæ Pſeudo-Archi-Epiſcopi per Anonymum. Editio priori longe elegantior & emendatior Lugduni Batavorum apud Cornelium Boteſteyn, 1708, 4*to*. i. e. 'The ALTAR at DAMASCUS: or, the Policy of the Church of England, intended to be obtruded on the Church of Scotland, delineated by ſome Lover of Ceremonies, illuſtrated and examined by the ſtudy and care of David Calderwood, heretofore publiſhed by him under the name of Edward Didoclavius. With a Confutation of the Admonition of Tilenus to the Scots, whom he ſtiles bigots to the diſcipline of Geneva, interſperſed in their proper places. To which is added, the Epiſtle of Jerom Philadelphus, of the Government of the Church of Scotland, with a Vindication thereof againſt the Calumnies of John Spotſwood, pretended Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, written by an anonymous author. More elegant and correct than the former edition.' In this large work, the Deſcription of the Policy of the Engliſh Church, the author of which Mr. Calderwood does not pretend to know, is made the text, and his own diſcourſes are digeſted into the form of notes, by which means the reader has the whole controverſy in one view, and in as regular a method as could well be contrived. This work is divided into fifteen chapters: 1. Of the King's Supremacy, and of the Juriſdiction of the Royal Commiſſioners in Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical. 2 Of the Ranks of Biſhops. 3. Of the Dignity and Power of Archbiſhops in England. 4. That a Biſhop and a Preſbyter are one and the ſame Order. 5. Of the Dignity and Power of Biſhops in the Engliſh Church. 6. Of Vicar-Generals, Officials, and Archdeacons. 7. Of Suffragans and Rural Deans. 8. Of Deans and Chapters. 9. Of Rites and Ceremonies. 10. Of the Calling and Function of Preſbyters, or Prieſts, in the Church of England. 11. Of the Calling and Function of Deacons. 12. Of Lay-Adminiſtrators in the Church of England. 13. Of Poſſeſſions. 14. Of Conſtitutions. 15. Againſt the Injuries and Calumnies vented by Tilenus. Some of theſe chapters are entirely of Mr. Calderwood's writing, particularly the fourth, and theſe are thrown in as ſupplements to the diſcourſes of the author whom he examines; and the great thing aimed at by this way of writing, is to ſhew his impartiality, by bringing to the view of the reader, the repreſentation of the policy of the Church

'could not be well known. Good faith! thou art 'a very knave, ſaid the King: See theſe ſame falſe 'Puritans, they are ever playing with equivocations. 'Mr. David had alledged his confinement to avoid 'a direct anſwer, becauſe he was urged with other 'points than was contained in the libel. The 'Biſhop of Glaſgow, thinking to catch him in a 'ſnare, aſked him, If he was confined, how were 'ye at the meeting in the ſong-ſchool where ye ſubſcribed the proteſtation? He anſwered, Since I 'was confined I obtained liberty, which was granted with exception of Preſbyteries and Synods: 'that meeting was neither a Preſbytery nor a Synod. 'Then ſome ſpeeches paſſed betwixt him and Glaſgow about the relaxation, which was proclaimed 'for the confined within the dioceſe of Glaſgow. 'Then the King aſked, If ye were relaxed will ye 'obey or not? He anſwered, Sir, I am wronged, in 'that I am forced to anſwer ſuch queſtions which 'are beſide the libel: yet, ſeeing I muſt anſwer, I 'ſay, Sir, I ſhall either obey you, or give a reaſon 'wherefore I diſobey; and if I diſobey, your Majeſty knows I am to lie under the danger as I do 'now. Then ſaid the King, remembering of his 'anſwer before, That is, to obey either actively or 'paſſively. I can go no farther, ſaid Mr. David: 'and ſo he was removed (10).' Upon his being called in again, he was ſuſpended till October, and threatened with deprivation; but Mr. Calderwood queſtioning the power of the Biſhops to ſuſpend him in the High Commiſſion Court, the King ordered him to be ſent priſoner to the Tolbooth of St. Andrew's, from whence he was afterwards removed to Edinburgh.

[D] Intituled, Altare Damaſcenum.] We have a particular detail of the ſubject of this treatiſe, and the reaſon and manner of its being publiſhed by the author of the Preface prefixed to the true Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland: his words are theſe, 'Mr. 'David Calderwood, whoſe praiſe is in the Churches 'of Chriſt, as otherwiſe, ſo particularly upon the 'account of his being, but under another and borrowed name of Edwardus Didoclavius, the author 'of that very learned and elaborate treatiſe, intituled, Altare Damaſcenum, wherein he doth by Scripture, Reaſon, and Fathers, irrefragably and unanſwerably (and indeed for any thing we know it 'hath not been anſwered to this day, nor belike 'will afterward) demonſtrate the iniquity of deſigning, and endeavouring to model and conform the 'divinely ſimple worſhip, diſcipline, and government of the Church of Scotland, to the pattern of 'the pompouſly prelatic and ceremonious Church 'of England: under ſome conviction whereof, it 'ſeems King James himſelf was, though implacably 'diſpleaſed with it, when, being after the reading 'of it ſomewhat penſive, and being aſked the reaſon 'by an Engliſh Prelate ſtanding by, and obſerving 'it, told him, he had ſeen and read ſuch a book; 'whereupon the Prelate willing his Majeſty not to 'ſuffer that to trouble him, for they would anſwer 'it: he replied, not without ſome paſſion, What— 'will you anſwer, man? There is nothing here than 'Scripture, Reaſon, and Fathers (11).' A very well known writer, after citing the greateſt part of this a great noiſe, and was ſoon brought to the hands of King James, who is ſaid to have expreſſed a high opinion of it, though he was extremely diſpleaſed with it. It is certain that it made a great impreſſion in England, and was very much admired by all the declared Puritans, and by ſuch as were well-wiſhers to their opinions. It was probably the great reputation of this book, that put one Mr. Patrick Scot, if Mr. Calderwood himſelf may be believed, upon a very ſtrange undertaking. Our author, it ſeems, had been afflicted in the year 1624 with a long fit of ſickneſs, and nothing being heard of him for ſome time, Scot took it for granted that he was dead, and thereupon wrote a Recantation in his name, as if before his deceaſe he had changed his ſentiments: but this impoſture being detected, he went over in the month of November to Holland, and ſtaid three weeks at Amſterdam, where he made diligent ſearch for our author, with a deſign, as Mr. Calderwood believes, to have diſpatched him (m). This Scot had the boldneſs to give out, that the King furniſhed him with the matter for his pretended recantation, and that he only put it in order: but ſurely a man, who could have the impudence to write a death-bed recantation, for a reverend Miniſter, and publiſh it in his name, deſerves no credit, when he endeavours to faſten ſuch an aſperſion upon a Sovereign Prince (n). It ſeems the reaſon that he did not meet with Mr. Calderwood in Holland, was, becauſe he privately returned into his own country, where he remained for ſeveral years; and as a man of his temper and talents could not be idle, it is very likely that he wrote ſeveral other books againſt the proceedings of the Clergy in Scotland (o) [E]. But it is very certain, that he collected with extraordinary diligence, all the memorials relating to the eccleſiaſtical affairs of that kingdom, from the beginning of the Reformation there down to his own time, which he digeſted with much accuracy, according to the order of time; and theſe collections of his are ſtill in being, though an extract only from them has been publiſhed, under the title of The true Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland (p) [F]. How long after this he ſurvived does not appear,

Church of England, in the words of a friend to, and advocate for, that kind of eccleſiaſtical government. It muſt be admitted, that though there is ſomething very ſingular in this manner of writing, yet it is not without its conveniencies, as it gave Mr. Calderwood an opportunity of bringing the whole controverſy within a reaſonable compaſs, and diſcuſſing every part of it methodically and perſpicuouſly. But by purſuing this plan, he has certainly made it very difficult to refute his book; for whoever attempts that, muſt not write by way of anſwer but of reply, and in that caſe he is under a neceſſity of building upon another man's foundation; that is to ſay, the author of the Deſcription of the Policy of the Church of England, which Calderwood made it his buſineſs to refute: and, perhaps, this may be one reaſon, why this treatiſe was never anſwered in form by any of the Divines of the Eſtabliſhed Church. But the ſeveral points which are therein handled, have been diſcuſſed over and over, and moſt of the arguments made uſe of by Mr. Calderwood, have been employed for the ſame purpoſe by the moſt eminent among the modern Engliſh Nonconformiſts. One thing more it will be neceſſary to remark, before we part with this celebrated work, and it is this, that the Nomme de Guerre our author made uſe of, viz. EDWARDUS DIDOCLAVIUS, is no more than a tranſpoſition of the letters of his own name, DAVIDUS CALDERWODIUS, ſo that if he might be ſaid in one ſenſe to diſguiſe, he might in another be affirmed to divulge, its falling from his pen.

[E] Wrote ſeveral other books againſt the proceedings of the Clergy in Scotland.] I muſt confeſs, that this is no better than conjecture, grounded upon the following paſſage in his Hiſtory, which ſeems to hint, that the ſame perſon who wrote the Altar of Damaſcus, was the author of ſome, if not all the treatiſes that are mentioned therein; but in reſpect to this, I leave every reader to judge for himſelf: 'Upon the fourth 'of January 1625, there was a proclamation made 'at the Croſs of Edinburgh, making mention, that 'there were ſundry ſeditious perſons who had written 'certain pamphlets and books tending to treaſon and 'ſedition againſt the King, which were printed in the 'Low-Countries, and were to be brought to Scotland. 'Therefore commanding all Magiſtrates of ſea-ports, 'Cuſtomers, Searchers, and other officers, to ſuffer 'no ſhips coming forth of the Low-Countries to 'come within the harbours, or any Merchant or paſſenger to come on land till the ſhips were firſt 'ſearched, for theſe ſeditious writs, pamphlets and books, and that the ſame be preſented to the Lords 'to be ſearched by ſuch as were appointed for that 'effect. But by the providence of God the books 'were brought out of the ſhip a day or two before 'it was ſearched, and were keeped cloſe till the approaching of Eaſter Communion; to wit, An 'Epiſtle to a Chriſtian Brother, An Exhortation to the 'Kirk of Edinburgh, A Diſpute againſt communicating, 'where there was Kneeling, Confuſion of Geſtures and 'Actions. The courſe of Conformity was ſet forth 'two years before, and the Latin book, intituled, 'Altare Damaſcenum; and two other years before, 'The Speech of the Kirk to her beloved Children, the 'Altar of Damaſcus, in Engliſh, and The Confutation of Doctor Mitchelſon's Reaſons for kneeling. 'The Antitheſis between the Paſtor and the Prelate, 'came not to light, till four or five years after 'this (13).'

[F] Under the title of the true Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland.] The entire work of Mr. David Calderwood, very neatly tranſcribed in ſix fair volumes in folio, by the care of Mr. William Dunlopp, Principal of the College of Glaſgow, is preſerved in the public library of that Univerſity. In the firſt volume, immediately after the title page, there is the following note. 'This work, comprehended in —— 'pages, is collected out of Mr. Knox's Hiſtory and 'his Memorials, gathered for the continuation of his 'Hiſtory out of Mr. James Melvil's Obſervations, 'Mr. John Davidſon his Diary, the Acts of the 'General Aſſemblies, and Acts of Parliament, and 'out of ſeveral Proclamations, and Scroles of diverſe: 'and comprehendeth an Hiſtory from the beginning 'of the reign of King James V. to the death of 'King James VI. but is contracted and digeſted in 'a better order, in a work of three volumes, bound 'in parchment, and is comprehended in 2013 pages. 'Out of which work contracted, is extracted another 'in leſſer bounds, but wanting nothing in ſubſtance, 'and comprehended in —— pages, which the author 'deſireth only to be communicated to others, and 'this with the other, contracted into three volumes 'to ſerve only for the defence of the third, and 'preſervation of the Hiſtory, in caſe it be loſt.' The firſt of the ſix volumes, gives a large introduction, wherein the author undertakes to inform us of the time when, and the perſons by whom the iſland of Great-Britain was firſt inhabited: and afterwards brings down the Scottiſh Civil Hiſtory as well as the Eccleſiaſtical, from the firſt planting of Chriſtianity to the end of James IVth's reign. After his account appear, for his hiſtory reaches no lower than the death of King James; but, it ſeems probable, from his mentioning the death of Mr. Robert Bruce, which happened in 1631 (q), that he lived pretty far in the reign of King Charles I; and this we find confirmed by what is ſaid in the advertiſement prefixed to the laſt edition of the Altare Damaſcenum, of his being Miniſter at Pencaithland near Edinburgh in 1638, but neither there or elſewhere can we find any notice of the time of his deceaſe. He was certainly a man of quick parts and profound learning, as fully appears from his conduct in his writings; and therefore it is but juſt that an account ſhould be given of him in a collection of this nature, more eſpecially as this article will inform the Engliſh reader of the nature of thoſe diſputes in Scotland, which, though he had ſo large a ſhare in them, are but very briefly repreſented by Archbiſhop Spotſwood, and are far from being fairly or diſtinctly treated by the famous Dr. Heylyn. It is not neceſſary that we ſhould attempt to give any character of this extraordinary perſon, ſince the Reader will be abundantly able to frame one for himſelf, from the matters of fact which we have delivered, and therefore we ſhall content ourſelves with adding, that all the writers on the ſide of Nonconformity, have ſet a very high value upon his performances; and the judicious Mr. Calamy (r), has particularly pointed out his Altare Damaſcenum as a capital work on that ſide of the queſtion.

account of the affairs of the State and the Church, we have a view of all the moſt conſiderable wars and battles (domeſtic and foreign) wherein the people of Scotland have been engaged before the ſaid period, as alſo of the ancient honorary titles, and their inſtitution. On this laſt head he quotes an old manuſcript, ſent from Icolmkill to Mr. George Buchanan, which teſtifies that a Parliament was held at Forfar, in the year 1061, wherein ſurnames are appointed to be taken, and ſeveral Earls, Barons, Lords, and Knights, were created. After this general Preface, he begins his proper work, The Hiſtory of the Scottiſh Reformation. And in this volume, advances as far as the marriage of Queen Mary, with the Lord Darnley, in the year 1565. In his ſtory of Mr. Patrick Hamilton, the protomartyr in this cauſe, he gives a copy of the ſentence pronounced againſt him, together with a congratulatory letter from the Doctors at Louvain to the Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, on the occaſion of his death. Amongſt thoſe learned men, who upon the firſt perſecution fled into Germany, he reckons Mr. George Buchanan. In his large account of the Diſputes and Sufferings of the Reformers, under the Adminiſtration of Cardinal Beaton, and the Queen Regent, we have the particulars of the contentions at Frankfurt, which are moſtly taken out of a book, intituled, A Brief Diſcovery of the Troubles of Mr. John Knox, for oppoſing the Engliſh Service Book, in 1554. After which we have Knox's Appeal, from the ſentence of the Clergy, to the Nobility, Eſtates, and Community of Scotland, with a great many letters from the Nobility to the Queen-Regent and him, on the ſubject of Religion. All this part of the Hiſtory, which in the printed book makes no more than thirteen pages, ends at pag. 571; from whence (to the end of the book at pag. 902) there is a good collection of curious Letters, Remonſtrances, &c. which are not in the prints, either of Knox or Calderwood. The ſecond volume contains the Hiſtory from 1565, to the arraignment of the Earl of Moreton for treaſon, in December 1580, and contains 614 pages, wherein are many valuable diſcoveries relating to the practices of David Rizzio, the King's murder, Bothwell's marriage and flight, &c. and a more perfect Narrative of the proceedings in the General Aſſemblies, than the printed Hiſtory will afford us. The third volume, comprehends the entire Hiſtory of both Church and State, from the beginning of January 1581 to July 1586, when Queen Mary's Letter to Babington was intercepted. Under the year 1584, there is a ſevere character of Mr. Patrick Adamſon, Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's (14); which in the concluſion refers us for a farther account of him, to a poem made by one Robert Semple, and intituled, The Legend of the Limmer's Life. Here is alſo An Account of the State and Church of Scotland to the Church of Geneva, which was written by Andrew Melvil, in anſwer to the miſrepreſentations of the Scottiſh Diſcipline ſcattered in foreign Countries, by the ſaid Archbiſhop Adamſon. The fourth gives the like mixt hiſtory of affairs, from July 1586 to the beginning of the year 1596. Here we have a full collection of papers relating to the trial, condemnation, and execution, of the unfortunate Queen Mary, with abundance of others, touching the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this Decennium. In the year 1587, there is a large account of the coming of the Sieur du Bartas into Scotland; of his being carried by King James to the Univerſity of St. Andrew's, his hearing of the Lectures of Mr. A. Melvil there, and the great opinion he had of the abilities of that Profeſſor, &c. In 1590, there are ſome ſmart reflections on Dr. Bancroft's Sermon at Paul's Croſs, cenſuring the proceedings of J. Knox, and others of the Northern Reformers, with the Aſſembly's Letter to Queen Elizabeth about that ſermon. The fifth volume reaches from the beginning of January 1596, to the ſame month in 1607. After the accounts of the proceedings of the Aſſembly in 1596, the author ſubjoins this pathetic Epiphonema: Here end all the ſincere Aſſemblies General of the Kirk of Scotland, enjoying the liberty of the Goſpel under the free government of Chriſt. The new and conſtant Platt of Planting all the Kirks of Scotland (written by Mr. David Lindſay, one of the Octavians) is here inſerted at large, as it was preſented to the King and States in the ſaid year 1596. The Hiſtory of the Conſpiracy of the Gowries, and the manner of its diſcovery is likewiſe here recorded at length, in the ſame order, wherein the King commanded it to be publiſhed. The new form of Nomination to Biſhopricks, the Proteſtation in Parliament againſt the Reſtitution of Epiſcopacy, and the Reaſons offered againſt it by others, are the remaining matters of conſideration in this book. The ſixth concludes with the death of King James VI. (15) C.

 [Whatever merit Calderwood's true Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland may have in point of authenticity and information, it is written in a way, both with reſpect to the ſpirit and ſtile of it, which renders it very unpleaſant in the peruſal. Neither can the manners of the Scotch Preſbyterian Clergy of that period be contemplated, by a liberal mind, without ſome degree of diſguſt. It will not appear ſurprizing, that King James the Sixth of Scotland, and the Firſt of England, contracted a diſlike to them; when we conſider that, beſides their rudeneſs in general, they were too deficient in that perſonal reſpect which is always regarded as due to a Sovereign.

When it is ſaid, with particular reference, we ſuppoſe, to Calderwood's 'Altare Damaſcenum,' that all the writers on the ſide of Nonconformity have ſet a very high value upon his performances, the aſſertion muſt be reſtricted to the older writers among the Engliſh Preſbyterians. Few of the modern Diſſenters, we believe, have read the 'Altare Damaſ-'cenum;' and if they had read it, would probably differ from the author in many points. The Jus Divinum of Preſbyterianiſm would not now be contended for; and Diſſenting Miniſters, who ſhould at preſent engage in vindicating their ſeparation from the Eſtabliſhed Church, might not think of looking into Mr. Calderwood's Works.] K.

CALFHILL or CALFILL (JAMES) a learned Divine of the XVIth Century, otherwiſe named Calfield, Cawfield, Chalfhill (a), or Calfed (b), was born in Shropſhire [A], in the year 1530 (c). He received his education at Eaton School, and from thence was ſent, in 1545, to King's College in Cambridge. But he was removed, with many other Cambridgemen, in 1548, to Chriſt-Church in Oxford, newly founded by King Henry VIII (d). Here he ſhewed himſelf to be a perſon of quick wit, and great capacity; being an excellent Poet and author of a Tragedy, with other Theatrical performances (e). In 1549, he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts (f); and that of Maſter, in 1552 (g), being junior of the Act celebrated in St. Mary's Church, July 18 (h). He was made, in 1560, Canon of the ſecond Canonry in Chriſt-Church Cathedral Oxon; and, on the 12th of December 1561, took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (i). In 1562, he was Proctor for the Clergy of London, and the Chapter of Oxford, in the Convocation that made the XXXIX Articles (k): and on the 16th of May, the ſame year, was admitted to the Rectory of St. Andrew Wardrobe, London (l). The 4th of October following, he was preſented by the Crown to the Prebend of St. Pancras, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul (m): and May 4, 1565, was collated by Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the Rectory of Bocking, in Eſſex (n): as he was alſo, July the 16th following, to the Archdeaconry of Colcheſter in Eſſex, by Edmund Grindal, Biſhop of London (o). The ſame year, on the 17th of December, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (p). In 1568, he preached two ſermons in Briſtol-Cathedral, on purpoſe to confute ſome opinions of Dr. Cheney [B], who held that See in commendam (q). In the year 1569, he made application to Secretary Cecil, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, for the Provoſtſhip of King's College, but Dr. Goad's intereſt prevailed (r). Upon the tranſlation of Dr. Edwin Sandys from the Biſhoprick of Worceſter to that of London, in 1570, Dr. Calfhill was nominated by Queen Elizabeth to ſucceed him (s); but, before his conſecration thereto, he died, about the beginning of Auguſt, (having a little before reſigned his Canonry of Chriſt-Church, and Rectory of St. Andrew Wardrobe) and was buried in the Chancel of Bocking Church (t). His works were as follow: I. Querela Oxonienſis Academiæ ad Cantabrigiam; i. e. 'The complaint of the Univerſity of Oxford to Cambridge.' Lond. 1552, 4*to*. A Latin Poem on the death of Henry and Charles Brandon, ſons of Charles, Duke of Suffolk, who died of the ſweating-ſickneſs in the Biſhop of Lincoln's houſe at Bugden, July 14, 1551. II. Hiſtoria de exhumatione Catherinæ nuper uxoris Pet. Martyris. i. e. 'The Hiſtory of the digging up the body of Catherine late 'wife of Peter Martyr.' Lond. 1562, 8*vo*. III. Anſwer to John Martiall's Treatiſe of the Croſs, gathered out of the Scriptures, Councils, and ancient Fathers of the primitive Church (u). Lond. 1565, 4*to*. IV. Progne, a Tragedy, in Latin; which probably was never printed. V. Poemata varia; ſeveral Poems (w). As to his character, we are informed, That he was in his younger days a noted Poet and Comedian; and in his elder, an exact diſputant, and had an excellent faculty in ſpeaking and preaching (x). One who had heard him preach, gives this account of him: 'His excellent tongue, 'and rhetorical tale, filled with good and wholeſome doctrine, ſo raviſhed the minds 'of the hearers, that they were all in admiration of his eloquence (y).'

[B] On purpoſe to confute ſome opinions of Dr. Cheney.] Dr. Richard Cheney was Biſhop of Glouceſter, and held with it the See of Briſtol in Commendam. By ſome perſons he had been accuſed of ſpeaking irreverently of Calvin and Luther, on account of their notions of Free-will, &c. and of preferring much the ancient Fathers to them (2). Dr. Calfhill, therefore, who was very orthodox, and a great admirer of all Calvin's opinions, was employed to confute him in his own Cathedral; and uſed in his ſermons the new coined phraſe of Free-willers. The Biſhop deſired to confer with him, but he never would wait upon him; which does not redound much to his credit (3).

CALVERT (GEORGE) deſcended from the ancient and noble houſe of Calvert in the Earldom of Flanders (a), and afterwards created Lord Baltimore, was born at Kipling in the North-riding of Yorkſhire (b), about the year 1582 (c); being the ſon of Leonard Calvert, and Alice his wife, daughter of John Croſtland, of Croſtland, in the ſame county. In the beginning of the year 1593, he became a Commoner of Trinity-College in Oxford, being then very young (d); and on the 23d of February 1596-7, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e): after which leaving the college, he travelled beyond the ſeas for a time. At his return, in King James Iſt's reign, he was made Secretary to Robert Cecil, then one of the chief Secretaries of State, being eſteemed a very knowing perſon in ſtate-affairs (f). And ſo well ſatisfied was Sir Robert with his faithfulneſs and diligence, that when he was raiſed to the office of Lord High-Treaſurer, he continued him in his ſervice, and employed him in ſeveral weighty matters (g). On the 30th of Auguſt 1605, when King James I. was entertained by the Univerſity of Oxford, he was created Maſter of Arts, with ſeveral Noblemen, Knights, and Eſquires (h). Afterwards, by the intereſt of his Patron Robert, Earl of Saliſbury, he was made one of the Clerks of the Privy-Council; and in 1617, September tember the 29th, received the honour of Knighthood from his Majeſty at Hampton-Court (i). On the 15th of February 1618-19, he was appointed one of the Principal Secretaries of State, in the room of Sir Thomas Lake; and the King made great uſe of him, becauſe he was better acquainted with State-affairs, and more diligent in diſpatching buſineſs, than his partner and fellow-ſecretary Sir Robert Naunton (k). He was ſworn, the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, into this important office (l); which he diſcharged with great truſt and induſtry [A]. As a reward for it, the King granted him, May 2, 1620, a yearly penſion of a thouſand pounds, out of the cuſtoms (m). But, after having enjoyed that place about five years, he willingly reſigned it in 1624; freely owning to his Majeſty, That he was become a Roman Catholic; ſo that he muſt either be wanting to his truſt, or violate his conſcience in diſcharging his office. This ingenuous confeſſion ſo affected King James, that he continued him Privy-Counſellor all his reign (n); and on the ſixteenth of February (o) 1624-5, created him (by the name of Sir George Calvert, of Danbywiſke in Yorkſhire, Knight) Baron of Baltimore, in the county of Longford, in Ireland. He was at that time one of the Repreſentatives in Parliament for the Univerſity of Oxford (p). While he was Secretary, he obtained a Patent, for him and his heirs, to be abſolute Lord and Proprietor (with the royalties of a Count-Palatine) of the province of Avalon, in Newfoundland: Which was ſo named by him, from Avalon, in Somerſetſhire, wherein Glaſtonbury ſtands, the firſt-fruits of Chriſtianity in Britain, as the other was in that part of America. Here he built a fine houſe in Ferryland, and ſpent twenty-five thouſand pounds in advancing this new Plantation. After the death of King James, he went twice in perſon to Newfoundland; and when Monſieur de l'Arade, with three men of war ſent from the King of France, had reduced our Engliſh fiſhermen to great extremity, this Lord, with two ſhips manned at his own expence, chaſed away the French, relieved the Engliſh, and took ſixty of the French priſoners (q). However, finding his plantation very much expoſed to the inſults of the French, he was, at laſt, forced to abandon it (r). Upon this he went over to Virginia, and, after having viewed thoſe parts, came to England, and obtained from King Charles I. (who had as great a regard and affection for him as King James) a patent, to him and his heirs, for Maryland on the north of Virginia [B]; with the ſame title and royalties as had been conferred upon him with reſpect to Avalon aforementioned (s). He died in London, April 15, 1632, in the fifty-firſt year of his age, and was buried in the chancel of the church of St. Dunſtan's in the Weſt, in Fleet-ſtreet (t). As to Sir George Calvert's character; One hiſtorian (u), who hardly ſpeaks well of any body, calls him an Hiſpaniolized Papiſt. But others (w) tell us in his praiſe, That though he was a Roman Catholic,

[B] King Charles I. granted him a patent, to him and his heirs, for Maryland.] That country was firſt diſcovered by Sebaſtian Cabot in 1497, but more perfectly in 1584, by Sir Walter Raleigh, and always paſſed for part of Virginia, till the year 1631, when King Charles I. made a grant of it to George Calvert, Baron of Baltimore. This Lord not living to ſee his grant made out, his ſon Cecil Calvert, Lord Baltimore (who had been at Virginia, and had looked out for a proper place to fix a new plantation of his own) took it out in his own name, and the Patent bears date June 20, 1632. The bounds of that country are thus aſcertained therein; namely—All that part of a peninſula lying between the ocean on the Eaſt, and the bay of Cheſepeak on the Weſt, and divided from the other part [or Accomac belonging to Virginia] by a right line drawn from Watkin's point on the Weſt, to the main ocean on the Eaſt; and between that bound on the South, to that part of Delaware-bay on the North, which lies under the 40th degree of northern latitude. And all that tract of land, from the foreſaid bay of Delaware, in a right line, by the degree aforeſaid, to the true meridian of the firſt fountain of the river Patowmeck, and from thence tending towards the South to the farther bank of the foreſaid river, and following the weſt and ſouth-ſide of it to a place called Cinquack, ſituate near the mouth of the ſaid river, where it falls into the bay of Cheſepeak, &c. On the Weſt it is bounded, at preſent, by the Aſpalathean mountains: And is in length, from North to South, 140 miles; but the breadth of it, from Eaſt to Weſt, is not ſo much. The Lord Baltimore was to hold it of the Crown of England in common ſocage, as of the manor of Windſor; paying yearly, on Eaſter-Tueſday, two Indian arrows of thoſe parts at the caſtle of Windſor, and the fifth part of the gold and ſilver ore that ſhall be found there. King Charles himſelf was pleaſed to give that province the name of Maryland, in honour of his beloved Queen Henrietta Maria. Cecil Lord Baltimore intended to go thither in perſon; but afterwards, changing his mind, he appointed his brother, Leonard Calvert, Eſq; to go Governor in his ſtead, with whom he joined in commiſſion Jeremy Hawley, and Thomas Cornwallis, Eſqrs. The firſt colony ſent thither, conſiſted of about two hundred people, Roman Catholics, the chief of whom were gentlemen of good families. They ſailed from Cowes, in the Iſle of Wight, November 22, 1633, and arrived at Point Comfort, in the bay of Cheſepeak, February the 24th following; and continuing their voyage, went northward as far as the river of Patowmeck. Since that time, this colony has become very conſiderable and flouriſhing, being chiefly peopled with Roman Catholics, who have tranſplanted themſelves thither, in order to avoid the penal laws made againſt them in England. At the Revolution, the Lord Baltimore was deprived of the power of appointing a Governor, and other officers; and the government of that province fell under the ſame regulation as other plantations, which are immediately ſubject to the Crown. Before the confuſions in America, the Baltimore family, as Proprietors of Maryland, derived a large revenue from it; being entitled to a duty on every hogſhead of tobacco exported; enjoying ſeveral manors, which might be ſtyled their demeſne lands, and having a rent paid them by every planter, beſides other perquiſites. The chief product of the country is tobacco: and it is divided into ten counties (2).

yet he kept himſelf ſincere and diſengaged from all intereſts; and was the only ſtateſman, that being engaged to a decried party, managed his buſineſs with that great reſpect for all ſides, that all who knew him applauded him; and none that had any thing to do with him, complained of him. He was a man of great ſenſe, but not obſtinate in his ſentiments, taking as great pleaſure in hearing others opinions, as in delivering his own. Whilſt he was Secretary of State, he carried every night to the King a digeſted and exact account of affairs, and took the pains to examine himſelf the letters that were of any conſequence (x). Judge Popham and he agreed in the public deſign of foreign plantations, but differed in the manner of managing them (y). The first was for extirpating the original heathen inhabitants, the ſecond for converting them: the former ſent the lewdeſt people to thoſe places, the latter was for the ſobereſt: the one was for preſent profit, the other for a reaſonable expectation; liking to have but few Governors, and thoſe not intereſted merchants, but unconcerned gentlemen; granting liberties with great caution; and leaving every one to provide for himſelf by his own induſtry, and not out of a common ſtock [C].

CAMDEN (WILLIAM) one of the moſt learned Writers, moſt diligent Antiquaries, and moſt impartial Hiſtorians, that the laſt age, or this country, produced, was deſcended from honeſt and reputable parents. His father, Samſon Camden, was a native of Litchfield in Staffordſhire, but, ſettling in London, became a member of the company of Painter-Stainers (a). His mother was of a very antient and worthy family, as himſelf hath recorded, viz. the Curwens of Wirkington, in the county of Cumberland (b). He was born May 2, 1551, at his father's houſe in the Old Bailey (c). He received the firſt tincture of letters in Chriſt's Hoſpital (d), erected the year after his birth, by that learned and pious young Prince, Edward VI. but at what time he was ſent thither does not appear, the records of that Hoſpital being deſtroyed in the fire of London, 1666. In the year 1563 he was removed to Iſlington, being infected with the plague, and remained there ſome time, which retarded his progreſs in learning (e). He was afterwards ſent to St. Paul's ſchool (f), where the pregnancy of his parts, and his aſſiduous application, diſtinguiſhed him to ſuch a degree, that in 1566 he was removed to the univerſity of Oxford, where he was entered a Servitor in Magdalen-college, being then about fifteen years old (g), and perfected himſelf in grammar learning in the ſchool adjoining, of which Dr. Thomas Cooper, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, was Maſter (h). Upon his miſſing a Demy's place in his college, he removed from thence to Broadgate-Hall, now Pembroke-College, in the ſame univerſity (i), where he remained two years and a half, under the tuition of Dr. Thomas Thornton, Canon of Chriſt-church, and his great patron. He left behind him here a ſignal mark of the reſpect paid him by his contemporaries, in the ſhort Latin Graces of his compoſition, which, for many years after, were uſed by the Scholars of this Society (k). He removed from hence to Chriſt-Church, where he was provided for by the kindneſs of Dr. Thornton, during the time he continued at the univerſity (l) [A]. It was about [A] By the kindneſs of Dr. Thornton, during the time he continued at the univerſity.] There are very few lives that have been written with greater care than that of our author by different pens; and yet there have been ſome miſtakes committed, of which it is neceſſary to take notice, that things may not be cenſured as deficiencies in this article, which, when explained, we hope will appear corrections. Degory Wheare, who was Camden's Profeſſor of Hiſtory at Oxford, in his Oration on the death of that great man, which he pronounced very ſoon after his deceaſe, places his birth in 1550, but without naming the day (1). It is in conſequence of this that he brings him to Oxford in 1565, and very probably his authority might have paſſed, if Camden himſelf had not ſettled both theſe dates, in a paper of memoranda which we find publiſhed by Dr. Smith; and theſe leading dates are of very great conſequence towards ſettling all the reſt (2). The time of his being ſeized by the plague is alſo fixed by Camden; but he ſays nothing of his being at the Hoſpital of Chriſt-Church, which one may preſume is the reaſon that a judicious Prelate treats it as a ſtory founded only on tradition (3). But this tradition muſt have been early, ſince we find the fact very poſitively mentioned in Wheare's Oration (4), nor do I know that it has been queſtioned by any author. What ſeems to confirm it is the lowneſs of his circumſtances at the time he was ſent to Oxford, where he depended on the kindneſs of Dr. Cooper, and his removal to Broadgate-Hall, which was the effect of Dr. Thornton's kindneſs for him (5). At the ſame time that theſe circumſtances demonſtrate his neceſſities, they carry along with them teſtimonies of unuſual vigour and firmneſs of mind, in the purſuit of knowledge under ſuch difficulties, and of his pregnant parts and happy diſpoſition, that before he was twenty, he could raiſe himſelf ſuch powerful patrons from his perſonal merit. This laſt protector being advanced to a canonry of Chriſt-Church, carried him along with him, and entertained him in his own lodgings (6). At this time it was, that his friendſhip commenced with the two Carews, Richard and George, the latter of whom was afterwards raiſed by King James to the title of Earl of Totneſs; and it has been ſuppoſed, that, as they were both Antiquaries, their converſation might give Mr. Camden a turn that way (7). This is the more probable, becauſe we learn from himſelf that before about this time, that, by the encouragement of his friends, he became a candidate for a fellowſhip in the college of All-Souls, and which he loſt by the intrigues of the Popiſh party, on account of his zeal for the Church of England as by law eſtabliſhed (m). In 1570, he ſupplicated the venerable Congregation of Regents of that univerſity, that he might be admitted Bachelor of Arts (n), but in this alſo he miſcarried. The year following he came up to London, and proſecuted his ſtudies under the patronage, and by the aſſiſtance, of Dr. Gabriel Goodman, and Dr. Godfrey Goodman, his brother, who ſupplied him both with money and books for that purpoſe (o). In 1573, he returned to Oxford, where he ſupplicated again, in the beginning of the month of March, for the degree that had been refuſed him; and his requeſt being now granted, he took, but did not compleat, it by determination (p). In 1575, by the intereſt of his friend Dean Goodman, he was made Second Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, which office he executed with great diligence, capacity, and ſucceſs (q); ſo that his reputation daily increaſed, and he became known to, and admired by, the great ornaments of the literary world, both at home and abroad [B]. As much of his time as he could ſpare from the duties of his arduous employment, he beſtowed on the ſtudy of Antiquities, to which he had addicted himſelf while at Oxford; to the proſecution of which he was excited by Godfrey Goodman, nephew to the Dean of Weſtminſter (r), Dr. Gabriel Goodman, and much encouraged by the famous Sir Philip Sidney (s), whoſe reputation for learning, and being the patron of learned men, our author gratefully celebrated (t). He at this time meditated the great work he afterwards compoſed in honour of his native country, and with equal care and diligence peruſed all that the Antients have left in their writings concerning Britain; with indefatigable induſtry ſearched out and examined the Hiſtorical Writers of our own country, of which very few at that time had been publiſhed; and with equal ſkill and labour viſited the records, and other repoſitories of that kind of learning which ſuited his purpoſe (u). In 1581, the learned Preſident Briſſon, being employed here by the French Court, in a negociation of great importance, he entered into a ſtrict friendſhip and cloſe correſpondence with Mr. Camden (w), which continued to the deplorable death of that eminent Magiſtrate [C]. In 1582, he took a journey through Suffolk into Yorkſhire, and returned before he left Oxford, he had a ſtrong inclination to theſe ſtudies, and that he could never hear any thing mentioned relating to that ſubject (8), without more than ordinary attention. After he quitted the univerſity, and before he was ſettled at Weſtminſter, he made frequent excurſions for the ſake of informing himſelf in matters of this nature, and began very early to form thoſe collections (9), out of which he afterwards drew his learned and laborious performance.

[B] By the great ornaments of the literary world, both at home and abroad.] There appears to be ſome confuſion in the accounts that are given us of Mr. Camden's patrons, the three Goodman's; and a very accurate French writer, who has written a very good account of our author, mentions it as an error in Bayle, that he took Dr. Godfrey Goodman for the brother of Dr. Gabriel, which, if it be an error, he certainly copied from Smith (10). Mr. Camden himſelf acknowledges very handſomely, the favours he received from Dr. Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Weſtminſter; and Anthony Wood poſitively aſſerts, that Godfrey Goodman, who was the Dean's nephew, and, as I take it, the ſon of Dr. Godfrey Goodman, ſupplied our author with books and money, and defrayed the expences of his journies (11), which account he borrowed from a MS. in the Bodleian Library (12), written by a third Godfrey Goodman, ſome time Biſhop of Glouceſter, ſon to the ſecond, and grandſon to the firſt, and who was himſelf ſcholar to Camden, ſo that he might be very well acquainted with the acts of friendſhip he received from his family. It is more probable that Mr. Godfrey Goodman, the Biſhop of Glouceſter's father, and nephew to the Dean of Weſtminſter, was our author's great patron; becauſe, in the ſpace of between four and five years, which elapſed between Mr. Camden's coming from Oxford to his being ſettled as Second Maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool, by the intereſt of Dean Goodman, he had no employment, and in this time it was, that he made moſt of thoſe journies (13). Beſides theſe he had many other friends and patrons, ſuch, particularly, as Mr. Thomas Savile, brother to the learned Sir Henry Savile, and, as plainly appears by his letters to Camden himſelf, one of the learneſt men of his time, and as ſuch, celebrated by Mr. Camden and others (14); and Mr. Edward Stradling, who was alſo a man of rank and diſtinguiſhed knowledge. Amongſt foreigners, Abraham Ortelius, the moſt able Geographer of his age, coming over to England made an acquaintance with Camden, and correſponded with him conſtantly. He was alſo very intimate with the famous Hotman, who had been Secretary to the Great Earl of Leiceſter; Juſtus Lipſius, Janus Douſa the younger, Janus Gruter, and many others (15). The reader will obſerve, that this account of his friends relates to the time while he was compoſing, and before he publiſhed, his Britannia; for after that came abroad, the number of his domeſtic and foreign patrons became much more numerous.

[C] To the deplorable death of that eminent Magiſtrate.] This honourable perſon, who was a Lawyer by profeſſion, and eſteemed one of the moſt learned men in France, was, in the month of Auguſt 1580, after having exerciſed for five years the office of Advocate-General to the Parliament of Paris, promoted to the rank of Preſident à Mortier, and was ſoon after declared Counſellor of State by Henry III. who ſent him over to England, to negociate a match between Queen Elizabeth and his brother the Duke of Anjou, at which time he came acquainted with Camden: and how high a value our author ſet upon his friendſhip, appears from his entering it amongſt thoſe few articles he ſet down relating to his own affairs (16). The Preſident Briſſon returning into France, had a large ſhare in the tranſactions of the State, and remaining at Paris when that city revolted againſt his maſter, and declared for the League, he was, by that faction, on the eleventh of January 1589, declared Firſt Preſident of the Parliament, in the room of Achilles de Harlay, whom, for his loyalty, they had thrown into priſon: but Preſident Briſſon, at the time of his accepting the office, declared, by an act under his hand, that he did it under force, that he did not receive his office as an honour (17), but as the only means he had left to ſave his life. Two years after this, a perſon being tried before the Parliament, for correſponding with the King, and being acquitted, the faction reſolved to revenge themſelves upon the Firſt Preſident, whom they condemned to be hanged, and executed their ſentence returned through Lancaſhire in the month of April (x), that he might examine with his own eyes, and upon the ſpot, ſome of thoſe Antiquities which he meant to illuſtrate in his great work, for the improvement of which he had carried on, for many years, a conſtant correſpondence with the moſt learned and judicious perſons of our own and other nations (y). He was fully ſenſible of all the difficulties of the taſk he had undertaken, and foreſaw to how great envy he ſhould be expoſed, by venturing upon ſuch a piece, as muſt naturally draw the attention of the learned throughout Europe; and therefore he omitted nothing that might render it worthy of that attention, and of the expectation of his friends. At length, in 1586, his performance appeared; and though much enlarged and improved in future editions, was even then eſteemed an honour to its author, and the glory of his country (z) [D]. In the month of June 1588, he ſupplicated the Univerſity of Oxford for the degree of Maſter of Arts, which deſire of his was granted conditionally, as we are told by Anthony Wood, that he ſhould ſtand in the Act following; but the ſame writer informs us, that his admiſſion occurs not in their Regiſter (a). The year following he made a journey into Devonſhire, and in the month of June, as himſelf tells us, was at Iffarcomb (b), which is a prebend of the church of Saliſbury, and had been beſtowed upon him on the ſixth of February preceding, by Dr. John Piers, then Biſhop of that dioceſe, and our author's intimate friend (c). The principal deſign of this journey, was to viſit the places moſt famous for their Antiquities in the Weſt; and the expence of this and others for the ſame purpoſe, and in order to improve his Deſcription of Britain, were defrayed, as we are told, by Mr. Godfrey Goodman (d). In 1590, he made a journey into Wales, in company with the famous Dr. Godwin, afterwards an eminent Prelate (e), and ſucceſſively Biſhop of Landaff and Hereford, that he might examine the Antiquities of

The famous M. de Thou, though he was no friend of his, is pleaſed to confeſs, That the Republic of Letters ſuſtained a ſenſible loſs by his death (19). The king his maſter was wont frequently to expreſs his eſteem for him by ſaying, 'That he believed no Prince in Europe had 'ſo learned a ſubject as his Briſſon.' Indeed his writings, upon a great variety of ſubjects, fully ſupport this character: but in all probability, it was his conſummate knowledge in ancient Geography and Hiſtory, that ſet him ſo high in the opinion of our author.

[D] Eſteemed an honour to its author, and the glory of his country.] The title of this work runs thus, Britanniæ, ſive florentiſſimorum Regnorum Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ, & Inſularum adjacentium ex intimâ antiquitate Chorographica deſcriptio. Londini, 1586, 8vo. i. e. 'Britain, or a Chorographical Deſcription of the flouriſhing kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the adjacent iſlands, from 'the moſt remote antiquity.' There ſeems to be nothing better fixed than the date of our author's firſt edition. He has aſſigned it himſelf expreſsly in his memorials, 1586 Britannium edidi (20). He affirms the ſame thing in his preface to his laſt edition; and yet Anthony Wood ſets down the firſt edition to have been in 1582, and makes the ſecond impreſſion in 1585 (21), though in another work of his, he had fixed the firſt edition to 1585 (22). By this means Niceron is led into a miſtake (23), as indeed might eaſily have happened to the moſt careful foreigner: but how, or whence, this error in Wood aroſe, is not to be gueſſed; for the author himſelf tells us, that he ſpent ten years in compiling it, and that he was firſt put upon it by Ortelius; by which it plainly appears, that he began to digeſt his collections the year after he came to Weſtminſter (24). It would require more room than we have to ſpare, to enter even into a brief account of the mighty praiſes that were beſtowed upon this book, even on its firſt and imperfect appearance; I mean, in compariſon of what it became afterwards, through the continual care and application of its author: But it may not be amiſs to inſert a paragraph or two from a letter written to our author by Mr. William Lambard (25), the famous Kentiſh Antiquary, to whom he communicated a part of it before it went to the preſs; the rather, becauſe the date of this letter, which is July 9, 1585, plainly proves there could be no edition till long after that time, notwithſtanding what Anthony Wood aſſerts in expreſs terms. 'I thank you moſt heartily, good 'Mr. Camden, for the uſe of theſe books of your's, 'ſince they deliver many things that are not, ſo far 'as I do know, elſewhere to be had, and the ſame 'no leſs learnedly picked out than delicately uttered 'and written. What praiſe you deſerve in all, I 'can beſt tell by Kent, wherein (howſoever I have 'laboured myſelf) I learn many things by you that I 'knew not before. Your conjecture at the etymon 'of the word Cantium is ſo probable, that you make 'me now doubt of mine own, which before I took 'to be moſt aſſured; you have ſo truly, as I think, 'traced out Leneham, Chilham, and Newendene, 'by the old Durolenum, Jul-laber, and Anderida, 'as I ſhall for ever hereafter reſt in your opinion of 'them. To be plain, I ſeem to myſelf not to have 'known Kent, till I knew Camden. If you have in 'purpoſe to perform the reſt, go on boldly, good 'Mr. Camden, wherein if you ſhall uſe the ſame 'dexterity that hitherto you have done (as I fear not 'but you will) Aceſii & Heliconis opera dixerim. 'Howſoever you ſhall be minded to do more or leſs, 'defraud not your countrymen of ſo great a pleaſure, 'nor the country itſelf of ſo great an honour, by 'forbearing to imprint the ſame. If I had any 'thing that might further your ſtudy, I would moſt 'willingly impart it; and whether I have or no, I 'will make yourſelf the judge, if it ſhall like you 'to come down into Kent, and look amongſt my 'papers.'

This work Mr. Camden dedicated to his firſt and great patron William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Knight of the Garter, and High-Treaſurer of England; and in his dedication he very fully acknowledges, not only the many kindneſſes and benefits he had received from him, but his aſſiſtance alſo in the work, and the great helps derived to him from the uſe of his well-choſen library. It is obſervable, that this dedication is dated May 2, 1586, ſo that our author finiſhed this work preciſely at the age of thirty-five; and yet, as he informs us himſelf, he dedicated thereto only his ſpare hours and holidays, the duties of his office engroſſing all the reſt of his time. He ſpeaks largely, and yet very modeſtly, of the many and great obſtacles he met with, and of the pains he took to overcome them: He ſhews a juſt ſenſe of the hazard he ran in publiſhing his labours, and his apprehenſion that they might provoke more than one ſort of men againſt him; but at the ſame time he profeſſes, that the encouragement of Ortelius and other friends, his own zeal for truth, and his paſſion for the ſervice of his country, inſpired him with a generous reſolution of daring all the envy of the Critics, rather than not attempt to render that juſtice to Britain, which had ſo long been denied to it.

this part of the iſland: for, as himſelf informs us, he was above all things deſirous of having the beſt and cleareſt evidence of things he undertook to write about, that the nature of thoſe things would admit. In point of Antiquities, he had recourſe to the moſt ancient authors, which, out of the duſt of libraries, he brought forth to public light: in reference to Civil Hiſtory, he ſearched the archives of this kingdom, both by himſelf and by his friends: as to deſcents and the memoirs of great families, he obtained the beſt lights that he could; and the ſame method he took, in regard to the deſcription of places; but finding great variation in theſe, he was willing to undergo any labour requiſite to come at truth, and that his reputation, which was continually riſing, might not give a ſanction to the miſtakes of other men, reported by him (f). On the twenty-third of October 1592, he was ſeized with an ague, which proved a quartan, and notwithſtanding all the helps he received from phyſic, held him long, and brought him low (g). While he was labouring under this diſtemper, Doctor Edward Grant, who for about twenty years had worthily executed the office of Head-Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, worn out with fatigue, reſigned it in February 1592-3 (h); and in the month of March following, was ſucceeded therein by Mr. Camden (i). Some indeed, and amongſt the reſt, the very learned and accurate Dr. Smith, have affirmed, that it was upon the death of that learned perſon (k) he came into his place; but the fact is otherwiſe, and therefore it is the more requiſite to correct an error of ſo long ſtanding [E]. In the ſucceeding year, but not till the middle of ſummer, he became perfectly free from his ague (l); and ſoon after publiſhed the fourth edition of his Britannia, which was now very much enlarged, and appeared in many reſpects quite another thing, from what it was at firſt, through the care and diligence of the author, in collecting and digeſting freſh materials, and reforming what, from the information of his friends, he found amiſs therein (m). But notwithſtanding all his attention and circumſpection, this edition expoſed him to a very warm, and in many reſpects indecent, attack from Raſe Brookeſmouth, York-Herald, in relation to certain miſtakes, which that writer believed he had diſcovered, in reference to deſcents, and which he apprehended might be attended with conſequences diſhonourable to many of the moſt ancient and moſt noble families in this kingdom (n). I have placed this event here, though moſt writers report it ſeveral years after, and I do it out of reſpect to truth, becauſe it is certain, that though York's book did not appear at this time, yet he had framed his collections for it, ſoon after the publication of the fourth edition of the Britannia (o). How far he might be excited by envy, jealouſy, or ſpite, to this undertaking, I ſhall not pretend to determine; but ſhall in the notes give the reader as clear an account of the controverſy as is in my power, and without any mixture of prejudice or prepoſſeſſion [F]. As ſoon as he found his health ſo well eſtabliſhed, as to enable him to undergo [E] The more requiſite to correct an error of ſo long ſtanding.] The firſt author of this miſtake, appears to be Degory Wheare, in his oration on the death of Camden (26); and by his authority, even the beſt writers have been miſled upon this ſubject (27). 'Upon the death of that moſt learned man Edward 'Grant, Doctor (28) in Divinity, who had the go- 'vernment of Weſtminſter-ſchool, which happened 'in the month of March 1593, Camden ſucceeded 'in his place;' ſays the worthy Dr. Smith; and in this he is followed even by that accurate writer, and excellent judge of our hiſtory, the late Dr. Gibſon, Biſhop of London, in the life of our author prefixed to the tranſlation of the Britannia. 'The firſt ſtep 'he made, was the ſecond Maſterſhip of Weſtminſter- 'ſchool in 1575. In this ſtation he continued till 'the death of Dr. Grant, Head School-maſter (which 'happened in 1593) whom he ſucceeded.' Anthony Wood, in his Hiſtory and Antiquities of Oxford (29), ſpeaks doubtfully. 'He came, ſays he, to be Head- 'maſter either by the reſignation, or death, of that 'eminent Divine Edward Grant.' In his article of Camden, of whom he promiſes to be more particular than about any other author, he writes ſtill with greater obſcurity (30). 'In March 1592-3, he was 'made Chief Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool in the 'place of Dr. Edward Grant.' Yet, in the article of Grant, he gives a full and clear account of the matter, which plainly overturns all the former accounts (31). 'He (that is Dr. Edward Grant) re- 'ſigned his Maſterſhip of Weſtminſter-ſchool about 'the month of February 1592, and was ſucceeded 'therein by William Camden. He died in Sep- 'tember, or October, 1601, and was buried in St. 'Peter's church in Weſtminſter, whereupon his 'Canonry was beſtowed on Dr. William Barlow.' This is pretty nearly, but not exactly, right; for this learned man actually died Auguſt 4, 1601 (32), as formerly appeared by the inſcription on his monument in Weſtminſter-abbey, which is now defaced; but the reader may ſtill find it preſerved by the care of our venerable author (33).

[F] Without any mixture of prejudice or prepoſſeſſion.] Writers, in general, repreſent this attack upon Mr. Camden, as proceeding from the envious malice of its author, ariſing from Mr. Camden's promotion, and his own diſappointment. A very learned writer begins his account of it thus (34). 'In the year '1597, upon the death of Richard Leigh, Clarenceux 'King at Arms, Sir Fulk Grevil recommended Mr. 'Camden to the Queen as a perſon every way qualified 'for the place, and one that had highly deſerved of 'her Majeſty and her kingdoms. The Queen, with- 'out more ado, gives him a grant, and Mr. Camden 'accordingly was created October 23, in the ſame 'year, having the day before been made Richmond- 'Herald, becauſe, by the Conſtitution, none can be 'King at Arms but who has been firſt Herald. At 'that time Mr. Brooke was York-Herald, who, 'upon Leigh's death, preſently had an eye upon 'that preferment, and doubted not but the ſtation 'he had already in the college would ſecure it to 'him. The greater his aſſurance was, the diſap- 'pointment lay ſo much the heavier upon him, and '(as men who lay too much ſtreſs upon their own 'merit are always hurried on to revenge upon the 'leaſt injury) his next buſineſs was, to find out a 'fair opportunity of ſhewing his reſentments. Mr. 'Camden, at the end of each county, has drawn 'down the hiſtory of the reſpective Earls, and he 'thought probably, that if a quarrel could be picked 'in the buſineſs of families, it would be moſt ſuitable 'to his preſent purpoſe. The plot was well con- 'trived, if the charge could have been made out. 'As undergo the fatigue of a freſh journey, and was able to obtain leiſure for another excurſion, he next made a tour to Saliſbury and Wales, with a view to farther improvements of his work; and returning by Oxford (p), ſpent there ſome time, in which he viſited moſt, if not all the churches and chapels there, copying the monumental inſcriptions and the arms, which he found in them, and reducing them into a book, which Anthony Wood (q) tells us, he had ſeen in his own hand-writing: A wonderful proof of his care and diligence! and which, therefore, well deſerved to be ſecured from oblivion. In 1597, he was again afflicted with a grievous ſickneſs, upon which he removed to the houſe of one Cuthbert Line, and there, as himſelf tells us, recovered by the care of that perſon's wife (r). He publiſhed in this year his Greek Grammar (s), for the uſe of Weſtminſter-ſchool, which as it was a proof of his great attention to the functions of his employment, ſo if he had never obliged the learned world with any other performance, it might well have ſecured his reputation with poſterity [G]. It is highly probable,

(37) See his Addreſs to Mr. Camden, before his firſt Diſcovery of Errors: and obſerve the motto alſo to that work, viz. Quam quiſq; norit Artem in hac ſe exerceat: which implies, that pedigrees were not Mr. Camden's buſineſs at the time this diſpute began.

'As it would have ſhewn Mr. Camden's forwardneſs 'in engaging himſelf on a ſubject he was not maſter 'of, ſo would it have convinced the Government of 'their unreaſonable choice, not only in preferring a 'perſon who knew little of the matter, but (which 'was worſe) in rejecting one that was an abſolute 'Critic. After two years ſtudy, he publiſhed a book 'with this title, A Diſcovery of certain Errors publiſhed in print in the much commended Britannia, &c. Without Licence, without name either of Printer or Bookſeller.' All this reads very well, and the circumſtances ſeem to hang together; but notwithſtanding this, and though it ſhould be granted, that Ralfe Brooke had a ſiniſter deſign in attacking Mr. Camden, yet I doubt it will be found, that this was ſo far from ariſing out of diſtaſte to his being King at Arms, that it was originally grounded on his being no Herald. In ſhort, the fact was this: Mr. Camden, in his firſt editions, touched but gently upon deſcents, and mentioned but a few families; whereas in his fourth edition, he enlarged ſo much upon them, that he has given a particular index to direct the reader on this head, under the title of Barones & illuſtriores familiæ, and has therein ſet down very near two hundred and fifty noble houſes, which Ralfe Brooke conſidered as an invaſion upon the rights of the college. This put him upon enquiring, whether there might not be ſome miſtakes in theſe accounts, and when he believed he had found a great many, he was deſirous they ſhould be amended (35). But he did not (if we may believe himſelf) think of attacking Mr. Camden in print, or of publiſhing his diſcoveries, as he called them, to the world. His taking this ſtep was owing to other cauſes, of which the reader may take this account in his own words, which I believe will fully clear up the matter (36). 'The moſt abſtruſe arts, 'I profeſs not, but yeild the palme and victorie 'thereof to myne aduerſary that great learned Mr. 'Camden, with whom yet a long experimented na'vigator may contend about his chard and compaſſe, 'about havens, creeks, and ſoundes; ſo I, an 'auncient Herauld, a little diſpute, without impu'tation of audacitie, concerning the honour of armes, 'and the truth of honorable deſcents. In confidence 'whereof, beholding in foure of his imprinted books 'ſucceſſively a continewed raz (race) and generation 'of errors, in corrupting and falſifying many noble 'diſcents and pedigrees, and perceaving that even 'the braines of many learned men beyond the ſeas 'had miſ-conceaved and miſcarried in the travaile 'and birth of their relations, being gotten, as it 'were, with child (as Diomedes mares) by the blaſt 'of his erronious puffes: I could not, but according 'to my profeſſion, and long experience in Herauldry, 'a little queſtion the original father of thoſe abſur'dities, being ſo farre blowne with the trumpett of 'his learning and fame into forreine lands. For 'what overture about the diſcents of Engliſh nobles, 'and other genealogies, hath that famous Mr. Hieron 'Henningius, in his foure pound folio booke, byne 'taken tardie with all, that his credulitie hath not 'ſucked out of that highlye eſteemed Britannia? 'And was it not from his genealogicall ſlippes, that 'Reuſner in his genealogies, amongſt manie groſſe 'miſtakings, hath made Richard Plantagenet, Duke 'of Yorke, and Anne Mortimer, to be father and 'mother to Edward the 4th, and Richard the thyrde, 'both Kings of England; coupling them together 'as unnaturally as OEdipus and Jocaſta.

'For remedie of which inconveniences, I was 'bould firſt to move others of good credite and learn'ing, friendly to advertice this learned man, Mr. 'Camden, of the faultie paſſages in his booke touch'ing Herauldry, to whom his anſwere was, that he 'could not correct any of them for diſcrediting his 'whole worke: as though mending the ſores would 'have maymed the bodye.

'Secondly. In private when I harde his addreſſe'ment to a fift impreſſion, I my ſelf dealt with him 'for the amendment of ſome ſlippes in his Britannia 'of the ſame kynd, promiſing hym the uſe of my 'owne obſervations and collections, which, as proffered wares, faſtidiouſly he reiected, not accounting 'them worthy his thankes or acceptation, contrarie 'to the aduice of the ſober learned, who are contente 'to heare the conceipt of a meane friend ſometymes, 'and reſpect the offer, although but a blynde man 'ſhould pointe out the way. The ratt is not ſo con'temptible but ſhee may helpe the lyon at a pinch out 'of thoſe nets wherein his ſtrength is hampered: and 'the words of an inferior may often carry matter 'in them, to admoniſh his ſuperiour of ſome impor'tant conſideration. And ſurely of what account 'ſoever I might have ſeemed to this learned man, 'yet in regarde of my profeſſion, and courteous 'offer (I being an auncient officer of armes, and he 'then but a Schoolmaſter) might well have vouch'ſaffed the peruſal of my notes.' It is moſt evident from hence, that his quarrel with our author began not from, but before, his promotion; and though it is very true, that his firſt book did not come out till after Camden was promoted; yet, as Brooke therein complained that he had been diſturbed in writing, and much more in printing it, by the friends of Mr. Camden, it is plain, that it was not a new or ſudden thought, but an obſtinate reſolution of purſuing an old deſign (37). To all this, we may add, though our author himſelf, in his anſwer to Brooke, of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, and which, without doubt, is ſharp enough, does indeed take notice of his promotion, and the diſtaſte that it might have given to York-Herald; yet this was after he had publiſhed his diſcovery, and throughout that piece, he ſhews that diſdain of his adverſary's abilities, which Brooke complains of, never once admits him to be in the right, or his corrections worth regarding (though in his fifth edition he very wiſely made uſe of them) but treats him with very high contempt, and as one no way worthy of his notice. To ſpeak my own ſentiment freely, I am perſwaded that if, on the one hand, Mr. Camden had foreſeen his becoming Clarenceux King at Arms, he would not have let fall ſome expreſſions in his writings; and, on the other hand, if Brooke had ſuſpected it before he began the quarrel, I much doubt whether he would have begun it at all; for whoever peruſes his books carefully will find, that what ſtung him moſt, was, that a Schoolmaſter ſhould meddle with deſcents and families, and at the ſame time treat Heralds, to whom he thought theſe things belonged, with ſo little ceremony and reſpect.

[G] It might well have ſecured his reputation with poſterity.] The title of this work, as publiſhed by the bable, that, at this time, our author was ſo far from having any thoughts of quitting a poſt, in which he was univerſally reſpected and eſteemed, that it is more probable he propoſed to himſelf, either ending his days in it, or following the example of his predeceſſor and reſigning it, when overwhelmed with infirmities, and when he had acquired wherewithal, to paſs the remainder of his days with eaſe and decency. This I ſay is probable, becauſe he refuſed the place of a Maſter of Requeſts (t), which it is likely might be offered him by his friend the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh; and yet notwithſtanding this, before the end of the year, he left it for a far more honourable employment. Richard Leigh (u), Clarenceux King of Arms, dying on the twenty-third of September, Sir Fulke Grevile, our author's intimate friend, aſked of Queen Elizabeth, that office for Mr. Camden, which was immediately granted; but becauſe it was not uſual in the College of Arms, for a perſon to riſe to that dignity, without paſſing through the office of Herald, he was on the twenty-ſecond of October ſo created, by the title of Richmond; and on the twenty-third made Clarenceux (w). Upon this preferment, he was complimented by all his friends, excepting the Lord Burleigh, who took it ill, that a perſon he had honoured with his friendſhip, ſhould decline his aſſiſtance in his promotion; but upon Mr. Camden's acquainting him, that it was entirely a thought of Sir Fulke Grevile's, and that himſelf was as much ſurprized by his promotion as his Lordſhip, that coolneſs was removed (x), and his protection continued to him as long as that wiſe and good ſtateſman lived, which was not long. It was both an happineſs and an honour to Mr. Camden to have ſuch a man, not only for his patron but for his friend, who afforded him his countenance, when he publiſhed his performance, as he had given him great aſſiſtance while he was engaged in it, communicating to him all the ſtores of his well-furniſhed library (y); and adding to theſe, the lights of his learned converſation, which could not but be highly uſeful to Mr. Camden; ſince that noble perſon had made the Antiquities of England, and the perſonal Hiſtory of the great men who had flouriſhed in it, his peculiar and conſtant ſtudy, through the courſe of his life (z). A little before his death, he recommended to our author the preſerving to poſterity the Hiſtory of his Royal Miſtreſs; and at the ſame time that he adviſed the building, contributed a large ſtock of materials towards the erecting it (a). How great an effect this recommendation had, will be hereafter ſeen: in the mean time let us obſerve, that as there could not be higher teſtimony of that great man's reſpect to his Sovereign, ſo it is impoſſible he ſhould give a ſtronger proof of his eſteem for our author's abilities, or thorough perſuaſion of his integrity, than by committing ſuch a work to his care. In 1600, Mr. Camden, who was now more at liberty than while he had the charge of the ſchool upon him, made a journey as far as Carliſle, in the company of Robert Cotton, Eſquire (b), his dear and intimate friend, afterwards Sir Robert Cotton, Baronet; and after having ſurveyed whatever was curious in the North, returned to London in the month of December (c). This long journey into the North, did not hinder his ſending abroad an account of all the monuments of the Kings, Queens, Nobles, and others, in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter's Weſtminſter, with their inſcriptions, which he enlarged and reprinted more than once; and though notwithſtanding theſe augmentations, it is ſtill but of very ſmall bulk, yet the elegance and accuracy of the performance (d) render it valuable, even at this day, notwithſtanding the pretences made by ſome authors, who would be thought to have written more fully upon, and to have examined more ſtrictly into, this ſubject. This year alſo came out the fifth edition of his Britannia, to which he annexed an Apology to the Reader, in anſwer to what had been publiſhed by Rafe Brooke to the prejudice of his work; and the reception which this edition met with very clearly ſhewed, that the fame of Camden was not to be obſcured by any flying clouds of critical envy [H]. author, ran thus, Grammatices Græcæ inſtitutio compendiaria in uſum Regiæ Scholæ Weſtmonaſterienſis. Londini, in 8vo. We have an excellent account both of our author's intention and performance in reference to this Grammar, which, therefore, it is but juſtice to inſert in the words of the Right Reverend Author (39). 'He was, ſays he, always exciting 'the preſent age to virtue and honour, by repreſenting to them the venerable monuments of their anceſtors, or laying a foundation for the happineſs of 'poſterity, by forming youth unto religion and 'learning. They are two profeſſions that ſeem to 'look quite different ways, and yet he managed 'them to ſuch advantage, that if he had been continually abroad, 'tis hard to imagine how the Antiquary could have been better, or if conſtantly in 'the ſchool, how the Maſter could have been more 'diligent. He was not content to train up thoſe 'who were under his immediate care, unleſs (like 'the good old Orator) he put himſelf in a condition 'to be a guide to them, even after it ſhould pleaſe 'Providence to remove him.' It is not neceſſary to add any thing farther to this account, except it be, that Dr. Smith tells us, that at the time he printed his book, which was in 1691, this Grammar had run through very near an hundred impreſſions (40).

[H] By any flying clouds of critical envy.] There were three editions of the Britannia in octavo, viz. the firſt in 1586, the ſecond in 1587, the third in 1590, but of a larger ſize than the two former. It appeared the ſame year at Franckfort, where it was printed by John Wechel, The fourth edition was printed at London in 1594, in 4to. and it was this edition that gave occaſion to the remarks of Rafe Brooke. This of which we are now ſpeaking was the fifth, printed alſo in 4to. at London; and at the end of this, we find his anſwer to Brooke, under no other title than this, Ad Lectorem, i. e. To the Reader. This is alſo ſometimes bound up with his adverſary's book, intitled, A Diſcovery of certain errors publiſhed in print next year after this, he was again viſited by a fever, from which he recovered by the care of his friend, Mr. Heather, for which he bore him ever afterwards very high reſpect (e). In 1603, the plague breaking out at London, he retired with his friend, Robert Cotton, Eſq; to his ſeat at Conington, and thereby eſcaped it (f). It was in this year, that by his care a very noble collection of our ancient hiſtorians, appeared at Frankfort; and theſe he dedicated to Sir Fulke Grevile, in acknowledgment for the good office he did him in procuring him to be made King at Arms. Part of theſe hiſtorians were never before publiſhed, and ſuch as had ſeen the light, he ſent abroad, much more accurate and complete, than formerly they had appeared, rendering thereby very great ſervice to all ſuch as were inclined to ſtudy the Britiſh, Engliſh, Iriſh, or Norman Hiſtories (g) [I]. In the year following, he publiſhed his Remains of his large work, concerning Britain, which, in gratitude for paſt favours, and as a mark of his ſincere print in the much-commended Britannia; but being very conciſe, I do not find that it has been ever printed by itſelf. He opens this ſhort work with a very clear, and very modeſt account of his own application to the ſtudy of Antiquities, which he aſſures us began while he was at ſchool, increaſed at the Univerſity, took up moſt of his time before he was ſettled at Weſtminſter, and induced him to make thoſe large collections, from whence, at the earneſt deſire of Abraham Ortelius, he afterwards drew out the firſt ſcheme of his Britannia, which, he informs us, he very well knew was, in many reſpects, imperfect; and therefore laboured, by the peruſal of books, the information of friends, and by ſeveral journies, in which he perſonally viſited the greateſt part of England, to amend and improve it. After all this painstaking, he was ſurprized to find himſelf, and his work, attacked with great virulence and fury by a certain perſon (he avoids naming him) whether moved thereto by folly or judgment, by the weakneſs of his mind, or by the heat of his envy, becauſe the late Queen had been graciouſly pleaſed paſſing this perſon by, to exalt him to a certain office, he does not determine; but after acknowledging, that he is very ſenſible both that he might commit, and has committed, various errors, he addreſſes himſelf to his defence againſt the charge that had been exhibited by his enemy (41). But here it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that a diſtinction muſt be made between the original difference that Brooke had with Camden, and the publication of his treatiſe. The former related only to ſome miſtakes which this man thought he had diſcovered in our author's work; but when he was once in, and fancied himſelf under a neceſſity of appealing to the world, and to the Earl of Eſſex, then Earl Marſhal, he brought in other matter, which was certainly foreign to his purpoſe, ſo that the whole of his charge might be reduced under three heads (42). The firſt of theſe was as to errors committed in accounts of noble families. The ſecond, as to the aſſiſtance derived, but not acknowledged, from Mr. Glover's papers in Lord Burleigh's library. The third, as to the vaſt helps received from Leland's papers, out of which, he ſurmiſes that Mr. Camden had gathered a great part of his deſcription (43). Our author, in his defence, ſhews largely, from various authorities both of hiſtory and records, that in many of the places objected to, himſelf was in the right; and his adverſary, notwithſtanding the many years he had ſpent in the office of a Herald, in the wrong. He acknowledges, however, that by following one of his predeceſſors, Robert Cook, Clarenceux King at Arms, he had fallen into ſome miſtakes, which he thinks were excuſable on the ſcore of the authority by which he was miſled. As to the other two parts of the charge, he acquits himſelf entirely, by declaring, that he mentioned with honour thoſe from whom he borrowed any thing; and with reſpect to Leland more particularly, he acknowledges, that he had peruſed ſome of his works, and particularly his Itinerary, and where he borrowed any thing from it material, had cited him; but obſerves very juſtly, that where he ſays the ſame things of his own knowledge that Leland had mentioned from his, he did not think himſelf indebted to him. He farther obſerves, that if this worthy perſon ſpent five years in theſe ſtudies, himſelf had ſpent thirty; that if he had examined many ancient authors, himſelf had alſo taken great pains in the ſame way, and had not only peruſed what was to be met with in Engliſh libraries; but had alſo procured great helps from abroad, from the monuments of learning preſerved in the libraries of France, Italy, and Spain, by the aſſiſtance of his learned friends Franciſcus Pithæus, Juſtus Lipſius, Abrahamus Ortelius, H. Surrita, J. Obſopæus, and others. He concludes his ſhort diſcourſe with ſome very quick and lively ſtrokes of learned raillery upon his opponent, charges him with utter ignorance in his own profeſſion, and incapacity of tranſlating, or, conſequently, of underſtanding perfectly what he had written in his Britannia; and offers to ſubmit the points in diſpute to the Earl Marſhal, to the College of Heralds, to the Society of Antiquaries, or to four perſons learned in theſe ſtudies. All this did not hinder Brooke from returning to the charge. He wrote a Second Diſcovery of Errors, in which he purſued the ſame method he had taken in the former; that is to ſay, he ſet down firſt a paſſage in Camden, then the objections raiſed againſt it in his firſt book; next, Camden's anſwer in his own words; and laſt of all, his reply; but, for reaſons that are not known to us, this was not publiſhed. The ſhrewdeſt part of it is the Appendix, in which he ſets down, in two columns, the paſſages objected to in Mr. Camden's edition of 1594, and the ſame paſſages as they ſtood in this edition of 1600, which puts it in the power of the reader to judge, at one view, of the real ſentiments of our learned author as to Brooke's animadverſions. This piece, about an hundred years after the death of its author, was printed from a manuſcript of the late learned and worthy John Anſtis, Eſq; Garter King at Arms (44), and has given us an opportunity of entering more thoroughly into the nature of this controverſy, than it was poſſible for writers to do, who had not ſeen the latter, as well as the former, performance of Brooke's, in which there are (mixed with much bitterneſs) abundance of uſeful and curious paſſages.

(41) Anſwer to Brooke, p. 1, 2, 3.

(42) Brooke's book was dedicated to the Earl of Eſſex, who from thence appears to have been his patron; whereas Camden called with the Cecils; he likewiſe added thereto Leland's New Year's Gift, which he reprinted with a libellous poem, intitled, Leland's Ghoſt.

(43) See the Addreſs at the beginning of his book to Mr. Camden, and the Dedication which is directed to him alſo.

[I] The Britiſh, Engliſh, Iriſh, or Norman Hiſtories.] The title of this work at large runs thus, Anglica, Normannica, Hibernica, Cambrica, à Veteribus deſcripta: ex quibus Aſſer Menevenſis, Anonymus de vitâ Gulielmi Conquæſtoris, Thomas Walſingham, Thomas de la More, Gulielmus Genuticenſis, Giraldus Cambrenſis. Plerique nunc in lucem editi ex Bibliothecâ Gulielmi Camdeni. Francofurti, folio 1603. There could not be a ſtronger proof of our author's candour, or zeal for the honour of his country, or the advantage of the Republic of Letters, than this publication of our ancient Hiſtorians (45). It plainly ſhews, that he was very far from being deſirous to lock up in his private ſtudy, as curioſities, ſuch pieces as, if divulged, might prove of public utility. He was ſenſible how great a loſs the learned world would ſuſtain, by his laying aſide the deſign he once had formed of writing an Engliſh Hiſtory, and therefore he thought himſelf obliged in juſtice, to add to the ſmall ſtock of materials already prepared, theſe original and valuable authors. This is the account that himſelf gives in his Epiſtle to Sir Fulke Grevile, and it is every way ſufficient to ſatisfy the reader as to the uprightneſs of his intention, and the benevolence of his diſpoſition. His collection was received, as it deſerved, with the utmoſt applauſe of the moſt learned abroad, and with all poſſible reſpect and gratitude at home, where it has ſerved for a foundation for moſt of our modern hiſtories (46).

friendſhip and high eſteem, he dedicated to his dear friend and conſtant patron, Sir Robert Cotton; though from the work itſelf it appears, that he once intended to have inſcribed it to Sir Fulke Grevile (b). There are in it, without doubt, abundance of curious, uſeful, and learned remarks; and though there may be ſome light and trivial things intermixed, which, perhaps hindered the author from owning it in the ſame public manner as he did the reſt of his works, yet there is no doubt at all of its being his, or of its being worthy of him [K]. He wrote beſides, many ſhort, but learned and valuable eſſays on Britiſh Antiquities, moſt of them at the requeſt, and in compliance with the practice of that learned Society of Antiquaries, we have mentioned in another place (i), and of which he was a member. Some of theſe have been preſerved and publiſhed, and, from the peruſal of them, we have reaſon to regret that others are loſt, or, at leaſt, concealed from the view of the world, and hindered from affording thoſe lights, which men addicted to theſe ſtudies will always reap from the writings of this judicious author. Thoſe that are ſtill extant, we owe to the care of the induſtrious and laborious Thomas Hearne (k) [L]. In 1606, began our author's correſpondence with [K] Or of its being worthy of him.] It will be proper, before we ſay any thing of this work, to give the reader its title, in which alſo he will find the contents briefly inſerted. In the original edition it ſtands thus: Remaines of a Greater Work concerning BRITAIN, the inhabitants thereof, their Languages, Names, Surnames, Empreſes, Wiſe Speeches, Poeſies, and Epitaphes, London, 1605, 4*to*. It is addreſſed to the Right Worſhipful, Worthy, and Learned Sir Robert Cotton of Conington, Knight; and the author makes it the ſole buſineſs of his Dedication to diſparage his book, treating it as an indigeſted heap of fragments that he left to be played with by the wind, which he knew to be unworthy of the perſon to whom they were preſented, and ſhould not therefore be offended, however he thought fit to diſpoſe of them. But the true reaſon of this conduct was, that he might eſcape any ſuch attacks as had been made upon his Britannia: it was this made him depreciate his collection, and call it 'the out-caſt 'rubbiſh of a greater and more ſerious work, the 'pitiful fillineſs whereof would ſecure it from envy, 'which only reaches at eminence.' It was for the ſame reaſon that he ſubſcribed it only with the final letters of his name, and delayed ſo long the publication: for the Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated the 12th of June 1603, but the book was not publiſhed till 1605. Dr. Smith indeed places it in 1604 (47), which is not only contrary to the title page of the firſt edition which lies before me, but the authority of Camden himſelf, who ſets it down thus in his Memoranda, 1605, Λείψανα prodierunt primum, i. e. In 1605, the Remains were firſt publiſhed (48). By the way, this ſhews his real ſentiments of that work; for, except the firſt edition of his Britannia, and his Greek Grammar, he takes no notice of the other works he publiſhed before it. It is expreſsly aſcribed to Camden by his adverſary Brooke, in his Second Diſcovery of Errors; and indeed I do not know that ever any doubt was made of its being his: and as to the value of the work, the number of editions it has run through, and the additions made to it by John Philpot, Somerſet-Herald, very clearly ſhew the reception it met with amongſt ſuch as were judges of its contents. Yet there is a certain author who, with mighty profeſſions of veneration for Mr. Camden, hath treated it very freely (49). 'There are in it, 'ſays he, a deal of good collections touching the 'languages, money, ſurnames, and apparel of our 'Britiſh and Saxon Antiquities; but his liſt of pro-'per names might be conſiderably enlarged and cor-'rected, by what Scottelius and Dr. Gibſon have 'written on that ſubject. As for his alluſions, re-'buſſes, and anagrams, he himſelf feared they would 'paſs for fooliſh fopperies; and I do not care for 'thwarting, without good reaſon, any of his opi-'nions. The conceits in impreſſes, apophthegms, 'poems, epigrams, and epitaphs are endleſs, and 'therefore hardly worth regiſtering in a work of this 'nature.' The proper anſwer to this indirect and timid piece of criticiſm is plainly this, that the author had no conception of what Camden intended to publiſh in that work; which was to preſerve to poſterity an infinite number of curious things, which had been communicated to him while he was forming collections for his Britannia, and which, from his own experience, he very well knew might prove very uſeful, and therefore muſt be very acceptable to ſuch as were lovers of Antiquities. To ſay the truth, it is very difficult to determine whether our prudent and judicious author gave a higher proof of his exquiſite penetration, in rejecting what this book contains, when he framed his Deſcription of Britain, or in putting together theſe materials when he had ſo rejected them, and leaving them, as he has done, to the conſideration and uſe of proper judges amongſt poſterity. If an Architect who, upon public notice of his deſign to erect ſome ſtately edifice for general uſe, ſhould be ſo ſupplied with all kind of coſtly materials, as to be able to finiſh his deſign completely, and yet have much of thoſe materials to ſpare, would any wiſe man blame him either for not crowding them all in, or for not burying the ſtones, breaking the bricks, or burning the beams that were left? They know little, very little, of the pleaſure, and even utility, of collecting what cannot be inſerted in a work ſo highly finiſhed as the Britannia, who blame Mr. Camden for ſorting and publiſhing his Remains; and they enter very little into his ſpirit, who take literally what he ſays in prejudice to that work, which if he had thought ſuch a heap of rubbiſh and pitiful fillineſs, as he ſtyles it, he would not have kept or publiſhed, much leſs inſcribed it to Sir Robert Cotton, that great patron of Learning, of Antiquities, and of Camden. But ſome men have the misfortune of miſtaking a humour of finding fault, for a true critical genius; a low punning wit, for a fine vein of raillery; and a confuſed remembrance of many books, for univerſal learning. Such men as theſe may write folio's without leaving Remains, but the dreams of Homer will be always more eſteemed, than the waking thoughts of rhymers, who are poets in no man's conception but their own.

[L] Of the induſtrious and laborious Thomas Hearne.] This well-meaning and indefatigable man, in the Collection, which he publiſhed, of curious diſcourſes written by eminent Antiquaries, has preſerved ſeveral pieces of Mr. Camden's, which otherwiſe had been buried in oblivion, and which notwithſtanding moſt certainly deſerved a better fate. The firſt of theſe is, A ſhort Account of the Antiquity, Office, and Privilege of Heralds in England (50), in which he ſeems to think this term is of German original, and that it ſignifies old or ancient Maſter, or, as I find it explained by another writer on the ſame ſubject, a perſon ſtyled Sir, or Maſter; on account of his venerable age. He likewiſe obſerves, that the firſt mention he finds of them was about the time of King Edward I. when in a ſtatute relating to Arms and Weapons it was directed, that the Kings of Heralds ſhould wear no armour but their ſwords pointleſs, and that they ſhould only have their Houſes des Armes, which he conceives to be their coats of arms. He adds, that the name and honour of them were never greater than in the time of King Edward III. when there were Kings of Arms, Heralds, and Purſuivants by patent, not only peculiar to the King, but with the famous Preſident de Thou, which continued to their mutual ſatisfaction for eleven years, that is to the death of that worthy magiſtrate and faithful Hiſtorian, during which time, he received many notices, with reſpect to the affairs of this iſland, from his judicious and faithful correſpondent, which, with much kindneſs and gratitude, he acknowledged (l). The diſcovery of the Powder-plot gave him a freſh occaſion of employing his pen in the ſervice of the public. It ſeems, that his Royal Maſter King James, after providing that poſterity in this kingdom, ſhould be for ever put in mind of the wonderful deliverance himſelf and the nation received, by an Anniverſary Thankſgiving, thinking it proper to put the Reformed Churches abroad upon their guard, againſt thoſe inveterate enemies of the Proteſtant Religion, as well as to ſatisfy foreign Princes of all Religions of the juſtice of his proceedings, made choice of Mr. Camden, as beſt qualified to draw up the whole caſe in a Latin ſtyle agreeable to the ſubject. This, with great accuracy, elegance, and ſpirit, he performed; and his work, to ſhew by whoſe authority it was compiled, iſſued out from the preſs of the King's Printer (m). It was not long after (and indeed, it is no wonder) put into the liſt of prohibited books by the Inquiſition at Rome (n), and probably will retain its place there as long as that continues in any credit. On the 7th of September 1607, he had the misfortune to fall from his horſe, by which he hurt his leg in ſuch a manner, that he was not able to ſtir abroad for many months (o). It was in this year, that he put his laſt hand to, and publiſhed, that noble and complete edition of his Britannia, which will remain a perpetual monument of his learning, the rather as it was erected to the honour of his country. It is from this edition, that ſeveral Engliſh tranſlations have been made, and therefore it is requiſite, that in the notes we ſhould give ſome farther account of it (p) [M]. He had now finiſhed and ſent abroad all thoſe pieces, to which his great deſign had given birth, and thereby put it much in the power of others to proſecute with certainty and eaſe, thoſe works in which himſelf had met with ſo much toil and labour. He had once indeed, as himſelf informs us, an intention to have written a Civil Hiſtory of this nation, which was before he undertook his Britannia (q); but he ſaw that it would coſt more than one man's life to bring the very materials of it but belonging alſo to the principal Nobility. The ſecond diſcourſe of Mr. Camden's is dated June 29th, 1604, upon which, probably, it was read in the Society of Antiquaries; the title is, Of the diverſity of Names of this Iſland (51); in which our author uſes many things before involved either in his Britannia, or Remains, and advances ſome that are in neither. Upon the ſame ſubject, diſcourſes were read at the ſame time, and before the ſame ſociety, by thoſe eminent Antiquaries, Mr. Joſeph Holland, Mr. Arthur Agard, and Mr. Michael Oldſworth, which laſt gives a high character of Camden in his ſhort treatiſe. The laſt treatiſe is Of the Etymology and Original of Barons (52); tranſcribed from Mr. Camden's Adverſaria, in poſſeſſion of Lord Hatton, T. [M] Take ſome farther account of it.] It was this laſt edition, correctly printed in folio, much augmented, amended where it was neceſſary, and adorned with maps, that procured our author thoſe magnificent titles of the Varro, the Strabo, and the Pauſanias of Britain (53); magnificent indeed, and which, though, beſtowed upon him by the moſt judicious men of the age, were what he little affected. One title this work merited, which has paſt deſervedly into a kind of prænomen both at home and abroad, ſo that we find him almoſt univerſally ſtyled the learned Camden (54). To commend it, is needleſs: our buſineſs is, to give an hiſtorical account of it, and this leads us to take notice of that multitude of commendatory verſes that ſtand before it, and which had been increaſing in every edition; but becauſe we would take notice of them but once, we deferred ſpeaking of them till now. Sir George Sidley, a man diſtinguiſhed both by birth and breeding, wrote a Latin Epigram on the book and its author; Sir George Buc, who was himſelf an Antiquary and an Hiſtorian, publiſhed an Hepaſtic on the ſame ſubject; Dr. Grant, his predeceſſor, wrote a very elegant poem, which ſtands before all the editions; the learned Dr. George Carleton diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a congratulatory addreſs in the ſame language; the celebrated Mr. Edmund Bolton, author of Nero Cæſar, exerciſed his pen in a very elegant political Elegy, entituled, A Deſcription of the Frontiſpiece; Mr. John Stradling before-mentioned wrote an excellent Epigram in Latin, as the famous B. Doddington did in Greek; and in the ſame language, the very ingenious and learned, but unfortunate, Henry Cuffe, who ſuffered with the Earl of Eſſex, complimented his fellow-ſtudent on his labours; and his verſes were again prefixed to this edition, though publiſhed nearly ſeven years after his death: Caſpar Dornavius, Janus Gruter, and many others, diſplayed their affection on the ſame occaſion; ſo that it may be truly ſaid, no performance of this kind was ever uſhered into the world with ſtronger recommendations. It was taken into Janſſon's Atlas, but altered and interpolated, printed at Amſterdam in 1659; it was epitomized by Regnerus Vitellius Zirizæus, and twice printed at Amſterdam, in 1616 and 1639, 8vo. It was firſt tranſlated into Engliſh, and publiſhed in folio, at London, in 1611, by the laborious Dr. Philemon Holland, a Phyſician of Coventry, who is thought to have conſulted our author himſelf, and therefore great reſpect has been paid to the additions and explanations that occur therein, on a ſuppoſition that they may belong to Camden. But in a later edition of the ſame tranſlation, publiſhed in 1636, the Doctor has taken liberties which cannot either be defended or excuſed. The new tranſlation, made with the utmoſt fidelity from this laſt edition of our author's work, was firſt publiſhed in 1695, by Edmund Gibſon, of Queen's College, in Oxford, aftewards Biſhop of London; in which beſides the addition of notes, and of all that deſerved to be taken notice of in Dr. Holland's firſt edition, which, though thrown out of the text, is preſerved at the bottom of the page, there are many other augmentations and improvements, all properly diſtinguiſhed from the genuine work of the author, as they ought to be: and the ſame judicious method has been purſued in the ſubſequent edition of the ſame performance, which may be juſtly conſidered as the very beſt book of its kind that has been hitherto publiſhed; and I am afraid is in no great danger of being deprived of that character by any new undertaking, notwithſtanding the many helps now at hand.

into order; and therefore he contented himſelf with adding the large volume of Hiſtorians before-mentioned, to the collections formerly publiſhed, and thereby ſet an example, which has been happily followed by ſeveral learned and worthy perſons. But that the remainder of his years might be filled up with ſomething worthy of his great talents, his uncorrupted fidelity, and extenſive reputation, he began, in 1608, to digeſt thoſe materials which he had been for many years collecting towards the Hiſtory of the reign of Queen Elizabeth (r), to which he had been firſt excited by his old patron, the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, the performing of which had from that time been requeſted of him by many other great perſonages, and with the expectation of which he had filled the minds of all his learned friends. But while he was meditating this great work, he was ſeized on his birth-day, in 1609, with a dangerous illneſs; and the plague breaking out in his neighbourhood, he was removed to the houſe of his friend, Mr. Heather, where, by the care of Dr. Giffard, his Phyſician, he, though ſlowly, recovered his health (s). At this time it was, that he made choice of Chiſlehurſt in Kent, for the place of his retirement; and thither he went for the firſt time, on the 15th of Auguſt that year, and returned from thence on the 23d of October following (t). It was in this year alſo, that a new preferment was intended for our learned author. Dr. Sutcliffe, Dean of Weſtminſter, had propoſed erecting a College at Chelſea, for a certain number of learned men, who were to make the oppoſing of Popery the great buſineſs of their ſtndies (u). King James was very well pleaſed with this deſign, and gave it all the encouragement that could be expected. He named Dr. Sutcliffe, the firſt Provoſt; ſeventeen very eminent Divines were appointed Fellows; and to theſe, as Hiſtorians, were added, Mr. Camden, and Dr. John Hayward, a Civilian (w). An Act of Parliament alſo paſſed for promoting this new foundation: but notwithſtanding all this, excepting the erecting the bare ſhell of a College, there was no progreſs made (x), ſo that it turned no other way to Mr. Camden's advantage, than by ſhowing, that when the cauſe of learning, the Proteſtant Religion, and the honour of this nation were under conſideration, he was always in the thoughts of thoſe who were the beſt judges. The infirmities of old age were now growing upon him daily, notwithſtanding which, he kept up his extenſive correſpondence both at home and abroad. The Hiſtory of Queen Elizabeth went on all this time but ſlowly, on account of the great circumſpection uſed by the author, who neglected no opportunity of conſulting State Papers, the Regiſters of the Privy Council, Ambaſſadors inſtructions, the letters of the great men of thoſe times, Parliament Journals, the ſeveral Laws and Statutes paſſed within the period of which he was to write; and, in a word, whatever elſe was requiſite to give him the beſt and moſt perfect lights; for which, beſides his own numerous collections, he had recourſe to the celebrated library of his ſincere, conſtant, and communicative friend, Sir Robert Cotton (y). After all theſe pains taken, and when the firſt part, which reached from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign to the year 1589, was completed and ready for the preſs, he obtained from his Royal Maſter King James, an order or warrant for the printing and publiſhing it [N]. In purſuance of this it was accordingly elegantly and accurately printed in 1615; and though vaſt expectations had been raiſed, both from the nature of the work itſelf, and the reputation of the author, yet it appears clearly from the reception it met with both at home and abroad, that thoſe expectations were fully ſatisfied. It muſt be acknowledged, that this was a felicity almoſt peculiar to our author, and which, without doubt, was owing no leſs to his great care and attention, than to his ſuperior genius and extenſive learning; ſo that his work may paſs for a model in its kind, being equally perfect in all its parts (z); a deſign truly noble in itſelf! as deſcribing a reign fruitful in great events, and one of the moſt glorious in our Hiſtory, taking in at the ſame time a great part of the moſt remarkable tranſactions that happened within this period, throughout the greateſt part of Europe, and in other quarters of the world alſo. The method is clear and plain, judiciouſly laid down, and conſtantly purſued, with equal accuracy, ſkill, and attention. The ſtyle is grave and ſuited to the majeſty of the hiſtory, never ſwelling into a falſe ſublime, or ſinking even in the relation of the ſmalleſt circumſtances, but even and elegant throughout, free from any mixture of affectation, and from a vain and needleſs oſtentation of learning: no way deficient in neceſſary circumſtances, never loaded with tedious or trifling particularities, but proceeding in ſo juſt and equal a manner, that the attention of the reader is continually retained, and never embarraſſed by any ambiguity or doubtfulneſs of expreſſion. His reflections are ſhort and weighty, his obſervations natural and inſtructive, his characters exactly and ſuccinctly drawn, his dates wonderfully correct, and his narrations cloſe, without prejudice to that clearneſs which is the great beauty of Hiſtory. But, above all, his veracity, candour, and probity; his gratitude to his miſtreſs and to his patrons, without any mixture of flattery, much leſs of falſehood; his freedom from prejudice or prepoſſeſſions; his fidelity in reference to perſons and to things, are truly admirable; ſo that we need not wonder at the high praiſes that were beſtowed upon his work in his life-time, or at the great character it has juſtly preſerved, and will ever preſerve, with poſterity [O]. We muſt indeed allow, that ſome objections were made with reſpect to the account he has given of the unfortunate Mary [O] And will ever preſerve, with poſterity.] The title of this part of Mr. Camden's work, as it was then publiſhed, runs thus, Annales rerum Anglicarum & Hibernicarum regnante Elizabethâ ad annum ſalutis, 1589. Londini, 1615, fol. It was again printed at Frankfort in 1616, in 8vo. In his preface he begins with informing the reader, that ſomewhat more than eighteen years before he publiſhed this firſt part, he was, without any ſeeking of his own, excited by the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, to compoſe the Hiſtory of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, in order to which he imparted to him, both from his own, and her Majeſty's collections, papers, letters, memorials, &c. Theſe he ſorted and peruſed with much leſs profit than he expected; and the Lord Treaſurer, and the Queen herſelf, dying ſoon after, he quitted for ſome time the thoughts of executing ſo laborious a deſign, hoping that it would be undertaken by ſome other pen. Perceiving, however, in proceſs of time, that theſe expectations were vain, he again (in 1608) reſumed his former intention, and took care to increaſe his ſtock of materials to the utmoſt extent of his power, as well by the aſſiſtance of his friends, particularly Sir Robert Cotton, as by reviewing his own ſtores; for though, ſays he, I have been a ſtudious admirer of venerable Antiquity, yet have I not been altogether an incurious ſpectator of modern occurrences, and have farther had the aſſiſtance of great men, who had their ſhare in tranſacting of affairs, and thoſe too with reſpect to religious diſputes of both parties. He proceeds then to ſhew, from Polybius, the true ends of Hiſtory, and the proper manner of writing it; and profeſſing, that he had laid aſide hope and fear, prejudice and prepoſſeſſion, he goes on to give an account of what he propoſed to himſelf in compiling this Hiſtory, which, as it more immediately concerns our deſign of placing his life and character in their true light, we will give the reader in his own words. 'My work, I have, entitled, by the name of Annals; in regard, I have diſpoſed every thing in its proper year; for I have learned of Tacitus, that weighty and remarkable occurrences are to be digeſted, by way of Annals; and that the principal buſineſs of Annals, is to preſerve virtuous actions from being buried in oblivion, and to deter men from either ſpeaking or doing what is amiſs, for fear of future ſhame. Beſides, a coarſer and ſhorter ſtyle (ſuch as this of mine) is proper and peculiar to things written by way of Annals. Upon theſe foundations, I ſet myſelf to writing; with this intion and deſign, I went forward; and in compoſing, poliſhing, and perfecting my undertaking, I reſolved to ſpend my whole pains at ſpare times; and to bequeath them, by my laſt teſtament, to that honourable perſonage, James Auguſtus de Thou, who has with ſingular commendations of his fidelity and moderation, begun an Hiſtory of his own time. And this I did, leſt one ſo much reſpected by me, as indeed, all ſtrangers are, ſhould, as one unacquainted in a foreign ſtate, be at a loſs in the affairs of our country. But in this my purpoſe, I was, I know not by what fate, prevented, and a great part of theſe Annals were ſent over to him ſome years before, when they lay yet ſhadowed in their firſt lineaments, and were ſcarce well begun, diſfigured with blurs and daſhes, and chaſms, and patches, here and there tacked together, as they ſlipt from my haſty pen, and worſe mangled by the tranſcriber. Out of theſe, by taking away ſome things, changing and adding others, he has inſerted ſome few paſſages in the eleventh and twelfth tomes of his Hiſtory; but indeed, by his grave and ſolid judgment, much rectified and refined. But whereas he, according to the proportion of his work, (for he undertakes an Univerſal Hiſtory of his time) has only ſelected a few paſſages concerning England and Ireland, and omitted a great many things that may pleaſe, and perhaps behove thoſe of our country to be acquainted with; and having myſelf heard, that the knowledge of our affairs is earneſtly deſired by foreigners, and that not without ſome check and reproach of our remiſſneſs in communicating them, I again ſettled myſelf to a work I had for ſome time diſcontinued. I read it all over and conſidered of it again, added ſome thing, and in ſome meaſure poliſhed the ſtyle of it, though without any affected flights of eloquence, or quaint ways of expreſſion. For I think it ſufficient, if like a picture drawn in weak and faint colours, it is placed in a good and advantageous light. Yet after all, whether I ſhould publiſh it or not, I could not well determine. But the truth is, thoſe cenſures and prejudices, that hatred and calumny, which I foreſee, advance their enſigns and ſound the charge againſt me, have not ſo much diſcouraged me, as my love of truth, my affection to my country, and the memory of that Princeſs (which among Engliſhmen ought to be held for ever ſacred) have borne me up againſt thoſe men; who having ſhaken off their allegiance to their Prince and country, endeavour to eclipſe the reputation of one, and the glory of the other, by ſpitting forth their venom and inveterate malice in their ſcandalous libels, publiſhed in foreign parts; and at this very inſtant (as they ſtick not to own) are ready to leave to poſterity, in a large volume, a monument of their lewdneſs and diſhoneſty. For my part, I deſire nothing more than that I may be like myſelf, and they like themſelves: poſterity will give every one the honour that is his due. What the loftineſs of the argument requires, I confeſs, and am ſorry I have not come up to, yet what pains I was able, I have willingly beſtowed. Myſelf I have not in the leaſt ſatisfied, either in this or my other writings; yet I ſhall think myſelf well rewarded for my labour, if by my chearful willingneſs to preſerve the memory of things, to relate the truth, and to train up the minds of men to honeſty and wiſdom, I may thereby find a place amongſt the petty writers of great matters. WHATEVER IT BE, I DEDICATE AND CONSECRATE IT AT THE ALTAR OF TRUTH TO GOD TO MY COUNTRY AND TO POSTERITY.' It is not eaſy to find out ſtronger words to bind a man to the moſt ſcrupulous regard of verity; and conſidering the character he had for probity, one cannot believe that he gave theſe aſſurances with a deſign to forfeit them. We may form ſome judgment of the great reputation it acquired him, both in his own country and abroad, by the many teſtimonies to that purpoſe, aſſembled by Sir Thomas Pope Blount (56).

[N] An order, or warrant, for the printing and publiſhing it.] This warrant was formerly in the hands of that eminently learned, worthy, and upright perſon the Reverend Mr. Thomas Baker of St. John's, who communicated it to Mr. Hearne; but it ſeems that Dr. Smith had a copy of it before, which came likewiſe into the hands of Mr. Hearne amongſt the reſt of that great man's papers. This warrant runs thus (55):

Queen

Queen of Scots, as if he had been biaſſed therein, from a complaiſance for her ſon, who was his Sovereign: but there does not appear any juſt ground for theſe ſuggeſtions, much leſs for what has been aſſerted, that his work was altered or caſtrated, and that it did not appear to the world as it fell originally from his pen (a). Theſe points have been very freely and judiciouſly canvaſſed by a very great author, who has alſo examined what has been thrown out, with reſpect to the difference between his own relations, and the memoirs communicated by him to his learned friend and conſtant correſpondent M. de Thou, upon that ſubject (b). A ſevere, but juſt, picture, he has drawn of the Engliſh and Iriſh Papiſts, and his full and accurate accounts of their many ſecret plots and contrivances, as well as frequent rebellions againſt Queen Elizabeth, provoked that party extremely; and as there were at that time many fugitives abroad, who made it their buſineſs to diſturb and impoſe upon the world by their writings, to which all foreign preſſes were open, they failed not to lay hold of this occaſion to abuſe and traduce Mr. Camden, and to vent a multitude of calumnies againſt him, which had frequently as little of probability in them as of truth. Amongſt the reſt, a certain virulent writer, who pretended to give the world a Hiſtory of Iriſh affairs, attacked our author with equal fury and falſehood, inſinuating that he had been of their religion, but had been drawn from it by ambitious and ſecular views (c). The nature of this charge, and the confidence with which it was made, induced ſome of Mr. Camden's beſt friends to think that it deſerved an anſwer; and the Government of Ireland condeſcending ſo far as to take notice of this malicious performance, and to refute the principal facts contained therein, an account was ſent to Mr. Camden of their deſign, with an offer that his juſtification ſhould be included in the ſame piece (d). But it ſeems he judged otherwiſe of the matter, and thought it better to treat ſuch kind of libels with contempt. We have, however, the letters which he wrote upon this ſubject, particularly to that wiſe and great Prelate (e) the Lord Primate Uſher, which fully refute theſe calumnies, and very clearly prove, that as he ended, ſo he began the world, with juſt notions of the Proteſtant religion, for which he was actually perſecuted at the Univerſity, at the very time that it was ſuggeſted he ſhowed himſelf of oppoſite principles, which, however, could not move him to enter into any controverſy [P]. There is good reaſon to believe, that the vaſt

[P] Could not move him to enter into any controverſy.] We ſhall in this note, fully clear up the boldeſt attack that was ever made upon our author's character; which is the more reaſonable, becauſe hitherto, we have had but very dark accounts of the matter. In the firſt place, it is not well agreed who was the author of that ſcandalous book, in which our author was attacked: but it ſeems very fully made out by Mr. Harris, who publiſhed the laſt edition of Sir James Ware's works, that it was written by Dr. David Roth, who was for many years titular Biſhop of Oſſory, and Vice-Primate of Ireland (57). Dr. James Uſher, afterwards Archbiſhop of Armagh, gave him the firſt notice, that an anſwer was preparing to this libel, by order of the State; and that Dr. Thomas Ryves, a Maſter in Chancery, afterwards knighted, was the perſon upon whom this taſk was impoſed, and who, ſays this learned perſon to Mr. Camden, 'is very deſirous to be certified from you, 'in what ſort you would have him anſwer that ca-'lumniation of our Iriſh libeller; where he inti-'mateth, that you diſſemble your religion, and 'write otherwiſe than you think, deluſus ſpe hujus 'ſeculi, & mundani honoris lenocinio illectus (58).' Dr. Ryves himſelf alſo wrote to our author upon the ſame ſubject, and offered him all the ſervice in his power. A ſhort paragraph from Camden's Anſwer, in regard to the opinion he entertained of ſuch defences, will anſwer our purpoſe ſufficiently. 'As 'for the aſperſion by your Analectiſt, it is common 'to me, with the moſt reverend and learned Prelates 'of our Church, from Papiſts and others: and as 'they, even ſo I, rectæ conſcientiæ clypeo tutus, ſmile 'at it, as having received exceſs of injuries, traduced 'as an heretic by Parſons, Poſſevinus, the Index Ex-'purgatorius of Spain, and divers others, but tranſe-'ant. This kind of devil is not caſt out, but with 'contempt. My life and my writings ſhall apologize for me. And ſo wiſhing you happy ſucceſs 'in your charge impoſed, I reſt, &c. (59).' But though he wrote thus briefly to this gentleman as a ſtranger, yet in his Anſwer to Dr. Uſher, he ſpeaks more largely, and gives us ſome very remarkable circumſtances of his own Hiſtory, for which reaſon it is neceſſary to inſert part of that letter. 'I thank 'God, my life hath been ſuch among men, as I am 'neither aſhamed to live nor fear to die, being ſecure 'in Chriſt my Saviour, in whoſe true religion I was 'born and bred in the time of King Edward VI. and 'have continued firm therein. And to make you 'my confeſſor, ſub ſigillo confeſſionis, I took my oath 'thereunto, at my matriculation, in the Univerſity 'of Oxon (when Popery was predominant); and for 'defending the religion eſtabliſhed, I loſt a fellow-'ſhip in All Souls, as Sir Daniel Dun could teſtify, 'and often would relate, how I was oppoſed there 'by the Popiſh faction. At my coming to Weſt-'minſter, I took the like oath, where (abſit jactan-'tia) God ſo bleſſed my labours, that the now 'Biſhops of London, Durham, and St. Aſaph, to ſay 'nothing of perſons employed now in eminent places 'abroad, and many of eſpecial note at home, of all 'degree, do acknowledge themſelves to have been 'my ſcholars; yea, I brought there to church divers 'gentlemen of Ireland, as Walſhes, Nugents, 'O-Raily, Shees, the eldeſt ſon of the Archbiſhop 'of Caſilles, Peter Lombard, a merchant's ſon of 'Waterford, a youth of admirable docility, and 'others bred popiſhly and ſo affected. I know not 'who may ſay, that I was ambitious, who contented 'myſelf in Weſtminſter ſchool, when I writ my Britannia, and eleven years afterwards, who refuſed 'a maſterſhip of Requeſts offered, and then had 'the place of a King of Arms, without any ſuit, 'caſt upon me. I did never ſet ſail after preſent 'preferments, or deſired to ſoar higher by others. 'I never made ſuit to any man, no not to his Majeſty, but for a matter of courſe incident to my 'place; neither, God be praiſed, I needed, having 'gathered a contented ſufficiency by my long labours in the ſchool. Why the Analectiſt ſhould ſo 'cenſure me, I know not; but that men of all 'humours repair unto me, in reſpect of my place, 'and reſt content to be belied by him, who is not 'aſhamed to bely the Lords Deputies of Ireland, and 'otherss of honourable rank. Sed hæc tibi uni & 'ſoli.' It is certain, that in this our author formed a very right judgment; for to contend with men, who

vaſt reſort to him of perſons of all parties, and of all religions, might give a handle to this opinion: but though our author ſuſpected it, he continued his old way of living, and would not alter it on account of theſe groundleſs aſperſions. He thought himſelf ſafe from the conſciouſneſs of his own innocence; and as it was the cuſtom of all foreigners, diſtinguiſhed either by their birth or learning, to pay their reſpects to him when they viſited England, he received them with the ſame kindneſs and civility as formerly, and would not deprive himſelf of the honour and ſatisfaction he received from thence, to ſtop the mouths of angry and diſcontented men; in which he was certainly in the right, and thereby gave a noble teſtimony of the firmneſs of his mind, and that freedom from fear which naturally attends a freedom from guilt (f). The great commendations the firſt part of this work had met with, were ſufficient to have encouraged him to proceed, if the natural ſteadineſs of his temper, and a deſire of perfecting what he had once begun, had not been a ſufficient motive to the proſecuting his glorious undertaking. Yet he was ſo far ſenſible of the inconveniencies that attended the publication of unwelcome truths, while thoſe whom they concern, or their immediate deſcendants, are living, and had been made ſo uneaſy by the conſequences of this kind that attended the publication of his firſt volume, that he reſolved the ſecond ſhould not come abroad during his life (g) [Q]. This was certainly a very wiſe and prudent determination, which left him at full liberty to continue his Hiſtory with the ſame free and impartial ſpirit with which it was begun. After this point was once ſettled, he went on with ſuch great chearfulneſs, that, notwithſtanding his weak and infirm ſtate of health, he abſolutely completed this book in the year 1617: but though he made no difficulty of owning this to his learned friends, yet he deliberated ſeveral years about the diſpoſal of this work, that he might have a moral certainty of its coming abroad as he left it, and not be either altered or ſuppreſſed. The method he took was equally judicious and ſucceſsful: he kept the original by him, which was preſerved in the Cotton Library, and he ſent a very exact copy of it to his friend Mr. Dupuy, who had given him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that he would punctually perform what ſo great a truſt required (h), which he did with the greateſt fidelity [R]. We have placed theſe facts who boldly aſſert any thing, without thinking themſelves at all obliged to produce proof, is equally endleſs, and to no purpoſe. Beſides, this author had traduced the whole ſtate of Ireland, and would have perſuaded the world, that at a time, that kingdom enjoyed the greateſt peace and quiet, the government was carrying on a flaming perſecution, which gave him an opportunity of framing a martyrology (60), in which he ſets down, a perſon executed for High Treaſon, and another who died, at upwards of fourſcore, of mere old age. How far the government might act wiſely, in juſtifying its proceedings againſt thoſe aſperſions, is another queſtion: but for a private man, like Mr. Camden, to enter into a diſpute, with an unknown perſon, who had conſequently no reputation to loſe, and might aver what he pleaſed, was a very unequal match, and therefore very prudently declined.

(60) Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. iii. p. 222.

[Q] The ſecond ſhould not come abroad during his life.] It is certain, that notwithſtanding the great care and circumſpection uſed by our author, in writing the firſt part of his Annals, they expoſed him to the reſentment of numbers of perſons, who thought themſelves injured by the accounts he gave, either of them or of their anceſtors; and many of theſe teſtified their reſentments, in methods ſuitable to their diſpoſitions. Amongſt the reſt, there was one Mr. Maitland, the ſon of the famous Laird of Liddington, who made ſo great a figure in the troubles of Scotland, by adhering faithfully to Queen Mary. It was, on the one hand, impoſſible for our author to paſs over this gentleman's behaviour and character in writing his hiſtory; and on the other, it was hardly poſſible for him to treat this ſubject with greater mildneſs or caution than he did; and yet his ſon wrote a very long letter, which is ſtill extant, to Mr. Camden, in which, though in very reſpectful terms, he very plainly expreſſes his diſtaſte at what he had publiſhed, and demands the ſatisfaction of ſeeing thoſe authorities, which were requiſite to juſtify what he had written (61). It is uncertain whether our author gave him that ſatisfaction or not; though, without doubt, it was in his power, ſince he carefully preſerved the collections he had made with great pains, for the ſupport of the facts, by him delivered, moſt of which are ſtill in being, or at leaſt were ſo long after his deceaſe: but it muſt certainly have been very uneaſy to him, to find himſelf continually expoſed to ſuch enquiries and demands; and therefore, we cannot wonder that he ſhould decline multiplying theſe inconveniencies, by publiſhing the ſecond part of his work. Yet it is very certain, that he was not abſolutely determined in this point, but from a conſciouſneſs of his own integrity, and reſpect for truth, was willing, if it had been at all neceſſary, that it ſhould have come abroad, as appears plainly in the following paſſages, from a letter of his written to a perſon of great quality, though to whom is unknown. 'I ſubmit the Sup-'plement of the Annals of Queen Elizabeth's reign 'to his Majeſty's judicious cenſure; whether it 'pleaſe him, they ſhall be ſuppreſſed, or publiſhed; 'for I am indifferent.' And he concludes the ſame letter, in theſe terms: 'As I do not diſlike, that 'they ſhould be publiſhed in my life-time, ſo I do 'not deſire, that they ſhould be ſo ſet forth in 'Engliſh, until after my death, knowing how un-'juſt carpers the unlearned readers are (62).'

[R] Which he did with the greateſt fidelity.] The great reputation of Mr. Camden, procured him very early a large correſpondence abroad, which was very uſeful to him, while he was collecting materials for, or corrections and improvements of, his Britannia; and theſe laſted during his whole life. His foreign friends, therefore, intereſted themſelves extremely in the preſervation, as well as the credit of his works; and it was to their ſolicitations, that his reſolution of ſending a copy of his manuſcript abroad, was principally owing. The celebrated Mr. de Peireſc, ſo much better known to the learned world by his Latin name of Peireſkius, was one of the moſt preſſing. In one of his letters to our author, he has the following paſſage (63). 'We have advice from 'Germany, that they have there printed the Hiſtory 'of the late Monſieur de Thou entire; my impati-'ence is great to ſee what it is. This puts me in 'mind of your's, and to deſire, that it may be got 'out of your hands, for the public benefit. If M. 'de Thou's had been in no body's hands but his own, 'it would have run the hazard of being ſuppreſſed; 'for his executors, and the tutors of his children, 'would have committed it to the flames, for the 'ſake of their private intereſt: Mr. Linghelſein, to 'whom the late M. de Thou confided a copy, has facts together, though they happened at ſome diſtance of time, for the ſake of perſpicuity, and that the thread of the narration, with reſpect to ſo material a point, might not be broken or interrupted. In the latter end of the year 1616, there happened an affair which expoſed Rafe Brooke, who had given our author ſo much trouble, to very ſevere cenſure; and we the rather mention it, becauſe the beſt account of it extant fell from the pen of Mr. Camden (i); though for what reaſon it is impoſſible to ſay, it is left out in the Engliſh tranſlation of that work (k), in which he thought fit to record it, and is very imperfectly told by other writers. We have reaſon, therefore, to believe, that the reader will be very well ſatisfied to find it fairly and faithly ſtated in the notes [S]. This affair made ſo much noiſe in the world, that, on the third of March following,

' prevented this. If Mr. Grotius, would but have ' believed us, more than ſix months before his miſ- ' fortune happened, there had been a copy of his ' Hiſtory in this kingdom, and conſequently out of ' the reach of all by whom he is either hated or en- ' vied. For the glory of God, think of your's, and ' if there are any difficulties that hinder your putting ' it to the preſs, during your life-time, let there be ' more copies than one, and let them not all be on ' the ſame ſide of the ſea. This, by all the affection ' I have for you, I conjure; remaining, &c.' This letter, is dated from Paris, October 14, 1620. It appears, however, by a letter from Mr. Dupuy, that he had not received the ſecond part of the Annals ſome time afterwards; but at length, it was ſent by a very ſafe hand, was carefully preſerved, and faithfully publiſhed. This account differs pretty much from what a famous writer tells us upon this ſubject, in a treatiſe, where one would have thought he ſhould have taken care to be very exact. His own words deſerves notice (64). ' Monſieur de Thou ' having intended to make his Hiſtory general, en- ' tered into a correſpondence with the men over all ' Europe, that were moſt likely to inform him right; ' ſo he was in a great correſpondence with Camden. ' And when Camden's firſt volume appeared, he ' writ ſeverely to him, finding that it was ſo diffe- ' rent, from what had paſſed between them in let- ' ters, chiefly with relation to the Queen of Scots; ' upon which Mr. Camden told him the truth, ' that King James would needs reviſe it himſelf, and ' afterwards put it into the Earl of Northampton's ' hands, who was brother to the Duke of Norfolk, ' that had been beheaded on that Queen's account; ' and that many things were ſtruck out, and many ' things altered: this troubled Camden extremely, ' who took care that his ſecond part, ſhould not run ' the ſame fate: and therefore, he ſent it out of ' England to that great man, that it might be print- ' ed faithfully after his death. This is well known ' in England, and the ſending the ſecond part be- ' yond ſea to a foreigner, does very eaſily carry a ' man to believe this to have been the true reaſon of ' it.' It is very juſtly obſerved, by a very learned Prelate, that nothing ought to be believed of the complaints, ſaid to be made by M. de Thou, againſt our author, unleſs it be proved by his letters; becauſe there are numbers extant, which clearly ſhew the contrary, which acknowledge Camden's aſſiſtance, admit the prudence of his advice, apologize for the neglect of it, promiſe corrections in future editions, deſire the continuance of his correſpondence, and put both their caſes upon the ſame foundation, that of being ill thought of, for intending well (65). The firſt notion of Mr. Camden's work being corrupted, came from an oration made at Oxford, in his praiſe, by Lewis Du Moulin, who affirmed the thing was out of doubt, but did not think fit to mention any authority; as he might have done without fear, conſidering the time at which he delivered his oration, viz. July 10, 1652 (66). It was from him, in all probability, that Mr. Wood took it, but ſtill without proof (67); and what ſeems totally to deſtroy the fact is, that in the laſt edition of his Annals, publiſhed by Mr. Hearne, from a copy corrected and fitted for the preſs by Mr. Camden's own hand, there is very little, and nothing material, altered, with reſpect to Mary Queen of Scots. As to his ſending it abroad to de Thou, there are ſome objections that render that a little incredible; firſt, becauſe it is more than probable, that he was dead before the book was finiſhed; next, becauſe it is certain, that the author had determined nothing about the publication of it, till many years after that worthy perſon was in his grave; and even then he ſubmitted it to the good pleaſure of the King, whether it ſhould be publiſhed or ſuppreſſed; and if publiſhed, whether in his own life-time or not. Thirdly, after all theſe precautions taken, there was a copy ſent abroad to Mr. Dupuy, according to the advice of M. de Piereſc, but the original remained here in England; and from thence the laſt edition of the work, has been both corrected and augmented. The ſecond part was firſt printed at Leyden in 1625, in 8vo. at London 1627, fol. again at Leyden 1639, 8vo. and ſeveral times ſince; but the moſt correct edition of the whole work is, that publiſhed by Thomas Hearne from Dr. Smith's copy, corrected by Camden's own hand, collated alſo with another manuſcript in Mr. Rawliſon's library (68). Both parts were tranſlated into French by M. Paul de Belligent, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris; from which language it was tranſlated into Engliſh, by one M. D'Arcy, but with many errors (69). There have been ſeveral other tranſlations, but none at all worthy of the author's admirable performance; and therefore it is much to be wiſhed, that even at this diſtance of time, the ſame juſtice might be done to his Hiſtory of Queen Elizabeth, that has been already done to his Britannia; the rather becauſe a good tranſlation of that work, illuſtrated with notes, and compared with the beſt accounts of thoſe times, that have been ſince publiſhed, could not but be acceptable at this juncture, when no branch of Literature ſeems to have more admirers than Hiſtory, and Engliſh Hiſtory is more particularly diſtinguiſhed.

[S] Faithfully ſtated in the notes.] The plain and naked account of the matter is this, that on the 27th of December 1616, complaint was made to the King, that Sir William Segar, Garter King at Arms, had granted the Royal Arms of Arragon, with a Canton of Brabant, to George Brandon, who was the common hangman, at which his Majeſty was highly offended. But upon ſtrict enquiry, the fact came out to be, that Rafe Brookeſmouth, York Herald, had actually drawn theſe Arms, which were not unlike thoſe of Arragon and Brabant, and, by an emiſſary of his, impoſing upon the credulity of Garter, for a fee of two and twenty ſhillings, procured the confirmation of them, and then cauſed them to be preſented to the King (70). Thus Mr. Camden plainly, clearly, and fully relates this ſtory; but Dr. Smith, who had ſeen a relation of this affair by another hand, gives us ſome farther circumſtances, though he is ſo cautious, as to leave out Sir William Segar's name (71). He ſays, that the man who came from Brooke pretended, that he was in a mighty hurry, and was to embark that very day on board a ſhip for Spain, by which means he the more eaſily drew Sir William Segar, to confirm him, what he called the arms of his family. On the 30th of the ſame month, the whole affair was heard before the Commiſſioners appointed to execute the office of Earl Marſhal, where York Herald openly took upon him the whole affair; and upon report of it made to the King, himſelf, for his malicious ſubornation, and Garter for his weakneſs and credulity in confirming thoſe Arms for the ſake of a little money, were both committed to the Marſhalſea. On New Year's day a petition following, the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Earl Marſhal of England, met at the College of Heralds in Darby-place, and propoſed various regulations, ſuch as, the augmenting their ſalaries, removing their wives out of the College, and correcting other abuſes, for recovering the credit, and maintaining the reputation, of that Honourable Society (l). Our author ſeems to have been all this time, rather a calm ſpectator than a buſy actor, even in matters that might have fallen properly enough within his province; yet he was extremely reverenced by the wiſeſt, greateſt, and beſt men of his time, as appears very clearly from his own Diary. He ſpent his ſummers moſtly at Chiſlehurſt, and his winters at his houſe in Weſtminſter, occupied in both places, as far as his infirm ſtate of health would allow, in ſerious and uſeful ſtudies, as is evident by the obſervations he ſet down relating to the weather, the appearance of comets, and other things of the like nature (m). Jan. 19, 1619, the Painters, Glaſiers, and Stonecutters, were ſummoned to the Herald's Office, in order to be made acquainted with certain regulations that had been thought neceſſary, in relation to the painting, and otherwiſe repreſenting of arms. On the 10th of February following, Mr. Camden was ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper, vomiting blood to ſuch a degree, that he ſwooned twice, but, by the care of his Phyſician, being twice let blood in three days, he grew better (n). In the month of June 1619, he had a warm diſpute with his brethren, Garter and Norroy, Kings at Arms, who it ſeems took it amiſs that he ſhould appoint Mr. Vincent to viſit Lincolnſhire, and Mr. Philpot to viſit Kent (o), the former of which it appeared was a miſinformation: but notwithſtanding he acquainted them with this, they complained to the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Earl Marſhal againſt him, as if he had exceeded the powers granted him by his patent; but Mr. Camden in his anſwer to the Earl of Arundel, in which the powers before-mentioned are tranſcribed, gave ſuch full ſatisfaction in this point, as, for any thing that appears, prevented any farther trouble to him on this ſubject (p). In the beginning of the year 1621, he was ſent for to Court, and conſulted by the Lord Chancellor Bacon, in reference to the ceremonies to be uſed in creating him Viſcount St. Alban's; and on the twenty-ſeventh of January following, in conſequence of what was then agreed on with him and Norroy King at Arms, the Chancellor was, with great ſolemnity, created Viſcount St. Alban's, the Lord Carew carrying the robe of ſtate, the Lord Wentworth the coronet, and the Marquis of Buckingham ſupporting the new created Peer (q). On the firſt of May 1621, he went to Sanderherſt, to look for the camp of the Emperor Alexander Severus, but could meet with no ſigns of it. This Emperor being killed in Britain, at a place called Siſila, an opinion prevailed amongſt many, that it muſt have been in that neighbourhood; but this was upon conjecture only, and without any kind of proof, in the ſentiment of our author (r). It appears plainly from hence, as well as from various other paſſages in his Diary, that he was ſtill endeavouring to correct, improve, and augment his Britannia, a copy of which, with many ſuch emendations and additions, was in the hands of Dr. Thomas Smith (s). In the month of June in the ſame year, he was preſent at the execution of a very extraordinary ſentence. On the laſt day of the term, about three in the afternoon, Sir Francis Mitchell, Knt. who had been deeply concerned in the monopoly, by which the innholders and keepers of public houſes were grievouſly oppreſſed, was brought by the Sheriffs of London into Weſtminſter-Hall. Soon after came the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Earl Marſhal, viz. the Lord Privy-Seal, the Duke of Lenox, the Marquis of Buckingham, and the Earl of Arundel; ſeveral other Lords being preſent as ſpectators. Before theſe the priſoner was brought; then the ſentence given againſt him in Parliament having been read with a loud voice, his ſpurs were broken in pieces by the ſervants of the Knight Marſhal and thrown away: then his ſword, which was of ſilver, and ought to have been gilded, was taken from his ſide, broken over his head, and alſo thrown away; laſtly, he was pronounced to be no longer a worthy Knight, but an errant knave, as had been done before in the caſe of Andrew de Harclay, when degraded by Anthony Lucy. The three Kings at Arms, during the whole proceeding, ſat at the feet of the Lords Commiſſioners (t). On the laſt of Auguſt the ſame year, Mr. Camden was ſeized with his old diſtemper of vomiting blood in the night, but happily recovered (u). He executed, during the courſe of the next year, as far as his ſtrength would permit, all the duties of his function; but finding himſelf gradually declining, and his infirmities growing more a petition from Garter was exhibited to the King, together with a certificate from the Herald's Office, of his integrity and upright behaviour before this unhappy accident; upon which he was releaſed, and ſoon after the friends of York Herald procured his diſcharge likewiſe (72). This plainly ſhews the reſtleſs and turbulent temper of the man and his impious malice, as Mr. Camden calls it againſt his ſuperior, and yet about two years afterwards, he dedicated a large work of his to King James, and to the Lords Commiſſioners for executing the office of Earl Marſhal of England, who were then, Edward, Earl of Worceſter, Lord Privy-Seal; Lodowick, Duke of Lenox, Lord Steward of the Houſehold; George, Marquis of Buckingham, Maſter of the Horſe; Charles, Earl of Nottingham, High Admiral of England; William, Earl of Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain; Thomas, Earl of Arundel, and Thomas, Earl of Suffolk, all Privy Counſellors and Knights of the Garter (73).

and more upon him, he reſolved to delay no longer the performance of what he had ſo long ago reſolved upon, the founding an Hiſtory Lecture at Oxford; and accordingly, in the month of May 1622, he ſent down his gift by the hands of his intimate friend Mr. Heather (w). This was declared by Dr. Piers, Dean of Peterborough, and then Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity, in full Convocation: whereupon the Univerſity ſent him a public letter of thanks, and becauſe they underſtood Mr. Heather was a perſon for whom he had a ſingular reſpect, they conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Muſic, and the like degree they conferred upon Mr. Orlando Gibbons, another friend of his; which civility procured them a new benefactor, and a new Lecture in Muſic, founded by this Dr. Heather (x). Thus Mr. Camden amply fulfilled a vow he ſeemed to have made at the cloſe of his Britannia, and provided for the ſtudy of Antiquity in ſucceeding times, which, by his writings, he had ſo much illuſtrated [T]. The firſt Hiſtory Profeſſor was Mr. Degory Wheare, ſo appointed by Mr. Camden himſelf, October 16, 1622, and he began to read on the ſixth of January following: he likewiſe granted the ſurvivorſhip in the ſame Lecture to Mr. Brian Twine, the famous Antiquary, in caſe he had out-lived Mr. Wheare, but as he did not, the right came to the Univerſity (y). It was ſome time in this year, that his old antagoniſt, Rafe Brooke, York-Herald, having ſent abroad a book which promiſed mighty things with reſpect to accuracy and correctneſs, Mr. Camden thought fit to make ſome notes upon it, in which he detected a great many groſs errors; but diſdaining at his time of life to enter into new controverſies, he did not publiſh it (z): yet it is very probable, that theſe notes were of uſe to his friend Mr. Vincent, who attacked Brooke's work with great vigour, and therein ſhewed not only his own ſkill, but his gratitude and friendſhip to Mr. Camden, which led us to mention it [U]. On the eighteenth of Auguſt, as he was ſitting in [T] Which by his writings he had ſo much illuſtrated.] It appears plainly, as we have obſerved in the text, that he had this generous deſign in his thoughts about fifteen years before he carried it into execution, from the concluſion of the ſixth edition of his Britannia, publiſhed in 1607, where he makes uſe of theſe words (74). 'Nothing remains now (having 'carried on this diſcourſe through ſo many ſhallows 'of the ocean and the rugged rocks, as it were of 'antiquity) but that, like the Mariners of old, 'who uſe to dedicate their tattered ſails, or a votive 'plank to Neptune, I alſo conſecrate ſomething to 'the Almighty, and to venerable Antiquity. A vow 'which I moſt willingly make, and which, by the 'bleſſing of God, I hope to diſcharge in due time.' It is alſo evident, that he communicated his deſign to, and had the advice thereupon of, his beſt friends, from the following extract of a letter from Sir Henry Savile, dated from Eaton, of which he was Provoſt, November 3, 1621 (75). 'I think not amiſs to ad-'vertiſe you, that by plain Will, without a Deed 'executed in life-time, no land will paſs to a College 'or Corporation, as I have heard by my Counſel. 'I am ſure, Merton-College hath felt it; for Doctor 'Huicke, Queen Elizabeth's Phyſician, whom you 'may have heard on, or peradventure known, by 'will left all his land of good value to his two 'daughters and their heirs; and for lack of heirs '(as we underſtood, they died without any children 'both) all his ſaid lands to Merton-College, where-'of he was Fellow; but Doctor Bickley laboured, as 'I have heard, much in it, and could recover no-'thing. So that you muſt fly to ſome ſuch courſe 'as I advertiſed you in my laſt, or leave it upon 'Feoffees, men of ſincerity and judgment, that 'your death do not fruſtrate your good intention.' Agreeably to the advice given him by his worthy and judicious friend, Mr. Camden, by a Deed drawn by Sir John Walter, executed in due form of law, under his hand and ſeal (76), the 5th of March, in the nineteenth year of the reign of King James, Anno Dom. 1621-2, and acknowledged before Sir R. Rich, Knight, one of the Maſters in the High Court of Chancery, on the 14th of April following, made over all his right in the manor of Bexley, in the county of Kent, with all profits, emoluments, &c. ariſing therefrom, to the Chancellor, Maſters, and Scholars, of the Univerſity of Oxford, and their ſucceſſors, with this proviſo, that the profits of the ſaid manor, which were computed to be of the yearly value of four hundred pounds, ſhould be enjoyed by Mr. William Heather, his heirs and executors, for the ſpace of ninety-nine years, from the death of the donor; during which time the ſaid William Heather, was to pay to the Profeſſor of Hiſtory in Oxford, one hundred and forty pounds per annum, by half-yearly payments; and after the expiration of that term, the whole eſtate to be veſted in that Univerſity. For this judicious and ample donation, he was by that learned body unanimouſly declared and received into the number of benefactors to the Univerſity (77). At the requeſt of many of his friends, he appointed Degory Wheare, Maſter of Arts, Fellow of Exeter-College, his firſt reader, aſſigning him twenty pounds for the firſt year, forty for the ſecond, and after the third, he was to enjoy the full ſtipend (78). He wrote and dedicated to his patron, a very learned treatiſe, which ſhewed him to be every way fit for that office (79), which he held to the time of his deceaſe, when the Univerſity elected in his room, Robert Waring, Maſter of Arts of Chriſt-Church, then ſenior Proctor of the Univerſity, Auguſt 2, 1647 (80); and he being turned out the next year by the Parliament Commiſſioners, Lewis du Moulin, Doctor in Phyſic, was ſubſtituted in his place, September 14, 1648, which gave him an opportunity of making the oration in praiſe of our author, which hath been before-mentioned (81). In 1660, he was expelled by the Royal Viſiters; and the Univerſity elected in his place, John Lamphire, M. D. and Fellow of New College (82).

[U] Which led us to mention it.] It has been before obſerved, that Robert Glover, Eſq; Somerſet Herald, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, a man univerſally eſteemed and admired for his great abilities in his profeſſion (83), had made conſiderable collections, in relation to the deſcents of the Nobility of this kingdom, which were very injudiciouſly and incorrectly publiſhed by his kinſman and executor, Mr. Thomas Milles, in 1610, which induced Rafe Brooke, York-Herald, to compoſe another work of the ſame nature, which he intituled, A Catalogue and Succeſſion of the Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, and Viſcounts of this Realm of England, ſince the Norman Conqueſt to this preſent year 1619; together with their Armes, Wives, and Children, the times of their deaths and burials, with many of their memorable actions, diſcovering and reforming many errors, committed by men of other profeſſion, and lately publiſhed in print; to the great wronging of the Nobility, and prejudice of his Majeſty's Officers of Armes, who are only appointed and ſworn to deal faithfully in theſe caſes. Lond. 1619, fol. and again with corrections and emendations in the ſame ſize, 1622. in his chair and very thoughtful, he ſuddenly loſt the uſe of his hands and feet, and fell down upon the floor, but without receiving any hurt; and ſoon recovering his ſtrength got up again (a). The account of this misfortune was one of the laſt things that the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Earl Marſhal, he complains bitterly, not only of Mr. Milles, but of John Stowe, for an error committed in his Annals; and of one Mr. Martin, who had written a Hiſtory of the Kings of England: and the great deſign of his complaints was, to obtain a reſtraint upon the preſs, that nothing might be publiſhed for the future upon this ſubject, but by the licence of the Earl Marſhal, or of the Commiſſioners for the executing that office; not foreſeeing, that this was to attempt curing a ſmall inconveniency by a much greater; for books thus licenſed, however erroneous, would have been the only books publiſhed; and thus, inſtead of providing for the cure of the diſeaſe, he, like a true quack, ſuggeſted the ſhorteſt method for rendering it incurable. It was to this book, that Mr. Auguſtine Vincent, Rouge Croix Purſuivant, wrote an Anſwer under the title of, A Diſcovery of Errors in the firſt Edition of the Catalogue of Nobility, publiſhed by Rafe Brooke, York-Herald, 1619, and printed herewith word for word according to that edition, with a Continuance of the Succeſſions from 1619 until this preſent year 1622; at the end whereof is annexed, a Review of a later Edition by him ſtolen into the world, 1621. London, printed by William Jaggard, 1622, fol. It is dedicated to the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, who was, by this time, become Earl Marſhal; and in this dedication, there is a ſtroke at York's prepoſſeſſion in favour of the family of his old patron the Earl of Eſſex, and his prejudice to the Howards. But whoever has a mind to ſee the true tendency of this controverſy, need only peruſe the following paragraphs from Mr. Vincent's addreſs to Brooke, which ſtand at the entrance of his performance. 'It is true, 'when I firſt entered a novice into the world, I 'found it poſſeſt of a ſtrange admiration of Maſter 'Yorke: his name was grown a terror to men of his 'own profeſſion, and I, a young novice, could not 'but be carried with the multitude into the ſame 'opinion. He had then but newly ſet forth a book 'againſt Maſter Camden, artificially penned, and 'like a ſcholar; I know the Doctor's name that 'penned it. I then began to obſerve him, abroad 'ſaw him, though loved of few, yet feared of all; 'heard him ſing Magnificat of himſelf in Pouls, and 'all the walk bear the quire to him; beheld him 'marſhal funerals ſolemnly, which I thought was 'rare. In a word, others admired him; I adored 'him. This opinion bred in me an infinite deſire 'to be his diſciple; but that again ſeemed too high an 'ambition. The next point then was, ſeeing I 'might not have that beatitude to enjoy his preſence in ſpecie, yet to have the fruition of him in 'ſpeculo in his works. I preſently got into my 'hands his Diſcovery againſt Mr. Camden; came 'to it with fear and trembling, as one that comes 'to pull a locke from a lyon's maine; read him 'with reverence, and began to find ſome pretty reliſe in him, only methought his ſtile was ſomewhat 'tart, but that I gueſſed might proceed out of age: 'but entering further, and ſeeing him to grow from 'vinegar to gall, and from gall to venom, againſt 'ſo renowned and reverend a man, and the ſame 'mixed with pride, arrogancie, and admiration of 'himſelf; this began a little to ſhake my former 'conceit: theſe things (methought) did not ſo well 'ſuit with a man that were truly learned; but yet 'theſe were his moralles (which are not alike tempered 'in all mens) this touched not his intellectuals.

'I then grew bolder, and began to handle him 'nearer, labouring, by comparing their books, to 'ſatisfy myſelf, whether Maſter Camden were ſo 'black as he had painted him, or not. I found for 'Maſter Camden, that if he had erred, he had erred 'with authority. For Yorke, I ſaw no proofs, but 'Pythagorian proofs, inſtead of ſcriptum eſt, ipſe 'dixit; no record, no antiquity, but his own antiquity of forty years practiſe in that ſtudy: this I 'liked not. Beſides, I noted in him not only animum 'contradicendi, a ſpirit of contradiction, but ſtudium 'calumniandi, a wilful humour of miſtaking, like 'Hercules in a play, that made monſters of ſtraw 'for himſelf to ſubdue; maliciouſly perverting and 'miſconſtruing what had a true and a right underſtanding; and, in further proceſs, diſcovered in 'him, by the books I ſearched, a great deal of 'ignorance and inſufficiency. Then I clearly found 'mine error, Tunc ille Æneas? Is this, Mr. Yorke! 'Are theſe the fruits of forty years ſtudy? I then 'damned my opinion, and hated myſelf for it, and 'that many headed beaſt from whom I had received 'it, taking a document thereby never again to 'build my judgment, either in good or bad part, 'upon the vulgar, who ſet up ſhadows for ſaints, 'and adore wooden images which, in their true 'worth, were fitter to be made whipping-poſts, and 'blaſt with their breath, the truly virtuous and noble, 'of whom the world is unworthy.

'Thus, Mr. Yorke, have I ſhrieved myſelf to 'you, what progreſs you have made, through my 'opinion, from the higheſt ſtep to the loweſt, and 'in what terms you ſtood there, before your late 'admired Catalogue came to light; ſo as now having 'thus given you a true glaſs of my heart, I truſt 'you will be ſatisfied, that it was not any humour 'of envy or emulation that drew me into this oppoſition; but, firſt, my zeal to truth, which I knew 'ſuffered in this diſcourſe; next, your own intolerable arrogance, and pride of conceit; your vilifying, and contempt of others, as if you had ſtood 'on the top of Poules, and ſaw all men under 'you no bigger than Jack Dawes: your familiar 'vein of detracting from the beſt and worthieſt men: 'your tongue-gilding over no man's name, but 'that it left a ſlime behind it: and, laſtly, the 'knowledge and experience I had of your defects, 'and infinite diſtance from true ſufficiency; and the 'juſt diſdain which burnt within me, to ſee a fellow 'blown up by a popular applauſe, and almoſt deified amongſt ſilly believers (as the ſtore-houſe of 'knowledge) whom I knew to be no better than the 'tomb of Semiramis, glorious without, and promiſing, by the inſcription, great treaſure within; 'whereas Darius opening it, found his expectation 'mocked with the ſight of a brainleſs ſkull, and the 'reliques of dead carcaſſes. But admit envy had 'ſpurred me on to this work, doth that prove that 'what you writ was true? Num quia ego claudas, tu 'recte incedis? Cloſe with me in this point: is that 'true, or no, which I have written in diſcovering 'of your falſhoods? If it be not, you are allowed 'your traverſe: if it be true that I ſay, what difference or choice is there of the perſon, whether 'envy, or detraction, or the devil himſelf ſpeak it; 'truth being ever the ſame through what mouth, or 'from what mind ſoever it paſs? In matters of charity, it is true, we look not what, but with what 'mind it is given: but in a verdict of truth it is not 'to be regarded with what mind but what is ſpoken. 'Neither can your fifty years practice give you privilege to write untruth by authority, or to ſet forth 'things that may appear untrue without authority. 'But we (you ſay) take upon truſt, and are deceived 'in the names, beginnings, and titles of families;'

Fabula narratur ———

It is plain from hence, that the whole of this affair was nothing more than a continuation of the old quarrel between Brooke and Camden, and if it were not ſo plain, we might add ſome other convincing proofs. Brooke's motto to his Catalogue is, Quam quiſque norit artem, in hac ſe exerceat, the very ſame that ſtood before his book againſt our author. Mr. Vincent's motto is, Pro captu Lectoris habent ſua fata libelli, the very ſame that ſtood before Mr. Camden's Britannia. His title too is the very copy of Brooke's book againſt Camden, and the method he takes in refuting that he committed to writing. It was followed by a ſevere fit of illneſs, which laſted to the ninth of November 1623, when he died at his houſe at Chiſlehurſt, in the county of Kent, in the ſeventy-third year of his age (b). By his Will, made on his laſt birth-day, he diſpoſed of what little he had left after founding his Hiſtory Lecture, in charities to the poor, legacies to his relations, and ſome ſmall memorials to his particular acquaintance, of which ſome account will be given at the bottom of the page (c) [W]. His body being removed to his houſe at London, was, on the nineteenth of the ſame month, carried to Weſtminſter-Abbey in great pomp. The whole College of Heralds attended in their proper habits, great numbers of the Nobility, and perſons of the firſt diſtinction accompanied, and at their entrance into the Church, the Prebends and other members received the corpſe in their veſtments, with much ſolemnity, and conducted it into the nave. After the funeral ſermon, which was preached by Dr. Sutton, and was eſteemed an excellent performance, they buried him in the ſouth iſle, near the learned Caſaubon, and over-againſt the celebrated Chaucer (d). Near the place a handſome monument of white marble was erected, with his effigies to the middle, and in his hand a book with Britannia inſcribed on the leaves, under which there is an elegant inſcription, but with a miſtake as to his age, which is there ſaid to be ſeventy-four, though he wanted almoſt ſix months of ſeventy-three (e). The Univerſity of Oxford alſo, in reſpect to a perſon whoſe breeding there did her ſo much honour, as well as out of gratitude for his noble benefaction, paid a remarkable tribute of various kinds of praiſe to the memory of this great man (f) [X]. His character is thus given us in few refuting him, is likewiſe an exact tranſcript of his own. But what is more ſingular is, the recommendations prefixed to this book, under this title: 'The opinions and offices of ſundry choice and qualified Gentlemen, friends to the author, touching this his Diſcovery of Errors.' Theſe gentlemen were Sir William Segar, Knight, Garter Principal King at Arms; Richard St. George, Eſq; Norroy King at Arms; Samuel Thompſon, Eſq; Windſor-Herald; Henry St. George, Eſq; Richmond-Herald; Henry Chitting, Eſq; Cheſter-Herald; Sampſon Lennard. Blewmantle Purſuivant; John Philpot, Rouge Dragon; Mr. Richard Brathwayte, Mr. John Bradſhaw, Mr. Stephen Clyve, and, to cloſe all, a long letter from John Selden, Eſq; which appears to be one of the moſt laboured and correct things he ever wrote. All I have to add to this long note is, that from the ſplenetic attack originally made by Rafe Brooke upon the Britannia, aroſe very great advantages to the public, by the ſhifting and bringing to light as good, perhaps a better and more authentic account of our Nobility, than had been given, at that time, of thoſe in any other country of Europe.

[W] At the bottom of the page.] He wrote his Will himſelf, upon his laſt birth-day, May 2, 1623; it having been his conſtant cuſtom, as appears by his Diary, to ſpend that day in good works and pious meditations (84). In this his laſt teſtament, after a devout introduction, and bequeathing eight pounds to the poor of the pariſh in which he ſhould happen to die, he bequeaths to Sir Fulke Grevile, Lord Brooke, who preferred him gratis to his office, a piece of plate of ten pounds; to the company of Painter Stainers of London, he gave ſixteen pounds to buy them a piece of plate, upon which he directed this inſcription, Gul. Camdenus Clarenceux filius Sampſonis, Pictoris Londinenſis, dono dedit; he beſtowed the ſum of twelve pounds on the company of Cordwainers, or Shoemakers of London, to purchaſe them a piece of plate, on which the ſame inſcription was to be engraved. To his couſin John Wyat, Painter of London, he bequeathed one hundred pounds; to Mr. Camden of London, Silkman, ten pounds; and other legacies to his relations; to Mr. Thomas Allen of Glouceſter-hall, in Oxford, he gave ſixteen pounds; to Janus Gruter, Library-keeper to the Elector Palatine, five pounds; and to Mr. Harvey, Vicar of Chiſlehurſt, ſeven; to each of the ſix Heralds, four pounds; and to each of the Purſuivants, two pounds; to Sir Francis Leigh of Weſtminſter, four pounds; to Sir Peter Manwood, four pounds; to Sir William Pitt, three pounds; to Mr. St. Loe Kniverton, three pounds; the like to Mr. Chamberlayne and to Mr. Limiter; to Mr. Selden of the Temple, five pounds; to Mr. Harding the Uſher, four pounds: and ſeveral legacies to his ſervants and dependants. As to his books and papers he directs, that Sir Robert Cotton of Conington, ſhould have the firſt view of them, that he might take out ſuch as he had borrowed of him, and then he bequeaths to him all his printed books and manuſcripts, excepting ſuch as concern Arms and Heraldry, which, with his ancient ſeals, he bequeaths to his ſucceſſor in the office of Clarenceux, provided, becauſe they coſt him a conſiderable ſum of money, he gave to his couſin John Wyat, what the Kings at Arms, Garter, and Norroy for the time being, ſhould think fit; and agreed alſo to leave them to his ſucceſſor. Of this Will he conſtituted Dr. Heather ſole Executor, and appointed Sir Robert Cotton and Mr. John Wiſe, Overſeers, giving each of them ten pounds for mourning. It was proved on the 10th of November 1623, before Sir William Byrd, Doctor of Laws, by Doctor Heather, his Executor (85). But it muſt be obſerved, that notwithſtanding this diſpoſition of his books and papers, yet Dr. John Williams, then Dean of Weſtminſter, and Biſhop of Lincoln, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, procured all the printed books for the new library erected in the Church of Weſtminſter (86). It is underſtood, that his collections in ſupport of his hiſtory, with reſpect to civil affairs, were before this time depoſited in the Cotton library; for as to thoſe that related to eccleſiaſtical matters, when aſked for them by Dr. Goodman, ſon to his great benefactor, he declared he ſtood engaged to Dr. Bancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, upon his death, tranſlated his right to them to his ſucceſſor, Dr. Abbot, who actually had them, and intended to have publiſhed them. They came afterwards into the hands of Archbiſhop Laud, and are ſuppoſed to have been deſtroyed, when his papers fell into the hands of Mr. Prynne, Mr. Scot, and Hugh Peters; for upon a diligent ſearch made by Dr. Sancroft, ſoon after his promotion to that See, there was not a line of them to be found (87).

[X] To the memory of this great man.] As ſoon as the news of his death reached Oxford, Mr. Degory Wheare, his learned Profeſſor of Hiſtory, reſolved to celebrate the memory of ſo worthy a man, by an oration, which he ſeems to have delivered only to ſuch as attended his Lecture. This oration of his was delivered on the 2d of December 1623, and a ſhort account is contained therein of the life and principal actions of the perſon, whoſe memory it celebrates (88). As it was ſo haſtily compoſed, and as orators are generally ſpeaking more attentive to the roundneſs of their periods, the propriety of their expreſſion, and the elegance of their method, than to matters of fact; we may from thence very eaſily account for ſeveral inaccuracies and errors, that are to be met with therein. One thing, however, deſerves particular notice. Mr. Wheare tells us indeed, that Mr. Camden had part of his education at Chriſt's Hoſpital, but he does not ſay that he received it from few words by an excellent writer, to which little can be added. 'In his writings he 'was candid and modeſt, in his converſation eaſy and innocent, and in his whole life 'even and exemplary (g).' The high reputation his writings acquired him amongſt foreigners, is at the ſame time a tribute to his merit, and to the glory of this nation, which owes to few of her worthies in the Republic of Letters, more than to him, whoſe fame extended throughout Europe, and yet eſcaped the rage of Critics wherever it came. This was certainly owing, in a great meaſure, to the ſweetneſs and candour of his temper, which ſo qualified his learning, that in foreign nations all were ready to commend, and none cared to diſpute with him. All this might be eaſily taken for fond partiality, or for downright flattery, if thoſe who are acquainted with the writings of our author, were not fully ſenſible, that if we had ſaid even more than this, it might have been ſupported by indiſputable evidence, and alſo by the teſtimony of a cloud of witneſſes, from amongſt thoſe, who, in that age, were eſteemed firſt-rate writers (b) [Y]. But notwithſtanding from the charity: on the contrary, he ſeems to inſinuate, that he was ſent thither by his father, who from his very cradle had deſigned him a learned education: it is neceſſary to produce his own words. Eum pater à primis incunabulis rei literariæ deſtinavit, cujus prima ſemina ſub magiſtro neſcio quo, in paidotrophio illo ampliſſimo quod Ædis Chriſti, Londini appellatur, imbibit, inde Scholam Colettianam, ad Divi Pauli ſitam petiit. Dr. Smith gives a different turn to this; and on the very circumſtance of his having been at this ſchool infers, that he muſt have loſt his father early, and have been educated there on the foundation as an orphan (89). That he was educated there, ſeems to be a fact out of doubt; for otherwiſe, I cannot imagine, that Degory Wheare, would have advanced it; but that he was upon the foundation as an orphan of the city of London, is not agreeable to what Wheare ſays, or to many other circumſtances. But to proceed; the Univerſity, out of regard to the benefaction they had received from him, directed, that a public oration ſhould be made to his honour, before the whole Univerſity; to which office, Zouch Townly of Chriſt-Church was aſſigned, a man remarkable for his parts and eloquence, as well as for his poſſeſſion of the Latin tongue in its utmoſt elegance and purity. There was upon this occaſion, a prodigious concourſe of the learned of all ranks, many drawn by the fame of the ſpeaker, but more by their reſpect for the memory of that great man, of whom he was to ſpeak. He diſcharged his duty upon this occaſion, in a manner worthy of himſelf and of Camden: it is a lofty and magnificent piece of eloquence, which carries the glory of its ſubject as high as human genius could raiſe it, and has been therefore always eſteemed as laſting a monument to the praiſe of Camden, as that in Weſtminſter-Abbey (90). The Univerſity went ſtill farther: the verſes written to celebrate the praiſe of the deceaſed by the diſciples of the Muſes in her precincts, were collected into a book, and publiſhed in the ſucceeding year, together with the oration laſt mentioned, under the title of Inſignia Camdeni (91). But even this was not all: they were deſirous of honouring him to the very utmoſt of their power; and therefore, in a full and ſolemn Convocation, held on the 18th of December, it was decreed by the unanimous conſent of the whole Academical Senate, that Camden, for his moſt noble munificence towards the Univerſity of Oxford, ſhould be inſerted into the roll of their benefactors, in order to be commemorated at the ſtated ſolemnities, with the reſt of the benefactors to this ancient ſource of Literature, whether Kings, Queens, Prelates, or Nobles, who were in this manner remembered; and who, however unlike in other reſpects, and unequal in rank to each other, were in this both like and equal, that they laboured to promote piety and virtue, by encouraging learning and facilitating ſtudy (92). It is very remarkable, that, on the one hand, Mr. Camden, who had not been over kindly uſed by the Univerſity, when he was a member of it, who does not ſeem to have taken much notice of the offer of a degree, when he went thither on account of Sir Thomas Bodley's funeral (93), and who ſeems to have declined the title of Doctor, as he did of Knight afterwards (94), ſhould contribute in ſo generous a manner, and by ſo uſeful a foundation, to the ſplendor of that illuſtrious body; and, on the other hand, it deſerves our notice, that the ſame Univerſity which had been ſo frugal, I had like to have ſaid ſomething more, of her favours to him, when a young man, who had no other claim to them than from his merit, ſhould afterwards be ſo profuſe of them to his friend, when he waved accepting them himſelf, and think no honour too great for the memory of one who, it is true, had enriched them by his benefaction; and which was ſtill more, had done them ſo much credit by his education.

[Y] Were eſteemed firſt rate writers.] It may not be amiſs to ſet down a very few only out of the almoſt numberleſs authorities, that without any difficulty might be aſſembled in proof of this point. The famous Juſtus Lipſius, upon a certain occaſion, ſpeaks thus to our author (95). 'I take thee, William 'Camden, for my judge, who lately, by the clear 'ſun of thy underſtanding, hath diſpelled the miſts 'which overwhelmed thy Britain.' The celebrated Joſeph Scaliger, in one of his moſt learned works, and which will preſerve his memory as long as any reſpect is paid to learning, ſpeaking of a certain point in Antiquity, ſays (96), 'It may be proved 'by a ſtone that was lately digged up in Britain, 'and which is produced by the moſt learned Camden, 'in his admirable performance.' In his Epiſtles alſo, he ſpeaks with raptures of our author, and tells his Engliſh friend to whom his Epiſtle is addreſſed, 'That he wanted time to inform that learned man 'himſelf (97), how much he thought himſelf obliged to him, for his benevolence in ſending it him.' The moſt celebrated Iſaac Caſaubon, writes to him in the following terms (98). 'It is not only the 'Engliſh, moſt learned man, who are for ever bound 'to you for this great work (Britannia), but all, and 'every one, let them reſide where they will, who 'are friends and lovers of ancient Hiſtory. Amongſt 'which, ſince I have preſumed to inſert my name, I 'would have you perſuaded, that no man can be 'more ſtudious in the peruſal of your works. All 'things in your writings pleaſe me extremely, the 'good ſenſe, diligence, learning, but above and 'beyond all, the ſagacity of your judgment.' Paulus Merula, ſpeaking of the aſſiſtance he had received from the learned, expreſſes himſelf thus (99): 'Out 'of Germany I returned home through France and 'England, where William Camden was to me of 'more uſe than all the reſt.' Thuanus writing to him for the helps that he expected from him, makes uſe of theſe very ſtrong expreſſions (100): 'Write, and 'do not deny your counſel to a friend that ſtands in 'need of it. Hints are ſufficient from you, nor is 'it neceſſary that you ſhould be at any pains in di'geſting them. Whatever you write will not only 'have the weight of advice, but the force of a com'mand: the next part of my hiſtory, which is al'ready printed, will ſhew you how much I value, 'as indeed I ought, your inſtructions.' The induſtrious Andrew du Cheſne, ſpeaking of the aſſiſtance he received from him, ſays (101), 'I received 'from that worthy Engliſhman, whoſe name ſtands 'ſo high in the liſt of men of letters, William Cam'den, ſeveral MSS. &c.' Inſtead of extending this note farther, we will conclude in the words of a great Prelate of our own (102): 'To be particular, 'ſays notwithſtanding all his great merit, and its being ſo generally, one might ſay univerſally, confeſſed, yet we ſhould have known what related to him very imperfectly, and in a very ſuperficial manner, if it had not been for the pious care, and indefatigable labour of the worthy Dr. Thomas Smith (i); who not only publiſhed a very curious and comprehenſive Life of our author, but, with incredible pains and induſtry, collected a great number of letters written to Mr. Camden, by the moſt judicious, as well as moſt learned, men, of other nations, beſides our own; and who likewiſe drew together abundance of ſmall pieces that fell from our author's pen, and which well deſerved to be tranſmitted to poſterity, and of which, as it is very requiſite, ſome notice ſhall be taken at the bottom of the page [Z]. That we might give an article of ſuch conſequence

(i) He not only publiſhed our author's Life and Letters, but left his Annals corrected by his own hand, to Mr. Hearne, who publiſhed them.

'ſays he, in his acquaintance, would be to reckon 'up all the learned men of his time. When he was 'young, learned men were his patrons; when he 'grew up, the learned men were his intimates; and 'when he came to be old, he was a patron to the 'learned. So that learning was his only care, and 'learned men the only comfort of his life. What 'an uſeful and honourable correſpondence he had 'ſettled, both at home and abroad, does beſt appear 'from his letters; and with what candour and 'eaſineſs he maintained it, the ſame letters may in'form us. The work he was engaged in for the 'honour of his native country, gained him reſpect 'at home, and admiration abroad, ſo that he was 'looked upon as a common oracle; and for a fo'reigner to travel into England and return without 'ſeeing Mr. Camden, was thought a very groſs 'omiſſion. He was viſited by ſix German Noble'men at one time, and at their requeſt wrote his 'Lemma in each of their books, as a teſtimony that 'they had ſeen him.'

[Z] At the bottom of the page.] The firſt of the pieces of Mr. Camden, publiſhed by Doctor Smith, is in Latin, and bears the title of (103) Gulielmi Camdeni Annales, ab anno 1603, ad ann. 1623; but the running title is Gul. Camdeni regni regis Jacobi I. annalium apparatus, i. e. A draft of William Camden's Annals of the reign of King James I. We have the following account of this work from Mr. Anthony Wood (104). 'The Annals of King 'James, reach from the death of Queen Elizabeth, '24th of March 1602-3, to 18th of Auguſt 1623, 'and no farther, becauſe the author being then very 'ill in body (remaining in that condition till his 'death) he could not well continue them any far'ther: ſo that theſe memoirs want more than for 'a year, to the end of the reign of James I. Theſe 'Annals are written with the author's own hand in 'fol. being only a ſkeleton of a hiſtory, or bare 'touches, to put the author in mind of greater mat'ters that he had in his head, had he lived to have 'digeſted them in a full hiſtory, as that of Queen 'Elizabeth. The original came after his death into 'the hands of Mr. John Hacket, afterwards D. D. 'and at length Biſhop of Litchfield; who, as I have 'been divers times informed, did privately convey 'it out of the library of the author; Hacket being 'then a Maſter of Arts of ſome years ſtanding. 'This original being communicated by the ſaid Dr. 'Hacket, while he was living at Litchfield, to Mr. '(afterwards Sir) William Dugdale, then Norroy 'King at Arms; he, contrary to the Doctor's know'ledge, took a copy of it, which I have ſeen and 'peruſed at Sir William's houſe, called Blith-hall 'in Warwickſhire; but therein I found many miſ'takes, as it afterwards more evidently appeared to 'me, when that tranſcript was put into the Aſhmo'lean Muſæum: another copy I have ſeen in the 'hands of Sir Henry St. George, Clarenceux King 'at Arms, which having been tranſcribed by one that 'underſtands not Latin, there are innumerable faults 'therein, and therefore not all to be relied upon. 'After Dr. Hacket's death, the original was put 'into the library of Trinity-College, in Cambridge, 'where it now remains.' It appears plainly from hence, that Mr. Wood really thought theſe were Mr. Camden's materials for the writing the Annals for King James's reign: but whoever ſhall conſider them attentively, will perceive, that he had no ſuch intention, amongſt many others, for theſe reaſons. In the firſt place, they are very unequal; in ſome years there are memoranda to every month, and almoſt to every day of the month; in others, there are only a few months; and in the year 1609, the dates are in February, March, and June only, and there are not above ten articles in the whole year. In the next place, they are very improperly digeſted for ſuch a purpoſe; many things of great moment are omitted; many of little importance are ſet down. In thoſe years, in which he is moſt copious, theſe trivial matters abound moſt. As for inſtance, in the year 1615, he ſets down, that in the month of February there was hard froſt (105), and a great deal of ſnow; more eſpecially on the 12th, and on the 14th; and that the froſt did not break till on the 26th. March 13, the firſt part of his Annals went to the preſs; on June 8, they were publiſhed (106). The month of July, was very dry throughout to the 31ſt, when it rained very hard (107). One ſees plainly from hence, that he did not intend this for a public hiſtory. As he had more leiſure, he enlarged his Diary; but then it appears, that he ſet down only thoſe things that concerned himſelf, his friends, or his office, as King at Arms: as he grew infirm, he ſet down when he was taken ill, when he went out of town, when he returned to it: and, in a word, whatever elſe occurred to him, that he thought worth remembering; as for inſtance, 'April 8, 1618, 'There was a great foot-race run, at which, though 'it was a dull day, the King was preſent, the mob 'was very great, and one J. Hubbard, ſon to the 'Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, who 'married Viſcount Liſle's daughter, was very much 'hurt (108).' It is true, that to give theſe more the air of Annals, almoſt all the paſſages of this ſort are thrown out in the Engliſh tranſlation; but by this means the cheat, or at leaſt the miſtake is carried on, and unwary people are led to believe, that from ſuch notes as theſe, our author intended to compoſe the Annals of the reign of King James, which is equally injurious to truth, and to the memory of Mr. Camden. What they really were, and how far they may be of uſe, that judicious Prelate we have ſo often quoted, has told us (109). 'From 'the end of Queen Elizabeth to his own death, he 'kept a Diary of all (rather, of many of) the re'markable paſſages in the reign of King James. 'Not that he could ſo much as dream of living to 'make uſe of them himſelf at that age, and under 'thoſe many infirmities, which a laborious life had 'drawn upon him. But he was willing however, 'to contribute all the aſſiſtance he could to any that 'ſhould do the ſame honour to the reign of King 'James, which he had done to that of Queen Eliza'beth. If this were practiſed by perſons of learn'ing and curioſity, who have opportunity of ſeeing 'into the public affairs of a kingdom, what a large 'ſtep would it be towards a hiſtory of the reſpective 'times? For after all, the ſhort hints and ſtrictures 'of that kind, do very often ſet things in a truer 'light than regular hiſtories, which are but too 'commonly written to ſerve a party, and ſo draw 'one inſenſibly out of the right way. Whereas, if 'men are left themſelves to make their own in'ferences from ſimple matters of fact, as they lay 'before them; though perhaps, they may often be 'at a loſs how to make things hang together; yet 'their aim ſhall be ſtill true, and they ſhall hardly 'be miſtaken in the main. One ſingle matter of 'fact, faithfully and honeſtly delivered, is worth a 'thouſand comments and flouriſhes.' To this piece we find annexed, a leaf of an Engliſh Diary, for the years

conſequence with all the advantage poſſible, we have been careful in peruſing what had been hitherto done in this way, and by comparing the facts with his own writings, have detected and rectified various miſtakes, which hitherto had paſſed current even with the learned world. But beſides theſe, we have met with ſome other circumſtances, memorials, and remarks, that may deſerve the reader's attention, and yet could not well be reduced into the general repreſentation of his life and writings; and therefore, that they might not be loſt, we have thrown them into a note [AA]. The great pains taken by the year 1603, 1604, and 1605; but it is remarkable, that they do not at all agree with the Latin Diary. There is a looſe leaf alſo of very ſhort hints, relating to his own life. Then follow two ſhort diſcourſes, upon the etymology, antiquity, and office of the Earl Marſhal of England. His verſes come next; and firſt his Latin Poem, in praiſe of the famous Roger Aſcham, written in compliment to his friend Dr. Grant. Another Latin Poem follows, intitled, Hibernia; then his excellent Epigram, in praiſe of Hakluyt's Voyages; and laſtly, an Epigram on Sir Clement Edmund's tranſlation of Cæſar's Commentaries: all theſe are in Latin, as are alſo the collection of Epitaphs, written by him; which are ten in number. The moſt remarkable, is that for Mary Queen of Scots, which probably was intended for her tomb in Weſtminſter-Abbey; on which there is now a larger, but far leſs elegant inſcription.

[AA] We have thrown them into a note.] There is great reaſon to believe, that notwithſtanding our author's warm love of Antiquities, the firſt work he projected, was a regular Hiſtory of England, from the Norman Conqueſt, in Latin. He tells us ſo himſelf pretty plainly; and from the ſpecimen he has given us (110) of his abilities in that way, we have the greateſt reaſon to regret, that he did not proſecute his deſign: for if he had, we ſhould certainly have ſeen an Engliſh Hiſtory equal in point of compoſition to Buchanan's boaſted Hiſtory of Scotland; and much ſuperior to it, in all other reſpects. His turn for Latin Poetry was admirable, and the marriage of Tame and Iſis, inſerted in the Britannia, and which is certainly his own, does as much honour to the quickneſs of his fancy, the beauty of his expreſſion, and the harmony of his numbers, as the reſt of that noble work does to his judgment, induſtry, and learning. But it ſeems he was afraid of being thought to apply himſelf to theſe kind of lighter ſtudies, which might be thought inconſiſtent with the gravity of his employments, and the ſerioufneſs of his temper. At leaſt, this we may have leave to gueſs from what his worthy and grateful ſcholar, Benjamin Jonſon, tells him in the Dedication of one of his Comedies (111). 'There are, no doubt, a ſu-
'percilious race in the world, who will eſteem all 'offices done you in this kind an injury; ſo ſolemn
'a vice it is with them, to uſe the authority of their 'ignorance, to the crying down of poetry or the 'profeſſors of it. But my gratitude muſt not leave 'to correct their error, ſince I am none of thoſe that 'can ſuffer the benefits conferred upon my youth to 'periſh with my age. I pray you accept this, ſuch
'wherein, neither the confeſſion of my manners ſhall
'make you bluſh, nor of my ſtudies repent you to 'have been the inſtructor.' The reverence and gratitude of Mr. Jonſon, was farther expreſſed in other of his works; and indeed, there have been few men of learning, who met with ſuch general reſpect from their contemporaries as Camden did. The famous Spenſer, in an excellent poem of his, intitled, The Ruins of Time (112), has a very fine ſtanza, to the honour of this learned man, which was written in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and is therefore referred to the fame that he acquired by his Britannia; it runs thus:

Camden, the nourice of Antiquity,
And lanthorn unto late ſucceeding age
To ſee the light of ſimple verity,
Buried in ruines, through the great outrage
Of her own people led with warlike rage:
Camden, though time all monuments obſcure,
Yet thy juſt labours ever ſhall endure.

Nor does it appear, that he was leſs reſpected by perſons, who perhaps in ſome things differed from him in opinion: as for inſtance, the famous Mr. Bolton (113), ſo well known to the world, by his excellent book, intitled, Nero Cæſar; a good Hiſtorian himſelf, and a profound Antiquary, but withal a Papiſt, complimented him in the following manner, upon Sir William Segar's and Sir Richard St. George's being knighted, who were Garter and Norroy Kings at Arms:

'Right worthy Sir,

'THOUGH your brother Kings have out-gone
'in you the honour of Knighthood, they ſhall ever 'come behind you very far in the greater honour of 'immortal fame. Some aſcribe it to ambition in 'you, that you are not a Knight (for you know how 'prepoſterouſly witty the wits of our time are on 'other men's actions and abſtinencies) as thinking
'the neglect thereof an higher point than the ac'ceptance: Others to puſillanimity; and we your 'friends to your modeſty; which I am angry with,
'notwithſtanding, becauſe it hath deprived us of
'ſome ſplendour, and comfort in our friend's ad'vancement.'

In another work of his, intitled, Hypercritica (114), in which, without queſtion, he has advanced as many judicious obſervations, in reference to Engliſh Hiſtory, as are any where to be met with, he very juſtly reproves a great error of ſome learned men, in altering proper names, that they might make a more claſſical appearance in their Latin; and takes an opportunity from thence, to pay a very handſome compliment to our author, for his wiſe caution in this particular. As the paſſage is curious, and the book ſcarce, the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee it. 'He who 'would compoſe a Corpus Rerum Anglicarum, a ge'neral Hiſtory of England in Latin, hath no other 'rules to follow, but ſuch as he who writes it in 'Engliſh. One thing nevertheleſs, is primely need'ful by our Latin Hiſtoriographer to be conſulted of
'and determined, becauſe I have obſerved much 'perplexity riſing out of the right or erroneous
'practice thereof. The difficulty therefore is, what 'to do in our Latin Hiſtory, with names of perſons, 'things, or places, which are not filed down to the 'ſmoothneſs of Latin ſounds, or rules of termination.
'Lucian notes a ridiculous curioſity in one Hiſtorian,
'who affecting Attic elegancy, would needs faſhion
'Latin names to the Greek garb, either by tranſla-
'tion, by alluſion, or tranſportation of letters. By 'tranſlation, as in calling Saturninus, Chronius; by
'alluſion, as in calling Fronto, Frontis; by *Meta-
'theſis*, or tranſportation of ſyllables or letters, in 'calling Titianus, Titanius. In this fine and mere 'ſchooliſh folly, after that, George Buchanan is of'ten taken, not without caſting his reader into ob-
'ſcurity. For in his Hiſtories, where he ſpeaketh
'of one Wiſehart, ſo little was his ear able to brook
'the name, as that tranſlating the ſenſe thereof in-
'to Greek, of Wiſehart, comes forth unto us Sopho-'cardius: and Wiſehart, whoſe name it was in'tended ſhould live, was quite loſt, or muſt be ſought
'for out in Lexicons. The better care of that po'lite and eloquent Scot, had been of truth and 'loyalty. All our Hiſtorians, ad unum (for ought I 'can remember) follow the plain prolation and
'truth of proper names; and ſo doth the moſt ap'proved and learned Philologer and Antiquary of 'our nation, Mr. Camden.' His friends alſo, who had given him countenance and aſſiſtance in the earlier part of his life, maintained the ſame warmth the accurate Mr. Bayle, the judicious Father Niceron, the ſeveral editors of Moreri's Dictionary, and other foreign writers, ſeem to lay us under a neceſſity of endeavouring to improve to the utmoſt, an article which has been, and ever will be, an ornament of every collection of this ſort; at the ſame time that it contributes not a little to illuſtrate various of affection for him, even in their own old age and his, which might appear from Sir Henry Savile's earneſt invitation of him to Eton, that they might ſpend their declining years together; from the letters of the Biſhop of Glouceſter, and from thoſe of Mr. Thomas Allen, both his ancient and conſtant friends. We will however content ourſelves, with tranſcribing only a ſhort one, from Dr. Francis Godwin, then Lord Biſhop of Hereford (115), which, though written in Engliſh, is penned in the true ſpirit of Antiquity, and would have made no inconſiderable figure in the collections of Cicero or Pliny. 'Laſt Eaſter 'term I was in London, and ſought you, but had not 'the good hap to find you. It diſcontented me not 'a little; I had no other errand but to ſee you. I 'love you; nay, I honour you. We now grow old 'and ſickly. I am afraid we ſhall never meet. 'Fiat voluntas Domini. But what becomes of your 'ſecond part of Elizabetha? How fain would I ſee 'it out? Let it not die. Live you long. Faxit. 'You ſhall live the longer, if the world may ſee it, 'if perchance the world hath not already ſeen that 'of you, which ſhall make you immortal even in 'this world, except ſo far forth, as the world itſelf 'is mortal. Although, why do I put in that perhaps 'of that which is extra aleam? You ſee how de'lighting to talk with you, I had rather to talk 'idle, than to ſay nothing. Camdeno meo ſalutem 'plurimam. Vale. Whitborne, October 9, 1620.' As to his reputation in his laſt profeſſion, that of a King at Arms, he carried it ſo high, that ſuch as meant to recommend their labours to the world in matters of that nature, knew no better or more ſucceſsful method, than by courting his protection, as appears from the following words of Mr. Milles (116), in his Dedication of Glover's, alias Somerſet's, Account of the Nobility; 'Learned William 'Camden, whom vertue her ſelf for piety and pro'bity, and honouring Greate Britaine, hath crowned 'a King of Arms.' But in all probability, this compliment coſt Mr. Milles very dear; for one may reaſonably ſuppoſe it put Brooke upon attacking him, ſo that all that followed was but a continuation of the old quarrel, which was kept on foot, from firſt to laſt, for very near thirty years. The induſtrious John Stowe was alſo a client of Mr. Camden's, who afforded him both countenance and aſſiſtance in the proſecution of his labours, for which reaſon he had a plentiful ſhare of abuſe beſtowed upon him in Brooke's writings (117), who charges him with making a tranſcript of Leland's Itinerary, for the uſe of Mr. Camden, who, as he pretends, allowed him an annual penſion for this as long as he lived. His favours to John Philipot and Auguſtine Vincent have been already remembered: and indeed it muſt be allowed, that no man was more communicative to his friends, or more ready to do them honour upon all occaſions, as appears from the frequent mention he makes of John Johnſon, an excellent Poet and learned Antiquary of Scotland; many of whoſe verſes, with high commendations, he has inſerted in his Britannia. But neither his extenſive learning, or his high reputation, could defend him from the envy of his enemies while living, or his memory from inſults after his death. A Church Hiſtorian (118), without naming him, has taken great pains to inſinuate things to his prejudice; and though he lay directly in his way, has avoided mentioning his name with praiſe, which, to a degree of fulſomeneſs, he has beſtowed upon perſons of far leſs merit. Dr. Smith gives us a much ſtronger inſtance of an extravagant and ill-grounded reſentment, which induced a certain young gentleman (119) of very good family, who, thinking the reputation of his mother hurt by ſomewhat that Camden has delivered of her in his Hiſtory, could find no other way to be revenged, than by breaking off a piece from the noſe of his ſtatue in Weſtminſter-Abbey: An action as mean and baſe, as it was wicked and unjuſt. It ſeems, that Anthony Wood (120) had not taken notice of this circumſtance; for he ſeems to attribute the injury done to Camden's ſtatue to ſome accident that happened at the ſolemnity of the pompous funeral of the laſt Earl of Eſſex, General of the army raiſed by the Parliament againſt Charles I. But poſterity hath done ample juſtice to his merit; paying the higheſt credit, as well as reverence, to his works, and looking with a juſt indignation on ſuch low attempts as theſe to tarniſh his reputation. Whoever would ſee an elegant panegyric in the form of a monumental inſcription, worthy of Camden's learning, prudence, and impartiality, may find it drawn by the pen of that admirable Maſter of Latin eloquence, Thomas Farnaby (121); or if verſes be more agreeable, in the poetical inſcription under an original picture of our author beſtowed on the Univerſity of Oxford by Degory Wheare (122), in memory of his patron, and placed in the ſchool (123) where the Hiſtory Lecture by him founded is ſtill publicly read; and may it be till all Hiſtories fail!

C.

 [Among Sir William Muſgrave's Memoranda is an Extract from the Hiſtory of Europe, vol. i. p. 360, in which it is aſſerted, that Camden was born in 1553. But the date aſſigned to his birth in the text is, we are perſuaded, right; and of this we are the more convinced, as the account given of our eminent Antiquary, in the work referred to, is in other reſpects certainly erroneous.

Among the reſt of the proofs which Camden afforded of his early attention to the ſtudy of antiquities, one was, that when he was an Undergraduate at Chriſt-Church, he ſurveyed all the churches and chapels in Oxford, and gave a deſcription of the monuments and arms in each of them. Wood often told Dr. Smith, that he had ſeen theſe church-notes, but never would ſay where (124); and they are probably by this time entirely loſt.

Mr. Camden's Greek Grammar was not ſtrictly and originally his own. His predeceſſor in Weſtminſter School, Dr. Edward Grant, compoſed a copious one, of which Camden's is only an abridgment (125).

It is a circumſtance to the honour of our great author, that in Dr. Smith's interleaved copy of the Britannia at Oxford, is a formal Recantation by Brooke. The Ducheſs of Newcaſtle, however, above fifty years after, took up the quarrel. In one of her Plays, juſtly called, 'The Unnatural Tra'gedy,' is a whole ſcene againſt the Britannia. Three or four virgins and matrons criticizing on the ſpeeches in the ancient hiſtorians, one of the ladies in the dialogue proceeds to charge our later Chronologers, and eſpecially Camden, with writing not only partially, but falſely. The immediate object of the charge is his account of Families (126). The criticiſm of this famous Ducheſs, who might probably be diſguſted at ſome ſuppoſed omiſſion or neglect in our author, can be of little injury to his reputation.

Mr. Granger takes notice, that Camden is one of thoſe writers who have ſubjoined the final letters for their names to ſome of their works. This appears from the end of his Dedication to his 'Remaines 'concerning Great Britain.' The ſame fancy was adopted by ſeveral authors of the laſt century (127).

 [Camden's Hiſtory of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth is certainly a valuable hiſtorical compoſition: it is, however, too favourable a repreſentation of the adminiſtration of that princeſs; and we cannot think the work entitled to ſuch very high encomiums as are beſtowed on it in this article.

various important points relating to our Civil Hiſtory, to the memoirs of other learned perſons, and other valuable purpoſes that naturally coincide with a deſign of doing juſtice to the memory of a man, diſtinguiſhed not by the excellence only, or by the extent, but by the variety alſo of his knowledge.

Le Clerc, in his Bibliotheque Choiſie (128), has made ſome obſervations on what Camden has ſaid concerning Buchanan, and Mary Queen of Scots, in his Annals of the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and ſhewn, that in thoſe parts of his work he is not to be implicitly relied on, having written either under the influence of prejudice, or miſinformation. Dr. Robertſon alſo makes it appear, that Camden's repreſentation of ſome important tranſactions relative to Queen Mary are very ill founded (129).

(128) Tome viii. p. 139, 158.

(129) Hiſt. of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 388, 389, 415.

Le Clerc intimates, that Camden was miſled by the good opinion that he had of his prince, King James I. and his zeal for his ſervice: and it appears from note [Q], that the ſubmiſſive loyalty of Camden led him to pay a greater regard to King James's opinion than it was entitled to. That prince could be no impartial judge of the propriety, or impropriety, of publiſhing the Annals of Queen Elizabeth.

Camden and De Thou ſeem to have differed much in their ideas concerning ſome important tranſactions in Scotland. Camden repreſents the Earl of Murray as aſpiring to the crown, and as concerned in plotting the murder of the King; but De Thou in one of his letters to him relative to Scottiſh affairs, expreſſes himſelf to the following purpoſe: "I very much "fear, that I have not every where obſerved that "moderation, in the narration of Scottiſh affairs, "which you recommend. I ſhould have been in the "leſs danger of incurring cenſure from you on this "account, if it had been allowable for me, as I "ſhould rather have wiſhed, wholly to have omitted "the relation of one tranſaction, which is in the "mouth of every body. But I ſhould not have diſ-"charged my duty in the work that I have under-"taken, if I had not avoided a ſhameful ſilence as "much as falſehood itſelf. And if it was neceſſary "that I ſhould write upon the ſubject, I do not ſee "how I could have written otherwiſe than I have "done. For to endeavour to impute to another, "merely upon ſuſpicion, the guilt of a crime which "you have yourſelf openly committed, what is it "but to endeavour to defend thoſe who are in "danger of condemnation, by ſubterfuges founded "on calumny? This might, perhaps, admit of ſome "excuſe, in a man accuſed of a crime, and defend-"ing himſelf in a doubtful cauſe; becauſe it might "be allowable for him to ſave his life as well as he "could: but it would be criminal in one who had "made a profeſſion of ſpeaking the truth, that he "ſhould load one perſon with infamy, in order to "remove from another the imputation of guilt. "The thing ſpeaks for itſelf. For let us ſuppoſe it "to be true, as is given out by ſome, that the Earl "of Murray, inflamed with ambition, wickedly de-"ſired to make himſelf King: (though this is con-"ſtantly denied by all the Scots worthy of credit "with whom I have converſed upon the ſubject; "even thoſe to whom Murray was otherwiſe odious "on account of his religion; for they ſay, that, "independently of his religion, he was a man free "from ambition, avarice, or from injuring any one; "a courageous man, courteous in his manners, be-"neficent, and of a very unblameable life; and that "if it had not been for him, thoſe who ſpeak ſo "much evil of him ſince his death, would not now "have been in poſſeſſion of the government:) but "let us ſuppoſe, I ſay, that, diſregarding all laws, "divine and human, he had formed the deſign of "committing ſo great a crime, with whom muſt he "have conſulted, and whom muſt he have taken as "an aſſociate in the buſineſs? In the firſt place, it "is well known, that there never was a greater ani-"moſity than that which ſubſiſted between Murray "and Bothwell. Who then can believe, that ſuch "inveterate enemies would conſult together con-"cerning ſo great a crime as a conſpiracy againſt "the King, or that they could hope that it would be "kept ſecret between them? Beſides, who can be-"lieve that Murray, who was ſo great an enemy of "Bothwell, would, after the commiſſion of the "crime, adviſe his ſiſter to marry the parricide? Or "that the Queen could be ſo ſenſeleſs, as to liſten "to a man who adviſed her to ſo diſhonourable and "dangerous a marriage? Laſtly, Why did Murray "afterwards retire of his own accord into France, "if he hoped to derive any advantages from theſe "troubles? Or why afterwards, when he was re-"called, did he govern the affairs of the kingdom "with ſo much integrity, during the infancy of the "King, and defend him in his tender years againſt "the Hamiltons, if he had conceived the hope of "gaining poſſeſſion of the throne by the deſtruction "of the King? For it would have been leſs odious, "and leſs dangerous, for him to contend for the "ſovereignty againſt the Hamiltons, if they had "ſucceeded in their deſigns, than to ruin and deſtroy "the ſon of his ſiſter, who had been entruſted to his "care both by her and by the parliament. In ſhort, "for what reaſon can you ſuppoſe that the Hamil-"tons, who aſpired to the tyranny, ſhould conſpire "againſt the life of Murray, except that they de-"ſpaired of ſucceeding in their deſigns, during the "life of ſo courageous a defender of the infant "King?

"On the other hand, reflect on the familiarity "which there was between the Queen and Bothwell, "before the murder of her huſband; on that hatred, "and contempt of the King, which ſhe openly diſ-"covered after the death of Rizzio; on the preci-"pitate acquittal of Bothwell, by the Queen's in-"fluence, though he was not only ſuſpected of the "murder of the King, but in the general opinion "conſidered as guilty; and on the divorce of Both-"well from his wife, of the family of Gordon, that "he might contract a more infamous marriage. "For as to the rape of the Queen, who is there that "does not conſider this as a ſubject of laughter? "Or rather, from the circumſtances that have been "mentioned, muſt we not neceſſarily conclude, that "a woman of ſo high a ſpirit would never have "conſented to this marriage, nor afterwards excuſed "it with ſuch artificial letters, if ſhe had not been "previouſly influenced by a ſtrong inclination for "this connexion (130)?"

(130) Camden Epiſt. p. 73, 74.

Dr. Robertſon, ſpeaking of the ſubſcriptions of ſome of the Scottiſh nobles to a paper in favour of Bothwell, and recommending him as a proper perſon for the Queen's huſband, obſerves, that "of all the "different ſyſtems with regard to this tranſaction, "that of Camden ſeems to be the leaſt accurate, and "the worſt founded (131):" and it cannot be denied, that there are ſome miſtakes and miſrepreſentations in our author's Annals of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In juſtice to Camden, however, it ſhould be obſerved, that he might give an erroneous account of ſundry tranſactions mentioned in his hiſtory, without any deſign on his part to miſlead his readers. There are many caſes in which it is extremely difficult, and ſometimes impoſſible, to attain an exact and thorough knowledge of the real ſtate of facts, though the truth be ſought with impartiality and diligence. It likewiſe often happens, that an hiſtorian may not be able to throw near ſo much light upon ſome tranſactions of his own time, as he may upon thoſe of a period ſomewhat more remote. Many ſtate papers, and private letters, are publiſhed by degrees, which greatly elucidate the hiſtory of particular periods, and which no contemporary hiſtorian can obtain. A much more complete, accurate, and impartial Hiſtory of the reign of Queen Elizabeth might now be written, than could have been produced in the time of Camden.] T.

(131) Hiſt. of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 415.

CAMPBELL,

CAMPBELL, an ancient and noble family in the kingdom of Scotland, the preſent chief of which is his Grace the Duke of Argyle, and of which family are beſides, the Earls of Loudon and Braidalbane; as there were anciently Earls of Athol, and Irvine, of this name, to which alſo the earldom of Iſlay lately belonged. As to the antiquity of this houſe, the beſt proof of it is the difficulty that occurs in ſpeaking of its origin. It is very well known, that the Bards and Sanachies were the ancient Heralds of that, and indeed of this country; and that they preſerved the memory of families, the Chiefs of which had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in war, in their ſongs; or to give them a better title, of which they are not at all unworthy, their lyric odes, and tranſmitted an account of their deſcents by tradition. That this kind of authority is evidence ſufficient to eſtabliſh hiſtorical facts, is what we dare not determine; but we may be permitted to ſay, without being ſuſpected of partiality for ſuch kind of teſtimony, that if it ought to be admitted in any caſe, this of genealogies may claim the preference, as being that, of all others, in which they were moſt ſcrupulous, and therefore beſt deſerved to be believed. By theſe then it has been remembered, one dares not ſay recorded, that this family were Lords of Lochow in Argyleſhire, in the reign of Fergus II. the reſtorer of the monarchy of Scotland, in the very beginning of the Vth century. It is not, however, pretended, that they were then diſtinguiſhed by the ſame ſurname as now. On the contrary we are told, theſe old Lords of Lochow were known to the world by the name of O-Dwbin, or rather O-Dwin, or Macdwine, for which laſt name there is ſome authority; ſince, by a charter granted to Colin Campbell, of Lochow, by King David II. ratifying the alienation made by Chriſtian, daughter and heir of Sir Dougal Campbell, his great uncle, of the lands of Craigniſh, it is declared, that the ſaid Colin Campbell ſhall hold thoſe lands of the King and his heirs, in as ample a manner as his anceſtor Duncan Macdwine held the barony of Lochow. We are told, on the authority of the Sanachies before-mentioned, that this appellation was aſſumed by Diarmed O-Dwin, one of their anceſtors, a brave and warlike man; and in the Iriſh language his deſcendants are called to this time Scol Diarmed, that is, the poſterity and offspring of Diarmed. From this Diarmed O-Dwin the Bards have recorded a long ſeries of the Barons of Lochow, who, they tell us, were very renowned both for conduct and valour. Paul O-Dwin, Lord of Lochow, called Paul in Spuran, ſo denominated from his being the King's Treaſurer, having no male iſſue, his eſtate went to his daughter Eva, who married Gileſpick O-Dwin, a relation of her own, who changed the name firſt from O-Dwin to Campbell, to perpetuate the memory of a noble and heroic piece of ſervice performed by him to the crown of France, in the reign of King Malcolm Canmure. By this Lady he left a ſon Duncan, who was Lord of Lochow, and was the father of Colin, and he again of Archibald, and he of Duncan Baron of Lochow. His ſon and ſucceſſor was Archibald Campbell, Knight, Lord of Lochow, who was the father of Sir Colin Campbell, a perſon who diſtinguiſhed himſelf, as well by the acquiſitions he made to his eſtates, as by his great actions in war, from whence he obtained the ſurname of Moor, and from this Colin it is, that the head of this illuſtrious family is ſtiled by the Iriſh Mac Collan More. He was ſlain in a conflict with a powerful neighbour of his, the Lord of Lorn, which created a feud between the two families, that laſted till they were united by marriage. His ſon, Sir Nicol or Neil, was honoured with that dignity by King Alexander III. and was one of the great men of Scotland, ſummoned to Berwick by King Edward I. and ſubmitted for a time to John de Baliol, as did alſo his brother Sir Donald Campbell, of Redhouſe, from whom the noble family of Loudon is lineally deſcended. But when Robert Bruce aſſerted his title to the Crown, Sir Neil Campbell joined him very early, and notwithſtanding all the efforts of the Lord of Lorn, reduced that country to his obedience. He was amongſt that handful of loyal ſubjects, who were preſent at the coronation of King Robert, at Scoon, in 1306; and when many deſerted him, Sir Neil Campbell, to his immortal honour, entered into an aſſociation with Sir Gilbert Hay and Sir Alexander Seton, wherein, in a moſt ſolemn manner, they bound themſelves to defend, till the laſt period of their lives, the liberties of their country, and the right of Robert Bruce their King, againſt all mortals, French, Engliſh, and Scots, to which they appended their ſeals at the abbey of Cambuſkenneth, 9 Sept. 1308. He was appointed alſo one of the Commiſſioners on the part of Scotland, to treat of a peace in 1314 with the Engliſh; which negociation, though it was not altogether ſucceſsful, procured however a releaſe or exchange of priſoners, and amongſt the reſt, of the Lady Mary Bruce, the King's ſiſter, whom Edward I. had not only impriſoned, but cauſed to be carried about in a cage, for Walter Cumine. Sir Neil Campbell, Lord of Lochow, was the next year preſent in the Parliament held at Air, in which the Crown was entailed upon Robert Bruce and his heirs, at which time Sir Neil obtained a grant of ſeveral lands for his good ſervices, and, as a ſtill higher mark of his Sovereign's confidence and eſteem, his ſiſter, the Lady Mary Bruce before-mentioned, in marriage; but he did not long ſurvive this high honour. He left left two ſons, of whom the ſecond, John Campbell, was, by King David II. honoured with the high title of Earl of Athol; but he dying without iſſue, the title became extinct in his family. Sir Colin Campbell, of Lochow, attended Edward Bruce in his expedition into Ireland in 1316, when he took the title of King of that country. He alſo faithfully adhered to King David Bruce during all his troubles, and re-taking for him the caſtle of Dunoon, which, for ſome time, was in the hands of the Engliſh, he was made hereditary governor of that fortreſs, which ſtill remains in his family. He deceaſed in 1340, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Archibald, who was alſo remarkably attached to the houſe of Bruce. His eldeſt ſon, Colin, was in great favour with King Robert II. and was employed by him to reſtrain the Highlanders, who infeſted the weſtern provinces of Scotland; which he did ſo effectually, that he obtained a grant of ſeveral lands for that ſervice. He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Sir Duncan Campbell, a man equally famous for his valour and wiſdom, who married the lady Margery Stewart, daughter of Robert Duke of Albany, Governor of Scotland, and by his intereſt with Murdoch, Duke of Albany, he prevailed upon him to ranſome and reſtore King James I. who had been many years priſoner in England. This ſignal ſervice made ſuch an impreſſion upon the King's mind, that he conſidered him ever after as one of the moſt deſerving of his ſubjects, received him into his Privy-Council, and made him Lord Juſtice and Lieutenant of the ſhire of Argyle. He was continued in his offices by King James II. to whom he adhered faithfully in all the troubles which diſturbed the beginning of his reign, in conſideration of which he was honoured with the title of Lord Campbell, Anno Domini 1445. He was the firſt that took the title of Argyle, though he as often uſed his old title of Lochow, and was a very charitable and religious perſon. He had by the Lady Margery Stewart before-mentioned, three ſons; the eldeſt, Cæleſtine, died without iſſue in his father's life-time; the ſecond, Archibald, alſo died before him, but left iſſue by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Somerville, a ſon who ſucceeded his grandfather; his third ſon was Sir Colin Campbell, of Glenurchie, anceſtor to the Earls of Braidalbain. He had alſo three ſons by his ſecond wife, Margaret Stewart, daughter of Sir John Stewart, natural ſon to King Robert III. This Duncan, Lord Campbell, died in 1453, and was ſucceeded by his grandſon Colin, who, being in his minority, had for his guardian his uncle, Sir Colin Campbell, of Glenurchie, before-mentioned. King James II. as well out of regard to the exemplary loyalty of his family, and the ſingular ſervices of his father, as for the promiſing parts of this young Nobleman, raiſed him to the title of Earl of Argyle in 1457. In the ſucceeding reign of James III. he was ſent Embaſſador to Edward IV. of England in 1465, being then Maſter of the Houſhold, and was afterwards honoured with the higheſt offices in the State, being conſtituted Lord Privy-Seal and Lord High Chancellor. He was alſo Embaſſador at the Court of France, with other perſons of the firſt quality, and was preſent at the ſealing and ſwearing to the League made with Charles VIII. at Paris, July 9, 1484. Upon his being appointed one of the Embaſſadors to King Henry VII. to procure his interpoſition to aſſwage the troubles then broke out in Scotland, he reſigned his office of Lord Chancellor. He had no ſhare or concern in the Civil War, in which his Royal Maſter fell; but after things were in ſome meaſure ſettled, he was again made Lord Chancellor, and continued to the time of his death, which happened in 1493, in poſſeſſion of that high office. He married the Lady Iſabel Stewart, one of the daughters and co-heireſſes of John, Lord Lorn, upon which he took that title and the arms of the family; and, as a confirmation of his title, procured the reſignation of Walter Stewart, of Innermeath; and by deed, dated the 17th of April 1470, entailed that honour on Sir Colin Campbell, of Glenurchie, and his heirs male, in caſe his own failed; on account, not only of his being inſtrumental in procuring him that marriage, but alſo becauſe the ſaid Sir Colin had before married another of thoſe co-heireſſes. His eldeſt ſon, Archibald, Earl of Argyle, was in great favour with his ſovereign King James IV. by whom he was made Lord Chamberlain and Maſter of the Houſhold; and having the honour to command the van-guard of the Royal army, fell valiantly fighting with his Maſter, in the fatal battle of Flowden, September 9, 1513. His eldeſt ſon, Colin, Earl of Argyle, was one of the four Counſellors of the Regency to King James V. in 1525; and in 1528, he was conſtituted Lieutenant of the Borders and Warden of the Marches, and had alſo an ample confirmation of the hereditary Sheriff-ſhip of Argyleſhire, Juſticiary of Scotland, and Maſter of the Houſhold, by which thoſe honours became veſted in his family. He died in 1542, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Archibald, who was one of the Lords that entered into an aſſociation to oppoſe the intended match between the young Queen Mary and King Edward VI. of England, dated July 4, 1543. On the breaking out of the war with England, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly in the battle of Pinky, and at the ſiege of Haddington. He was the firſt of this noble family who embraced the Proteſtant Religion, of which he was a moſt ſincere and zealous profeſſor; and recommended the promoting thereof, and the ſuppreſſing Popiſh ſuperſtition, to his ſon and ſucceſſor, when he was upon his deathbed. He married firſt Lady Helen Hamilton, daughter of James, Earl of Arran, by whom he had his eldeſt ſon and heir, Archibald: his ſecond wife was Mary, daughter to William Graham, Earl of Monteith, by whom he had Sir Colin Campbell, of Buchan. Archibald, Earl of Argyle, ſucceeded his father in 1558; and being a perſon of great parts and prudence, he was ſent over to the Queen in France, the year after his father's death, to ſupplicate her in favour of the Proteſtant Religion. He concurred with other perſons of quality and diſtinction, in taking ſuch meaſures as were neceſſary for promoting the Reformation, and was very inſtrumental in procuring it to be ſettled by authority of Parliament; and by the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth, Queen of England, he was alſo very ſucceſsful in obliging the French to quit Scotland. In the year 1561, when Queen Mary returned from France, and conſtituted a new Privy-Council, of which the Earl of Argyle was a member, it is very obſervable, that he had no concern whatever, in any of thoſe intrigues and inſurrections which happened ſoon after. He did indeed, upon the Queen's marriage with the Earl of Bothwell, enter into a bond or aſſociation, for the defence of the Prince, afterwards King James VI. and was preſent at his coronation, when he carried the ſword of State. But being afterwards informed, that the Queen's reſignation was far from being voluntary, he laboured to reſtore her, and was General of her forces in the battle of Langſide, near Glaſgow, in 1568, where they were defeated; but however, his Lordſhip remained firm to the Queen, as long as there was any probability of doing her ſervice. After the death of the Earl of Lenox, who was Regent, and the election of the Earl of Mar to that high office, the Earl of Argyle was conſtituted Lord High Chancellor; by whoſe great moderation, as well as through the high eſteem in which he ſtood with men of all parties, the peace of the kingdom was reſtored. His Lordſhip died poſſeſſed of this great office, September 12, 1575, without leaving any iſſue; and was ſucceeded by his brother, Sir Colin Campbell before-mentioned, who, having always diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a cloſe and ſteady attachment to the cauſe of King James VI. and having been very inſtrumental in ſecuring to him the full and free adminiſtration of the government, when he was of fit age to take it into his own hand, his Majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to admit him of his Privy-Council; and on the 16th of Auguſt 1579, he took the oath of office as Lord High Chancellor, which he executed with the univerſal approbation of the whole kingdom, to the time of his deceaſe, in 1584. He married firſt Jane Stewart, daughter of Henry, Lord Methven, by whom he had no iſſue; and after her deceaſe, the widow of James, Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, by whom he had two ſons, Archibald and Colin. Archibald, Earl of Argyle, was diſtinguiſhed by his military genius, as well as by his conſtant and loyal adherence to his ſovereign, whoſe forces he commanded at the battle of Glenlivet, in 1594, againſt the Earls of Huntley and Errol. He afterwards ſuppreſſed the Mac-Gregors, and a more formidable inſurrection of the Macdonalds in 1614, for which ſervices he had a grant made him of the country of Kintyre, which was confirmed by an Act of Parliament. In 1618 he went over to Spain, and entered into the ſervice of that Crown, remaining abroad many years, till, at length, he obtained his Majeſty's permiſſion to return, and died at London, in 1638. This noble Earl was twice married, firſt, to Anne, daughter and heir of William, Earl of Morton, by whom he had his ſucceſſor and four daughters. His ſecond wife was Anne, daughter to Sir William Cornwallis, by whom he had a ſon, James, who, in 1622, was created Lord Kintyre by King James VI. and afterwards by Charles I. by letters patents, bearing date March 28, 1642, created Earl of Irvine (a). Of his eldeſt ſon and ſucceſſor, Archibald, Earl of Argyle, and afterwards Marquis, we ſhall ſpeak in the next article.

(a) This article is extracted from ſeveral manuſcript accounts in the hands of the author, and has been compared with the article in Collier's Dictionary, tranſmitted by direction of the Duke of Argyle, father to the Dukes John and Archibald, as alſo with Crauford, Neſbit, &c.

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD) Earl and Marquis of Argyle, was the ſon of Archibald Earl of Argyle, by the Lady Anne Douglas, daughter of William Earl of Morton (a). He was born ſome time in the year 1598, and was very carefully educated, ſuitably to his high birth and great intereſt in his country. He was, though very young, with his father in the field, when the dangerous inſurrection of the Macdonalds was ſuppreſſed (b); and after his father went abroad, the care of the Weſt Country, and more eſpecially of the Proteſtant intereſt therein, devolved in a great meaſure on the Lord Lorn, the conſtant title of the apparent heirs of this noble family. As he came very early into the world, and had the eyes of many upon him, ſo he was extremely cautious in his conduct; and having been educated in the profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion, according to the ſtricteſt rules of the Church of Scotland, as it was eſtabliſhed immediately after the Reformation, he was ſincerely and ſteadily devoted thereto, perhaps with a degree of zeal rather too fervent: however, he neither changed, or ever pretended to change, his ſentiments; but made it the great buſineſs of his life to ſupport that Church, and the conſtitution of his country, as he underſtood ſtood it to be ſettled by law (c). In theſe principles he was ſtrongly confirmed by the advice, concurrence, and aſſiſtance, of many perſons of great quality and fortune, who afterwards changing their ſentiments, were obliged to ſuſtain their own characters at the expence of his (d). It is a clear and full proof of his great parts and wiſe conduct in that ſeaſon of life, when men are uſually famed for other qualities than diſcretion, that in the year 1626, his Majeſty was pleaſed to call him to the high office of a Privy-Counſellor, his father being then living, and himſelf, conſequently, no Lord of Parliament (e). At this time there is no doubt that he made great profeſſions of loyalty to his Prince, by which muſt be underſtood, ſuch attachment to his perſon, and ſubmiſſion to his will, as was conſiſtent with the laws of the land, and might contribute to the good of the people. It is alſo clear, that his Lordſhip was not at all tainted with the predominant vice of thoſe times, that of aggrandizing himſelf at the expence of his neighbours, or of the Crown; for in 1628, we find he ſurrendered to the King, as far as in his power lay, the office of Juſtice-General of Scotland, which was hereditary in his family, reſerving to himſelf and his heirs, the office of Juſticiary of Argyle, and the Weſtern Iſles, and wherever elſe he had lands in Scotland, which agreement was afterwards ratified and confirmed by Act of Parliament (f). It does not appear, that his Lordſhip took any great ſhare in the differences and diſputes that happened in Scotland from that time, till the year 1633, when his Majeſty came to viſit his native and hereditary kingdom; at which time, it is certain, that the Lord Lorn ſtood as high in his Majeſty's favour, as any man of quality in his country, and higher marks of duty and ſubmiſſion to the Royal will, could be hardly expected, than was ſhewn by his father and himſelf, in ſubmitting the deciſion of the differences unhappily raiſed between them to the King's pleaſure; of which, a certain great Hiſtorian (g), has given a very guarded and circumſpect account; which, when fully explained, will not appear ſo much to this noble perſon's diſcredit, as at firſt ſight it ſeems [A]. It is on all hands agreed, that the King had then ſo good

[A] As at firſt ſight it ſeems.] There is no doubt, that ſo much of the Earl of Clarendon's Hiſtory, as relates to facts, that fell immediately under his own cognizance, may be written with great exactneſs, and much regard to truth: but without any imputation on his character, it may be affirmed, that where he took things upon the credit of other people, he might be impoſed upon, or miſtaken. He does not mention the Earl of Argyle till after the firſt Pacification, and then he gives us an account of things that happened ſeveral years before, when his Lordſhip was only Lo[illegible] Lorn; and the account he gives us is ſuch a one, as ſhews us he had received it in converſation from thoſe who were of a party oppoſite to Argyle. But as this ſeems to be the foundation of all the reflections caſt upon this Nobleman, we will examine it more particularly. The Earl of Clarendon then writes thus (1). 'The people of 'Scotland being now reduced by them to a more 'implicit obedience, and no body daring to oppoſe 'the moſt extravagant proceedings of the moſt vio-'lent perſons in power, they loſt no time, as hath 'been ſaid, to make all preparations for a war they 'meant to purſue. Moſt of the King's Privy-'Council, and great Miniſters, who (though they 'had not vigorouſly performed their duty in ſupport 'of the regal power) till now had been ſo reſerved, 'that they ſeemed not to approve the diſorderly 'proceedings, now as frankly wedded that intereſt 'as any of the leaders, and quickly became the 'chief of the leaders. As the Earl of Argyle, who 'had been preſerved by the King's immediate kind-'neſs, and full power, and reſcued from the anger 'and fury of his incenſed father, who being pro-'voked by the diſobedience and inſolence of his ſon, 'reſolved ſo to have diſpoſed of his fortune, that 'little ſhould have accompanied the honour after his 'death. But by the King's interpoſition, and indeed 'impoſition, the Earl, in ſtrictneſs of the Law in 'Scotland, having need of the King's grace and pro-'tection, in regard of his being become Roman 'Catholic, and his Majeſty granting all to the ſon 'which he could exact from the father, the old man 'was in the end compelled to make over all his 'eſtate to his ſon, reſerving only ſuch a proviſion for 'himſelf as ſupported him according to his quality, 'during his life, which he ſpent in the parts beyond 'the ſeas. The King had too much occaſion after-'wards to remember, that in the cloſe, after his 'Majeſty had determined what ſhould be done on 'either part, the old man declared he would ſubmit 'to the King's pleaſure, though he believed he was 'hardly dealt with; and then with ſome bitterneſs 'put his ſon in mind of his undutiful carriage to-'wards him, and charged him to carry in his mind 'how bountiful the King had been to him, which yet, 'he told him, he was ſure he would forget; and there-'upon ſaid to his Majeſty, Sir, I muſt know this young 'man better than you can do. You have brought me 'low that you may raiſe him, which, I doubt, you 'will live to repent; for he is a man of craft, ſubtlety 'and falſehood, and can love no man; and if ever he 'finds it in his power to do you miſchief, he will be 'ſure to do it. The King conſidered it only as the 'effect of his paſſion, and took no other care to pre-'vent it, but by heaping every day new obligations 'upon him, making him a Privy-Counſellor, and 'giving him other offices and power to do hurt, 'thereby to reſtrain him from doing it, which would 'have wrought upon any generous nature the effect 'it ought to have done. The Earl (for his father 'was now dead) came not to Edinburgh during the 'firſt troubles; and though he did not diſſemble his 'diſpleaſure againſt the Biſhops, becauſe one of them 'had affronted him in truth very rudely, yet he re-'newed all imaginable profeſſions of duty to the 'King, and a readineſs to engage in his ſervice, if 'thoſe diſorders ſhould continue. But after the 'Pacification, and diſbanding of the King's army, 'and the Covenanters declaring, that they would 'adhere to the Acts of the Aſſembly at Glaſgow, he 'made haſte to Edinburgh with a great train of his 'family and followers, and immediately ſigned the 'Covenant, engaged for the proviſion of arms, and 'raiſing forces, and in all things behaved himſelf 'like a man that might very ſafely be confided in by 'that party.' In the firſt place it is neceſſary to ob-ſerve, that the old Earl of Argyle had been the beſt part of his life a very warm and zealous Proteſtant, had fought againſt the Huntley family, and after-wards againſt the Macdonalds, partly on account of religion (2); yet drawn aſide by his Engliſh lady, who was a Papiſt herſelf, and deſcended of a rebel-lious family, he went abroad into the Spaniſh ſer-vice, commanded their troops in the Low Countries, and was even ſuſpected of carrying on ſome cor-reſpondencies with the Macdonalds, whom he had diſpoſſeſſed of their lands for treaſon, and had re-ceived ſome grants of them from the Crown (3). By this means he totally loſt King James's favour, who, as good an opinion of his Lordſhip, as to think the power and influence of his family in Scotland, could not be repoſed in ſafer hands than his; otherwiſe he would not, in juſtice to himſelf and his poſterity, having it ſo much in his power as he had, have diſpoſed of it, as he did (b). The part his Lordſhip afterwards acted, was that of a good patriot, which he all his life-long underſtood to be that of a good ſubject; and if he did not give into all the projects of the King's Miniſters, it muſt be allowed, that his conduct was both open and uniform, and that he concurred with the greateſt and wiſeſt men in that kingdom (i). It is alſo very certain, that ſome of thoſe Miniſters acted a very double part; and while they made the King believe, that the ſcheme of Archbiſhop Laud, for introducing an abſolute uniformity in religion, was a thing very practicable in Scotland; they not only knew it not to be ſo, but even put the King upon theſe meaſures, with a deſign to render it more impracticable (k). How juſtifiable ſuch a conduct as this might be, is not our buſineſs to determine: but moſt certainly the conduct of Lord Lorn was infinitely more agreeable to the ordinary rules of juſtice and morality; for he adhered conſtantly and ſteadily to the principles he profeſſed; and openly and fairly oppoſed thoſe deſigns, which the Miniſters meant ſhould miſcarry, while they ſeemed to approve and promote them (l). It is very likely, that in ſuch a ſituation of things, the method his Lordſhip took, might expoſe him to miſrepreſentations to his ſovereign; and that his behaviour, however open and candid, might be liable to miſconſtruction: but at this diſtance of time, when all prejudices either are or ought to be buried, it is not eaſy to conceive upon what grounds it ought to be cenſured or condemned. He was far from being very active or buſy: on the contrary, he took no greater ſhare in the management of public affairs, than the poſt which his Majeſty had aſſigned him, rendered abſolutely neceſſary; and though his name be found to ſeveral Remonſtrances of the Privy-Council, and other acts of a like public nature (m); yet at a time, when he had neither power nor influence, and when his enemies were poſſeſſed of both, in the higheſt degree, he challenged them to ſhow, that he had any concern in thoſe ſecret conſultations, or any ſhare in the political intrigues, which created the higheſt diſputes of thoſe times, and which brought ſo many miſeries and misfortunes upon his country (n). It is indeed true, that there were great feuds and jealouſies in Scotland; and, therefore, it cannot be wondered, that, notwithſtanding all his care and caution, a man of his great quality ſhould have, both open and ſecret enemies; and very certain it is, that he did not want for both (o). The latter were moſt dangerous; for they were continually ſuggeſting, that his Lordſhip was a Covenanter in his heart, which was a neceſſary diſtinction: for though it might ſeem ſtrange to an Engliſh reader, yet it is undoubtedly true, that his Lordſhip never ſigned any Covenant, till the King commanded him ſo to do (p). When by his father's death he became Earl of Argyle, his ſuperior title gave him ſomewhat greater authority, but he employed it the ſame way; and that was, in keeping the country quiet, and ſeeing the laws put in execution. He ſtill acted and conferred with the Council, and did there as much ſervice to his Majeſty as any of them, notwithſtanding he was repreſented as the very chief of the Covenanters. The Marquis of Hamilton was then the King's Commiſſioner in Scotland: he was directed by, and correſponded ſolely with, Archbiſhop as Archbiſhop Spotſwood ſays, could not endure an apoſtate Papiſt, and was publicly denounced a rebel (4). It might very well happen, that when this old Lord returned home, which he did after an abſence of ten years, he might be very angry with his ſon, and yet that ſon be in no great fault, unleſs adhering to the Proteſtant Religion, and the Conſtitution of his Country, were faults. It is not eaſy to conceive, when or where this diſcourſe happened. If it happened at all, it is moſt probable in the year 1628, when Lord Lorn reſigned his Poſt of Juſtice-General (5), which might be a good reaſon for the King's being very kind to him. Neither had the Earl his father any reaſon to complain of his Majeſty, who, though his ſon, by his ſecond marriage, was then in foreign ſervice, honoured him with a title, and ſecured to the Earl himſelf a rent-charge, which, conſidering the circumſtances he was then in, was all he could expect (6). Biſhop Guthrie, who ſeldom miſſes an occaſion of ſpeaking ill of the Earl of Argyle, mentions the King's favours to him largely (7); but ſays not one word of his father's quarrel with him; which, had it been true, he was the moſt likely man in the world to have heard; and had he heard it, no man ſo likely to repeat it. On the whole therefore, there is great reaſon to doubt the fact, which muſt have been related upon hearſay, and is related without any mention of the author; and in words too that viſibly belong to the perſon who tells the ſtory. But ſuppoſing the fact to be true, the King made a very right judgment of it, in ſuppoſing it the effect of paſſion; for the Earl had not ſeen his ſon for many years; and his Majeſty knew enough of Lord Lorn, before this could poſſibly happen, to make him a Privy-Counſellor (8), which it does not appear that he ever repented of, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew hereafter. As to the craft and cunning charged upon this Nobleman, it muſt be referred to the opinion that the writer had of him; for his Lordſhip never acted a double part, but openly declared his principles from the beginning, and adhered to them to the ſcaffold. Biſhop Guthrie, who knew his Lordſhip very well, is ſo far from charging him with craft, that at the cloſe of theſe tranſactions (for Lord Clarendon's period takes in the compaſs of ten years) that is, when the Earl joined the Covenanters, he obſerves, that he declared himſelf more poſitively than could have been expected from a man of his prudence (9). This is ſo true, that ſome of his Lordſhip's Letters, lately come to light, very fully prove, he made no ſecret of his ſentiments, but very plainly told the great Earl of Strafford (10), That as he meant all duty to the King, ſo he thought that duty beſt ſhown by maintaining the Conſtitution of his Country in Church and State.

Laud;

Laud; and in appearance, at leaſt, he laboured to introduce that Prelate's ſcheme of government (q), againſt the voice of the whole nation; and when this could not be effected, the King was induced to enter into a war againſt them, which, as it was calculated to bring great diſtreſs upon the nation in general, ſo great care was taken by Laud's party, that the Earl of Argyle ſhould have his ſhare of it in particular [B]. But notwithſtanding their projects were well laid, yet the ſcheme diſappointed. The Earl of Argyle wrote a large vindication of his own conduct, and ſent it to Court: the [B] Should have his ſhare of it in particular.] It muſt be very evident, to any who will take the pains to enquire into the tranſactions of thoſe times, that the cauſe of all the diſputes in Scotland was Archbiſhop Laud's being deceived (11), as to the ſtate of that kingdom, and reſolving to force upon them forms and ceremonies in religion, to which they were averſe. In order to this the King was perſwaded to make war upon that nation; and though the Earl of Argyle had conducted himſelf ſo cautiouſly, as to have given far leſs provocation than many others of the nobility of that country had done; yet the Earl of Antrim, an Iriſh Papiſt, was encouraged to raiſe an army of his own people to attack the Weſtern Iſlands, and the countries under the influence of the Earl of Argyle; which, if he could conquer, he was to have all, or at leaſt the beſt part of them, for his pains (12). One ought to have good authority to ſupport ſuch an aſſertion; and I think ſuch a one is produced, when one names the Earl of Strafford, who, in a letter dated April 16, 1639, directed to Sir Henry Vane, ſpeaks thus (13): 'It is over evident his Majeſty hath been 'woefully ſerved by his Miniſters in Scotland; and 'if thoſe played their parts ill which ſurrendered the 'caſtle of Edinburgh, they did ſtill worſe who have 'on this ſide done the like for that of Dumbarton, a 'place, indeed, of infinite great conſequence, all 'rightly conſidered. It is reported to have been 'taken by the wiles of the Earl of Argyle, who now 'is, they ſay, poſſeſſed of it, and I believe will 'thence intend all the conduct of thoſe affairs on 'this ſide the kingdom. I will warrant you, the 'Earl of Antrim's tenants wiſh themſelves, with all 'their hearts, well ſecured from the ill of him, for 'all their own Lord's profeſſions to invade and beat 'that other Earl, forth of the Iſles this inſtant ſum-'mer. It ſhould ſeem to me, for I was not of this 'council, my Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and my 'Lord of Antrim, had to his Majeſty undertaken the 'buſineſs before the Earl of Antrim's coming forth 'of England, conſequently before Argyle was de-'clared Covenanter. My Lord of Antrim was, for 'his reward, to have had a ſhare of his eſtate. What 'other ſhares there were, any, or none, in truth I 'know not. Now, howbeit, this was carried very 'ſecretly to us on this ſide, yet Argyle got know-'ledge of it there, and certainly occaſioned him to 'declare himſelf ſooner for the Covenant, than 'otherwiſe, perchance, he would have done: But 'whether that had been better or worſe for his Ma-'jeſty's ſervice, I am not able to judge.' What ſort of an undertaking this was, and what were the conſequences likely to follow on it, we may gather from another letter of the ſame noble perſon's, in which he gives Secretary Windebank a very large detail of a converſation that paſſed between himſelf and the Earl of Antrim, upon this buſineſs (14). 'His Lordſhip, ſays he, mentioned certain propo-'ſitions by his Lordſhip made, and directions and 'authority by his Majeſty given, at his laſt being in 'England, concerning his Lordſhip's going upon 'the Iſles of Scotland; that in conformity thereunto 'he had quietly expected the ſignification of his 'Majeſty's pleaſure, nor ſtirred at all till the receipt 'of my letter; complained of the ſuddenneſs and 'ſhortneſs of the warning, but told me, that in-'ſtantly, upon the receipt of his Majeſty's letter, he 'had ſent to the O Neales, O Haras, the O Lurgans '(if I miſtake not that name) the Mac Genniſſes, 'the Mac Guyres, the Mac Mahons, the Mac 'Donnels, (as many Oe's and Mac's as would ſtartle 'a whole Council-board on this ſide to hear of) and 'all his other friends, requiring them, in his Ma-'jeſty's name, to meet him with their forces, ſo as 'this buſineſs is now become no ſecret, but the 'common diſcourſe, both of his Lordſhip and the 'whole kingdom: that he had bought boards, and 'given order for making of long boats for the tranſ-'portation of his men, and was now come to aſk my 'advice and counſel.' What the ſentiments of this great Stateſman were, of Antrim's undertaking, and how wiſe a ſcheme he took this of the enemies of the Earl of Argyle's to be, may be ſeen by another paragraph in the ſame letter. 'In ſum, I muſt needs 'ſay, his Lordſhip ſhuffles the pack dexterouſly 'enough, if pretending to make a war at his own 'coſt he can thus preſently and totally ſhift off the 'charge upon the King, deal himſelf a General-'ſhip at ſea and land, a Command of the King's 'armies, his ordnance, his arms, his ſtores, his ſhip-'ping; make all his own officers, new levies as like 'him beſt, and procure a good horſe troop for his 'brother. Old Ned Coke would have here ſaid, God 'is my witneſs, theſe are ſtrange things to me. But 'now, all this for what? Marry, for aught I either 'hear, or can foreſee, to enable his Lordſhip to go 'upon the Iſles there, to recover for himſelf thoſe 'great Seigniories belonging unto his anceſtors, and 'ſay all the new poſſeſſors be Covenanters, which 'yet appears not; and that he do conquer the 'country (for not a leſs word than conqueſt comes 'from us), what ſhall his Majeſty, or any other 'man, ſave himſelf, be the better? Indeed it trou-'bles me to imagine, how his Lordſhip may think 'of us, all his Majeſty's Miniſters, whilſt he feeds 'himſelf with the hopes to carry out from amongſt 'us his own ends and benefits, thus in ſovereignty, 'and under a colour of doing a ſervice to the Crown, 'apply all to his own private uſe.' To theſe obſervations this very great and very knowing man, adds ſeveral queries, of which we will take notice only of three. 'What ſudden outrage may be apprehended 'from ſo great a number of the native Iriſh, children 'of habituated rebels, brought together without pay 'or victual, armed with our own weapons, ourſelves 'left naked the whilſt? What ſcandal to his Ma-'jeſty's ſervice, it might be in a time thus condi-'tioned, to employ a General, and a whole army, 'in a manner Roman Catholics? What affright or 'pretence this might give for the Scottiſh, who are 'at leaſt fourſcore thouſand in thoſe parts, to arm 'alſo under colour of their own defence, to ſet the 'whole kingdom into a tumult, which might be the 'matter of ſad and deſperate effects?' Theſe remarks will appear ſtill more pertinent, when we conſider, that within two years after the great Iriſh Rebellion broke out, which, without doubt, was chiefly owing to that indulgence given the Papiſts, under the latter part of the Earl of Strafford's government, much againſt that great man's will; and to the much greater indulgence that was allowed them afterwards, by which they came to know and feel their own ſtrength; at the ſame time, that they perſuaded many people in the adminiſtration, that none were better friends to the government than themſelves; which, beſides the diſmal conſequence it had, in amuſing the King and his Miniſters, produced an evil ſtill more dangerous; that of giving a reaſonable jealouſy, that either they ſecretly favoured the Papiſts, or were deluded and amuſed by them (15); ſo that in either caſe, thoſe that meant ſincerely well to the Proteſtant cauſe, ſaw they were under an abſolute neceſſity of taking care of themſelves: and as this was a juſt and reaſonable, ſo it is the real and true apology for the Earl of Argyle, and the Covenanters in Scotland; ſo far as they acted according to law, and by that authority, which his Majeſty himſelf had eſtabliſhed, when he was laſt in that kingdom (16).

only anſwer which the King gave it was, that he ſhould be glad to receive his vindication from his own mouth (r). The Marquis of Hamilton was then ſent with a force by ſea; but finding that it was no way capable of dealing with a nation, that were in a manner united againſt the meaſures he was to impoſe, he firſt entered into ſome conferences with the Earl of Argyle, and other Lords, himſelf, and then adviſed a treaty with the King, who was in the field. This brought about the firſt Pacification in the month of June 1639, to which, by the advice of Laud, the King conſented (s). It was not long after this, that his Majeſty ſent for the Earl of Argyle, and ten or twelve more of the principal Nobility, to London. This was thought an extraordinary thing in Scotland; and thoſe intruſted with the government there, would not on any terms ſuffer all the Lords to go, but ſent up the Earls of Montroſe, Loudon, and Lowthian, which was very ill taken by the King, who was perſuaded by ſome about him to think, that it was ſhowing a great diſreſpect to, and want of confidence in, him (t). It is very poſſible, that the Lords might not wholly confide in the honour and ſincerity of thoſe who had then the King's ear; and ſome reaſon they had for this diffidence, from the uſage the Earl of Loudon met with, who very narrowly eſcaped loſing his life, and was actually impriſoned in the Tower of London (u), notwithſtanding the King's ſafe conduct. Theſe violent meaſures brought on another war with Scotland, to which the King is ſaid to have been principally excited by the Earl of Traquair, who was then the King's Commiſſioner to the Parliament; and in the ſpring of the year 1640, the King marched againſt the Scots with a great army. But the Scots were well provided, and inſtead of waiting till they were attacked, marched into England with an army, and were ſo ſucceſsful, that a new treaty was ſet on foot at Rippon, in the month of September (x); and this produced a ſecond Pacification, in which the King granted all the demands of the Convenanters; yet, in all theſe affairs, it does not appear, that the Earl of Argyle took any great ſhare (y). By this time, the diſcontents in England were riſen to a great height, and his Majeſty being deſirous to ſee one of his kingdoms thoroughly ſettled, took a ſudden reſolution of going to Scotland, where, with his nephew, the Elector Palatine, he arrived on the 12th of Auguſt 1641 (z). At this time he directed the Marquis of Hamilton, whom he greatly truſted, to enter into a cloſe correſpondence with the Earl of Argyle, in which he ſeems to have formed a right judgment of both their tempers: for though the Marquis always profeſſed the higheſt loyalty to his Maſter, yet he had a great concern for his country; and the Earl, though he avowed the utmoſt ſteadineſs to the Conſtitution, yet at the ſame time affirmed, he had the warmeſt affection for his Prince (a). This conjunction had very probably brought about an entire and effectual ſettlement in that kingdom, if ſome perſons who were willing to have the entire management of it, had not formed a deſign againſt the lives of both theſe Noblemen, in the middle of the month of October, which obliged them to quit Edinburgh for their own ſafety (b). It is on hands all agreed, that the King had nothing to do with this ſtrange action; but it is alſo agreed, that the matter of fact is out of diſpute, and that ſuch a deſign there really was [C]. This gave great interruption to the King's

[C] That ſuch a deſign there really was.] We have three very different accounts of this matter of fact; the firſt is that of Biſhop Guthrie (17), who ſays, That the Earl of Argyle had information given him by one Colonel Stewart, that the Earl of Crawford and ſome other perſons had framed a deſign againſt the life of the Marquis of Hamilton and his own; and upon this theſe two Lords retired from Edinburgh, with a view, as he would have it, to make the Parliament riſe in confuſion; and he adds, that this was prevented by the King's going to the Houſe, where he made a bitter ſpeech againſt the Marquis of Hamilton. The ſecond is from Biſhop Burnet (18), who ſays, That the two Lords had an account of ſuch a deſign; but without naming the authors, and having this account only from one witneſs, they had it not in their power to prove it in a legal manner; and this made them retire from Edinburgh, that they might provide for their own ſafety, as having no other way to provide for it. He alſo agrees, that this had very ill conſequences with reſpect to public affairs; but that upon enquiry the fact was juſtified, and it plainly appeared thoſe two Noblemen had good reaſon for what they did; and if they had not, the Parliament that continued ſitting in their abſence, would have called them to a ſevere reckoning for it. The third is that of the noble Hiſtorian who is very clear in it; and after ſhowing, that Montroſe deſerted the Covenanters, becauſe the Earl of Argyle had more intereſt with them than he, goes on to relate the whole ſtory with great plainneſs and perſpicuity (19). 'After his Majeſty's arrival in Scot'land, ſays he, by the introduction of Mr. William
'Murray of the Bed-chamber, Montroſe came pri'vately to the King, and informed him of many
'particulars, from the beginning of the Rebellion;
'and that the Marquis of Hamilton was no leſs faulty
'and falſe towards his Majeſty, than Argyle; and 'offered to make proof of all in the Parliament; but 'rather deſired to have them both made away, which
'he frankly undertook to do: but the King ab-
'horring that expedient, though for his own ſecu'rity, adviſed that the proofs might be prepared for
'the Parliament. When ſuddenly, on a Sunday 'morning, the city of Edinburgh was in arms; and
'Hamilton, and Argyle, both gone out of the town
'to their own houſes; where they ſtood upon their 'guard; declaring publicly, That they had with- 'drawn themſelves. becauſe they knew that there was
'a deſign to aſſaſſinate them; and choſe rather to abſent
'themſelves, than by ſtanding upon their defence in 'Edinburgh (which they could well have done) to
'hazard the public peace, and ſecurity of the Par'liament; which thundered on their behalf. The 'Committee at Edinburgh diſpatched away an ex-
'preſs to London, with a dark and perplexed ac'count, in the morning that the two Lords had left
'the city; with many doubtful expreſſions, what
'the end of it would be; not without ſome dark
'inſinuations, as if the deſign might look farther
'than

King's affairs, and put a ſtop to the ſettlement between him and the nation: but as the Hiſtorian of the Hamilton family acknowledges, the deſigns of the two Lords were perfectly ſincere; and as the Marquis meant nothing but the King's ſervice, ſo, to uſe that Hiſtorian's own words, Argyle expreſſed a hearty concurrence in it (c). At this juncture, his Majeſty had Preſbyterian Divines about him; profeſſed a willingneſs to ſettle the Church of Scotland according to the deſires of that nation; and was ſo well pleaſed with the openneſs and plainneſs of Argyle's behaviour, that, by letters patent, bearing date November 16, 1641, he created him Marquis (d). It is very true, that ſome of our Hiſtorians ſay, the King went at this time down to Scotland, to make a deed of gift of that kingdom with his own hands (e), which is an expreſſion not eaſily to be underſtood: another has been uſed, which is much plainer, and I believe nearer the truth; that in the end of November, when he quitted that kingdom, he went from thence a contented King, and left behind him a contented people (f). How the ſcene was afterwards changed, is another affair. At this juncture, there happened a tranſaction, which ſhows, beyond all manner of doubt, that the Marquis was underſtood by the whole world, not only to be in the King's favour, but to be thoroughly and heartily inclined to his ſervice. The Iriſh Rebellion was juſt broken out, upon which the Scots, as well as the Engliſh Parliament, reſolved to ſend forces thither to ſuppreſs it; and the former determined the Marquis of Argyle ſhould command theirs; but that firſt, in conjunction with the Earl of Loudon, he ſhould go to London, to mediate between the King and the Engliſh Parliament; with both which meaſures his Majeſty was perfectly well pleaſed: but the Parliament being jealous of the Marquis's attachment to the King, civilly declined it, by declaring, that they looked upon the Marquis's preſence in Scotland to be then indiſpenſably neceſſary. At the beginning of the enſuing year, the Scots, as a nation, had very much in their power; for in the differences between the King and the Parliament of England, that ſide to which they joined themſelves unanimouſly, was ſure to prevail. This was a thing ſo plain, and withal ſo certain, that both his Majeſty and the Parliament ſaw and knew it; and therefore both ſides began to court the Scots, with all the pains imaginable (g). The Marquis of Hamilton very prudently repreſented to the King, that this was an affair of a very nice nature; that his Majeſty's having a party in Scotland would be the ruin of him; but if his Majeſty could gain the whole nation, the Parliament muſt ſubmit to reaſonable terms; and when he had ſtated this difficulty, he offered to go and make uſe of his beſt endeavours to get over it (h). The King accepted his ſervice, and ſent a letter, by the Earl of Lanerick, brother to the Marquis, to his council in that kingdom, who in the laſt Parliament had been declared Conſervators of the peace, dated September 18, 1642. The Marquis of Hamilton, according to his promiſe to the King, addreſſed himſelf to the Marquis of Argyle, with whom he was then in great friendſhip; and by their joint labours a reſolution was obtained, to ſend the Marquis of Hamilton to Holland, to engage the Queen to come over to Scotland, on a promiſe of ſecurity for her perſon, and the free exerciſe of her religion, for herſelf and family, offering to aſſiſt her Majeſty in mediating with both Houſes; and in caſe they refuſed to make a ſettled and ſolid peace upon reaſonable terms, they undertook, that the whole force of Scotland ſhould engage for the King againſt them (i). The King, at firſt, ſeemed not only ſatisfied but overjoyed with this; but ſome about him ſoon filled his head with jealouſies, that the Scots took too much upon them, upon which the King let this propoſition fall; and though the

'than Scotland. And theſe letters were brought to 'London, the day before the Houſes were to come 'together, after the receſs; all that party taking 'pains to perſuade others, that it could not but be a 'deſign to aſſaſſinate more men than thoſe Lords at 'Edinburgh. And the morning the Houſes were to 'meet, Mr. Hyde being walking in Weſtminſter-'hall, with the Earl of Holland and the Earl of 'Eſſex, both the Earls ſeemed wonderfully con-'cerned at it; and to believe, that other men were 'in like danger of the like aſſaults: the other, not 'thinking the apprehenſion worthy of them, told 'them merrily, That he knew well what opinions 'they both had of thoſe two Lords, a year or two before, 'and he wondered how they became ſo altered; to 'which they anſwered ſmiling, That the times and 'the Court was much altered ſince. And the Houſes 'were no ſooner ſat, but the report being made in 'the Houſe of Commons, and the Committee's letter 'from Scotland being read, a motion was made, '*To ſend to the Houſe of Peers, that the Earl of Eſſex, 'who was left by the King General on this ſide Trent, 'might be deſired to appoint ſuch a guard, as he 'thought competent for the ſecurity of the Parliament, 'conſtantly to attend while the Houſes ſate; which was 'done accordingly; and continued till they thought 'fit to have other guards.' We ſee plainly from hence, what terrible conſequences attended thoſe over forward and violent reſolutions, which were not put in execution, merely from the juſtice and tenderneſs of the King's nature. For it is very obſervable, that though the Hiſtorian does not in the leaſt diſpute the fact, yet he acknowledges, that himſelf treated it at the time, as a very light matter; and would have perſuaded the Lords, that there was a time, when they would not have been ſo much concerned for the ſafety of theſe Scotch Noblemen; which, not to ſay a harſher thing of it, is a very extraordinary expreſſion; and very plainly ſhews, what ſtrange expedients ſome Politicians at that time thought not altogether unjuſtifiable to carry their points; and if by degrees, others were either taught or forced to follow their examples, they could not, upon their own principles, judge it inexcuſable. In the former note, we have ſhown, that there were thoughts of ſtripping the Earl of Argyle of his eſtate; in this, it has been proved, that a deſign was formed againſt his life; when he was ſo far from having forfeited the King's confidence, that after this he created him, in public teſtimony thereof a Marquis.

Queen,

Queen, who was extremely pleaſed with it, procured the Marquis of Hamilton to be created a Duke, on the merit of this ſervice, which was the greateſt he ever did, or indeed could do, yet ſhe could not hinder his being perſecuted afterwards, and ſent priſoner to Pendennis Caſtle, as a traitor (k). After this, the affairs of Scotland took the worſt turn poſſible for the King. He had owned the Conſervators by the letter before-mentioned, notwithſtanding which, he was prevailed upon to grant a commiſſion to the Earl of Montroſe, which threw that kingdom into a Civil War; the King's authority being claimed on both ſides (l). The ſhare the Marquis of Argyle had in this, belongs to the General Hiſtory of thoſe times; and therefore, we ſhall not meddle with it here, farther than to obſerve, that in 1644, Antrim, who was created a Marquis for that very purpoſe, ſent over a great body of his Iriſh Papiſts, who waſted and deſtroyed all Argyle's eſtate; and, which was worſt, killed moſt of his people (m). In the courſe of this period, Argyle was conſtantly employed by the Parliament, and had their authority for every thing he did, particularly in reſpect to a journey he made to Ireland; at his return from which, he found the King in the hands of the Scots army at Newcaſtle, in which it is certain that he had no hand; but upon his repairing thither, he had acceſs to (n), and was very kindly received by, his Majeſty. This was in 1646, and upon that occaſion it was thought neceſſary by the Parliament of Scotland, that he ſhould repair to London, with inſtructions to their Commiſſioners. At this very time, he was intruſted by his Royal Maſter with a ſecret commiſſion of the greateſt importance, which he executed with much dexterity, diligence, and fidelity (o) [D]. Yet his conduct at this very time has been grievouſly cenſured by thoſe who, it ſeems were not in the ſecret, and were unacquainted that the meaſures he took, were not only moſt for the King's ſervice, but had alſo his Majeſty's approbation (p). As to what afterwards paſſed with reſpect to the terms made with the army from Scotland, and the meaſures taken in reference to the diſpoſal of the perſon of King Charles I. we find many things ſaid in our hiſtories, as to the conduct of the Marquis of Argyle, but they are aſſerted only without any proofs (q): and this noble perſon himſelf, at a time when, if there had been any ſuch proofs in the power of the perſons who have aſſerted theſe things, or of any other, they might certainly have been produced, declared in terms the cleareſt and moſt poſitive that could be framed, he had no intereſt or concern in them whatever, but ſtudiouſly avoided interfering in any manner, in matters which he [D] With much dexterity, diligence, and fidelity.] The account which the Earl of Clarendon gives of what paſſed after the King came to Newcaſtle, is ſuch a one as might be expected from a perſon who was not an eye-witneſs of the things about which he writes, who took his accounts from men of his own party; and, to make his work all of a piece, repreſents the Scots in the blackeſt colours (19). As to Duke Hamilton's and the Marquis of Argyle's conferences with the King, he is ſilent, which is a plain indication that he was not acquainted with them. Biſhop Guthrie is very particular, and the particulars he gives us are ſuch, as ſhow him to have been a very credulous man, and very unfit for writing hiſtory. He ſays, that on July 17, 1646, when Duke Hamilton arrived at Newcaſtle, the day was perfectly fair and pleaſant, but at the very inſtant he kiſſed the King's hand, there began a terrible thunder, with lightning and rain, which continued all night. Upon the 24th came the Marquis of Argyle, and as he kiſſed the King's hand, juſt the like thunder, lightning, and rain began, and continued all the night alſo. Theſe are the Prelate's own words; and a little after he tells us, that upon the 2d of Auguſt, the Engliſh Commiſſioners removed from Newcaſtle; and the next day, the Chancellor, the Marquis of Argyle, and the Earl of Dumferling, offered to go up and treat with the Parliament for a mitigation of the articles, which they had ſent by their own Commiſſioners; and with ſome of which, the King had expreſſed himſelf diſſatisfied; upon all which he makes this wiſe reflection (20), 'Whether 'or not his Majeſty truſted them, and expected any 'good from them, is doubtful: but the Royaliſts '(who well knew their ways) ſpared not to ſay, that 'their treating would end in a bargain.' Biſhop Burnet gives us alſo an account of the acceſs which theſe Lords had to the King, and of a commiſſion with which the Marquis of Argyle was charged, in conjunction with the Chancellor, in which he was enjoined ſecrecy. At the ſame time he tells us, what this commiſſion was, and aſſures us the ſecret of it, was but very ill kept (21); whereas, in truth, it was ſo well kept, that it clearly appears from his account, that at the time he wrote his book it had not reached his knowledge. The truth of the matter then was this: the Marquis of Argyle might, if he had ſo pleaſed, have reſided at London, as a Commiſſioner from the Parliament of Scotland; but he liked not of the office, and therefore very carefully declined it. That he went up now was at the King's requeſt (22); and the Commiſſion he was charged with, this, that he ſhould conſult the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hertford, as to the expediency of the Scots Parliament and army declaring for him; what effects they judged this would have, and what part his friends in England would take, if ſuch a thing happened. Argyle honeſtly executed the truſt repoſed in him, and received from theſe noble perſons the following anſwer; that his Majeſty well knew, his beſt friends at Oxford never wiſhed to ſee him bring his Parliament under by an abſolute conqueſt; and that if at this juncture the Scots ſhould declare for him, it might prove his ruin, by turning it into a national diſpute, in which all parties of the Engliſh would unite to prevent their being conquered. The King having received this anſwer from the Marquis of Argyle's own mouth, remained ſatisfied, and took other meaſures. When the Marquis of Argyle was ſent to the Tower in 1661, he deſired that Lord Hertford's depoſition might be taken to this point; which was refuſed him, and probably kept from that nobleman's knowledge. Thus the reader ſees, that while the Marquis was doing his duty with the utmoſt diligence, he was baſely ſuppoſed to be driving a bargain. One thing more is very remarkable, that it was propoſed in the Engliſh Houſe of Commons to give thanks to the Scotch Commiſſioners for their great civilities and good offices, while at Newcaſtle; but when it came to be put to the vote, the words good offices were left out, ſo far were they from thinking theſe Commiſſioners did their buſineſs with the King (23). Theſe are facts, and facts are ſtubborn things: ſo are not conjectures and characters, which every man may mould or model according to his own inclinations.

foreſaw it was impoſſible in the nature of things ſhould ever end other than they did, or be by him wrought to produce what he could wiſh. His Lordſhip's declaration, under ſuch circumſtances, as to his own behaviour, which he muſt certainly beſt know, will, to any reaſonable man, ſeem as much deſerving of credit, as what others have aſſerted from their own notions and conjectures, and without pretending to produce any kind of evidence whatever [E]. In the ſucceeding year, when the Duke of Hamilton undertook to lead an army out of Scotland into England for the relief of the King, the conduct of the Marquis of Argyle is very much cenſured, becauſe himſelf and his friends differed in a debate, from the majority of that Parliament, and proteſted againſt the vote (r), after it was carried. But if it be conſidered, that the Marquis of Argyle had in his own breaſt the deciſion of the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hertford, that if Scotland took part with the King, the Engliſh would riſe as one man againſt him (s); and that Sir Philip Warwick tells us, Hamilton had no engagements with the Nobility that roſe about this time in England (t); it may be eaſily conceived, why Argyle had ſo indifferent an opinion of an enterprize, at the head of which Hamilton was ſet, a man, of all the Scotch Nobility, more obnoxious to the Engliſh than any. It is certain that he was very right in his judgment, for the Duke very ſoon threw away both himſelf and the army (u); and the Marquis of Argyle, by ſeeming to have oppoſed his conduct, had intereſt enough thereby to hinder Cromwell from entering Scotland with his army, and making an abſolute conqueſt of it, which he might have eaſily done (w). Upon his marching ſouthwards, all our Hiſtorians agree, that Scotland was left intirely in the hands of Argyle and his friends; and therefore, from their conduct at this time, we may form a true judgment of their real ſentiments and principles (x). The firſt thing they did, was to declare fully and plainly againſt the proceedings in England, and to order the Scots Commiſſioners to proteſt againſt them; which they did in terms, the moſt clear and explicit, ſhowing, that they looked upon the Parliament of England, as no longer ſubſiſting after the Houſe of Lords was taken away, and ſo many Members of the Houſe of Commons excluded; that they had no power over the perſon of the King; and that whatever they pretended to do, was arbitrary, unjuſt, and illegal (y). It was not at that time in the power of the Scots to do more, the Duke of Hamilton's precipitate attempt having weakened them extremely, but they took the beſt meaſures they could to put themſelves again in a poſture of defence; and as ſoon as they were informed of the King's being beheaded, they proclaimed his ſon (z): and it cannot be denied, that the Marquis of Argyle employed all his intereſt and influence to procure his being invited into Scotland; which ſufficiently refutes that groundleſs and ſcandalous aſperſion, as if Cromwell had communicated to Argyle his deſign againſt the King's life, and that it had been approved of by the latter (a). It is indeed true, that the Marquis of Argyle, and thoſe who had then power in Scotland, inſiſted on the [E] Any kind of evidence whatever.] It would take up more room than the nature of this work will allow, to enter into a particular diſcuſſion of every important matter of fact; and thoſe we have already examined, are inſtances ſufficient of what might be done in this way. At preſent we will content ourſelves with citing a paſſage from the Marquis's defence, when he was charged in general terms, in a judicial way, with the crimes that are imputed to him by certain Hiſtorians. Thus then it ran (24): 'As for what was done in the years 1646 and 1647, 'concerning the diſpoſal of his late Royal Majeſty's 'perſon, the return of the Scottiſh army, and the 'agreement for the money to be paid for their 'arrears, it is well known, that inſtructions were 'ſent to and again in theſe affairs, both from Com'mittees and Commiſſioners in Scotland and Eng'land. Yet it ſhall never be found, that ever either 'my hand or preſence was at any Committees, where 'any thing was debated or reſolved, concerning the 'diſpoſal of his late Royal Majeſty's perſon, or up'on any treaties or concluſions for return of the 'Scots army, or for the money for the ſatisfaction 'of their arrears. So that, I hope, when it is ſeri'ouſly conſidered, that I was one of the laſt in 'Scotland, who ſubſcribed the national Covenant, 'and never did the ſame till commanded by his Ma'jeſty; and that I was of all thoſe who acted in 'public affairs, one of thoſe who had leaſt acceſſion 'to thoſe things, though I be moſt blamed by com'mon report, that your Lordſhips will not find my 'carriage, during the late troubles, to have de'ſerved to have been put in ſo ſingular a condi'tion.' And to the ſame purpoſe, the Marquis delivered himſelf in his ſpeech before the Parliament of Scotland, April 16, 1661. 'I have but only a few 'word to ſay, in remembering your Lordſhips of 'three things obſervable in my carriage during the 'late troubles. Firſt, my never joining in the na'tional Covenant, till commanded by his late Royal 'Majeſty. Secondly, my never receiving any pay 'during all the troubles, either as Committee-man, 'Commander in Chief, Colonel, or Captain, in all 'the ſervices of England, Scotland, or Ireland, 'till in a Parliament of the year 1646, which was 'after all I had was deſtroyed by the Iriſh rebels and 'their aſſociates: and what I got from the Parlia'ment 1647, was after my eſtate and lands were 'ruined, and was only for my family's ſubſiſtence, 'and paying ſome neceſſitous creditors ſome annual 'rents, as the Act of Parliament, 1647, and order 'to the Scots Commiſſioners at London the ſame 'year can ſhow. And for the firſt negative part, Sir 'William Thomſon's hand will prove it, who was 'either depute, or principal receiver and layer out 'of all public monies all that time. Thirdly, my 'being free of any actings in the years 1646 and '1647, anent the diſpoſing of his Majeſty's Royal 'Father's perſon, never having concurred in Com'mittees in Scotland or England, nor as a Commiſ'ſioner at London anent the ſame, nor in any reſolu'tions concerning the return of the Scots army, nor 'the money for their arrears agreed to in theſe 'times, except that I might be preſent in the Parlia'ment 1647, which I do not well know. By all 'which it is evident, how clearly and freely I may 'ſay, that I do not deſerve to be the ſingle ſufferer 'in all his Majeſty's dominions, for my carriage 'during the late troubles, his Majeſty having (to his 'eternal praiſe) pardoned all but ſome of the mur'ders of his late Royal Father.'

King's complying with their terms; which if they had not done, it would have been impoſſible for them to have brought the nation to adhere to him (b). As to what happened afterwards to Montroſe, the Marquis of Argyle had no immediate hand in it. He had formerly made an agreement with him, which the Committee of Eſtates refuſed to ratify; and now, when he was brought to a trial for being in arms, as the Scots conſidered it, againſt his country, the Marquis declared, that he was too much a party to be a Judge (c), and therefore declined any ſhare in thoſe proceedings. What he meant by this, and how far he was juſtified in this ſtep of his conduct, the reader may learn from ſome Hiſtorians, not at all inclined to be partial in Argyle's favour (d) [F]. At laſt, with much perſuaſion, in ſome meaſure againſt his own will, but certainly contrary to the advice of the noble Hiſtorian, and others of his moſt favoured Counſellors, the King determined to accept the repeated invitations of the Parliament of Scotland, and to go over thither upon their terms (e). It is allowed, that this return of his Majeſty, was ſingly and entirely owing to the Marquis of Argyle; and the Hiſtorian of the Hamilton family tells us, that Duke William, the laſt heir male of that race, when he

[F] To be partial in Argyle's favour.] It is certainly a very difficult thing to come at truth, in reſpect to any of theſe tranſactions; and the only way to come at it is, to examine, without prejudice, what different authors have delivered, and make ſuch allowances as are neceſſary on the ſcore of that partiality, in favour of their own parties, with which almoſt all of them are known to write. It is evident from the whole tenor of Biſhop Guthrie's Memoirs, that he was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed againſt the Marquis of Argyle: yet he acknowledges, that, in 1643, this nobleman ſet on foot a negociation for compromiſing his differences with Montroſe (25); and at the ſame time owns, that the latter gave him a dilatory anſwer, with a view to gain time, having already taken a ſettled reſolution to begin the war, as ſoon as thoſe of his party about the King could procure him a commiſſion. It is alſo neceſſary to obſerve, that Argyle and his friends, whom Burnet ſtiles the Church party (26) in Scotland, had very clearly the King's authority on their ſide, as appears, beyond contradiction, from his Majeſty's owning them upon many occaſions, and treating with them to the laſt, at the Iſle of Wight, as a legal Parliament, and repreſentatives of his ſubjects; and as ſuch, after his death, they were owned by King Charles II. Yet notwithſtanding this, in 1644, Montroſe was employed in Scotland to raiſe a war on that ſide, and Antrim promiſed to ſend aſſiſtance from Ireland; and for their encouragement, both were created Marquiſſes (27). By this means the war began in Scotland, and was carried on with great violence and fury, more eſpecially by the Iriſh that Antrim ſent over. The Marquis of Argyle and the Earl of Lothian were employed by the Parliament to command their forces againſt Montroſe, when they acted for ſome time on the defenſive, and at laſt laid down their command; of which Biſhop Guthrie gives this account (28); 'without more ado (ſays he) they 'went to Edinburgh and delivered up their com-'miſſions to the Committee of Eſtates, receiving 'from them an act of approbation of their ſervice, 'which many ſaid they deſerved the better, becauſe 'they had ſhed no blood.' It is to be hoped this Prelate himſelf was among the many; for ſurely avoiding to ſhed blood in ſuch times as theſe, was a very heroic, as well as chriſtian diſpoſition. Yet ſome time after, this right reverend author ſeems to take a pleaſure in relating the calamities that befel the countries belonging to the Marquis of Argyle; obſerves, without any teſtimony of compaſſion, that the people were driven to hide and lurk about, ſo that multitudes periſhed by famine; and aſſerts, that, at laſt, the Marquis's great power was ſo far reduced, that he could ſcarcely muſter fifteen hundred of his tenants, ſuch rivers of blood had been ſhed in the Civil War (29). The Earl of Clarendon (30) alſo acknowledges, that upon enquiring what foul offence the Marquis of Montroſe had ever committed that ſhould hinder the Lords, who now (1650) were returned to their duty from acting in conjunction with him, the Earl of Lauderdale, 'told him, that he could not imagine or conceive 'the barbarities and inhumanities Montroſe was 'guilty of, at the time he made war in Scotland; 'that he never gave quarter to any man, but pur-'ſued all the advantages he ever got, with the ut-'moſt outrage and cruelty; that he had in one 'battle killed fifteen hundred of one family of the 'Campbells, of the blood and name of Argyle, and 'that he had utterly rooted out ſeveral names and 'entire noble families.' It muſt, therefore, be allowed, that it was a mark of much moderation and greatneſs of mind in the Marquis of Argyle, to refuſe having any ſhare in the proceedings againſt this unfortunate nobleman: neither is any thing ſaid of him here, or elſewhere, intended as the leaſt aſperſion upon his character. It was the unhappineſs, the ſignal unhappineſs, of thoſe diſmal times, that men of honour, of virtue, and of religion, were drawn by the different colours given to the cauſes of ſeveral parties, to ſhed the blood of their countrymen, to deſtroy and to depopulate their native ſoil, and to purſue even their old acquaintance, nay, and near relations, with unrelenting fury. The Marquis of Argyle appears to have had as little of this ſpirit as any; and yet when he had leiſure to recollect, and to reflect upon his own actions, we find him profeſſing, with an ingenuity worthy of his noble nature, his concern for what had happened. Theſe are his words (31). 'I confeſs it was my great miſ-'fortune to be too deeply engaged in theſe fatal 'times. I know the Nobility of Scotland have al-'ways bickered with their Princes; and from the 'inſolency of that cuſtom, not any of our Kings 'have been free. It is alſo true, the perpetual 'family feuds among us, which by all the induſtry 'and authority of our Princes could never be ſo pa-'cified, but that they revived again, and took upon 'themſelves, as they had advantage, to revenge 'their quarrel; (and yet like ſudden floods which 'violently over-run, and as peaceably return within 'their banks, abated to their due allegiance) did 'eaſily perſuade me, that there was no ſuch ap-'parent danger in the firſt beginnings of the conteſt 'between the King and my nation of Scotland. I 'had laid it for a maxim, that a reformation was 'ſooner effected, per Gladium Oris, then per Os Gla-'dii; and certainly true religion is rather a ſettler 'than a ſtickler in policy, and rather confirms men 'in the obedience to the government eſtabliſhed, 'than invites them to the erecting of new, which 'they neither do nor can know till it be diſcovered 'and declared. Wherein I did not look upon our 'intended reformation as any way taxable, ſince it 'had the whole ſtream of univerſal conſent of the 'whole nation. I never thought of thoſe dire con-'ſequences which preſently followed, till by that 'confuſion my thoughts became diſtracted, and my-'ſelf encountered ſo many difficulties in the way, 'that all remedies that were applied did the quite 'contrary operation. Whatever therefore hath been 'ſaid by me and others, in this matter, you muſt 'repute and accept them as from a diſtracted man, of 'a diſtracted ſubject, in a diſtracted time wherein I 'lived; and this ſhall ſerve to let you know, how 'far I waded unwarily in that buſineſs.'

found himſelf excluded by the Parliament of Scotland from having any ſhare in public affairs, thought fit, notwithſtanding, out of pure loyalty to the King, to preſs him to cloſe with the propoſitions that were made him, and to rely upon the Marquis of Argyle (f) as the only perſon, who, as things then ſtood, could ſerve him effectually; which is a convincing argument, that the fact was really ſo: for had it been otherwiſe, the Duke of Hamilton would never have attempted to make his Majeſty believe ſuch great things of a man, he then held to be his enemy. Upon his Majeſty's arrival, he was very dutifully received by the Marquis, and the utmoſt reſpect was paid to his perſon, by all ſuch as approached him (g). It is true, that the King took the Covenant, and complied in all other reſpects, with the terms agreed on in Holland; which we find ſome writers repreſenting as a great hardſhip, and aſcribing it ſolely to the Marquis of Argyle. But granting this to be true, even theſe authors acknowledge, that the voice of the nation was with him (h): and if the Marquis meant to reſtore the King, he could not diſcover the ſincerity of his meaning more plainly, than by urging him to make good his promiſes at the beginning, and to ſatisfy the people of that nation, that he meant to keep his word with them. Neither was there any thing blameable in the Marquis's conduct, ſuppoſing it to have proceeded merely from his zeal for the Church of Scotland; ſince this was agreeable to the whole tenor of his life, and the very principle upon which all that influence was grounded, which hitherto he had ſo effectually uſed for the King's ſervice and ſupport (i). It is alſo allowed, that the Marquis's conduct in Scotland had a very great effect upon his countrymen in Ireland, who thereupon immediately and unanimouſly declared for the King (k). It is very certain, that as the Marquis of Argyle had brought the Scotch nation to own and receive his Majeſty upon the foundation of their conſtitution; ſo he was very ſolicitous, that the King ſhould keep his promiſes with them, and that he ſhould act in ſuch a manner as might extinguiſh all their fears and jealouſies, in which impartial people will allow, that he acted like an able Stateſman and a good ſubject (l). Upon Cromwell's entering Scotland, it is confeſſed, that he met with effectual and obſtinate reſiſtance, and that he was never in ſo great danger of being defeated, as in that expedition. There are very different accounts of the battle of Dunbar, which was fought, September 3, 1650, in which, though Cromwell gained a great, yet it was an unexpected victory; and, notwithſtanding the Marquis of Argyle had been very inſtrumental in raiſing that powerful army, which fought there in the King's cauſe, yet never any blame was charged upon him, in reſpect to the defeat (m). He adhered to the King as ſteadily afterwards as he did before it; attended him at Perth, or St. Johnſtoun, with the ſame diligence and duty (n); and was ſo inſtrumental in the ſteps taken there for his Majeſty's ſervice, that out of a full perſuaſion of the uprightneſs of his intentions, and the juſtice of his conduct, the King, of his own motive, was pleaſed to give him ſuch a teſtimony under his hand, as ought to convince poſterity, that what ſome men have written, in reference to this noble perſon, proceeded either from partiality or want of ſufficient lights (o). This paper alone is of more weight than all the private Memoirs or General Hiſtories of thoſe times put together; as King Charles II. is known to have formed very right judgments of men, and as he hath given us therein his judgment of the Marquis's behaviour to this time [G]. Such of the Engliſh as were about the King, and more eſpecially the Duke of Buckingham, were very well ſatisfied with the Marquis's conduct, and concurred with him in his [G] Of the Marquis's behaviour to this time.] The defeat at Dunbar was a very trying circumſtance, in reſpect to the King's affairs; and it ſeems, that the Committee of Eſtates were not extremely attentive to the concern his Majeſty was under on this occaſion. He was at that time at Perth, from whence he diſpatched the Marquis of Argyle to the States, with a meſſage, which was ſoon after followed by a moſt gracious letter, dated the 12th of September: the very ſame day the Lord Lorn was ſent with another letter, in reference to recruiting the regiments of guards (32). The pains taken, both by the Marquis and his ſon, upon this occaſion, might very naturally make a ſtrong impreſſion upon his Majeſty's mind, more eſpecially as he could not but be ſenſible, that it was chiefly owing to their influence the Miniſters were kept to his party; and that the advice given him by the Marquis, how little ſoever it might be agreeable to his age and temper, was, notwithſtanding, of the utmoſt conſequence to his affairs, and the fitteſt for him to follow at that juncture. Upon theſe motives, he was inclined to give the Marquis a ſignal teſtimony of his Royal Favour; which, at the ſame time, that it expreſſed his ſenſe of paſt and preſent ſervices, might bind him to him for the future. He drew up therefore the following paper with his own hand, and preſented it to the Marquis, under his ſign manual (33).

(33) Printed by the Rev. Mr. Echard, in the Appendix to the third volume of his Hiſtory, being communicated to him by the firſt Duke of Argyle.

'HAVING taken into my conſideration the faithful endeavours of the Marquis of Argyle, for reſtoring me to my juſt rights, and the happy ſettling of my dominions, I am deſirous to let the world ſee how ſenſible I am of his real reſpect to me, by ſome particular marks of my favour to him, by which they may ſee, the truſt and confidence which I repoſe in him: and particularly, I do promiſe, that I will make him Duke of Argyle, and Knight of the Garter, and one of the Gentlemen of my Bed-chamber; and this to be performed, when he ſhall think it fit. And, I do further promiſe him, to hearken to his counſels ——— (worn out) ——— Whenever it ſhall pleaſe God to reſtore me to my juſt rights in England, I ſhall ſee him paid the forty thouſand pounds ſterling, which is due to him. All which I do promiſe to make good, upon the word of a King.'

St. Johnſtoun, September 24, 1650. CHARLES R.

There

his measures. They knew very well, that there was no sailing against wind and tide, and thought those did the King service, that enabled him to sail with them (p). But after all, his Majesty was drawn to wish for a coalition of parties; and having intelligence, that the Highlanders were in arms, and that several Noblemen had joined with them, he secretly withdrew from Perth, intending to have cast himself upon them (q). He was, however, prevailed upon to return; and the Marquis of Argyle still adhering closely to him, though he saw his Majesty disposed to take other measures than those he thought best for his service, it was resolved, he should be solemnly crowned at Scoon, with all the magnificence in the power of that distressed nation; which was accordingly done in January following, when the King, by his coronation oath, renewed all his former promises and obligations, and the Crown was set upon his head by the Marquis of Argyle, who was the first Nobleman that did homage and swore allegiance (r). After this, his Majesty entered into measures for procuring the Act of Classes, by which Montrose's party were kept out of employments, to be repealed, which, though it might be against the judgment of the Marquis of Argyle, yet he did not hinder his Majesty from prosecuting that design. It is very clear from the Histories of those times, that how much soever these steps might increase the King's army, they added very little strength to it, or weight to his Councils (s). New jealousies arose, fresh struggles for power began, Cromwell pushed his successes so far, that having at last made himself master of Perth, the King found himself obliged with his army to retire to Sterling, where, however he was so strongly posted, that after several attempts to no purpose, Cromwell was obliged to lay aside his design of attacking him (t). It was in the month of July, that the King formed a resolution of marching into England, which, it is allowed, was opposed by the Marquis of Argyle; and it is acknowledged by the Earl of Clarendon, that the reasons he offered against it were no frivolous ones, though they are not mentioned (u). It is highly probable, that the Marquis might think his Majesty might find it easier to deal with his enemies in a country where his authority was universally acknowledged, excepting in the places immediately under their power. He might also hope, by protracting the war, and removing the seat of it, that Cromwell's army might be lessened, separated, and perhaps drawn into the same circumstances, they were in before the fatal battle of Dunbar: neither is it at all unlikely, that he might hope the English in the King's interest, would, by such a diversion, have time given them to consult and concert a general insurrection, which was like to prove infinitely more formidable than any attempts they could make to join the King upon his sudden marching into their country with several flying corps of the Parliament forces in his front, and on his flanks, and Cromwell's numerous and victorious army at his heels (w). But though the Marquis disapproved the measure, and gave his reasons against it, which were allowed to have weight by the best judges, even of the King's English friends, yet he would have accompanied his Majesty, if his Lady had not lain at the point of death, which induced him to ask the King's leave to remain behind; which was very graciously given, and he had the honour of kissing his Sovereign's hand, when he took leave of him at Sterling (x). We are, indeed, told by certain Historians, that there were some about the King, who would have persuaded him to secure the Marquis's

There can be but two constructions put upon this paper: for, either it must have proceeded entirely from the kindness and good-will of the King; and then it must be allowed, to be the clearest demonstration of his high opinion of the Marquis's abilities and fidelity, which over-turns all the conjectural accounts of those Historians, who pretend, that he looked upon himself, as under a kind of government and restraint from the Marquis; or it must have been owing to the ambition of that Nobleman himself, who was willing to have a security from the King, for the hazards he ran in his service; and taken in this light, it is as clear a proof of his sincere intention to contribute all in his power to his Restoration, without which this paper was a thing of no value. If therefore, we either allow, which by the way, no body ever denied, that the King had parts, or the Marquis prudence, we cannot doubt, that they perfectly understood each other; though it is highly probable, from the profound secrecy with which this transaction was attended, that neither inclined the world should know how perfect an understanding there was between them. It would be no very difficult matter to show the truth of this observation from matters of fact. The King, though he did not follow the Marquis's advice in protracting the war in Scotland, yet testified his respect and regard for him at his departure. It appears from the Earl of Clarendon's account, that the Queen-Mother had always a very good opinion of the Marquis (34), as had such of the King's English Counsellors as wished to see him truly a Monarch, the sovereign of all his subjects, of what religious or political sentiments soever they might be, and to which in his own nature the King himself was inclined. The conference with Don John of Austria, five years after this, shews his Majesty's thorough sense of the Marquis's real attachment, notwithstanding appearances (35). On the other hand, he was the last man that capitulated in Scotland; he did it when sick and a prisoner, and then only promised to be quiet. He held several meetings with the loyal nobility, to consider whether any thing might be attempted for his Majesty's service. His son was very often in arms, which made the father always suspected; and though he seems to have altered his conduct in the last years of the usurpation, yet it was, because he judged, complying so far, as to sit in Parliament in the time of Richard, might be of more service to the King, as it really was, than acting in Scotland against Monk. At his very trial, he appealed to his Grace, the Earl of Middleton (36), then High Commissioner, for the truth of his sending a message to him in the hills, when he was there in arms with a few followers for the King; to which he received no answer; and his resolution of going up to London after the Restoration, must have arisen from a consciousness of these past services.

perſon, and to have left him, not only as he did, without truſt or power, but without liberty alſo (y), when his Lady was in a dying condition in Scotland. But his Majeſty had more wiſdom, as well as juſtice, than to conſent to any ſuch thing; and the anſwer that he gave upon that occaſion ſhews, how much better he was able to judge of things, than any of thoſe about him. After the King's defeat at Worceſter, the Marquis of Argyle retired to his own houſe at Inverary, where he continued to act as he thought beſt for his own defence, for a whole year (z); till falling ſick, he was ſurprized and made priſoner by General Dean, who afterwards brought him up to Edinburgh, where he was likewiſe a priſoner, when Cromwell was proclaimed Protector; and having received General Monk's orders to attend the Council, he was, in conſequence of that attendance, obliged to be preſent at the ceremony of proclaiming the Protector (a). While he was a priſoner, a paper was tendered to him to ſign, containing his ſubmiſſion to the government, as ſettled, without King or Houſe of Lords; which he refuſed; but afterwards, when he was in no condition to ſtruggle, he did ſign a paper (b) promiſing to live peaceably under that government. His Chaplain, Mr. Alexander Gordon, while the Engliſh were at Inverary, prayed conſtantly for his Majeſty; and when the Marquis himſelf prayed, he always mentioned thoſe to whom he was engaged, by natural, civil, or Chriſtian bonds (c). His country was the laſt that ſubmitted; and even then, his ſon did not ſubmit. The Marquis did indeed uſe great civility towards the perſons in power, which was the more neceſſary, becauſe, as Whitelocke and other writers of that party tell us, he was under continual ſuſpicions; ſo far is it from being true, that he was looked upon by them as a man firm in their intereſt, or one in whom they might confide (d). He oppoſed the act of Union, upon plauſible and juſt motives; but in reality, with a view to hinder it from ſucceeding at all (e). In 1656, when King Charles II. had a conference with Don John of Auſtria upon the ſtate of his affairs in Scotland; and amongſt other things it was objected to him, that the Marquis and his ſon, the Lord Lorn, had the greateſt intereſt there, and that it was ſuſpected they were againſt him; his Majeſty anſwered clearly, that for the Lord Lorn, he could depend as much upon him, as upon his brother. In regard to the Marquis, he contented himſelf, with ſaying, he was a very wiſe man; but at laſt confeſſed, that he had received more money from him, than from any perſon in Scotland (f). It is not to be inferred from hence, that the King had any doubts, at that time, about his fidelity; but knowing his cautious way of acting, he was unwilling to declare his ſentiments plainly, even to Don John. Under Richard's Protectorate, the Marquis was choſen for the ſhire of Aberdeen; and though he had refuſed to ſerve in Oliver's Parliament, yet he thought fit to go up then to London, and wrought there, as he told ſeveral after he came down again to Scotland, for his Majeſty's ſervice, as it was afterwards proved, for his ſervice effectually, by making that breach, by which his majeſty entered (g). It ſeems, however, that during Monk's government in Scotland, he looked upon the country as abſolutely conquered; and his conceiving the thing in this light, very probably induced him to take many ſteps, that he would not otherwiſe have done (h). Upon the King's Reſtoration, he was differently adviſed by his friends: ſome perſuaded him to go immediately up to London, and congratulate his Majeſty on his return; others thought it more adviſeable, that he ſhould wait till the government was ſettled. There is no doubt, that he weighed very ſeriouſly both theſe opinions; but at laſt, he determined upon the former, as the more open and honeſt, if not the moſt prudent courſe. He accordingly came up to London, where he arrived July 8, 1660 (i); though it is reported, that orders had been procured from the King to ſtop him on the road. Immediately after his arrival, he went to Whitehall; of which, when the King was informed, he ſent Sir William Fleming to carry him to the Tower. He preſſed very earneſtly, that he might be allowed to ſee the King, but his enemies prevented that: they knew his great abilities, and they knew the confidence the King had in him; they knew, likewiſe, the arts by which that confidence had been ruined; and therefore they cauſed him to be hurried away without ceremony, indeed without civility or decency (k). After he was committed to the Tower, he made application for liberty to have affidavits and declarations of ſeveral perſons in England, particularly of the Marquis of Hertford, taken upon ſome matters of fact; but this piece of juſtice was denied him (l). At the very time he was committed to the Tower, the Marquis of Antrim was alſo ſent thither, for affirming, that the Iriſh had acted by the late King's authority; and it will not certainly do any great honour to that adminiſtration with poſterity, who thought it conſiſtent with the King's reputation to diſmiſs the latter ſo eaſily, and to proſecute the former to deſtruction without mercy (m). He was continued in the Tower for about five months, and in December was ſent down by ſea to Scotland, very narrowly eſcaping ſhipwreck in his paſſage by a ſtorm (n). As ſoon as he arrived, he was ſent priſoner to the Caſtle of Edinburgh, in order to be brought to a trial before the Parliament of Scotland, to which his capital enemy, the Earl of Middleton, was ſent down Lord High Commiſſioner; who, through the whole courſe of it, argued with a vehemency, that would have been highly indecent in an Advocate, and therefore I know not what what to call it in a Judge (o). A long charge was exhibited againſt the Marquis, comprehending a vaſt variety of facts, from the year 1638; which was done purpoſely to render him odious, and to raiſe a clamour againſt him, for moſt of them were incapable of any kind of proof; and all before the year 1651, were abſolutely pardoned (p) by the Act of Indemnity, which his Majeſty had paſſed in that very year. He had counſel aſſigned him to the number of ſix; and amongſt theſe, was Mr. Mackenzie, afterwards the famous Sir George Mackenzie. On the 13th of February, he was brought before the Parliament, where he deſired leave to ſpeak before his indictment was read; which was refuſed him, as were alſo ſome other things, that in any caſe but his, would have been looked upon as matters of courſe (r). Theſe ſteps were probably taken to ſhorten the trial, which however was very long; for though no pains were ſpared to ſearch almoſt every ſhire in Scotland, to find out people to blacken his character, yet, when the matters came to be looked into, they turned to no account (s). At laſt, they were forced to fix upon his joining with the Engliſh, as the only ſpecies of treaſon that could affect him; and, in reference to this, the Earl of Loudon, ſo many years Chancellor, defended him with great warmth and eloquence (t). The Marquis himſelf ſaid, 'That what he had done, he was compelled to do by neceſſity, which being a thing 'above law, and which took place only where there was no law, ought, in the reaſon 'of things, to juſtify a man againſt law: That what he did, he did with a good intention, with a deſire to ſerve his Majeſty, and preſerve his ſubjects; and, that he bleſſed 'God, he had ſucceeded in both: That however, he had done no more than others 'did, even thoſe who were now his proſecutors and his judges. He adviſed them, 'therefore, to conſider how fatal a precedent they were about to eſtabliſh, with reſpect 'to themſelves and to their poſterity. A precedent, that making it impoſſible for any 'man to be thought innocent, who ſubmitted to a uſurpation, muſt neceſſarily take 'away from every man the deſire of over-turning a uſurpation, as that muſt have a 'tendency to his own deſtruction.' On the 29th of April, the Earls of Glencairne and Rothes, and Mr. James Sharpe, afterwards Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, were ſent up to Court to give an account of the proceedings (u). The Marquis alſo ſent up his ſon, Lord Niele Campbell, to act on his behalf; and it is ſaid, that the King wrote to his Commiſſioner, the Earl of Middleton, requiring him to preſs no acts of treaſon, but ſuch as happened after the year 1651, and not to proceed to ſentence before his Majeſty had reviſed the proceedings. With the former inſtruction the Commiſſioner complied, but pretended, that the latter manifeſted ſuch a diſtruſt of the Parliament (w), that he durſt not mention it. The depoſitions of abundance of people were taken, with reſpect to the Marquis's acting under, and owning, the government eſtabliſhed in Scotland in 1652. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that Monk ſent down his letters, that they came after the evidence was cloſed, but that the Lord Commiſſioner cauſed them to be read; upon which the Marquis's friends went out, perceiving there was then no room to ſerve him (x). I find nothing of this any where elſe; and though I very readily believe, that if Monk had any ſuch letters, he would have ſent them, and that they would have been read; yet, I think, there are good reaſons to eſteem this fact doubtful, if not falſe [H]. At laſt, upon the evidence, produced on May 3d, 7th, and the 8th, they pronounced

[H] To eſteem this fact doubtful, if not falſe.] It is very clear, that what Biſhop Burnet relates, concerning the tranſactions of theſe times, he muſt have received from other people, and that ſeveral years after: for at the time of the Marquis of Argyle's death, he could not be much above eighteen years old. We need not wonder, therefore, that in the circumſtances relating to great events, before thoſe times in which he came to have a ſhare in buſineſs, he might be miſinformed; for that is all, that either is or ought to be contended for on this occaſion. After giving us an account of a very learned ſpeech prepared by the Earl of Loudon, and which Crauford tells us, was ſpoken by him in juſtification of the Marquis, the Biſhop proceeds thus (38): 'But 'while it was very doubtful, how it would have 'gone, Monk by an inexcuſable baſeneſs had ſearched among his letters, and found ſome that were 'writ by Argyle to himſelf, that were hearty and 'zealous on their ſide. Theſe he ſent down to 'Scotland. And after they were read in Parliament, it could not be pretended, that his compliance was feigned or extorted from him. Every 'body blamed Monk for ſending theſe down, ſince 'it was betraying the confidence that they then lived in. They were ſent by an expreſs, and came 'to the Earl of Middleton after the Parliament was 'engaged in the debate. So he ordered the letters 'to be read. This was much blamed as contrary to 'the forms of juſtice, ſince probation was cloſed on 'both ſides. But the reading of them ſilenced all 'farther debate. All his friends went out: and he 'was condemned as guilty of treaſon. The Marquis 'of Montroſe only refuſed to vote. He owned he 'had too much reſentment to judge in that matter. 'It was deſigned he ſhould be hanged as the Marquis of Montroſe had been: but it was carried, that 'he ſhould be beheaded, and that his head ſhould 'be ſet up where Lord Montroſe's had been ſet.' It is evident from hence, that if our author's account of the matter be right, the Marquis of Argyle had nothing to complain of; for theſe letters ſent down by Monk fixed the fact ſo fully upon him, that even his friends gave up his defence, and withdrew. But the Marquis, when he received ſentence, as well as in the whole courſe of his defence, inſiſted, that he had complied no farther than other people had done who were then his judges; and the ſame thing he ſays in his ſpeech; and hence it is, that I am apt to believe, that there is ſome miſtake or miſapprehenſion in this matter; and that though Monk might give his aſſiſtance to ruin a man whoſe abilities he might fear, and whoſe influence he very well knew (39); yet he neither ſent down any ſuch letters, nor had any ſuch to ſend; and in ſupport of this opinion, I ſhall offer my reaſons. I. This matter was very narrowly looked into at the time it happened; has been very carefully reviewed ſince, and accounts of it have been given by perſons of oppoſite ſentiments, yet none of theſe mention Monk's letters. The great pronounced him guilty, after debates, which laſted many days; and on Saturday, May 25, they pronounced the following ſentence, That he ſhould be beheaded on the Monday following, at the Croſs of Edinburgh; that his head ſhould be ſet up, where the Marquis of Montroſe's formerly ſtood, and his coat of arms torn before the Parliament, and at the Croſs. He behaved on that occaſion, with great firmneſs and conſtancy, as well as much calmneſs and dignity. The ſentence being pronounced, he was going to ſpeak, but the trumpets ſounding, he ſtopped till that ſtrange ceremony was over; then lifting up his eyes, he ſaid, 'I had the honour to ſet the Crown upon the King's head, and 'now he haſtens me to a better crown than his own: then directing himſelf to the Com- 'miſſioner and Parliament, he added, You have the indemnity of an earthly King in your 'hands, and have denied me a ſhare in that; but you cannot hinder me from the in-'demnity of the King of Kings, and ſhortly you muſt come before his tribunal. I 'pray he mete not out ſuch meaſure to you as you have done to me, when you are 'called to an account for all your actions, and this amongſt the reſt.' He was conducted from the bar to the common goal of Edinburgh, where he remained to the time great Miniſters of thoſe times, and thoſe who were deepeſt in taking away the Marquis's life, removed, as far as they were able, all the minutes relating to his proceſs, which they would not have done, had he been convicted on the teſtimony of theſe letters; becauſe, the recording them had juſtified their proceedings (40). All things tending to juſtify the bringing the Marquis to a trial, condemning, and putting him to death, were carefully publiſhed in England, as Biſhop Kennet ſhows very largely; but nothing is ſaid of theſe letters (41). Sir George Mackenzie wrote a Vindication of the Government of King Charles II. in Scotland, in which he paſſes over entirely this whole tranſaction; which ſurely he would not have done, if it could have been ſo eaſily vindicated, as by tranſcribing theſe letters (42). Mr. Wodrow collected every thing he could meet with relating to this proceſs, and has preſerved names of the witneſſes that proved the Marquis's compliance, but he ſays nothing of Monk's letters; neither is there a ſyllable of them in the State Trials, excepting the tranſcribing this paſſage from Biſhop Burnet. II. It ſeems to be inconſiſtent with another part of the Biſhop's own account: for he ſays, the King inſtructed his Commiſſioner not to proceed to ſentence, or at leaſt to execution, till he had reviewed the proceedings (43); for which there had been no occaſion, if the King had known any thing of theſe letters, ſince what ſatisfied the Marquis's friends as to his guilt, would undoubtedly have ſatisfied his Majeſty alſo upon that ſubject. III. There are ſome circumſtances in the account this Prelate gives us of the Marquis, which may eaſily induce us to believe, that he might be miſled in regard to this ſtory. As for inſtance, he mentions his being upon ill terms with his ſon Lord Lorn, and having actually had thoughts of diſinheriting him (44). Under the uſurpation, it was neceſſary for the Marquis to diſclaim the conduct of Lord Lorn for his own ſafety and preſervation; but this never deceived the people in power (45); and therefore it is ſtrange, that it ſhould impoſe upon the Biſhop. In the Marquis's advice to his ſon, and to the reſt of his children, there is nothing that looks that way; and in the next article, we ſhall ſee, that Lord Lorn's zeal for his father, had like to have coſt him his own life, as the Marquis's coming to London on his ſon's letter, actually coſt him his. The Biſhop ſpeaks of an attempt made by the Marquis to make his eſcape out of the Caſtle; but he ſays, that fearing it might haſten his execution, his heart failed him (46). It is not eaſy to conceive, how this can be reconciled to the ſtory of Monk's letters. Before they came, the Biſhop tells us the affair was very doubtful; and in ſuch a ſituation, it is not probable the Marquis would attempt an eſcape. After ſentence was paſſed he never was in the Caſtle, and conſequently could have no opportunity of eſcaping from thence. It is however true, that he really intended an eſcape from the Caſtle, and was once in complete diſguiſe for that purpoſe; but laid aſide his deſign, becauſe he would not deſert the ſentiments which he had eſpouſed (47). He choſe rather to die like an honeſt man, than to draw an imputation of guilt upon his character by flight; but his conduct would have been abſurd, if his letters to Monk had proved him already guilty, or even if he knew ſuch letters had been in Monk's power. The Biſhop ſays expreſsly, that the Marquis wrote his letter to the King the day before his execution (48): the letter itſelf ſhews, that the Marquis wrote it that very day (49). It ſeems therefore poſſible, that the Biſhop having this account from ſome good hand, in his opinion, might ſet it down without conſidering it very carefully. IV. We have many things ſaid by Clarendon and Echard of the Marquis's correſpondence with Cromwell and Sir Henry Vane, though neither have vouchſafed us any proofs. On the other hand, Whitelock, and other writers on that ſide, give him quite another character, and repreſent him as a perſon always ſuſpected and dreaded. We have of late years had great diſcoveries made of the correſpondence under Cromwell's government; all which clearly proves, that the Marquis of Argyle was never conſidered in any other light than that of a concealed Royaliſt, as his ſon, the Lord Lorn, was a declared one (50). There is a letter of his to King Charles II. which I have ſeen, and is now in print, that proves he had a great correſpondence with King Charles I. and in which he tells the King, that no body could reſtore him but the Preſbyterians; which the King afterwards found to be true (51). V. Laſtly, It is ſo far from being a fact, that he had any cloſe connection with Monk in the management of affairs, while he governed Scotland, that I am able to prove he was his mortal enemy, and repreſented him in the blackeſt colours to both the Protectors. He accuſed him to Oliver as not deſerving the money that was paid him (52) as a debt, for maintaining the Scots troops in Ireland upon the credit of the public faith; and the following letter will fully ſhew, that he did not conſider his going up to Richard's Parliament as a compliance with that Government, but as an endeavour to overturn it. This letter is directed to Thurloe, and runs thus (53):

'My Lord,

'MY Lord Keeper and myſelf have done our 'beſt to get thoſe men choſen you have wrote 'for; but my Lord of Argyle, and ſome others 'whom my Lord Keeper will acquaint you with, 'have endeavoured all they can to get all Scotch-'men choſen. But, I doubt not, but there will be 'three choſen of thoſe five you ſent the names of; 'and I have taken care, that as many as come out 'of this country, ſhall be there with the firſt: and 'if the writs come in time, which I hope they will, 'they ſhall be all ſent to Dr. Clarges. The Mar-'quis of Argyle himſelf endeavours to be choſen, 'notwithſtanding he is Sheriff of Argyleſhire; 'neither do I gueſs he will do his Highneſs's in-'tereſt any good; but when my Lord Keeper comes 'up, he ſhall acquaint you with the buſineſs. 'Which is all at preſent from

[I] Than thoſe who brought him to that death.] There are ſome variations in the printed copies of the Marquis's ſpeech, which perhaps, may be owing to a deſire of giving an Engliſh turn to ſome of the Scotch expreſſions (54); but whoever peruſes it muſt confeſs, that it is grave and manly, and at the ſame time, loyal and pious. He gives a full and clear account of his actions, aſſerts the uprightneſs of his conduct and the ſincerity of his affection, both to King Charles I. and King Charles II. He owns and juſtifies his zeal for the religion in which he was bred, and with true Chriſtian charity forgives his enemies, and prays that God would forgive them. His laſt words immediately before he laid his head upon the block, were the vindication of his innocency from the crime of the King's death, in theſe words:

'Moſt Sacred Sovereign,

'I Doubt not but your Majeſty hath an account 'given you from others, of the iſſue of that 'ſtrange proceſs and indictment laid againſt me be'fore this can come to your Royal hands; of which, 'if I had been guilty according to the charge, I 'ſhould have eſteemed myſelf unworthy to breathe 'upon the earth, much leſs would I have preſumed 'to make any application to your Majeſty. But of 'all thoſe great crimes which have been charged up'on me, there hath nothing been proven, except a 'compliance with the prevalent uſurping rebels, af'ter they had ſubdued all your Majeſty's dominions, 'whereby, I was forced, with many others, to 'ſubmit unto their unlawful power and govern'ment, which was an epidemic diſeaſe and fault of 'the time.

'What meaſure ſoever I have met with, and what'ever malice or calumny hath been caſt upon me, 'yet it is inexpreſſible joy and comfort, under all 'theſe ſufferings, that I am found free and acquit 'of any acceſſion to that execrable murder committed 'againſt the life of your Royal Father, which (as I 'deſire a comfortable appearance before the Judge, 'both of the quick and the dead) my ſoul did ever 'abominate; for death, with the inward peace of 'my innocency, is much more acceptable to me, than 'life itſelf, with the leaſt ſtain of treachery.

'And now I am confident, that your Majeſty's 'diſpleaſure will be ſatisfied, and you will ſuffer my 'failings to be expiate with my life, which, with all 'humility and ſubmiſſion, I have yielded up; and in 'this ſmall period that remains of my life, no earth'ly thing ſhall be more cordially deſired by me, than 'your happineſs, and that your Majeſty and your 'ſucceſſors to all generations may ſway the Sceptre of 'theſe nations, and that they may be a bleſſed people 'under your government.

'And now, hoping that the humble ſupplication 'of your Majeſty's dying ſubject may find ſome place 'within the large extent of your princely goodneſs 'and clemency, I have taken the boldneſs to caſt 'the deſolate condition of my poor wife and family 'upon your Royal favour; for whatever may be 'your Majeſty's diſpleaſure againſt myſelf, theſe I 'hope have not done any thing to procure your Ma'jeſty's indignation. And ſince, that family have 'had the honour to be faithful ſubjects, and ſervice'able to your Royal progenitors, I humbly beg my 'faults may not extinguiſh the laſting merit and me'mory of thoſe who have given ſo many ſignal proofs 'of conſtant loyalty for many generations. Orphans 'and widows, by ſpecial prerogative and command 'from God, are put under your protection and de'fence, that you ſuffer them not to be wronged: 'they will owe their preſervation ſo entirely to your 'Majeſty's bounty and favour, that your coun'tenance, and nothing elſe that's human, can be a 'ſhield againſt their ruin.

'I ſhall add no more, only being addebted to 'ſeveral of your Majeſty's good ſubjects, and your 'Royal juſtice being the ſource and fountain of all 'equity, whereby, all your people are preſerved in 'their juſt rights and intereſts, I humbly beg, that 'none of them may ſuffer for my fault, but that you 'would allow them ſatisfaction and payment of 'what is juſtly owing unto them, of thoſe ſums and 'debts which are truly reſting to my ſon and me. 'And, as it is my ſerious and laſt deſire to my chil'dren and poſterity, next to their duty to Almighty 'God, that they may be faithful and ſerviceable to 'your Majeſty; ſo were I to enjoy this frail life any 'longer, I would endeavour before all the world, to 'evidence myſelf to be,

 [In Lord Clarendon's Continuation, there is a character of the Marquis of Argyle, which, being drawn up in the maſterly manner uſual with the noble Hiſtorian, we ſhall here inſert, though it is far from being ſo candid a delineation of the Marquis as is given by our ingenious predeceſſor.

'The Marquis of Argyle (without mentioning of 'whom there can hardly be any mention in Scotland) 'though he was not of this fraternity, yet thought 'he could tell as fair a ſtory for himſelf as any of the 'reſt, and contribute as much to the King's abſolute 'power in Scotland. And therefore he had no ſooner 'unqueſtionable notice of the King's being in London, 'but he made haſte thither with as much confidence 'as the reſt. But the Commiſſioners who were be'fore him wrought ſo far with the King, that in 'the very minute of his arrival he was arreſted by a 'warrant under the King's hand, and carried to the 'Tower, upon a charge of high treaſon.

'He was a man like Drances in Virgil,

'Largus opum, & linguâ melior, ſed frigida bello
'Dextera, conſiliis habitus non futilis auctor,

'Without doubt he was a perſon of extraordinary 'cunning, well bred; and though, by the ill-placing 'of his eyes, he did not appear with any great ad'vantage at firſt ſight, yet he reconciled even thoſe 'who had averſion to him very ſtrangely by a little 'converſation: inſomuch as after ſo many repeated 'indignities (to ſay no worſe) which he had put up'on the late King, and when he had continued the 'ſame affronts to the preſent King, by hindering the 'Scots from inviting him, and as long as was poſſible 'kept him from being received by them; when 'there was no remedy, and that he was actually land'ed, care that his proceſs ſhould not remain among the Parliament Regiſters. Sir George Mackenzie, who wrote a Vindication of the Government of Scotland during this reign, does not ſo much as mention the Marquis's proceſs, though, as his advocate, he had defended him with great learning and ſpirit. Nay, thoſe who paſſed the ſentence upon him did not think fit to ſign a dead warrant; ſo that in the letter of the law, as well as in the eye of reaſon, this could be accounted no better than a murder committed with much form (z). As the Lord High Commiſſioner diſobeyed his Majeſty's command in precipitating the death of the Marquis, ſo for this, and other acts of violence, he was quickly diſgraced. At his firſt appearance in the world he had ſerved the Parliament of England againſt his Prince; he afterwards deſerted that ſervice, and was employed in Scotland in a manner which prejudiced him againſt the Marquis of Argyle, and induced him to act as he did, equally againſt the laws of the land, and the inſtructions of his maſter (a). At that time his conduct was univerſally condemned, and the behaviour of the Marquis generally applauded, as indeed it deſerved; for in the whole courſe of his life he never changed his ſentiments, but died with the ſame religious and political principles which he had always profeſſed while he lived, and practiſed alſo from firſt to laſt.

'ed, no man paid him ſo much reverence and outward reſpect, and gave ſo good an example to all others, with what veneration their King ought to be treated, as the Marquis of Argyle did, and in a very ſhort time made himſelf agreeable and acceptable to him. His wit was pregnant, and his humour gay and pleaſant, except when he liked not the company or the argument. And though he never conſented to any one thing of moment, which the King aſked of him, and even in thoſe ſeaſons in which he was uſed with moſt rudeneſs by the clergy, and with ſome barbarity by his ſon the Lord Lorn, whom he had made Captain of his Majeſty's guard, to guard him from his friends, and from all who he deſired ſhould have acceſs to him; the Marquis ſtill had that addreſs, that he perſuaded him all was for the beſt. When the other faction prevailed, in which there were likewiſe crafty managers, and that his counſels were commonly rejected, he carried himſelf ſo, that they who hated him moſt were willing to compound with him, and that his Majeſty ſhould not withdraw his countenance from him. But he continued in all his charges, and had a very great party in that Parliament that was moſt devoted to ſerve the King; ſo that his Majeſty was often put to deſire his help to compaſs what he deſired. He did heartily oppoſe the King's marching with his army into England, the ill ſucceſs whereof made many men believe afterwards, that he had more reaſons for the counſels he gave, than they had who were of another opinion. And the King was ſo far from thinking him his enemy, that when it was privately propoſed to him by thoſe he truſted moſt, that he might be ſecured from doing hurt when the King was marched into England, ſince he was ſo much againſt it; his Majeſty would by no means conſent to it, but parted with him very graciouſly, as with one he expected good ſervice from. All which the Commiſſioners well remembered, and were very unwilling that he ſhould be again admitted into his preſence, to make his own excuſes for any thing he could be charged with. And his behaviour afterwards, and the good correſpondence he had kept with Cromwell, but eſpecially ſome confident averments of ſome particular words or actions which related to the murder of his father, prevailed with his Majeſty not to ſpeak with him, which he laboured by many addreſſes, in petitions to the King, and letters to ſome of thoſe who were truſted by him, which were often prevented by his wife and his ſon, and in which he only deſired "to ſpeak with the "King, or with ſome of thoſe Lords," pretending "that he ſhould inform and communicate ſomewhat "that would highly concern his Majeſty's ſervice." But the King not vouchſafing to admit him to his preſence, the Engliſh Lords had no mind to have any conference with a man who had ſo dark a character, or to meddle in an affair that muſt be examined and judged by the laws of Scotland: and ſo it was reſolved, that the Marquis of Argyle ſhould be ſent by ſea into Scotland, to be tried before the Parliament there when the Commiſſioner ſhould arrive, who was diſpatched thither with the reſt of the Lords, as ſoon as the ſeals and other badges of their ſeveral offices could be prepared (56).'

(56) Clarendon's Continuation, vol. ii. p. 99—101.

'As ſoon as the Parliament was convened at Edinburgh, and the Commiſſioner found the temper of them to be ſuch as he could wiſh, the Marquis of Argyle, (who had been ſent by ſea from the Tower of London to Leith) was brought to his trial upon many articles of treaſon and murder; wherein all his confederacies with Cromwell were laid open, and much inſiſted upon to prove his being privy to the reſolution of taking the King's life, and adviſing it: and though there was great reaſon to ſuſpect it, and moſt men believed it, the proofs were not clear enough to convict him. But then the evidence was ſo full and clear of ſo many horrid murders committed by his order upon perſons in his diſpleaſure, and his immediate poſſeſſing himſelf of their eſtates, and other monſtrous and unheard of acts of oppreſſion; that the Parliament condemned him to be hanged upon a gallows of an unuſual height, and in or near the place where he had cauſed the Marquis of Montroſe to be formerly executed: all which was performed the ſame day, with the univerſal joy of the people; the unfortunate perſon himſelf ſhewing more reſolution and courage than was expected from him; and expreſſing much affection and zeal for the Covenant, for which he deſired all men ſhould believe he was put to death (57).'

(57) Ibid. p. 403, 404.

The Earl of Clarendon's aſſertion, that the Marquis of Argyle was executed with the univerſal joy of the people, cannot poſſibly be true. Out of the vaſt multitudes of Scotchmen who were zealouſly devoted to the Preſbyterian form of Church Government, many, if not moſt of them, would undoubtedly behold the execution of ſo illuſtrious a ſupporter of it with the greateſt grief and concern.

Mr. Hume characterizes the Marquis of Argyle as a man equally ſupple and inflexible, cautious and determined, and entirely qualified to make a figure during a factious and turbulent period (58).

Mr. Walpole, in his 'Royal and Noble Authors,' has aſſigned a place to the Marquis, on account of two pieces written by him, which are mentioned in the Catalogue of the Harleian Library. Their titles are as follows: "Marquis of Argyle his In-"ſtructions to a Son," 1661. "His Defences "againſt the Grand Indictment of High Treaſon," 1661. It is obſervable, ſays Mr. Walpole, that this Lord quarrelled both with his father and his ſon (59).] K.

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD), Earl of Argyle, ſon to the former, and himſelf one of the worthieſt Noblemen, and one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Patriots of the age in which he lived. He was educated under his father's eye in the true principles of loyalty and of the Chriſtian Religion (a), and came to be very early diſtinguiſhed in the world by his perſonal merit, as well as by his titles and the high rank he held in his country. When King Charles II. was invited home to receive the Crown of his ancient and hereditary kingdom in 1650, he was conſtituted Colonel of his Majeſty's Footguards, in which there happened ſomething very particular: for whereas all commiſſions were then granted by the Parliament of Scotland, and they affected a kind of ſovereign authority, the Lord Lorn refuſed to act without a commiſſion from the King; which was accordingly granted him (b). In this command he ſerved with great bravery at the battle of Dunbar, where his regiment ſuffered exceedingly (c); and he continued in this command ſo long as his Majeſty remained in Scotland, behaving himſelf with ſuch tenderneſs and affection, as well as fidelity and duty, to that Prince, as gained him a high place in his favour; more eſpecially as he was always ready to obey his maſter's commands, and did every thing to alleviate that conſtraint, which, from the rigid ſeverity of the Clergy, his Majeſty was for ſome time under (d). Neither was his zeal for the King's ſervice at all abated by the fatal defeat at Worceſter: on the contrary, he remained in arms, kept up a party in the Highlands, joined readily with the moſt inveterate enemies of his family for the King's ſervice, even though he found himſelf very ill uſed by them, and more than one attempt was made to impriſon him (e). But neither the hardſhips he went through, nor the treachery to which he was expoſed, could induce him to quit the Royal cauſe; and the teſtimonies of favour he had received from his Majeſty, made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion on his mind, that he continued active when the King's affairs were deſperate, until he brought his own into the ſame condition (f). This conduct made him ſo obnoxious to Cromwell, that there was no perſon in Scotland whom he purſued with greater animoſity, as appears by his excepting him out of his general pardon, in 1654 (g). Yet, even this, did not at all diſcourage him, or prevail upon him to deſiſt from giving that Uſurper all the trouble that was in his power, till he received General Middleton's orders, by the King's authority, to capitulate, which were dated December 31, 1655 (h). He then ſubmitted to live quietly and peaceably, but never owned either Oliver or Richard's government, but remained obnoxious to thoſe ſort of men who derived their power from them ſo long as it continued (i): of all which, many and inconteſtable proofs might be given, if the nature of this work would allow us to enlarge upon the ſubject [A]. [A] To enlarge upon the ſubject.] It is very much to be regretted, that a ſincere deſire of diſcovering truth does not prevail as much in the world, as that ſpirit of curioſity which ſometimes wears the appearance of it. If ſuch a deſire could be excited, it would certainly engage lovers of Engliſh Hiſtory to prefer the knowledge of facts to the florid repreſentation of them; as this again would engage others to labour for their ſatisfaction, and to make it their buſineſs to deſcribe the real characters of great men from their actions, and not truſt to ſuch draughts of them as are given by authors, guided rather by fancy than by authority, and who at beſt give us only their conceptions of men for what ought to be thought of them. The noble Hiſtorian is pleaſed to ſpeak of the Lord Lorn's commanding the King's guard (1), as if it had been a truſt committed to him by his father, and that the King was rather delivered to his cuſtody, than had in him a faithful officer and an obedient ſervant. Mr. Echard follows, or rather copies, this account (2), which is entirely inconſiſtent with that we have given in the text, as it is with Biſhop Burnet's relation, that the Lord Lorn (3) won upon his Majeſty by the ſmoothneſs of his behaviour, and by admitting whomſoever the King deſired to his preſence. Moſt certainly his Lordſhip behaved all the time the King was in Scotland with great zeal and duty; and he preſerved the ſame diſpoſition during the whole time of his Majeſty's being abroad; of which it may not be amiſs to add ſome particular inſtances here. He was in the Iſles in 1653, where he had a difference with Glengary, which might be probably owing to the feuds between their families; but this did not however hinder him from aſſiſting that Highland Chief in the King's quarrel (4). In the year following, notwithſtanding the ſeeming difference between him and his father the Marquis of Argyle, he brought a body of near one thouſand men into the field, and joined the Earl of Glencairne (5). That noble Lord, as Biſhop Burnet tells us, had a notion of becoming another Montroſe (6); and he ſeems to have had as ſtrong an averſion to the houſe of Argyle: for he firſt took from Lord Lorn a regiment of foot he had raiſed, and gave him a troop of horſe; afterwards he took away that troop of horſe; and laſtly, out of mere partiality and private pique, would have ſecured his perſon, if he had not made his eſcape (7), which ruined this deſign for the King's ſervice, at a time, when, as the Oliverians themſelves confeſs, they had a great probability of aſſembling a very numerous army (8). Yet the King was ſo well ſatisfied of Lord Lorn's fidelity, and was ſo deſirous to free him from theſe diſcouragements, that he ſent him a commiſſion to be Lieutenant-General (9); of which, as of moſt other of his Majeſty's meaſures, Cromwell had ſo good an account, that it was very probably one reaſon for his excepting Lord Lorn out of his pardon. That pardon I have ſeen as it paſſed in his Parliament, April 12, 1654 (10), and in it is excepted the Queen-Dowager, the King, the Duke of York, the two Dukes of Hamilton, both dead, the Earl of Crawford and Lindſey, the Earl of Callander, the Earl Marſhal, the Earl of Kelly, the Earl of Lauderdale, the Earl of Loudon, the Earl of Seaforth, the Earl of Athol, Viſcount Kenmure, Lord Lorn, Lord Mackling, ſon to the Earl of Loudon, the Earl of Glencairne, and many others. Towards the end of that year, Lord Lorn was ſo diſtreſſed, that he retired to an iſland with only four or five perſons about him (11); whence it appears, that he did not ſubmit, till he was no longer in a condition of oppoſing. But his ſubmiſſion did not exempt him, either from ſuſpicions or hardſhips, as appears from an information againſt him in September 1655, by the Lord Broghill (12); and by another letter of Monk's in November following, in which he ſays, that he had taken ſecurity for his peaceable behaviour, as good

Reſtoration, he came up to London to congratulate him, and brought with him a letter from his father, containing aſſurances of his duty; which the King received in ſuch manner, as gave that unfortunate Nobleman thoſe hopes, which proved the cauſe of his deſtruction (k). All the time of his father's proſecution, Lord Lorn remained at Court, and laboured indefatigably to do him ſervice; and though this inſtance of filial piety ought certainly to have endeared him to all ranks of men, yet ſuch was the ſtrange diſpoſition of thoſe times, that it ſerved only to ſharpen the edge of their reſentments who were enemies to his family, and laboured the deſtruction of it, that they might raiſe their own (l). Theſe men, who were ready to take any advantage, and were not either afraid or aſhamed to commit any act of violence neceſſary to ſerve their purpoſes, though the Royal authority was ever ſo much proſtituted, or the conſtitution of their country ever ſo much weakened thereby, ventured upon ſuch a ſtep to remove this noble and innocent perſon, as will appear to be full as ſingular, as it was iniquitous and cruel. Lord Lorn had diſcovered that theſe people had, by the baſeſt intrigues and blackeſt calumnies, hindered his Majeſty from extending to him his Royal favour, as he was naturally inclined; and having by the aſſiſtance of the Earl of Berkſhire convinced the Earl of Clarendon, upon whom they chiefly depended, of the injuries and injuſtice that was done him, he thought fit to communicate the ſucceſs that attended his endeavours to his friend the Lord Duffus by a letter (m). This letter was intercepted and carried to the Earl of Middleton, who finding his own and his friends views entirely diſconcerted, exhibited the letter to the Parliament of Scotland as a libel upon their proceedings, and projected thereupon a new method of bringing things round again, by taking his Lordſhip's life, as he had done his father's (n). The Parliament of Scotland at that time, wholly at his devotion, concurred in this ſcheme; and June 24, 1662, ſent up a repreſentation to the King, ſetting forth, that the eldeſt ſon of the late Marquis of Argyle, had both ſpoken and written againſt their authority, and requeſted that he might be ſent down to ſtand his trial (o). The King, upon reading the letter, on which this accuſation was founded, acknowledged it to be indiſcreet, but thought there was nothing criminal in it; which induced him to comply with their requeſt, and to lay his commands upon Lord Lorn to go down to Edinburgh; which he did; and on the very day of his arrival, which was July 17, he appeared in Parliament, and made a handſome ſpeech in his own juſtification; notwithſtanding which, he was immediately committed cloſe priſoner to the Caſtle, and a proceſs commenced againſt him, for what in the Scotch laws is ſtiled leaſing-making, that is, for creating diſſention between the King and his ſubjects, by giving the former falſe and lying informations (p). Lord Lorn inſiſted in his own defence, that there was nothing in his letter of that nature; that he ſpoke only of his juſtifying himſelf againſt lies that had been told the King to his prejudice, but had accuſed no body, or pretended to have grounds for accuſing any. But thoſe he had to do with ſhowed very little regard to his defence; for on the 26th of Auguſt following, they cendemned him to loſe his head, and to forfeit all his eſtate: but they were ſo merciful, as to leave the day of his execution to the King's plea-as could be had in Scotland, to the amount of five thouſand pounds; and adds, that conſidering the very ill uſage he had received from the King's friends, he apprehended he would not be very ready to ſtir again (13). But it appears by an examination taken at the cloſe of the ſame year, that the King had ſtill as great a confidence in him as in any man in that kingdom (14). In 1656, Lord Broghill gave freſh informations againſt him in the month of May (15); and in Auguſt, Lockhart, who was Cromwell's Miniſter in France, charged Lord Fairfax and Lord Lorn with being engaged in new deſigns for the King's ſervice (16); of which, about the ſame time, Lord Broghill gave ample accounts, and adds alſo ſome very odd inſtances of his own watchings over Lord Lorn's conduct, and corrupting perſons in his ſervice (17). In the ſpring of the year 1657, General Monk thought fit to commit Lord Lorn to priſon, which was a very uſual thing whenever any ſtirs were apprehended in Scotland (18). But Lord Broghill did not think even this enough, and therefore he recommended the bringing him priſoner into England (19). Thus it very plainly appears, that if ſuffering be a proof of loyalty, no man's loyalty had better and more frequent teſtimonies to ſupport it than Lord Lorn's. But this is not all: in one of his impriſonments an accident befel him, which brought him to the very brink of the grave. It was a cuſtom then, as indeed it ſtill is in Scotland, more eſpecially in cold weather, for the ſoldiers to play at what they call long-bullets; and while the guards were thus employed, a bullet thrown with all the force a man's arm could give it, glanced from a ſtone and ſtruck the Lord Lorn on the head, by which his ſcull was terribly fractured, ſo that he was forced to undergo the hazardous operation of the trepan, from which it was thought a miracle that he recovered (20). After all this, there is no great reaſon to wonder, that his Lordſhip ſhould expect to be welcome to King Charles II. upon his Reſtoration, or that he might preſume on his having ſome influence in favour of his father, if the Marquis of Argyle's conduct had ſtood in any need of it more than many others, who had not only ſubmitted to the uſurpers, but had laboured to eſtabliſh their authority, and expreſſed the higheſt diſreſpect towards the King, who yet found ways and means afterwards to obtain a large ſhare in his favour; while thoſe who had ſerved him from principles of conſcience, in the way that their conſcience would allow, were treated with relentleſs ſeverity, or rather were delivered up to the fury of their enemies. For it is moſt certain, that the Marquis of Argyle's death was brought about, and his ſon's was very near being brought about, by a faction, which abuſed the King's authority, not only contrary to his inclination, but in expreſs repugnance to his inſtructions (21); ſo that hardly ſuch a ſcene of violence, under ſanction of law, and covered by the approbation of a Parliament, ever appeared in any country, as there did in Scotland for the two years that ſucceeded the King's Reſtoration, when the Earls of Middleton and Glencairne were at the head of the adminiſtration, which they managed entirely for the ſervice of their private intereſts, and the gratifications of their reſentments.

ſure (q), which, yet perhaps they had not done, if his Majeſty, by his letter to the Earl of Middleton, had not poſitively commanded him not to proceed to any ſentence whatever; for he had no conception that any ſet of men would have turned ſo ſlight a thing into a capital offence without his approbation and conſent. When this news came to England, it filled the Court with aſtoniſhment, and the Earl of Clarendon was the firſt perſon to declare, that if the King ſuffered ſuch a precedent to take place, he would get out of his dominions as faſt as his gout would let him (r). Yet his Lordſhip ſuffered a long and ſevere impriſonment, for he was not diſcharged out of the Caſtle till the 4th of June 1663, after the Earl of Middleton had loſt his power, and his own friends were come into favour (s). Soon after he was reſtored to his grandfather's title and eſtate, and part of his father's was ordered to be ſold for the payment of debts (t). The King having once taken this ſtep, returned to his natural inclination for a perſon in whom he had formerly ſo entire a confidence; and as a farther mark of his favour, was pleaſed to order that he ſhould be ſworn a Privy-Counſellor (u). In this capacity he was a great ſupport to the Earl of Lauderdale, ſo long as his adminiſtration was carried on with any kind of temper or diſcretion; but he never concurred in any of his violences, but on the contrary, ſtudied all he could to ſoften, if not prevent them (w). The principles of both Earls were very nearly alike: the only difference was, that the Earl of Argyle acted as cloſely to his as poſſible, whereas the conduct of the Earl of Lauderdale was directly oppoſite to his ſentiments. He made it his buſineſs to carry the prerogative high, becauſe he had the ſole power of directing it; and he maintained the Biſhops in Scotland with a high hand, though a rigid Preſbyterian in his heart, becauſe he thought this neceſſary to ſuſtain his influence at Court (x). It is inconceivable what troubles this created in Scotland, where Dr. Sharp, Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, was in a manner at the head of the domeſtic adminiſtration, who had much of Laud's ſpirit, only he had better parts, with regard to his public character. This management drove the zealous Preſbyterians in 1666 into a rebellion in the Weſt, upon which the Earl of Argyle, to ſhow his loyalty, raiſed fifteen hundred men, but the Archbiſhop took care they ſhould not be employed; and the rebels being defeated by the King's regular troops on the 27th of November the ſame year, many were executed for this weak and fooliſh inſurrection, and many more had been executed if the King had not interpoſed, and poſitively commanded that ſuch as would promiſe to live quietly, ſhould not only be ſpared, but be ſet at liberty (y). The adminiſtration proceeded afterwards with ſtill greater violence; and Lauderdale, who was now created a Duke, began to forſake his old friends, who were not inclined to go all the lengths he would have them. Amongſt theſe was the Earl of Argyle, who, though he loſt the confidence of the Miniſter for ſome time, yet was known to ſtand ſo well with the King, and had ſuch an intereſt in his country, that it was not thought proper to remove him, either from the Board as a Privy-Counſellor, or from his place as one of the Lords of the Treaſury (z). In 1678, things came to a great criſis: the weſtern part of the kingdom was grown univerſally diſaffected; and to root out this bad diſpoſition, the Duke of Lauderdale contrived, or at leaſt conſented, to an odd remedy, which was bringing down the Highlanders upon them. This had ſuch dreadful effects, that ſome who had been hitherto his friends, could not help complaining of it, and even ſuggeſting, that they would carry their complaints to the throne; upon which a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding men of quality to go out of the kingdom without licence: but notwithſtanding this, the Earls of Athol and Perth, who were both Privy-Counſellors, went up to London to ſet forth their grievances; where, however, they were but indifferently received, though the King took a reſolution to put the government of that kingdom into other hands (a). In the midſt of all theſe diſturbances, the Earl of Argyle maintained his wonted moderation: he ſent no troops to the Highland army, nor did he join in attacking the Miniſtry. Public affairs being in a great confuſion in England, his Majeſty thought fit to ſend his brother, the Duke of York, in 1681, down to Scotland; where, upon his firſt arrival, he behaved with ſuch mildneſs and modeſty, with ſo good a temper, and with ſo much moderation, that the Nobility were extremely pleaſed, and the greateſt part of the nation perfectly ſatisfied (b). His Royal Highneſs was particularly obliging to the Earl of Argyle: he was well acquainted with the great power he had, ſaw the general eſteem he was in, and from thence formed ſuch a notion of his influence, that there is but too much reaſon to believe, he took a reſolution, either to delude or to deſtroy him (c). In order to this, he took pains to ſift him on ſeveral heads, but chiefly with reſpect to the government in Scotland, and the part he would take, in caſe the King was either inclined to, or forced upon an Act of Excluſion. The Earl anſwered him candidly and fairly: he gave him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his ſervice, ſo long as the Proteſtant Religion was not ſtruck at: if any ſuch thing ſhould happen, he frankly declared he would oppoſe him. On the other hand, he intimated, that his duty to the King was entire, and ſhould be ſo to him, when he became ſo; but till that happened, he would always adhere to his Royal Maſter (d). The Duke, upon this, grew cold towards him, but was ſtill as civil, or rather rather more civil than ever. Upon the opening of the Parliament, two laws were propoſed; the firſt, for confirming thoſe in being againſt Popery; the ſecond, making it High-Treaſon to propoſe any alteration in the ſucceſſion: the former, was intended to pleaſe the people; the latter, for the ſecurity of his Royal Highneſs (e). In the firſt the Earl concurred, as might well be expected; but he went into the latter, with a warmth ſomewhat unuſual to him; and many thought, that this would have perfectly eſtabliſhed him with the Duke, who ſpoke of his conduct on that occaſion, in terms of the higheſt gratitude and reſpect (f). There was a third Act paſſed for eſtabliſhing a teſt, by which all who were in employment, or ſhould be ſo, were obliged to take an oath, not to attempt any change in the conſtitution of Church or State. What the real intention and deſign of this law was, is very hard to ſay; but certain it is, that it became the occaſion of much diſcontent and confuſion. The Earl of Argyle oppoſed it in Parliament, where he behaved himſelf with the greateſt ſteadineſs and conſtancy, though he could not help ſeeing that very deep and dangerous deſigns were formed againſt him (g) [B]. After the law was paſſed, many of the Nobility expreſſed their ſcruples about the oath; others, abſolutely refuſed it; and the Marquis of Queenſbury would not take it without an explanation. The Earl of Argyle thought the ſame thing neceſſary; and being ſummoned to take the oath as a Privy-Counſellor, he drew up a ſhort explanation, which he ſent to the Duke of York for his approbation; and having received it, gave it as his ſenſe of the oath, November 3, 1681, when he took and ſigned it as a Privy-Counſellor (h). The Privy-Council themſelves explained the oath that very day, in terms not very different from Argyle's. He took his ſeat at the board afterwards, and his Royal Highneſs ſeemed very well pleaſed with him, and ſpoke more kindly than he had done for ſome time before. The next day, the Earl was ſummoned to take the oath again as a Commiſſioner of the Treaſury, where he offered the ſame explanation, when he was deſired to ſign it, which he refuſed to do (i). The next day, he went to wait upon the Duke, who appeared diſpleaſed, and deſired him not to go out of town: the ſame command was repeated by the Privy-Council, and the term fixed to their next meeting, which was on the eighth. They then ſent up a complaint of the Earl's explanation to the King; and the ſame day ordered the Earl to ſurrender himſelf priſoner to the Caſtle of Edinburgh; which he did (k). In the next place, without ſtaying for his Majeſty's anſwer, they commenced a proſecution, at firſt, as it ſeems, for a high miſdemeanour; but ſoon after, they changed their reſolution, and cauſed him to be indicted before the Juſticiary for high-treaſon (l). At this time, ſome perſons having repreſented to the Duke, that it would look ſtrange to take away ſo great a man's life and fortune, upon ſuch a pretence; he anſwered as in a ſurprize, Life and fortune! God forbid (m)! What he meant by this is very uncertain, nor is it poſſible to diſcover, whether he made others his tools to deſtroy this noble perſon, or whether thoſe who meant to deſtroy the Earl made him theirs (n). However it was, the proſecution was driven on with the moſt indecent fury, and notwithſtanding the general exclamation it occaſioned, the Earl was brought to his trial on the twelfth of December, where, notwithſtanding his own and Sir George Lockhart's moſt admirable ſpeeches, he was found guilty, to the eternal reproach of all who had any concern in that moſt infamous mockery of juſtice (o) [C]. [B] Were formed againſt him.] In the debating of the Teſt Act, the Earl of Argyle oppoſed the proviſo for exempting the lawful brothers and ſons of the reigning King, from taking the oath preſcribed thereby, which, as the Biſhop of Edinburgh told him, provoked his Royal Highneſs extremely (22). The pretence of falling upon him was, to deprive him of his heretable offices, in which he had been twice confirmed by Parliament; and to this purpoſe, two attempts were made in that Seſſion, but without effect (23). It was given out, that nothing more was intended by this capital proſecution, than to force him to ſurrender them: but this was probably contrived to amuſe the King; and granting it to be true, is the cleareſt proof of the wickedneſs of the whoſe proceeding (24).

[C] In that moſt infamous mockery of juſtice.] In order to have a due conception of the manner in which this affair was carried on in as narrow compaſs as it is poſſible, it is neceſſary to ſee the Earl's explanation, made before his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, and the whole Privy-Council: it was in theſe words (25):

(25) State Trials, vol. iii. p. 442.

'I have conſidered the teſt, and I am very deſirous to give obedience as far as I can. I am confident, the Parliament never intended to impoſe contradictory oaths; therefore, I think no man can explain it, but for himſelf. Accordingly, I take it, as far as it is conſiſtent with itſelf and the Proteſtant Religion. And I do declare, that I mean not to bind up myſelf in my ſtation, and in a lawful way, to wiſh and endeavour any alteration, I think, to the advantage of Church and State, nor repugnant to the Proteſtant Religion and my loyalty. And this, I underſtand, as a part of my oath.'

It is very remarkable, that Queenſbury, who was then Lord Juſtice General of Scotland, and who preſided in the Judicature, before which the Earl of Argyle was tried for High-Treaſon, had himſelf ſcrupled the teſt, and had explained himſelf preciſely to the ſame purpoſe, before he would take it (26). It was no wonder, therefore, that he was unwilling to give his caſting vote againſt the Earl, as to the relevancy of the libel; and therefore, two of the Judges, men of very fair characters, and firmly attached to the Court, declaring directly againſt the legality of the indictment, as two other Lords of very different characters were for it; it was found neceſſary, to call the old Lord Nairn out of his bed, who was ſo deaf, that he could hear little of it, and ſo infirm, that he could not ſit the cauſe out, who joining the other two Lords, this difficulty was got over (27). The Aſſize or Jury that paſſed upon the Earl, were the perſons following. The Marquis of Montroſe, Earl of Middleton, Earl of Airlie, Earl of Perth, this, wrote for the King's leave to proceed to ſentence, of which the Earl having private intelligence, ſent up a gentleman to Court, in order to procure him the beſt account he could of the King's diſpoſition (p). Before he could have any return from this meſſenger, his Lordſhip received many notices from his friends in Scotland, of circumſtances no way favourable: ſuch as, that the Duke refuſed to hear any interceſſion; that few of his friends had any farther credit with his Royal Highneſs; and that orders were given for preparing rooms for him in the common goal, to which Noblemen were ſometimes removed a few days before their execution (q). Theſe notices induced him to think of his eſcape, and of contriving the means of it; but he was not abſolutely fixed in his reſolution till the twentieth of December, when he had letters from London, that did not give him any great hopes of the King's being unalterable in his deſire of ſaving him; and as he was apprehenſive of being removed the very next day, he reſolved not to delay his eſcape a moment. Accordingly, about eight o'clock at night, not without ſome difficulty, he got out of the caſtle, and in a few days ſafely out of Scotland into the South of England, and from thence to London (r). Upon receiving the King's letter of permiſſion, the Council thought fit to direct, that ſentence ſhould be publicly proclaimed at the Croſs, notwithſtanding the Earl's abſence, and the application of the Counteſs of Argyle upon that account. The ſentence was accordingly publiſhed, and his arms torn at the Croſs of Edinburgh, as if he had been in open rebellion, and had fled from juſtice (s). While the Earl was at London, he was not ſo cautious in concealing himſelf as might have been expected; ſo that the Court had frequent accounts of him, of which no great notice was taken. It is certain that the King had a very good opinion of him, and diſcouraged all ſearch after him. A perſon who thought he had done a mighty thing, put into his Majeſty's hand a note, ſignifying that the Earl of Argyle might be eaſily found. The King tore it with ſome indignation, ſaying, Poh, poh, hunt a hunted partridge, for ſhame (t)! As ſoon as he had an opportunity, the Earl went over to Holland, where he continued during the remaining part of that reign. Upon the acceſſion of King James, many of the gentlemen of Scotland, that had been obliged to fly their native country, by the violent proceedings of the perſons entruſted with power there, began to preſs the Earl of Argyle to make ſome attempt upon that kingdom; which he might the more probably be inclined to do, becauſe he looked upon his attainder to have diſſolved entirely all the obligations he was under as a ſubject. Beſides, he conſidered the government in Scotland as unſettled, the King not having as yet taken the coronation oath; and therefore he thought himſelf at liberty to make ſome attempt, for recovering the conſtitution by force of arms (u). He concerted his deſign with the Duke of Monmouth, who was at the ſame time to try what impreſſion he could make in England; but he promiſed the Earl of Argyle that he would not declare himſelf King, which however he did, and this proved very prejudicial to them both (w). The Earl carried on his preparations with great ſecrecy, and bought up arms in the name of a perſon who was an agent for the State of Venice; but his ſtock did not go any great way, and the number of perſons he carried over was far from being conſiderable. He ſailed North about, and had a very ſafe voyage; but ſending a boat aſhore to the Orkneys, and being obliged to leave her by the winds changing, the government had very early intelligence at Edinburgh of his being at ſea; upon which orders were immediately ſent for ſecuring ſuch gentlemen in Argyleſhire, as were ſuſpected by them (x). By this precaution, the Earl's deſign was, in a manner, ruined; for he looked upon it, that after his landing, he ſhould very ſoon be five thouſand ſtrong; whereas, he was never able to collect above half that number; and even theſe, were not all of them determined: for the face of things, and the temper of men's minds, were by this time

Perth, Earl of Dalhouſie, Earl of Roxburgh, Earl of Dumfries, Earl of Linlithgow, Lord of Lindores, Lord Sinclair, Lord Bruntiſland, Laird of Gosford, Laird of Claverhouſe, Laird of Balnamon, Laird of Park-Gordon. The verdict they gave was as follows. 'The Aſſize, having elected and choſen the Marquis 'of Montroſe to be their Chancellor (equivalent to 'our Foreman) they all in one voice find the Earl of 'Argyle guilty, and culpable of the crimes of 'treaſon, leaſing-making and leaſing-telling; and 'find by plurality of votes, the ſaid Earl innocent, 'and not guilty of Perjury (28).' The latter part of the verdict was intended to qualify the former, and to give the world ſome notion of the probity and fair dealing of this Jury, who would not find the Earl guilty in the lump, of High-Treaſon and Perjury both. There was, however, nothing due to them; for the Lords of the Juſticiary had before determined, that the Earl having propoſed his declaration previous to his taking the oath, could not be guilty of Perjury (29). The whole of this buſineſs was diſpatched at one ſitting December 12, 1681, and the verdict given in after ten o'clock at night, without ſo much as calling upon the Earl, or hearing him in his own defence, after the evidence produced, which he expected, and had prepared a long ſpeech for the occaſion (30). It has been pretended, that the Earl was frighted into his eſcape, by thoſe, who, though they wanted not good will, durſt not have executed this ſentence, if he had ſtaid: but there is little reaſon to believe this, ſince, upon the King's letter to allow their publiſhing their ſentence, but requiring them to ſtay the execution of any part of it, till his pleaſure was known; they not only proclaimed the ſentence at the Croſs, December 23, 1681, but alſo cauſed the Earl's Coat of Arms to be torn, which was part of their ſentence, and an illegal part (31) of it too; ſo that they executed it to the utmoſt of their power, and in direct diſobedience to the King's command. It was upon this ſentence, that by King James IId's expreſs command, the Earl afterwards ſuffered (32).

very much changed, the ſeverity of the government having frighted ſome, and diſpirited all; ſo that thoſe who joined him, were far from having the courage and alacrity that he expected. He had ſtill hopes of increaſing his body of men; and this led him into Kintyre; but his endeavours were ineffectual (y). On the 27th of May, he came with his forces, which were not above fifteen hundred men, to the Tarbet; and there he publiſhed his Declaration. His own intention was, to have marched from thence to Inverary; but the principal perſons about him differing from him in opinion, his meaſures were diſconcerted, and ſoon after all things fell into confuſion; and he endeavouring to make his eſcape, was taken by five country fellows, who carried him priſoner to Glaſgow; from whence, on the 20th of June, an order came for carrying him up to Edinburgh; where it was very ſoon reſolved to put him to death upon his former ſentence; and he was accordingly beheaded, June 30, 1685 (z). He ſhowed great calmneſs, conſtancy and courage, under his misfortunes: he eat his dinner the day of his death very chearfully; and, according to his cuſtom, ſlept after it a quarter of an hour, or more, very ſoundly. At the place of execution, he made a ſhort, grave, and religious ſpeech; and after declaring ſolemnly, that he forgave all his enemies, he ſubmitted to death, with as much firmneſs and compoſure of mind, as ever man did (a). [D] The reader will find in the notes.] It is aſſerted, that this noble perſon wrote theſe lines that follow, upon the day before his execution; ſo that, in that light, they may be conſidered, as a very ſtrong inſtance of the quiet of his conſcience, and of the ſerenity of his mind. But beſides this, they may be read to another end; for in them, we ſee plainly his ſentiments of the cauſe in which he died, and that to his very laſt moment, he remained perſuaded, that he had done nothing contrary to the laws of his country, or conſequently to the laws of God. For it appears, as well from theſe verſes, as from his declaration, that the Earl of Argyle did not look on himſelf as a rebel, or upon the perſon he oppoſed as a King. His opinion was, that the Royal authority and the Conſtitution went together; and that the violation of the latter, took away the former; ſo that the allegiance of the ſubject was no longer due to the Prince, than as he continued to him that protection ſtipulated by the Conſtitution. Biſhop Burnet, in his account of the Earl's expedition (33), repreſents the miſcarriage of it as owing to his aſſuming too much power. Mr. Wodrow has ſhown, that it was really brought about by his not having power enough (34); and that this was the Earl's own ſentiment, the following lines moſt clearly diſcover, which are ſtill to be ſeen on his monument, in the Gray-Friers church-yard, at Edinburgh.

[The Earl of Clarendon, who was much diſpleaſed with the favour which King Charles the Second ſhewed to Lord Lorn, in reſtoring him to the eſtate and honours of his family, gives the following relation of that event, aſcribing it to the influence of the Earl of Lauderdale:

'The Marquis of Argyle had been a man univerſally odious to the whole nation, ſome Miniſters and Preachers excepted: And there had been always thought to have been an implacable animoſity from Lautherdale towards him; and after the King's return no man had appeared more againſt him, nor more inſiſted upon his not being admitted to his Majeſty's preſence, or for his being ſent into Scotland to be tried. Yet after all this it was diſcovered, that he had interpoſed all he could with his Majeſty to ſave him, and employed all his intereſt in Scotland to the ſame purpoſe. And the Marquis was no ſooner executed, but the Earl of Lautherdale had prevailed with the King immediately to give his ſon the Lord Lorn (who had remained in London to ſolicit on his father's behalf) leave to kiſs his hand, and to create him Earl of Argyle, and to confer on him the office of General Juſtice in the Highlands, by which his father had been qualified to do moſt of the wickedneſſes he had committed; all which the Parliament of Scotland ſhould have treated as the moſt ſenſible affront to them that they could undergo.

'It was well known that this young man, who was Captain of the King's Guard when he was in Scotland, had treated his Majeſty with that rudeneſs and barbarity, that he was much more odious to him than his father; and in all the letters which Lautherdale had found opportunity to write, whilſt he was a priſoner in England, to the King when he was beyond the ſeas, he inveighed equally againſt the Prince of Orange, was admitted into the Convention, as Earl of Argyle, though his father's attainder was not reverſed; and in the Claim of Rights, the ſentence againſt him was declared to be, what moſt certainly it was, a reproach upon the nation (b). That noble perſon was afterwards raiſed by letters patents, dated June 23, 1701, to the title of Duke of Argyle; and, at the ſame time, was created Marquis of Kintyre, and Lorn, Earl of Campbell and Cowel, &c. (c). He was the father of the late Field-Marſhal, John, Duke of Argyle, created Baron of Chatham and Earl of Greenwich by Queen Anne, in 1705 (d); and raiſed to the title of Duke of Greenwich, April 30, 1719, by his Majeſty King George I. 'the ſon as the father, and never gave him any other 'title than that Toad's Bird: So that nobody could 'imagine from whence this change could proceed, 'but from a deſign to preſerve an intereſt in the 'Preſbyterian party againſt the time he ſhould have 'occaſion to uſe them.

'Then there were circumſtances in this grace of 'the King to the Lord Lorn, that exceeded all men's 'comprehenſion: For his Majeſty cauſed all the 'eſtate of the Marquis of Argyle, which did not 'appear in any degree ſo conſiderable as it was ge-'nerally believed to have been, to be ſeized upon 'as forfeited to him; and then would grant it to the 'ſon ſo abſolutely, that neither the owners ſhould 'recover what had been injuriouſly and violently 'taken from them for their loyalty to the King, nor 'the creditors receive ſatisfaction for the juſt debts 'which were due to them, and which muſt have been 'ſatisfied if the King had retained the forfeiture. 'But upon the application of the Commiſſioner and 'the other Lords, that the King would hear all 'perſons concerned, there was ſome mitigation in 'thoſe particulars, notwithſtanding all the oppo-'ſition which Lautherdale did barefaced make on 'the behalf of the Lord Lorn, and which the other 'bore with great indignation: Which he knew very 'well, and did believe that the oath and ſubſcription, 'which he well knew they had contrived for the next 'ſeſſion of parliament, was levelled at him; that not 'taking it, as they did not believe he would do, the 'Secretary of Scotland's place might become void, 'which they had much rather ſhould have been in 'any man's hand than in his. And therefore he 'took all occaſions to profeſs and declare, beſides 'his conſtant raillery againſt the Preſbytery, "that "if they ſhould require him to ſubſcribe that he is "a Turk, he would do it before he would loſe his "office (35)."

(35) Clarendon's Continuation, vol. ii. p. 412, 414.

When we conſider the diſlike which the great hiſtorian here manifeſts againſt Lord Lorn, we can ſcarcely credit the fact mentioned in the text, that he was ſo diſſatisfied with the proceedings of the Earl of Middleton in the condemnation of this young nobleman, as to declare, that if the King ſuffered ſuch a precedent to take place, he would get out of his dominions as faſt as his gout would let him. Our doubt is confirmed by Lord Clarendon's total ſilence upon the ſubject, in the continuation of his hiſtory. Another thing which cannot be permitted to paſs unnoticed, is the Earl of Clarendon's aſſertion, that Lord Lorn, as captain of King Charles the Second's guard in Scotland, treated his Majeſty with rudeneſs and barbarity. That this was not the caſe, is ſufficiently evinced by our learned predeceſſor.

'The Earl of Argyle's epitaph, though not very 'poetic, has energy enough, ſays Mr. Walpole, to 'make one conclude that it was not his firſt eſſay. 'At leaſt, there is an heroic ſatisfaction of con-'ſcience expreſſed in it, worthy of the cauſe in which 'he fell.

'His ſpeech at his execution is printed in Ho-'ward's Collection of Letters, p. 399 (36).'

The Earl of Argyle was a man of a calmneſs of ſpirit almoſt incredible. When he was on the ſcaffold, he took out of his pocket a little ruler, and meaſured the block.  [CAMPBELL (JOHN) ſecond Duke of Argyle, and alſo Duke of Greenwich and Baron of Chatham, grandſon to the ſubject of the preceding article, was born on the 10th of October, 1678 (a). He was ſon to Archibald, Duke of Argyle, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Lionel Talmaſh, of Helmingham, in the county of Suffolk. It is mentioned as a remarkable circumſtance, and which gave riſe to many ſuperſtitious obſervations, that on the very day, and preciſely at the time, when his grandfather was executed at Edinburgh, he fell out of a three pair of ſtairs window, without receiving the leaſt hurt (b). Of the truth of this fact we know nothing, but from the authority of Mr. Robert Campbell, the writer of his life. At the time when this accident is related to have happened, he was between ſix and ſeven years of age, and was at the houſe of Dunybriſſel, the ſeat of his aunt, the Counteſs of Murray. He very early gave ſigns of ſpirit and capacity, but without ſhewing much inclination for cloſe ſtudy; though he is ſaid, at the age of fifteen, to have made a conſiderable progreſs in claſſical learning, and in ſome branches of philoſophy, under the tuition of Mr. Walter Campbell, afterwards Miniſter of Dunoon, in Argyleſhire (c). It ſoon appeared, that his diſpoſition led him moſt towards a military life; and he began to apply almoſt his whole attention to the art of war, for which he diſcovered great talents. This propenſity was encouraged by his father [A]: and being introduced at the [A] By his father.] This nobleman was particularly active in procuring the crown to be eſtabliſhed on the Prince and Princeſs of Orange; which being carried by a great majority in the Scottiſh convention, his Lordſhip, as Earl of Argyle, was ſent from the Nobility, with Sir James Montgomery, and Sir John Dalrymple, from the Barons and Boroughs, to offer the Crown in the name of the Convention, to their Majeſties, and tendered them the coronation oath; for which, and many other eminent ſervices, he was admitted a member of the Privy Council, and, in 1690, made one of the Lords of the Treaſury. He was afterwards made a Colonel of the Scots horſe guards; and, in 1694, one of the extraordinary Lords of Seſſion. He was likewiſe created Duke of Argyle, Marquis of Kintyre and Lorn, Earl of Campbell and Cowell, Viſcount of Lochow and Glengla, Lord Inverary, Mull, Morvern, and Terrey.

the court of King William, under the title of Lord Lorn, he was preferred by that Prince to the command of a regiment of foot, in the year 1694, when he was not quite ſeventeen years of age; and in that ſtation he gave ſignal proofs of courage and military capacity (d).

He continued in this ſituation during the remainder of King William's reign, and till the death of his father, the firſt Duke of Argyle. That nobleman dying on the 28th of September 1703, he ſucceeded him in his honours and eſtate; and was ſoon after ſworn of Queen Anne's Privy Council, appointed Captain of the Scotch Horſe-guards, and one of the extraordinary Lords of Seſſion (e). He was likewiſe made one of the Knights of the Order of the Thiſtle, when her Majeſty, the following year, ſigned a patent for reviving and reſtoring that Order (f).

(f) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 291.

In 1705, he was nominated her Majeſty's Lord High Commiſſioner to the Scottiſh Parliament, though he was then only twenty-three years of age. This appointment was ſo much to the ſatisfaction of that nation, that his Grace was met on the borders, near Berwick, by a ſquadron of the Marquis of Lothian's dragoons, on the 23d of April; and that night he arrived at Dunbar, attended by a great number of perſons of diſtinction. The next day, the Lord Advocate, the Lord Provoſt, and Magiſtrates of Edinburgh, met him at Edgbucklinbrack, with above 600 horſe, and there were alſo in his retinue 34 coaches and ſix of the nobility and gentry. On the 28th of June, his Grace opened the Parliament by a ſpeech, which will be found in the notes [B]. He was ſo well convinced of the advantages which would reſult to both kingdoms from an union between England and Scotland, that he employed his whole intereſt in the promotion of that meaſure: and, during his ſtay in Scotland, notwithſtanding great oppoſition, and ſtrong proteſts were made againſt it, an act was paſſed in the parliament of that kingdom for a treaty with England, which proved the baſis of that union which was ſoon afterwards effected (g).

On his arrival in England, her Majeſty was ſo well ſatisfied with his conduct and ſervices, that ſhe created him a Peer of England, by the title of Baron of Chatham, and Earl of Greenwich; and on the 3d of December, in the ſame year, he was introduced into the Houſe of Peers between the Earl of Rivers and the Earl of Kingſton, the Duke of Northumberland officiating as Lord Great Chamberlain (h). In 1706, he made a campaign under the Duke of Marlborough; and greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and conduct in the battle of Ramillies, in which he acted as a Brigadier-General (i). He alſo rendered himſelf conſpicuous at the ſiege of Oſtend, and in the attack of Menin, a town that was a key to the French conqueſts in the Netherlands, and of which his Grace took poſſeſſion on the 25th of Auguſt (k).

After that event, he returned again to Scotland, in order to be preſent in the Parliament of that kingdom, when the treaty for the Union was agitated. He was very active in the promotion of it, though he declined being one of the Commiſſioners [C].

Terrey, by letters patent, bearing date at Kenſington the 23d of June, 1701. He ſent over a regiment to Flanders for King William's ſervice, the officers of which were chiefly of his own name and family, who bravely diſtinguiſhed themſelves through the whole courſe of the war.

He married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Lionel Talmaſh, of Helmingham, in the county of Suffolk, by Elizabeth, Ducheſs of Lauderdale, his wife, daughter and heir of William Murray, Earl of Dyſart, by whom he left iſſue two ſons and a daughter; namely, John, Duke of Argyle, the ſubject of the preſent article; Archibald, who ſucceeded his brother as Duke of Argyle; and Lady Anne, married to James Stuart, ſecond Earl of Bute, by whom ſhe had the preſent Earl (1).

(1) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 290, 291.

'My Lords and Gentlemen,

'Her Majeſty has in her letter expreſſed ſo much 'tenderneſs and affection towards this nation, in 'aſſuring you, that ſhe will maintain the govern-'ment as eſtabliſhed by law, both in Church and 'State; and acquainting you, that ſhe has been 'pleaſed to give me full power to paſs ſuch acts as 'may be for the good of the nation; that were it not 'purely to comply with cuſtom, I might be ſilent.

'Her Majeſty has had under her conſideration, the 'preſent circumſtances of this kingdom; and out of 'her extreme concern for its welfare, has been gra-'ciouſly pleaſed to recommend to you, two expe-'dients to prevent the ruin, which does but too 'plainly threaten us. In the firſt place, your ſettling 'the ſucceſſion in the Proteſtant Line; as what is 'abſolutely, and immediately neceſſary to ſecure our 'peace, to cool thoſe heats which have with great 'induſtry and too much ſucceſs, been fomented 'among us, and effectually diſappoint the deſigns of 'all our enemies. In the ſecond place, a Treaty 'with England, which you yourſelves have ſhown ſo 'great inclination for, that 'tis not to be ſuppoſed 'it can meet with any oppoſition.

'The ſmall part of the funds, which were appro-'priated at your laſt meeting for the army, are now 'at an end; and I believe every body is ſatisfied, of 'how great uſe our frigates have been to our trade; 'and 'tis fit to acquaint you, that our forts are 'ruinous, and our magazines empty, therefore I do 'not doubt, but your wiſdom will direct you to pro-'vide ſuitable ſupplies.

'My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am moſt ſenſible of the difficulties that attend 'this poſt, and the loſs I am at, by the want of ex-'perience in affairs; but I ſhall endeavour to make 'it up by my zeal and firmneſs in ſerving her Ma-'jeſty, and the great regard I ſhall have to whatever 'may be for the good of my country (2).'

(2) R. Campbell's Life of the Duke of Argyle, p. 92, 93.

[C] He declined being one of the Commiſſioners.] Mr. R. Campbell ſays, that the Duke of Hamilton 'had an inclination to be of the number of Treaters '(Commiſſioners) himſelf, and he had got the Duke 'of Argyle's word of honour, that he ſhould be one 'of the Queen's nomination; on which he depended, 'and had no reaſon, though he was diſappointed, to 'be diſobliged at the Duke of Argyle, who ſo much 'reſented the Queen's refuſal to name the Duke of 'Hamilton, that he would not be prevailed on to be 'one of the number himſelf (3).'

(3) Life, p. 110.

When a riotous multitude came to the Parliament-close, demanding, with loud clamours, "That the treaty of Union should be rejected," his Grace went out of the House, and appeased the people who were assembled, by the calmness and strength of reason with which he addressed them (l). However, his zeal in the promotion of the Union rendered him less popular in his own country than any other part of his conduct, though even his enemies did justice to the rectitude of his intentions [D].

(l) Collins, ubi supra, p. 293.

In 1708, the Duke of Argyle commanded twenty battalions at the battle of Oudenarde; and the troops under his command were the first of the infantry that engaged the enemy, and they maintained their post against unequal numbers. He likewise assisted at the siege of Lisle; and commanded as Major-General at the siege of Ghent, taking possession of the town and citadel on the 3d of January, 1708-9 (m). He was afterwards raised to the rank of Lieutenant-General, and commanded in chief under General Schuylemberg, at the attack of the city and citadel of Tournay. He had also a considerable share, on the 11th of September, 1709, in the victory at Malplaquet, where he was much exposed [E], and gained great honour, but came off unhurt (n).

(n) Collins, ubi supra, p. 294.

On the 20th of December, 1710, he was installed a Knight of the Garter, his late Majesty being then received into that Order by proxy, and also the Duke of Devonshire. About this time he took some part in the debates in Parliament, relative to the inquiry which was set on foot concerning the management of affairs in Spain (o): and on this occasion he spoke and voted with the Tories, and joined in the censure that was passed [F] on the conduct of the late Whig ministry.

(o) Hist. and Proceedings of the House of Lords, vol. ii. p. 300, 307, 309, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 321, 322, 325, 328.

On the 18th of January, 1710-11, he was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Charles the Third, King of Spain, and Commander in Chief of her Majesty's forces in that kingdom (p). Dr. Smollet observes, that his Grace "had "long been at variance with the Duke of Marlborough [G], a circumstance which "recommended him the more strongly to the ministry (q)." But it is intimated, that some of his friends were averse to his acceptance of these employments, being sensible, from the ill state of our affairs in Spain, how extremely difficult it would be for him to gain any ground in that kingdom (r). However, he set out for Barcelona, and in his way thither arrived at the Hague on the 4th of April. He made a visit to the grand pensionary, and another to Lord Townshend, the British Plenipotentiary at the Hague: but though the Duke of Marlborough was there at that time, he did not visit him (s). When he arrived at Barcelona, on the 29th of May (t), he found the troops in so wretched a condition, and the affairs of the allies at so low an ebb, by the losses sustained the preceding year at the battle of Almanza, and in other actions, that he was not able to undertake any thing of consequence (u). The British troops were in the utmost distress for want of subsistence, though the ministry had promised to supply him liberally, and the parliament had granted 1,500,000l. for that service (w). The Duke of Argyle wrote pressing letters to the ministry, and loudly complained that he was altogether unsupported: but all his remonstrances were ineffectual; no remittances arrived (x); and he was obliged to raise money on his own credit, to defray part of the subsistence of the troops (y). He had the misfortune also to be seized with a violent fever, which rendered it necessary for him to quit the camp, and retire to the town

[D] Even his enemies did justice to the rectitude of his intentions.] Mr. R. Campbell says, that 'the 'part his Grace the Duke of Argyle acted in this 'important affair (of the Union), by voting for and 'influencing his friends to favour it, is one of the 'most unpopular parts of his Grace's character: but 'as his enemies allowed, that he acted above-board, 'and from conviction of the utility of the Union, 'free from any mixture of bye-ends, malice itself 'cannot load him with any part of that reflection 'others merited, who were, perhaps, too much 'biassed by private interest, in their determination 'of that affair (4).' The author of the Scotch Memoirs, a writer on the other side of the question, and who says some disrespectful things of the Duke, yet admits, that he 'might well enough pass for an 'accomplished gentleman. He was extremely for-'ward in effecting what he aimed at and designed, 'which he owned and promoted above-board, being 'altogether free of the least share of dissimulation, 'and his word so sacred, that one might assuredly 'depend upon it. His head ran more upon the 'camp than the court, and it appears, nature had 'dressed him up accordingly; being altogether inca-'pable of the servile dependency and flattering in-'sinuations requisite in the last, and endued with 'that chearful lively temper and personal valour 'esteemed and necessary in the other. In Scotland 'he affected and gained the leading of the Presby-'terians, as his father had done before him, and 'was, upon that and other accounts, a very signi-'ficant member (5).' Mr. Campbell observes, that this is a character 'which nothing but the force of 'truth could extort from a party so much exas-'perated (6).'

[F] Joined in the censure that was passed, &c.] Dr. Smollet, speaking of the parliamentary resolutions against the conduct of the late ministry, the Earl of Galway, &c. which the Duke of Argyle promoted, observes, with much reason, that they "were not the proceedings of candour and national "justice, but the ebullitions of party zeal and ran-"corous animosity (8)."

(8) Hist. of England, vol. x. p. 56, 57.

[G] At variance with the Duke of Marlborough.] We do not find the grounds of this variance particularly mentioned; but it appears, that when the Earl of Scarborough, in 1710, moved that the thanks of the House of Peers should be given to the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Argyle made some objections to the motion (9). His declining to visit the Duke of Marlborough, when he passed through the Hague, in his way to Spain, as mentioned in the text, is also another evidence of the fact.

Of

of Barcelona (z). It is pretended, that about this time a ſcheme was formed in England to aſſaſſinate him in Spain (a): but this appears to have been a report without foundation. His health being re-eſtabliſhed, he at length quitted Spain, without having been able to attempt any enterprize of importance: and, indeed, the Miniſtry were now privately employed in negociating the peace which was afterwards concluded at Utrecht. Before his return to England, he went to Minorca, of which he had been appointed Governor: but made no long ſtay there.

(z) Collins, ubi ſupra, p. 294.
(a) Life, p. 71.

In June, 1712, the Queen appointed him General and Commander in Chief of all the land forces in Scotland, and Captain of the company of foot in Edinburgh Caſtle (b). But he did not long continue upon good terms with the Miniſtry: and, indeed, he openly oppoſed their meaſures in Parliament. He ſpoke againſt a bill which was brought in by the Adminiſtration, appointing Commiſſioners to examine the value and conſideration of all the grants of Crown Lands made ſince the Revolution, by which a general reſumption was intended to have been made (c). In 1714, when it was debated in the Houſe of Peers, whether it ſhould be reſolved, that the Proteſtant ſucceſſion was in danger under the then Adminiſtration, the Duke of Argyle maintained the affirmative: and alſo declared his diſapprobation of the proceedings of the Miniſtry, relative to the peace of Utrecht. He ſaid, that 'he had lately croſſed the kingdom of 'France, which was indeed one of the fineſt countries of the univerſe, but that there 'were marks of a general deſolation in all the places through which he paſſed. That 'he rode forty miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms, and that the 'reſt of the people were in the utmoſt want and miſery. He did not, therefore, apprehend, there could be any neceſſity to conclude a peace ſo precipitately with a Prince, 'whoſe dominions were ſo exhauſted of men, money, and proviſions. He declared, 'that he firmly believed the ſucceſſion in the Electoral Houſe of Hanover was in danger from the preſent Miniſters, whom he durſt charge with mal-adminiſtration, both 'within and without thoſe walls. He knew, he ſaid, and offered to prove, that the 'Treaſurer had yearly remitted four thouſand pounds to the Highland Chiefs of Scotland, who were known to be entirely devoted to the Pretender, in order to keep 'them under diſcipline, and ready for any attempt. That, on the other hand, the 'new modelling of the army, by diſbanding ſome regiments out of their turn, and by 'removing from their employments a vaſt number of officers, merely on account of 'their known affection to the Houſe of Hanover, were clear indications of the deſigns 'in hand.' He added, 'that it was a diſgrace to the nation, to ſee men, who had 'never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the places of ſeveral brave officers, 'who, after they had often expoſed their lives for their country, were now ſtarving in 'priſon for debts, which had been contracted for want of pay (d).'

His Grace likewiſe zealouſly oppoſed the extenſion of the malt-tax to Scotland; and was appointed with the Earl of Mar, and two Scotch Members of the Houſe of Commons, to attend the Queen, and make a remonſtrance to her Majeſty on this ſubject [H]. They repreſented, 'that their countrymen bore with great impatience the vio'lation

[H] Attend the Queen, and make a remonſtrance to her Majeſty on this ſubject.] Mr. Macpherſon ſays, that 'though the Queen expreſſed the greateſt un-'eaſineſs at the addreſs of the Scots, they reſolved to 'proceed in their intended motion. Several of the 'Jacobite part of the Tories entered with eagerneſs 'into a meaſure, which was well calculated to diſtreſs 'the Earl of Oxford. The Whigs, for the like rea-'ſon, were ready to throw their weight into the 'ſame ſcale. But the perſon who animated the 'whole oppoſition, on this ſubject, was the Duke 'of Argyle. This nobleman, eſpouſing the prin-'ciples or paſſions of his family, had uniformly 'profeſſed his attachment to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, 'and his conſequent averſion to a miniſter, who was 'deemed to favour the Pretender. Careleſs and 'eager in his diſpoſition, he neither concealed his 'reſentment, nor diſguiſed his deſigns. With a 'commanding manner, which ſtamped his very for-'wardneſs with an appearance of authority, he was 'feared by many, but beloved by none. Brave in 'his perſon, but not remarkable for his conduct, he 'might be conſidered, in his military capacity, as a 'bold partiſan, rather than a judicious commander. 'In his civil character, his fire degenerated into a 'violence, that often defeated his views. In his 'public exhibitions in Parliament, he was rather 'ſpirited than eloquent; better calculated to terrify 'his enemies, than to ſupport his friends. His 'great defect was a love of money and emolument, 'which he could not effectually conceal, with all 'the efforts of his pride. His chief talent was an 'addreſs in managing the prejudices of the vulgar. 'He marked their opinions as they changed, and 'fell dexterouſly down with the tide.

'The Earl of Oxford, no ſtranger to the importance of the Duke of Argyle, had reſolved to gain 'him by promiſes of advantage. His object was to 'place him as a kind of ſpy upon the Whigs, and to 'terrify, upon occaſion, that party, by his means. 'But the Duke declined to enter into the views of 'the Miniſter, till he ſhould obtain the office of 'Maſter-general of the Ordnance, vacant by the 'death of the Duke of Hamilton. The Lord Trea-'ſurer was unwilling to truſt a place of ſuch impor-'tance in the hands of a man whom intereſt only 'could gain to his ſide. Diſappointment heightened 'the Duke's reſentment. He reſolved to gain by 'force what he could not obtain by favour. He 'oppoſed the Court with vehemence. He treated 'the Miniſter with inſult. He therefore entered, 'with great zeal, into the counſels of his country-'men, for the diſſolution of the union between the 'two kingdoms (10).'

(10) Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. ii. p. 601, 602.

This is certainly not a very favourable character of the Duke of Argyle: but it may be doubted, whether proper evidence is produced of ſome of the facts; though we are far from controverting the idea, that the Duke was much influenced by views of intereſt and ambition. But in ſupport of his aſſertions, Mr. Macpherſon only gives a looſe reference to Hanover and Stuart papers for the year 1713, without

'lation of ſome articles of the Act of Union; and the laying ſuch an inſupportable 'burthen as the land-tax upon them, was likely to raiſe their diſcontent to ſuch an 'height, as to prompt them to declare the Union diſſolved (e).' He alſo ſupported the motion that was made by the Earl of Seafield, for leave to bring in a bill for diſſolving the Union. In his ſpeech in Parliament upon this ſubject, he admitted, that 'he had a great hand in making the Union, and that the chief reaſon that moved him 'to it was the ſecuring the Proteſtant ſucceſſion; but that he was ſatisfied that might 'be done as well now, if the Union were diſſolved.' He added, 'That he believed in 'his conſcience, it was as much for the intereſt of England, as of Scotland, to have 'it diſſolved: and if it were not, he did not expect long to have either property left in 'Scotland, or liberty in England (f).'

His Grace's conduct in Parliament having given great offence to the Miniſtry, he was about this time deprived of all the employments he held under the Crown (g): and he continued to oppoſe the Adminiſtration to the end of this reign. But when Queen Anne's life was deſpaired of, he attended the Council-chamber at Kenſington, as did alſo the Duke of Somerſet, without being ſummoned (h). The members of the Council were ſurprized at their appearance: but the Duke of Shrewſbury thanked them for their readineſs to give their aſſiſtance at ſo critical a conjuncture, and deſired them to take their places (i); and their attendance on this occaſion, was conſidered as highly ſerviceable to the intereſts of the Houſe of Hanover [I].

On the 27th of September, 1714, he was again conſtituted General and Commander in Chief of the Forces in Scotland; and, on the 1ſt of October following, he was ſworn a member of the new Privy Council (l). On the 5th of the ſame month, he was appointed Governor of Minorca; and on the 15th of June, 1715, made Colonel of the Royal regiment of Horſe-guards in England (m). without mentioning any page. This is a mode of reference not very convenient for thoſe who are deſirous of aſcertaining the truth of hiſtorical facts. We have, however, looked over theſe papers, but do not find ſufficient authority for ſome of Mr. Macpherſon's aſſertions; though it appears from the Hanover papers (11), that the Duke of Argyle was conſidered as an intereſted and ambitious man, and that it was thought both he and his brother might be gained by penſions. There may be little reaſon to queſtion the truth of this; and there may alſo be ſome truth in other inſinuations thrown out againſt him in the Stuart papers; but yet it may be obſerved, that the mere aſſertions of a Jacobite ſpy, or foreign agent, cannot juſtly be regarded as that kind of hiſtorical evidence which is to be implicitly received.

(11) Macpherſon's Original Papers, vol. ii. p. 467, 468, 502.

The following are ſome of the moſt remarkable paſſages in theſe papers relative to the Duke of Argyle. In the Stuart papers, Rogers writes thus to Sir William Ellis: 'Argyle begins to be obſtre-'perous. Harley thought to make him his ſpy on 'the Whigs, and bully them on occaſion; but he 'will do nothing for him, till he gets Duke Hamil 'ton's place. Harley will not truſt him with it. 'Argyle is reſolved to hector him into it. Harley 'makes ſatires on him, in order to expoſe him, and 'thinks to ſilence him: time will ſhew how they 'will end. The Whigs will ſpirit him to be uneaſy 'to Harley and the Queen (12).'

(12) Ibid. p. 404.

In the Hanover papers, there is a letter from Schutz, a Hanoverian agent, to Robethon at Hanover, dated October 30, 1713, wherein he ſays, 'Lord Sunderland aſſures me, the Duke of Argyle, 'who paſſed ſome days with him in the country, 'may be depended on. He thinks him incapable 'of ever reconciling himſelf with the Miniſter; as 'he acknowledges now, that he acted formerly on 'wrong principles, and is diſſatisfied with his bro-'ther for having ſhuffled; i. e. for having paid 'court to the Lord Treaſurer, in hopes that he 'would have made him one of the ſixteen Scotch 'Peers. The misfortune is, that he has thereby 'neglected to be choſen in oppoſition to the Court, 'which the Duke thinks he could not have miſſed 'to be, if he had ſpoken out, and employed the in-'tereſt of his friends in Scotland (15).'

(13) Ibid. p. 510.

In another place we are told, from letters of L'Hermitage, that he thought 'the ſucceſſion would 'be loſt, unleſs the Electoral Prince came to Eng-'land. Lord Halifax believed now, that 50,000 l. 'ſterling, inſtead of the 100,000 l. they aſked at 'firſt, would be ſufficient to carry the election againſt 'the Court: and the Duke of Argyle told Halifax, 'that with 20,000 l. he would anſwer for all the 'elections in Scotland (14).'

(14) Ibid. p. 498.

With reſpect to the motion for diſſolving the Union, we find the following paſſage concerning it, in a letter from Eraſmus Lewis, Eſq; to Dr. Swift, dated June 2, 1713. 'The diviſion yeſterday, in 'the Houſe of Lords, was fifty-four againſt fifty-'four. Proxies were called for, and we had ſeven-'teen to thirteen. This is the greateſt victory we 'ever had. The Duke of Argyle, and the Scotch, 'were againſt us to a man. The Lords Weymouth 'and Carteret were with them. It was very comical 'to ſee the Tories, who voted with the Lord Trea-'ſurer againſt the diſſolution of the Union, under 'all the perplexities in the world, leſt they ſhould be 'victorious; and the Scotch, who voted for a bill 'of diſſolution, under agonies, leſt they themſelves 'ſhould carry the point they pretended to deſire. 'In all the time I have been converſant in buſineſs, 'I never before obſerved both ſides, at the ſame 'time, acting parts, which they thought contrary 'to their intereſts (15).'

(15) Swift's Letters, publiſhed by Hawkeſworth, vol. i. p. 388, 389. edit. 8vo. 1766.

According to Mr. Macpherſon, the Scotch took great offence at a ſpeech of the Duke of Argyle in this debate, in which he had mentioned the Pretender very contemptuouſly, and they were thereby afterwards led to favour again the views of the Court (16).

[I] Highly ſerviceable to the intereſts of the Houſe of Hanover.] Mr. R. Campbell ſays, "that the other "members of the council paid ſuch great reſpect to "the Dukes of Somerſet and Argyle, as not only "to admit them to ſit in council without oppoſition, "but on their motion allowed that all Privy Coun-"ſellors then in and about London, ſhould attend "without diſtinction; by which means, the friends "of the Houſe of Hanover had an opportunity to "protect the intereſt of that auguſt houſe (17)."

When

When a rebellion was raiſed in Scotland in favour of the Pretender, the Duke of Argyle was ſent to take the command of the forces there. He was very aſſiduous in raiſing troops for his Majeſty's ſervice (o), and in taking proper meaſures for ſuppreſſing the rebellion. On the 13th of November he engaged the rebel army, commanded by the Earl of Mar, at Dumblain. The Duke's troops did not conſiſt of more than three thouſand five hundred, while thoſe of the Earl of Mar amounted to nine thouſand (p). Notwithſtanding this inequality of numbers, the rebels were worſted, though the victory was not complete, and was indeed claimed by both ſides. His Grace behaved in the action with great gallantry [K]; and was congratulated, on account of the advantage that he had obtained, in a letter from the Town-council of Edinburgh, in which are the following expreſſions: 'When we look back upon the difficulty your 'Grace has lain under from the time of your arrival in this country, we cannot too 'much admire your fortitude; nor, in the midſt of it, too greatly extol the conduct 'and courage you have ſhewn in forcing ſo great a body of rebels to fly with the ut-'moſt confuſion from ſo ſmall a number. And when we reflected upon the virtues of 'your Grace's anceſtors, the zeal and active ſpirit they ſhewed for the Proteſtant reli-'gion, and the blood which has been ſpilt in your family (for the ſame cauſe your 'Grace has at this juncture ſo liberally ventured your own) we had always hopes, under 'the bleſſing of God, of ſucceſs from your undertaking (q).'

Soon after the battle of Dumblain, the Duke of Argyle was joined by ſome dragoons from England, and by ſix thouſand Dutch troops under General Cadogan; and being thus reinforced, he compelled the rebels to abandon Perth, on the 30th of January, 1716; and the Pretender was ſoon afterwards obliged to retire to France with the utmoſt precipitation (r). The Duke of Argyle now repaired to Edinburgh, where he arrived on the 27th of February, and was magnificently entertained by the Magiſtrates of Edinburgh, in gratitude for the ſignal ſervices he had rendered to that city and kingdom in the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion. On the firſt of March he ſet out for England, and arrived on the 6th of that month in London, where he was very graciouſly received by his Majeſty (s).

On the 10th and 16th of April he ſpoke in the Houſe of Peers in defence of the bill for repealing the triennial act, and rendering Parliaments ſeptennial (t). But ſoon after this his Grace ſeems to have conceived ſome diſguſt againſt the Court, or ſome diſlike was taken at his conduct there, for in June following he reſigned all his places [L]. The particular grounds of his diſſatisfaction, or of his being removed from his offices, are not mentioned; but we now find him in ſeveral inſtances voting againſt the Miniſtry (u). In February 1717-18, he ſpoke againſt the mutiny-bill, and endeavoured to ſhew, by ſeveral inſtances drawn from the Hiſtory of Great Britain, that "a ſtanding army, in the time of peace, was ever fatal, either to the Prince or the nation (w)." But on the 6th of February 1718-19, he was made Lord-Steward of the Houſhold (x); and, after that event, we again find his Lordſhip voting with Adminiſtration (y); and which he generally continued to do for many years afterwards.

On the 30th of April, 1718, he was advanced to the dignity of a Duke of Great-Britain, by the title of Duke of Greenwich (z). His Grace oppoſed, in 1722, the bill "for ſecuring the Freedom of Election of Members to ſerve for the Commons in Parliament:" and promoted the reſolution of the Houſe for expunging the reaſons [M] that

[K] Behaved in the action with great gallantry.] In Colonel Harriſon's account of this battle, he ſays, "The conduct and bravery of the Generals and inferior officers, contributed much to this ſucceſs; "but, above all, the great example of the Duke of "Argyle, whoſe preſence not only gave ſpirit to "the action, but gained ſucceſs as often as he "led on (18)."

[L] Reſigned all his places.] Dr. Smollet ſays, that both the Duke of Argyle, and his brother, the Earl of Ilay, were "diſmiſſed from their employments (19);" and mentions it as an inſtance of ingratitude in the Court, conſidering the importance of their ſervices. Mr. Salmon ſays, that the Duke of Argyle was not only removed from all his places, but "his penſion of two thouſand pounds per annum "ſuperſeded (20)."

Mr. Tindal obſerves, that 'the Duke of Argyle, 'and his brother, the Earl of Ilay, were removed 'from all their employments. They had both diſ-'tinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal and ſervices for 'the government; and the King had, in ſome 'meaſure, put his crown into their hands, by pla-'cing them at the head of his armies in Scotland. 'They had all along voted in the Houſe of Lords 'on the Court ſide; and, therefore, their removal 'was the more ſtrange. Whatever might be the 'cauſe, their poſts were diſpoſed of, to ſhew there 'was no room to expect being reſtored. General 'Carpenter was made Commander in Chief of the 'Forces in Scotland, and Governor of Minorca and 'Port Mahon; and the Duke of Montroſe was ap-'pointed Lord Clerk-Regiſter of Scotland, in the 'room of the Earl of Ilay.' It is added, in a note, that 'the Duke of Argyle, it was obſerved, wait-'ed that morning on the King, (July 7, 1716, the 'morning that his Majeſty ſet out for Hanover) and 'was for a few minutes in private conference with 'him (21).' This was the day after he had been diſpoſſeſſed of his places.

[M]. Promoted the reſolution of the Houſe for expunging the reaſons, &c.] This was certainly an act of violence, and reflected no credit on any who were concerned in it. If the ſeveral members of the Houſe of Peers have a right to enter their proteſts againſt the conduct of the majority, it muſt be abſurd, that the ſame majority ſhould alſo aſſume a right of expunging theſe proteſts at their pleaſure. On the above occaſion, the Lords in the Minority proteſted againſt the expunging of their former proteſtation; that were urged by ſome of the Lords in their proteſt againſt the rejection of the bill (a). He alſo ſupported a motion made by the Earl of Sunderland, for limiting the time for entering proteſts [N]: and he ſpoke in favour of the bill for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus Act for a year, on occaſion of the diſcovery of Layer's plot (b); as he did likewiſe, with great zeal and warmth, for the bill of pains and penalties againſt Biſhop Atterbury (c). In 1724, he defended the mutiny-bill (d); and, it appears, that his Grace had not the ſame fears of a ſtanding army now, as when he was out of place a few years before.

On reſigning his place of Lord Steward of his Majeſty's Houſhold, he was conſtituted Maſter-general of the Ordnance: and by King George II. he was appointed Colonel of her Majeſty's own regiment of horſe, and Governor and Captain of the town and iſle of Portſmouth, and of the caſtle there, called South-Sea-Caſtle (e). He ſpoke againſt the bill for diſabling penſioners from ſitting in the Houſe of Commons (f); and on the firſt of May, 1731, againſt Lord Bathurſt's motion for an Addreſs to the King to diſcharge the Heſſian troops in the pay of Great-Britain (g). In 1733, he made a long and elaborate ſpeech againſt any reduction of the army; and endeavoured to prove, in direct contradiction to the ſentiments he had formerly advanced, "that a ſtanding army never "had in any country the chief hand in deſtroying the liberties of their country;" and that it could not be ſuppoſed they ever would (h). He alſo oppoſed the efforts that were made by ſome of the Minority Lords to prevent the influence of the Crown in the election of the Sixteen Peers for Scotland (i). And on the 14th of January, 1735-6, he was conſtituted Field-Marſhal of all his Majeſty's Forces (k).

When the caſe of the city of Edinburgh, relative to the affair of Porteous, came to be agitated in Parliament, in 1737, the Duke of Argyle exerted himſelf vigorouſly in favour of that city (l): and, in 1739, from whatever cauſe it proceeded, he repeatedly voted againſt Adminiſtration (m). He ſpoke againſt the Spaniſh Convention with great ſpirit (n), and againſt the motion made by the Duke of Newcaſtle, for an unlimited vote of credit (o). About this time he was removed from all his places (p), and engaged vigorouſly in the oppoſition againſt Sir Robert Walpole (q). After the removal of that Miniſter in 1741, he was again made Maſter-general of the Ordnance, Colonel of his Majeſty's Royal regiment of Horſe-guards, and Field Marſhal and Commander in Chief of all the Forces in England (r). But in leſs than a month, he reſigned his employments for the laſt time (s), being probably diſſatisfied with ſome of the political arrangements that took place after the removal of Walpole. About this time he is ſaid to have received a letter from the Pretender, which ſome of his enemies are ſuppoſed to have procured to be written to him, with a view of injuring him; but he prevented any ill effects from it, by immediately communicating it to his Majeſty's Miniſters *. He had been for ſome years afflicted with a paralytic diſorder, which now began to increaſe: and towards the cloſe of his life he was ſomewhat melancholy and reſerved (t). He died on the 3d of September, 1743 (u), and was interred in Weſtminſter Abbey. The titles of Duke and Earl of Greenwich, and Baron of Chatham, became extinct at his death; but in his other titles he was ſucceeded by his brother Archibald Earl of Ila (w).

John, Duke of Argyle, was a Nobleman of great political abilities, an eloquent and diſtinguiſhed Senator, of high ſpirits, undaunted courage, and eminent military talents. But he has been accuſed of being much actuated by motives of avarice and ambition: and, indeed, the uniformity with which he ſupported all the meaſures of Government at one period, and oppoſed them at another, cannot be reconciled to principles of real patriotiſm. He had, however, the honour to be celebrated in very high terms both by Pope and Thomſon [O]. In private life his conduct is ſaid to have been very reſpectable.

teſtation; alledging, among other arguments, that they "were very deſirous, that the arguments con-"tained in thoſe reaſons againſt bribery and corrup-"tion in elections, and their zeal for obtaining ſuch "remedies as were propoſed by the Commons them-"ſelves, might appear to poſterity as fully and par-"ticularly as poſſible (22)."

(22) Lords Debates, vol. iii. p. 231.

[N] The limiting the time for entering proteſts.] Lord Sunderland's motion was, 'That ſuch Lords 'as ſhall enter their proteſtations with reaſon, ſhall 'do the ſame before two o'clock the next ſitting day, 'and ſign them before the Houſe riſes.' This was very properly oppoſed by Biſhop Atterbury; who obſerved, that 'if proteſts were limited to ſo ſhort a 'time, this was, at leaſt, the way to have them 'crude and indigeſted; and he thought it unbe-'coming the dignity of that auguſt aſſembly to have 'any thing entered upon their Journals, which were 'records for after ages, before it had been duly con-'ſidered, and well digeſted (23).'

able. He was an affectionate huſband, and an indulgent maſter. He ſeldom parted with his ſervants, till age had rendered them incapable of their employments; and then he made proviſion for their ſubſiſtence. He was liberal to the poor, and particularly to perſons of merit in diſtreſs: but though he was ready to patronize deſerving perſons, he was extremely cautious not to deceive any by laviſh promiſes, or leading them to form vain expectations (x) [P]. He was a ſtrict œconomiſt, and paid his tradeſmen punctually every month; and though he maintained the dignity of his rank, he took care that no part of his income ſhould be waſted in empty pomp, or unneceſſary expences (y).

He married Mary, daughter of John Brown, Eſq; and niece of Sir Charles Duncomb, Knight; who, in 1708, was Lord Mayor of London. But this Lady dying without iſſue, on the 15th of January, 1716, his Grace married, on the 6th of June, 1717, Jane, daughter of Thomas Warburton, of Winnington, Cheſhire, Eſq. Her Grace was one of the Maids of Honour to Queen Anne, as alſo to her late Majeſty, Queen Caroline, when Princeſs of Wales, and died on the 16th of January, 1767, having borne to the Duke of Argyle five daughters: 1. Lady Caroline, married firſt to Francis, Earl of Dalkeith, eldeſt ſon of Francis, Duke of Buccleugh; and afterwards to the Right Honourable Charles Townſhend, Chancellor and Under-treaſurer of the Exchequer [Q]. She was created a Baroneſs of Great-Britain, by the title of Baroneſs of Greenwich,

'Her genius, wiſdom, her engaging turn,
'Her pride of honour, and her courage try'd,
'Calm, and intrepid, in the very throat
'Of ſulphurous war, on Tenier's dreadful field.
'Nor leſs the palm of peace inwreathes thy brow:
'For, powerful as thy ſword, from thy rich tongue
'Perſuaſion flows, and wins the high debate;
'While mix'd in thee combine the charm of youth,
'The force of manhood, and the depth of age.'

[P] Cautious not to deceive any by laviſh promiſes, or leading them to form vain expectations.] Of this we meet with the following inſtance related by the writer of his life: 'A young gentleman of North Britain, liberally educated, and endued with a large 'ſhare of natural parts, was ſent up to London by 'his father, who had ſeveral other children, and 'had advanced this ſon for this expedition as much 'as he could ſpare without beggaring his family.

'He had conſented to this journey of his ſon on 'the repeated promiſes of a certain peer of that 'country, to put him into a handſome way of 'bread: his reliance on this nobleman's faith 'made him ſtretch a point to furniſh his ſon, ſince 'he looked upon that as beſtowed in order to ſettle 'him for life.

'Full of pleaſing hopes of immediate preferment, 'our young adventurer arrived at his patron's houſe, 'who received him with open arms, and a thouſand 'proteſtations of ſerving him; but ſeveral months 'paſſed over, and nothing but promiſes came; 'years went away in the ſame empty manner; every 'next month promiſed him happineſs, but ſtill it 'was as barren as the laſt. The young gentleman 'had paid levee to this little ſtateſman till he had 'exhauſted all his patrimony, and wearied all his 'relations, yet ſtill he was enjoined patience, and 'promiſed mountains.

'I think in the third or fourth year of this at'tendance, this young gentleman was walking very 'melancholy in Hyde-Park, when he ſpied the Duke 'of Argyle alight from his coach, in order to take a 'walk. A thought ſtruck into his head to addreſs 'the Duke, though an utter ſtranger to him, for a 'place in his Grace's diſpoſal in the ordnance, de'pending on his humanity for ſucceſs.

'He accoſted his grace, told him he was a gentle'man of his country, of ſuch a name and family; 'that he was in low circumſtances, and heard that 'ſuch a ſmall place was now vacant, and in his 'Grace's gift, therefore he took the liberty to beg 'that his Grace would put him into it.

'The demand was ſo uncommon, that his Grace 'made him repeat it again before he gave any 'anſwer; and then he ſaid, Sir, I know your family 'very well, but don't flatter yourſelf with that; take 'for anſwer, that I will not give it you. The young 'gentleman replied, God bleſs your Grace, this exact'ly anſwers the character I have heard of you. The 'laſt words a little ſurprized the Duke, and he de'ſired the young man to explain himſelf; which he 'did by ſaying, that if another peer had been ſo 'honourable as to make him the ſame anſwer, upon 'his firſt application to him, he would have been 'now in a condition to live without making ſo odd 'an application as his preſſing neceſſities obliged 'him juſt now to make to his Grace. His Grace 'recollecting ſome circumſtances he had formerly 'heard of the connection between this young gen'tleman's family and his former patron, was moved 'with the unhappy youth's caſe. After a ſhort 'pauſe, he directed him to call at his houſe next day, 'and in leſs than three days provided for him be'yond his expectations (26).'

(26) Life, p. 346, 347.

[Q] The Right Honourable Charles Townſhend, &c.] This gentleman was eminent for his uncommon eloquence, and the brilliancy of his genius; and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very high degree both in the Senate and the Cabinet. He was ſecond ſon of Charles Lord Viſcount Townſhend, and was choſen member for the town of Yarmouth, in the Parliament which aſſembled in 1747, and in that of 1754. In conjunction with his brother, George, the preſent Lord Townſhend, he was a zealous promoter of the laws for eſtabliſhing a national militia. In 1749, he was conſtituted one of the Commiſſioners of Trade and Plantations; and, in 1751, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, as he was alſo at a new nomination in 1754. In 1756, he was made Treaſurer of his Majeſty's Chamber, by which his ſeat in Parliament being vacated, he was ſoon after choſen for the borough of Saltaſh, in Cornwall, and about the ſame time was ſworn of the Privy Council. At the acceſſion of his preſent Majeſty, he was continued at the Council Board, and in his office of Treaſurer of the Chamber, which he quitted in 1761, on his being appointed Secretary at War. He was returned member for Harwich, in Eſſex, in the Parliament which was convened in that year. In February 1763, he reſigned the office of Secretary at War, and in March was appointed Firſt Lord of Trade and Plantations. On the 8th of June, 1765, he was conſtituted Paymaſter-general of the Forces; and on the 21ſt of Auguſt, 1766, he was made Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one of the Lords of the Treaſury. He continued in this ſituation till his death, having acquired a great aſcendency in the Adminiſtration. He died on the 4th of September, 1767, at the age of forty-two years (27).

His parliamentary talents were very great, and have been celebrated by a gentleman, whoſe uncommon powers of eloquence are univerſally acknowledged. In a ſpeech delivered in the Houſe of Commons, on the 19th of April, 1774, Mr. Burke gave the following character of Mr. Townſhend. 'He was the delight and ornament of this Houſe, 'and the charm of every private ſociety which he 'honoured with his preſence. Perhaps there never

Some years after the Duke's deceaſe, a fine monument, executed by Roubiliac, was erected in Weſtminſter Abbey, to his Grace's memory, by order of Sir Henry Fermer, Baronet, who left by will five hundred pounds for that purpoſe. By direction of the ſame Gentleman, the following inſcription, of which Mr. Paul Whitehead was the author, is repreſented as written by the Pen of Hiſtory, who is a capital figure in the monument.

'Briton, behold! if Patriot worth be dear,
'A ſhrine that claims thy tributary tear!
'Silent that tongue admiring ſenates heard;
'Nerveleſs that arm oppoſing legions fear'd;
'Nor leſs, O CAMPBELL, thine the power to pleaſe,
'And give to grandeur all the grace of eaſe.
'Long, from thy life, let kindred heroes trace,
'Arts, which ennoble, ſtill the nobleſt race:
'Others may owe their future fame to me,
'I borrow immortality from thee.'

* The Medallion dates his birth in 1680.

In a Medallion are given the dates of the Duke's birth * and death; and in a ſhort inſcription below, he is ſaid to have been an honeſt man, a conſtant friend; and that as a General and an Orator, he was exceeded by none of the age in which he lived.

ARCHIBALD, Third Duke of Argyle, brother to the ſubject of the preceding article, and who ſucceeded him in his Scottiſh titles, was born at Ham-houſe, in England, in June, 1682, and was educated at the Univerſity of Glaſgow. He afterwards applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law at Utrecht; but, upon his father's being created a Duke, he laid aſide the ſcheme which he had formed of appearing at the bar, and betook himſelf to a military life. He ſerved under the Duke of Marlborough, was Colonel of the 36th regiment of foot, and Governor of Dumbarton Caſtle. But having a greater propenſity to be a Stateſman than a Soldier, he continued not long in the army; and, after he had quitted it, employed himſelf in the acquiſition of that knowledge, and thoſe qualifications, which would enable him to make a figure in the political world (a). In 1705, he was conſtituted Treaſurer of Scotland, and made a conſiderable figure in Parliament, though he was not more than twenty-three years of age. In 1706, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for treating of the Union; and the ſame year was created Lord Ornſay, Dunoon, and Arrois, Viſcount and Earl of Ila, or Iſlay. In 1708, he was made an extraordinary Lord of Seſſion; and when the Union was effected, he was choſen one of the Sixteen Peers for Scotland, in the firſt Parliament of Great-Britain, and was conſtantly elected to every future Parliament till his death, except the fourth [R]. In 1710, he was made Juſtice-General of Scotland, and

'aroſe in this country, nor in any country, a man 'of a more pointed and finiſhed wit; and (where his 'paſſions were not concerned) of a more refined, 'exquiſite, and penetrating judgment. If he had 'not ſo great a ſtock, as ſome have had, who flouriſhed formerly, of knowledge long treaſured up, 'he knew better by far, than any man I ever was 'acquainted with, how to bring together within a 'ſhort time, all that was neceſſary to eſtabliſh, to 'illuſtrate, and to decorate that ſide of the queſtion 'he ſupported. He ſtated his matter ſkilfully and 'powerfully. He particularly excelled in a moſt 'luminous explanation, and diſplay of his ſubject. 'His ſtile of argument was neither trite and vulgar, 'nor ſubtle and abſtruſe. He hit the Houſe juſt between wind and water.—And not being troubled 'with too anxious a zeal for any matter in queſtion, 'he was never more tedious, or more earneſt, than 'the pre-conceived opinions, and preſent temper of 'his hearers required; to whom he was always in 'perfect uniſon. He conformed exactly to the temper of the Houſe; and he ſeemed to guide, becauſe he was always ſure to follow it.—He had no 'failings which were not owing to a noble cauſe; 'to an ardent, generous, perhaps an immoderate 'paſſion for fame; a paſſion which is the inſtinct of 'all great ſouls. He worſhipped that goddeſs 'whereſoever ſhe appeared; but he paid his particular devotions to her in her favourite habitation, 'in her choſen temple, the Houſe of Commons '(28).'

[R] Elected to every future Parliament till his death, except the fourth.] It is ſaid in Mr. Macpherſon's papers, that this was occaſioned by his having paid court to the Lord Treaſurer Harley, in hopes that he would have made him one of the ſixteen Scotch Peers, in which he was diſappointed: and he, 'therefore, neglected to be choſen in oppoſition to 'the Court, which the Duke (of Argyle) thinks he 'could not have miſſed to be, if he had ſpoke out, 'and employed the intereſt of his friends in Scotland. They ſay he is diſguſted at having been 'played the fool with in this manner, and diſappointed in his hopes; and he muſt have exerted 'himſelf very much, and with great ſucceſs, though 'chiefly out of ſpite, in order to carry the elections 'of and the following year was called to the Privy Council. Upon the acceſſion of King George I. he was nominated Lord Regiſter of Scotland: and though he had long given up all command in the army, yet when the rebellion broke out in 1715, he again betook himſelf to arms, in defence of the Houſe of Hanover. By his prudent conduct in the Weſt Highlands, he prevented General Gordon, at the head of three thouſand men, from penetrating into the country, and raiſing levies. He afterwards joined his brother at Stirling, and was wounded at the battle of Dumblain (b). In 1725, he was appointed Keeper of the Privy Seal; and, from this time, he was entruſted with the management of Scottiſh affairs. In 1734, upon his reſigning the Privy Seal, he was made Keeper of the Great Seal, which office he enjoyed till his death. Upon the deceaſe of his brother, he became Duke of Argyle, Hereditary Juſtice General, Lieutenant, Sheriff, and Commiſſary of Argyleſhire and the Weſtern Iſles, hereditary Great Maſter of the Houſhold, hereditary Keeper of Dunſtaffnage, Carrick, and ſeveral other caſtles (c). He was alſo Chancellor of the Univerſity of Aberdeen (d); and laboured to promote the intereſt of that, as well as of the other Univerſities of Scotland. He particularly encouraged the School of Phyſic at Edinburgh, which has now acquired ſo high a reputation. He was a man of great natural and acquired endowments, well verſed in the laws of his country, eminent for his ſkill in human nature, and poſſeſſed of very conſiderable parliamentary abilities. His ſpeeches often occur in the ſeven volumes of the Hiſtory and Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, publiſhed by Timberland. As he had the chief management of Scotch affairs, he was extremely attentive to promote the trade and manufactures of Scotland, and to forward improvements for the good of his country. It was by his advice that, after the rebellion in 1745, the Highlanders were employed in the Royal army (e). He had great talents for converſation, and had collected one of the moſt valuable private libraries in Great-Britain. He built himſelf a very magnificent ſeat at Inverara. The faculties of his mind continued ſound and vigorous till his death, which happened ſuddenly on the 15th of April, 1761, in the 79th year of his age. He was interred at Kilmun, in the pariſh of Dunoon, in Argyleſhire, the burying-place of the family (f). He married the daughter of Mr. Whitfield, Paymaſter of the Marines, but had no iſſue by her: and was ſucceeded in his titles, and the eſtates of the family, by John Campbell, fourth Duke of Argyle, ſon of the Honourable John Campbell of Mammore, who was the ſecond ſon of Archibald, the ninth Earl of Argyle (g).] T.

 [CAMPBELL (JOHN)*, an eminent hiſtorical, biographical, and political writer of the preſent century, was a native of that part of Great-Britain called Scotland, and born in the city of Edinburgh, on the 8th of March, 1707-8. His father was Robert Campbell of Glenlyon, Eſq; and Captain of Horſe in a regiment commanded by the then Earl of Hyndford; and his mother, Elizabeth, was the daughter of ——— Smith, Eſq; of Windſor, in Berkſhire [A]. Our author was their fourth ſon; and, at the age of five years, he was brought by Mrs. Campbell to Windſor, from Scotland, which country he never ſaw afterwards. It was at Windſor that he is ſuppoſed to have received the firſt principles of his education, under the direction and patronage of his uncle, ——— Smith, Eſq; of that place. At a proper age, he was placed out as clerk to an attorney, being intended for the law; but whether it was that his genius could not be confined to that dry ſtudy, or to whatever cauſes beſides it might be owing, it is certain that he did not purſue the line of his orignal deſignation: neither did he engage in any other particular profeſſion, unleſs that of an author ſhould be conſidered in this light. One thing we are ſure of, that he did not ſpend his time in idleneſs and diſſipation, but in ſuch a cloſe application to the acquiſition of knowledge of various kinds, as ſoon enabled him to appear with great advantage in the literary world. What ſmaller pieces might be written by Mr. Campbell, in the early part of his life, we are not capable of aſcertaining; but we know that, in 1736, before he had completed his thirtieth year, he gave to the public, in two volumes folio, 'The Mi-'litary Hiſtory of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough; comprehending the 'Hiſtory of both thoſe illuſtrious perſons, to the time of their deceaſe.' This performance was enriched with maps, plans, and cuts, by the beſt hands, and particularly by the ingenious Claude du Boſc. The reputation hence acquired by our author, occa-

* For the materials of this article, we are greatly indebted to Mr. William Wharton, who was thirty years Dr. Campbell's ſecretary; and to the Rev. Mr. Hall, Rector of Child Okeford, Dorſetſhire, a particular friend of the Doctor's.

[A] His father was Robert Campbell, &c.] The Campbells of Glenlyon are a branch of the Noble Houſe of Breadalbane, of which a diſtinct account may be ſeen in Niſbet's and Douglas's Peerages. For information concerning the reſpectable family of the Smiths of Windſor, recourſe may be had to Aſhmole's Antiquities of Berkſhire, and to N° 5800, a book of Heraldry, in folio, in the Britiſh Muſeum. Mrs. Campbell likewiſe, and conſequently our author, had the honour of claiming a deſcent from the famous poet, Waller.

ſioned him ſoon after to be ſolicited to take a part in the 'Ancient Univerſal Hiſtory,' a work of great merit, as well as magnitude, though drawn up with ſomething of that inequality which is almoſt unavoidable, when a number of perſons are engaged in carrying on the ſame undertaking. This Hiſtory was publiſhed at firſt, we believe, periodically; and five volumes of it, in folio, were completed in 1740. The ſixth volume was finiſhed in 1742, and the ſeventh in 1744 (a). A ſecond edition of it, in octavo, began to be publiſhed in 1747, and was carried on monthly, with uncommon ſucceſs, till the whole was concluded in twenty volumes. For what parts of it the Republic of Letters was more immediately indebted to Mr. Campbell, it is not in our power to determine, excepting that he is underſtood to have been the writer of the Coſmogony, which affords a diſtinguiſhed proof of his extenſive acquaintance with the ſyſtems of the ancient philoſophers. Whilſt our author was employed in this capital work, he found leiſure to entertain the world with other productions. In 1739, he publiſhed (b), 'The Travels and Adventures of Edward Brown, Eſq;' a book that was ſo well received as to call for another edition (c). In the ſame year appeared his 'Memoirs of 'the Baſhaw Duke de Ripperda (d),' which were reprinted, with improvements, in 1740. Theſe Memoirs were followed, in 1741, by the 'Conciſe Hiſtory of Spaniſh 'America (e),' a ſecond edition of which, if we recollect aright, came out in 1756. In 1742, he was the author of 'A Letter to a Friend in the country, on the publication 'of Thurloe's State Papers;' giving an account of their diſcovery, importance and utility. The ſame year was diſtinguiſhed by the appearance of the firſt and ſecond volumes of his 'Lives of the Engliſh Admirals, and other eminent Britiſh Seamen.' The two remaining volumes were completed in 1744; and the whole, not long after, was tranſlated into German. This, we believe, was the firſt of Mr. Campbell's works to which he prefixed his name; and, indeed, he had no reaſon to be aſhamed of ſo doing, for it is a performance of great and acknowledged merit. The good reception it met with, was evidenced in its paſſing through three editions in his own life-time; and a fourth hath lately been given to the public, under the inſpection of Dr. Berkenhout. When our author had finiſhed the third edition, which is more correct and complete than the former ones, he thus wrote to his ingenious and worthy friend, the Reverend Mr. Hall: 'I am certain the Lives of the Admirals coſt me a great deal of trouble; and I 'can with great veracity affirm, that they contain nothing but my real ſentiments, 'ariſing from as ſtrict an enquiry into the matters which they relate, as was in my 'power.' In 1743, he publiſhed a very curious and entertaining pamphlet, called 'Hermippus revived;' a ſecond edition of which, much improved and enlarged, came out in 1749, under the following title: 'Hermippus Redivivus: or, the Sage's Tri-'umph over old Age and the Grave. Wherein a method is laid down for prolonging 'the life and vigour of man. Including, a Commentary upon an ancient Inſcription, 'in which this great ſecret is revealed; ſupported by numerous authorities. The 'whole interſperſed with a great variety of remarkable and well atteſted relations.' This extraordinary Tract had its origin in a foreign publication [B]; but it was wrought up to perfection by the additional ingenuity and learning of Mr. Campbell, and was founded on the following inſcription, ſaid to be preſerved in Reineſius's Supplement to Gruter.

From the circumſtance here mentioned, which is repreſented as having been the means of prolonging the life of Hermippus to ſo great an age, the author raiſes an hypotheſis, and ſupports it in an admirable ſtrain of grave irony, concerning the ſalutary nature of the breath of young perſons, eſpecially girls and young women. Beſides this, he digreſſes largely concerning the hermetic philoſophers and their univerſal medicine; and relates a variety of ſtories concerning them, which are excellently calculated, not only only to amuſe his readers, but almoſt to deceive thoſe who are not ſufficiently aware of his intention, and whoſe judgments are not matured. The writer of this article well remembers, that, having read the 'Hermippus Redivivus' in his youth, ſuch an impreſſion was made by it upon his imagination, that, though his underſtanding was not convinced, or his belief engaged, by the reaſonings and facts contained in it, he ſeemed for two or three days to be in a kind of Fairy-land. Dr. Mackenzie, a phyſician at Worceſter, and the author of a Treatiſe on Health, is ſaid to have viewed Mr. Campbell's book in a ſerious light; and to have been ſo far influenced by it, that he went and lived ſome time at a female boarding-ſchool, for the benefit of receiving the ſalutary effects ariſing from the breath of the young ladies (f). Mr. Thickneſs, in a late performance, hath gravely adopted the ſyſtem of the 'Hermippus Redivivus.' It had been aſſerted, that Monſ. Bayle alone poſſeſſed the faculty of treating at large upon a difficult ſubject, without diſcovering to which ſide his own ſentiments leaned, and that his acquaintance with uncommon books extended farther than that of any other man. The Hermippus was an eſſay to ſhew, that ſuch a mode of writing, and ſuch a ſpecies of literature were not confined to Monſ. Bayle. This, as our author himſelf long afterwards informed Mr. Hall, was the true key to the book. In 1756, a tranſlation of it into Italian, was publiſhed at Leghorn (g); in the introductory preface to which, high commendations are beſtowed upon the Hermippus Redivivus.

(g) In quarto.

The ſmaller pieces written by Mr. Campbell were only an occaſional amuſement to him, and never interrupted the courſe of the great works in which he was engaged. In 1744, he gave to the public, in two volumes, folio, his Voyages and Travels, on Dr. Harris's plan, being a very diſtinguiſhed improvement of that Gentleman's Collection, which had appeared in 1705. So well was this publication of our author received, that a new edition was ſoon called for, which came out in numbers, and was finiſhed in 1749. The work contains all the circumnavigators from the time of Columbus to Lord Anſon; a complete Hiſtory of the Eaſt Indies; hiſtorical Details of the ſeveral Attempts made for the Diſcovery of the North-eaſt and North-weſt Paſſages; the Commercial Hiſtory of Corea and Japan; the Ruſſian Diſcoveries by Land and Sea; a diſtinct Account of the Spaniſh, Portugueſe, Britiſh, French, Dutch, and Daniſh Settlements in America; with other Pieces not to be found in any former Collection. The whole was conducted with eminent ſkill and judgment, and the Preface is acknowledged to be a maſter-piece of compoſition and information. The time and care employed by Mr. Campbell in this important undertaking, did not prevent his engaging in another great work, with regard to which we have reaſon to record his learned labours with particular pleaſure. The work we mean is the Biographia Britannica, which began to be publiſhed in weekly numbers in 1745, and the firſt volume of which was completed in 1746, as was the ſecond in 1748. By one of thoſe revolutions to which the beſt deſigns are ſubject, the public attention to the Biographia ſeemed to flag, when about two volumes had been printed: but this attention was ſoon revived by the very high encomium that was paſſed upon it by Mr. Gilbert Weſt, at the cloſe of his poem on Education; from which time the undertaking was carried on with increaſing reputation and ſucceſs. We need not ſay, that its reputation and ſucceſs were greatly owing to our author. It is no diſparagement to the abilities and learning of his coadjutors to aſſert, that his articles conſtitute the prime merit of the four volumes through which they extend. He was not ſatisfied with giving a cold narration of the perſonal circumſtances relative to the eminent men whoſe lives he drew up, but was ambitious of entering into ſuch a copious and critical diſcuſſion of their actions or writings, as ſhould render the Biographia Britannica a moſt valuable Repoſitory of hiſtorical and literary Knowledge. This end he has admirably accompliſhed, and herein hath left an excellent example to his ſucceſſors. We have formerly mentioned (h), that he received the thanks of John, the fifth Earl of Orrery, 'in the name of all the Boyles, for the 'honour he had done to them, and to his own judgment, by placing the family in 'ſuch a light as to give a ſpirit of emulation to thoſe who were hereafter to inherit the 'title.' The ingenious Mr. Walpole, ſpeaking of the Campbells, Earls of Argyle, adds, 'It is totally unneceſſary for me to enter into their characters, that taſk having 'been ſo fully performed by one who wears the honour of their name, and who, it is no 'compliment to ſay, is one of the ableſt and moſt beautiful writers of this country (i).' The like encomium might be extended to many other articles, ſeveral of which are ſo uniformly complete, and ſo highly finiſhed, that it is difficult to aſcertain where the preference ought to be given. Were we, however, to ſelect any ſingle life from the reſt, we ſhould ſay, that the account of Roger Bacon alone would be ſufficient to procure for our author no ſmall degree of reputation. One thing by which he is peculiarly diſtinguiſhed, is the candour diſplayed by him with reſpect to thoſe perſons from whom he moſt differed in religious and political opinions. After he had written the Lives of the Calamies, he was waited upon by the Reverend Mr. Edmund Calamy, to thank him for thoſe articles, and eſpecially for the juſtice done to his great grandfather, the firſt divine of that family. Mr. Calamy was even ſurprized to find that Mr. Campbell was a Member

Member of the Church of England; and ſtill more ſo, when he learned that our Biographer had undertaken the articles of Mr. Baxter and Dr. Conant, on purpoſe to prevent their falling into hands that might not equally be diſpoſed to pay the teſtimony due to their reſpective merits. Indeed, our author has been charged with an exceſs of candour, in ſome of the accounts given in the Biographia. But if, in a few inſtances, there ſhould appear to be any ground for this charge, it ought to be remembered, that his error never proceeded from any intention to flatter or deceive, but from the amiable benevolence of his heart, and from his readineſs to diſcern, and to acknowledge, the talents and the worthineſs of men who were of the moſt oppoſite principles and parties. It ought, alſo, to be remembered, that his candour was not unfrequently the reſult of ſuperior knowledge; and that it led him into diſquiſitions, which tended to throw new light on characters and actions.

When the late Mr. Robert Dodſley formed the deſign of that uſeful book, 'The 'Preceptor,' which appeared in 1748, Mr. Campbell was one of the ingenious Gentlemen applied to, to aſſiſt in the undertaking; and the parts written by him were the Introduction to Chronology, and the Diſcourſe on Trade and Commerce, both of which diſplayed an extenſive fund of knowledge upon theſe ſubjects. In 1750, he publiſhed (k) the firſt ſeparate edition of his 'Preſent State of Europe;' a work which had been originally begun in 1746, in the 'Muſeum,' a very valuable periodical performance, printed for Mr. Dodſley. There is no production of our author's that hath met with a better reception. It has gone through ſix editions, and fully hath it deſerved this encouragement; for it is not eaſy to find a book which, in ſuch a moderate compaſs, contains ſo much hiſtorical and political information. The perſpicuity, the good ſenſe, and the ſagacity with which it is written, will ever command attention and admiration, even though ſome of Mr. Campbell's conjectures and reaſonings concerning the future views and intereſts of the European powers, ſhould happen to be overturned by the late ſurprizing revolutions in the politics of the world. In ſuch high eſtimation was 'The 'preſent State of Europe' held abroad, that the Count de Giſors, one of the moſt amiable young noblemen of his time, and only ſon to the Marſhal Duke de Belleiſle, learned Engliſh, when at Copenhagen, in order to be able to read it. The next great undertaking which called for the exertion of our author's abilities and learning, was 'The Modern Univerſal Hiſtory.' This extenſive work was publiſhed, from time to time, in detached parts, till it amounted to ſixteen volumes folio; and a ſecond edition of it, in octavo, began to make its appearance in 1759. The parts of it written by Mr. Campbell, were the Hiſtories of the Portugueſe, Dutch, Spaniſh, French, Swediſh, Daniſh, and Oſtend Settlements in the Eaſt Indies; and the Hiſtories of the Kingdoms of Spain, Portugal, Algarve, Navarre, and that of France, from Clovis to the year 1656. It may, without controverſy, be aſſerted, that theſe parts of 'The Modern Univerſal Hiſtory,' muſt be reckoned among ſome of its brighteſt ornaments. As our author had thus diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Literary World, the Degree of L.L.D. was very properly and honourably conferred upon him, on the 18th of June, 1754, by the Univerſity of Glaſgow. With regard to his ſmaller publications, there are ſeveral, we apprehend, that have eluded our moſt diligent enquiry: of ſome others we ſhall give an account in a note [C]. His laſt grand work was 'A political Survey of Britain: being a Series of 'Reflections

(k) In octavo.

[C] Of ſome others we ſhall give an account in a note.] In early life, he wrote a little piece, entitled, 'A Diſcourſe on Providence,' 8vo, the third edition of which was printed in 1748. He publiſhed in 1746, 'The Sentiments of a Dutch Patriot. Being 'the Speech of Mr. V. Hn, in an auguſt As-'SEMBLY on the preſent ſtate of affairs, and the 'reſolution neceſſary at this juncture to be taken for 'the ſafety of the Republic (2).' The Hiſtory of this little Tract, the deſign of which was to expoſe the temporizing policy of the States of Holland, is ſomewhat amuſing. His amanuenſis, when he was going to write the pamphlet, having diſappointed him, he requeſted, after tea in the afternoon, that Mrs. Campbell, when ſhe had ordered a good fire to be made, would retire to bed as ſoon as poſſible, with the ſervants; and, at the ſame time, leave him four ounces of coffee. This was done, and he wrote till twelve o'clock at night, when, finding his ſpirits flag, he took two ounces. With this aſſiſtance, he went on till ſix in the morning, when again beginning to grow weary, he drank the remainder of the coffee. Hence he was enabled to proceed with freſh vigour, till nine or ten o'clock in the morning, when he finiſhed the pamphlet, which had a great run, and was productive of conſiderable profit. Mr. Campbell having ſucceeded ſo well in a performance haſtily written, expected much greater ſucceſs from another work, about which he had taken extraordinary pains, and which had coſt him a long time in compoſing. But when it came to be publiſhed, it ſcarcely paid the expence of advertiſing. Some years afterwards, a book in French was brought to him, that had been tranſlated from the German; and he was aſked, whether a tranſlation of it into Engliſh would not be likely to be acceptable. Upon examining it, he found that it was his own neglected work, which had made its way into Germany, and had there been tranſlated and publiſhed, without any acknowledgment of the obligation due to the original writer (3).

(2) In octavo.

In 1749, he printed, in octavo, 'Occaſional 'Thoughts on moral, ſerious, and religious Sub-'jects.' In 1754, he was the author of a work, entitled, 'The rational Amuſement, comprehending 'a Collection of Letters on a great variety of Sub-'jects, interſperſed with Eſſays, and ſome little 'Pieces of Humour (4).' 'The Shepherd of Ban-'bury's Rules,' a favourite pamphlet with the common people, and 'The Hiſtory of the War in the 'Eaſt Indies,' which appeared in 1758 or 1759, under the name of Mr. Watts, are ſuppoſed to have been of Mr. Campbell's compoſition. Upon the concluſion of the peace of Paris, our author was requeſted

'Reflections on the Situation, Lands, Inhabitants, Revenues, Colonies, and Com'merce of this iſland. Intended to ſhew, that they have not as yet approached near the 'ſummit of improvement, but that it will afford employment to many generations, be'fore they puſh to their utmoſt extent the natural advantages of Great-Britain.'. This work, which was publiſhed in 1774, in two volumes, royal quarto, coſt Dr Campbell many years of attention, ſtudy and labour. As it was his laſt, ſo it ſeems to have been his favourite production, upon which he intended to erect a durable monument of his ſincere and ardent love to his country. A more truly patriot publication never appeared in the Engliſh language. The variety of information it contains is prodigious; and there is no book that better deſerves the cloſe and conſtant ſtudy of the Politician, the Senator, the Gentleman, the Merchant, the Manufacturer; in ſhort, of every one who has it in any degree in his power to promote the intereſt and welfare of Great-Britain. An aſſiduous purſuit of the numerous hints and plans of improvement ſuggeſted by our worthy author, would, perhaps, be the only effectual method of preſerving and continuing the proſperity of this iſland, amidſt that combination of enemies and misfortunes with which ſhe is at preſent ſurrounded. As the 'Po'litical Survey' is ſo excellent both in its deſign and execution, it is not ſurprizing that Dr. Campbell ſhould receive the higheſt teſtimonies in commendation of it, and that it ſhould engage him in a very extenſive correſpondence. The correſpondence occaſioned by it was, indeed, ſo great, that, in a letter to Mr. Hall, dated July 21, 1774, he informed his friend, that it had abſorbed a rheam of paper; and that he was about to begin upon another rheam, which would probably ſhare the ſame fate.

In the account which has been given of Dr. Campbell's writings, we have mentioned ſome of the encomiums that have been paſſed upon his literary merit. Several others might he added; but we ſhall content ourſelves with producing one or two, that happen to be at hand. Dr. Smollet, when doing juſtice to the eminent writers who adorned the reign of King George the Second, ſays, 'Nor let us forget the merit con-
'ſpicuous in the works of Campbell, remarkable for candour, intelligence, and preci'ſion (l).' The author of the 'Account of the European Settlements in America,' which common fame aſcribes to a gentleman of the moſt diſtinguiſhed abilities and character, concludes his Preface with the following paſſage. 'Having ſpoken perhaps a 'little too hardly of my materials, I muſt except the aſſiſtance I have had from the ju'dicious collection called Harris's Voyages. There are not many finer pieces than the 'Hiſtory of Brazil in that Collection. The light in which the author ſets the events
'in that hiſtory is fine and inſtructive; an uncommon ſpirit prevails through it; and 'his remarks are every where ſtriking and deep. The little ſketch I have given in the 'part of Portugueſe America, if it has any merit, is entirely due to that original.'——
'Where I differ from him in any reſpect, it is with deference to the judgment of a wri'ter, to whom this nation is much obliged, for endeavouring every where, with ſo
'much good ſenſe and eloquence, to rouze that ſpirit of generous enterprize, that can 'alone make any nation powerful or glorious.' Dr. Campbell's reputation was not confined to his own country, but extended to the remoteſt parts of Europe. As a ſtriking inſtance of this, we may mention, that in the ſpring of the year 1774, the Empreſs of Ruſſia was pleaſed to honour him with the preſent of her picture, drawn in the robes worn in that country in the days of John Baſiliowitz, Grand Duke of Muſcovy, who was contemporary with Queen Elizabeth. To manifeſt the Doctor's ſenſe of her Imperial Majeſty's goodneſs, a ſett of the 'Political Survey of Britain,' bound in Morocco, highly ornamented, and accompanied with a letter deſcriptive of the triumphs and felicities of her reign, was forwarded to St. Peterſburgh, and conveyed queſted by Lord Bute, to take ſome ſhare in the vindication of that peace. Accordingly, he wrote (5) a 'Deſcription and Hiſtory of the new Sugar 'Iſlands in the Weſt Indies;' the deſign of which was to ſhew the value and importance of the neutral iſlands that had been ceded to us by the French. As his book was to be preſented to the King, he was deſired to write a Dedication to his Majeſty; which he wiſhed to decline, becauſe he had hitherto avoided all political diſputes, and becauſe his earlier attachments and ſentiments had not led him to pay his devoirs to the Court of St. James's. However, it was at length determined, that he ſhould preſent the Dedication in manuſcript. The following is a copy of it.

into the hands of that great Princeſs, by Prince Gregorio Orloff, who had reſided ſome months in this kingdom. The Empreſs's picture, ſince the death of our author, hath been preſented by his widow to Lord Macartney.

Let us now advert a little to Dr. Campbell's perſonal Hiſtory. On the 23d of May, 1736, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Benjamin Vobe, of Leominſter, in the county of Hereford, Gentleman, with which Lady, he lived nearly forty years in the greateſt conjugal harmony and happineſs. So wholly did he dedicate his time to books, that he ſeldom went abroad: but to relieve himſelf, as much as poſſible, from the inconveniencies incident to a ſedentary life, it was his cuſtom, when the weather would admit, to walk in his garden; or, otherwiſe, in ſome room of his houſe, by way of exerciſe. By this method, united with the ſtricteſt temperance in eating, and an equal abſtemiouſneſs in drinking, he enjoyed a good ſtate of health, though his conſtitution was delicate. His domeſtic manner of living did not preclude him from a very extenſive and honourable acquaintance. His houſe, eſpecially on a Sunday evening, was the reſort of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons of all ranks, and particularly of ſuch as had rendered themſelves eminent by their knowledge, or love of Literature. He received foreigners, who were fond of learning, with an affability and kindneſs, which excited in them the higheſt reſpect and veneration; and his inſtructive and chearful converſation, made him the delight of his friends in general. On the 5th of March, 1765, Dr. Campbell was appointed his Majeſty's Agent for the Province of Georgia, in North America, which employment he held till his deceaſe. His laſt illneſs was a decline, the conſequence of a life devoted to ſevere ſtudy, and which reſiſted every attempt for his relief that the moſt ſkilful in the medical ſcience could deviſe. By this illneſs he was carried off, at his houſe in Queen-Square, Ormond-Street, on the 28th of December, 1775, when he had nearly completed the ſixty-eighth year of his age. His end was tranquil and eaſy, and he preſerved the full uſe of all his faculties to the lateſt moment of his life. On the fourth of January following his deceaſe, he was interred in the New Burying Ground, behind the Foundling Hoſpital, belonging to the pariſh of St. George the Martyr, where a monument, with a plain and modeſt inſcription, hath been erected to his memory. Dr. Campbell had by his Lady ſeven children, one of whom only ſurvived him, Anne, who, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1763, married John Grant, Eſq; of Lovat, near Inverneſs, in North-Britain, then Captain in the fifty-eighth regiment of foot, and lately his Majeſty's Commiſſary and Paymaſter of the Royal Artillery at New-York. Mrs. Grant, who was a woman of excellent underſtanding and taſte, which had been cultivated under her father's eye, and who was poſſeſſed of the moſt amiable virtues, died at New-York, on the 2d of July, 1778, in the thirty-ſeventh year of her age. Mr. Grant, returning ſome time after to England, departed this life at Kenſington, in the month of November 1780. Three children, left by Mr. and Mrs. Grant, are now under the care of their worthy Grandmother, the Doctor's widow, and are her only remaining conſolation.

Dr. Campbell's literary knowledge, was by no means confined to the ſubjects on which he more particularly treated as an author. He was well acquainted with the mathematics, and had read much in medicine. It hath been with great reaſon believed, that if he had dedicated his ſtudies to the laſt ſcience, he would have made a very conſpicuous figure in the phyſical profeſſion. He was eminently verſed in the different parts of ſacred literature; and his acquaintance with the languages extended not only to the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin among the ancient, and to the French, Italian, Spaniſh, Portugueſe, and Dutch, among the modern; but, likewiſe, to the Oriental Tongues. He was particularly fond of the Greek language. His attainment of ſuch a variety of knowledge, was exceedingly aſſiſted by a memory ſurprizingly retentive, and which, indeed, aſtoniſhed every perſon with whom he was converſant. A ſtriking inſtance of this hath been given by the Honourable Mr. Daines Barrington, in his Tract, entitled, 'The Probability of reaching the North Pole diſcuſſed [D].' In communicating his ideas, our author had an uncommon readineſs and facility; and the ſtile of his works, which had been formed upon the model of that of the celebrated Biſhop Sprat, was perſpicuous, eaſy, flowing, and harmonious. Should it be thought that it is ſometimes rather too diffuſive, it will, notwithſtanding, indubitably be allowed, that it is, in general, very elegant and beautiful.

To all theſe accompliſhments of the underſtanding, Dr. Campbell joined the more important virtues of a moral and pious character. His diſpoſition was gentle and humane, and his manners kind and obliging. He was the tendereſt of huſbands, a moſt indulgent parent, a kind maſter, a firm and ſincere friend. To his great Creator

[D] In his Tract, entitled, The Probability of reaching the North Pole diſcuſſed.] The inſtance mentioned by Mr. Barrington, regards the accuracy wherewith Dr. Campbell, at the diſtance of thirty years, remembered the facts related to him by a Dr. Daillie, concerning a voyage towards the North Pole; in which the navigators, among whom was Dr. Daillie himſelf, went ſo far as to the 88th degree of north latitude; and might eaſily have proceeded farther, had not the Captain thought himſelf obliged, by his duty in other reſpects, to return.

he paid the conſtant and ardent tribute of devotion, duty, and reverence; and in his correſpondences he ſhewed, that a ſenſe of piety was always neareſt his heart. 'We 'cannot,' ſaid he, in a letter to Mr. Hall, 'too much inſiſt on the neceſſity of reli-'gion, not only as ſecuring our happineſs hereafter, but as the only ſafe and certain 'rule of life, and ten thouſand times preferable to the modern notions of philoſophy, 'and ties of honour. I may with great truth ſay, that the Church Catechiſm is a 'much better ſyſtem of morals than Tully's Offices. There are many fine things 'in theſe, and in the works of Seneca; but, in my judgment, none that equal, either 'in ſpirit or compoſition, ſome of the Collects in our Liturgy.' On another occaſion, he wrote to the ſame friend, that he thought there was more good ſenſe, and far better precepts for the conduct of life, in the Wiſdom of Solomon, and the ſon of Sirach, than in all the Heathen Sages put together; or than could be met with in Lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Hume, or Voltaire. It was our author's cuſtom every day, to read one or more portions of Scripture, in the original, with the ancient Verſions, and the beſt Commentators before him; and in this way, as appears from his own occaſional notes and remarks, he went through the Sacred Writings a number of times, with great thankfulneſs and advantage.

Such was Dr. Campbell as a writer and as a man. By his works he has ſecured not only a laſting reputation, but rendered himſelf highly beneficial to the public; and by his virtues, he became prepared for that happy immortality, which awaits all the genuine followers of goodneſs [E]. K.

[E] Since note C was printed off, we have had an opportunity, by the favour of the Hon. Mr. Daynes Barrington, the Rev. Dr. Lort, and Mr. Reed, of enlarging, as follows, our liſt of Dr. Campbell's ſmaller publications. 'The Caſe of the Oppoſition 'impartially ſtated,' 8vo. 1742. In Mr. Reed's copy of this pamphlet, are various corrections and additions in Dr. Campbell's own hand, which appear evidently written with a view to a ſecond impreſſion. In Mr. Barrington's curious collection of papers, relative to the probability of reaching to the North Pole, is a Tract, which he received from a learned friend, who permitted him to print it, though not to inform the public to whom they were indebted for the communication. It is entitled, 'Thoughts on the probability, expediency, 'and utility of diſcovering a paſſage by the North 'Pole.' We are now permitted by Mr. Barrington to ſay, that the writer of this ingenious eſſay was Dr. Campbell.

We were in hopes of communicating to our readers ſome farther intelligence concerning our author's moſt early publications; but the materials not having been ſent to us in time, we muſt be contented with taking notice of them, if obtained, in the Addenda to be prefixed to the next volume.

* For the materials of this Article, we are wholly indebted to Mr. William Canton, ſon of Mr. John Canton.

 [CANTON (JOHN), an ingenious natural philoſopher of the preſent century, was born at Stroud, in Glouceſterſhire, on the 31ſt of July, 1718, old ſtile; and was placed, when young, under the care of a Mr. Davis, of the ſame place, a very able mathematician, with whom, before he attained the age of nine years, he had gone through both vulgar and decimal arithmetic. He then proceeded to the mathematics, and particularly to algebra and aſtronomy, wherein he had made a conſiderable progreſs, when his father took him from ſchool, and put him to learn his own buſineſs, which was that of a broad-cloth weaver. This circumſtance was not able to damp his zeal for the acquiſition of knowledge. All his leiſure time was devoted to the aſſiduous cultivation of aſtronomical ſcience; and, by the help of the Caroline Tables, annexed to Wing's Aſtronomy, he computed eclipſes of the moon and other phænomena. His acquaintance with that ſcience he applied, likewiſe, to the conſtructing of ſeveral kinds of dials. But the ſtudies of our young philoſopher being frequently purſued to very late hours, his father, fearing that they would injure his health, forbad him the uſe of a candle in his chamber, any longer than for the purpoſe of going to bed, and would himſelf often ſee that his injunction was obeyed. The ſon's thirſt of knowledge was, however, ſo great, that it made him attempt to evade the prohibition, and to find means of ſecreting his light till the family had retired to reſt, when he roſe to proſecute undiſturbed his favourite purſuits. It was during this prohibition, and at theſe hours, that he computed, and cut upon ſtone, with no better an inſtrument than a common knife, the lines of a large upright ſun-dial, on which, beſides the hour of the day, was ſhewn the riſing of the ſun, his place in the ecliptic, and ſome other particulars. When this was finiſhed, and made known to his father, he permitted it to be placed againſt the front of his houſe, where it excited the admiration of ſeveral gentlemen in the neighbourhood, and introduced young Mr. Canton to their acquaintance, which was followed by the offer of the uſe of their libraries. In the library of one of theſe gentlemen, he found Martin's Philoſophical Grammar, which was the firſt book that gave him a taſte for Natural Philoſophy. In the poſſeſſion of another gentleman, a few miles from Stroud, he firſt ſaw a pair of globes; an object that afforded him uncommon pleaſure, from the great eaſe with which he could ſolve thoſe problems he had hitherto been accuſtomed to compute. The dial was beautified a few years ago, at the expence of the Gentlemen at Stroud, ſeveral of whom had been his ſchool-fellows, and who continued ſtill to regard it as very diſtinguiſhed performance. Among other perſons with whom he became acquainted in early life, was the late Reverend and ingenious Dr. Henry Miles of Tooting, a learned and reſpectable member of the Royal Society, and of approved eminence in natural knowledge. This gentleman, perceiving that Mr. Canton poſſeſſed abilities too promiſing to be confined within the narrow limits of a country town, prevailed on his father to permit him to come to London. Accordingly, he arrived at the metropolis on the 14th of March, 1737, and reſided with Dr. Miles, at Tooting, till the ſixth of May following; when he articled himſelf, for the term of five years, as a clerk to Mr. Samuel Watkins, maſter of the academy in Spital-Square. In this ſituation, his ingenuity, diligence, and good conduct, were ſo well diſplayed, that, on the expiration of his clerkſhip, in the month of May, 1742, he was taken into partnerſhip with Mr. Watkins for three years; which gentleman he afterwards ſucceeded in Spital-Square, and there continued during his whole life. On the 25th of December, 1744, he married Penelope, the eldeſt daughter of Mr. Thomas Colebrooke, and niece to James Colebrooke, Eſq; Banker in London.

Towards the end of the year 1745, Electricity, which ſeems early to have engaged Mr. Canton's notice, received a very capital improvement by the diſcovery of the famous Leyden Phial. This event turned the thoughts of moſt of the Philoſophers of Europe to that branch of Natural Philoſophy; and our author, who was one of the firſt to repeat and to purſue the experiment, found his aſſiduity and attention rewarded by many capital diſcoveries. Dr. William Watſon, whoſe early and diſtinguiſhed proſecution of electrical enquiries is well known, mentions, in a paper read at the Royal Society, on the 30th of October, 1746 (a), an experiment of Mr. Canton's, to determine the quantity of electricity accumulated in the Leyden Phial. Taking the charged phial in one hand, he made it give a ſpark to an inſulated conductor, which ſpark he took off with his other hand. This operation he repeated till the whole was diſcharged; and by the number of the ſparks, he eſtimated the height of the charge. He found, likewiſe, that if a charged phial was placed upon electrics, the wire and the coating would give a ſpark or two alternately, and that by continuing the operation the phial would be diſcharged. Dr. Prieſtley has taken notice, that this diſcovery has a near affinity to the great diſcovery of Dr. Franklin (b). Mr. Canton, however, did not at that time obſerve, that the alternate ſparks proceed from the two contrary electricities. In the Gentleman's Magazine for January, 1747, he publiſhed two electrical problems (c). Towards the end of the year 1749, he was concerned with his friend, the late ingenious Benjamin Robins, Eſq; in making experiments in order to determine to what height rockets may be made to aſcend, and at what diſtance their light may be ſeen [A]. On the 17th of January, 1750, was read at the Royal Society, Mr. Canton's 'Method of making Artificial Magnets, without the uſe of, and yet far ſuperior to any natural ones [B].' This paper, which had been written ſome time before,

[A] In order to determine to what height rockets may be made to aſcend, and at what diſtance their lights may be ſeen.] The firſt trial was on the 29th of September that year, when about a dozen rockets, made by a perſon many years employed in the Royal Laboratory at Woolwich, were fired from London Field, Hackney. The heights to which they aſcended were meaſured by Mr. Canton, (Mr. Robins being preſent) at the diſtance of 1200 yards from the poſt from whence they were fired. They roſe in general to about 400 yards, and the higheſt to about 600 yards, and were ſeen by different perſons, ſtationed on purpoſe, at the diſtance of 35 miles. Some more trials were made on the 12th of October following, at the ſame place, when the rockets roſe to nearly the ſame heights with the former, excepting one, which was obſerved to riſe 690 yards. On the 2d of April, 1750, ſome rockets, conſtructed by Mr. Banks and Mr. Samuel Da Coſta of Devonſhire Square, were fired off, when ſeveral of the latter gentleman's roſe to 1000 yards, and one to 1200 yards. The heights to which theſe aſcended were likewiſe all taken by Mr. Canton (1).

[B] Method of making artificial magnets, &c.] Having procured a dozen bars, ſix of ſoft ſteel, each three inches long, $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch broad, and $\frac{1}{20}$ of an inch thick, with two pieces of iron, each half the length of one of the bars, but of the ſame breadth and thickneſs; and ſix of hard ſteel, each $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches long, $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch broad, and $\frac{3}{20}$ of an inch thick, with two pieces of iron of half the length, but the whole breadth and thickneſs of one of the hard bars: they were all marked quite round them at one end.

Then having fixed one of the ſoft bars with a piece of ſewing ſilk, near the top of a poker, (which was held upright between the knees) with its marked end downwards; with a pair of tongs held nearly in a vertical poſition, the bar was ſtroked by the lower end from the bottom to the top, about ten times on each ſide, which gave it a magnetic power ſufficient to lift a ſmall key at the marked end: which end, if the bar was ſuſpended on a point, would turn toward the north, and is therefore called the north pole of the bar.

Four of the ſoft bars having been impregnated after this manner, the other two were laid parallel to each other, at the diſtance of about $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch, between the two pieces of iron belonging to them, a north and a ſouth pole againſt each piece of iron: then fore, would ſooner have been communicated to the Society, had not our author apprehended, that the publication of it might be injurious to Dr. Gowen Knight, who procured conſiderable pecuniary advantages by touching needles for the Mariner's Compaſs, and kept his method a ſecret. But Mr. Canton having ſhewn his experiments to Martin Folkes, Eſq; that gentleman was of opinion, that a diſcovery of ſuch general utility to mankind, ought not to be withheld from the public on any private conſideration. Accordingly, our Philoſopher ſoon afterwards gave it to the Royal Society, and exhibited before that learned body the main experiment itſelf, together with ſome others relative to the ſame ſubject, all which ſucceeded greatly to their ſatisfaction. Mr. Canton's paper upon this occaſion procured him, on the 22d of March, 1750, the honour of being elected a member of the Society; and, on the St. Andrew's day following, the farther honour of receiving the moſt diſtinguiſhed teſtimony of their approbation, in the preſent of their gold medal. On the 21ſt of April, in the ſame year, he was complimented with the Degree of Maſter of Arts, by the Univerſity of Aberdeen; and, on the 30th of November, 1751, he was choſen one of the Council of the Royal Society.

In 1752, when the act paſſed for changing the ſtile, Mr. Canton gave to the Earl of Macclesfield ſeveral memorial canons for finding Leap-year, the Dominical Letter, the Epact, &c. This he did with the view of having them inſerted in the Common Prayer Book; but he happened to be too late in his communication, the form in which they now ſtand having been previouſly ſettled. Theſe canons, with an explication of the reaſons of the rules, were afterwards given to the Reverend Dr. Jennings, who was thankful for the permiſſion of inſerting them in his Introduction to the Uſe of the Globes.

On the 20th of July, 1752, our Philoſopher was ſo fortunate as to be the firſt perſon in England, who, by attracting the electric fire from the clouds during a thunder ſtorm, verified Dr. Franklin's hypotheſis of the ſimilarity of lightning and electricity. Mr. Canton's ſucceſs was owing to his precaution in faſtening a tin cover to his apparatus, in order to ſecure the glaſs tube, which ſupported it, from rain. By this means he was enabled to get ſparks at the diſtance of half an inch; but the appearance ceaſed in the ſpace of two minutes. On the 6th of December, 1753, his paper, entitled, 'Electrical Ex-'periments, with an attempt to account for their ſeveral Phænomena,' was read at the Royal Society. The experiments in this communication tend to prove, that the electrical fluid, when there is a redundancy of it in any body, repels the electrical fluid in any other body when they are brought within the ſphere of each others influence, and drives it into the remote parts of the body, or quite out of it, if there be any outlet for that purpoſe: in other words, that bodies immerged in electrical atmoſpheres, always become poſſeſſed of the electricity contrary to that of the body in the atmoſphere of which they are immerged. At the time of making theſe experiments, Mr. Canton was of opinion, with Dr. Franklin, that excited glaſs emits the electric fluid, but that excited wax receives it. Afterwards, however, he ſaw reaſon to think, that electric atmoſpheres are not made of effluvia from excited or electrified bodies, but that they are only an alteration of the ſtate of the electric fluid contained in, or belonging to the air ſurrounding them, to a certain diſtance: excited glaſs, for inſtance, repels the electric fluid from it, and conſequently beyond that diſtance makes it more denſe; whereas excited wax attracts the electric fluid exiſting in the air nearer to it, making it rarer than it was before. In the ſame paper, Mr. Canton mentioned, likewiſe, his having diſcovered, by a great number of experiments, that ſome clouds were in a poſitive, and ſome in a negative then taking two of the four bars already made magnetical, they were placed together ſo as to make a double bar in thickneſs, the north pole of one, even with the ſouth pole of the other: the remaining two were then put to theſe, one on each ſide, ſo as to have two north, and two ſouth poles together. The north poles were then ſeparated by a large pin from the ſouth poles, and placed perpendicularly with that end downward, on the middle of one of the parallel bars, the two north poles towards its ſouth, and the two ſouth poles towards its north end: they were then ſlid backward and forward three or four times the whole length of the bar, and being removed from the middle of this, they were placed on the middle of the other bar, in the ſame manner as before, which was gone over in the ſame manner. Then the bars being turned the other ſide upward, the former operation was repeated; which being done, the two were taken from between the pieces of iron, and the two outermoſt of the touching bars being placed in their room, the remaining two were made the outermoſt of the four to touch theſe with: and this proceſs was repeated till each pair of bars had been touched three or four times over, which gave them a conſiderable magnetic power. The half dozen were then put together after the manner of the four, and with them two pair of the hard bars (placed between their irons at the diſtance of about $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch from each other) were touched, the ſoft bars being then laid aſide, and the remaining two hard bars, were impregnated by the four above-mentioned; and the ſame method was obſerved as with the ſoft bars, till each pair had been touched two or three times over, which gave them nearly as much magnetic virtue as they were capable of receiving.

The firſt hint of uſing the poker and tongs to communicate magnetiſm to ſteel bars was taken, from Mr. Canton's obſerving them one evening, as he was ſitting by the fire, to be nearly in the ſame direction with reſpect to the earth as the dipping needle. He thence concluded, that they muſt from that poſition, and the frequent blows they receive, have acquired ſome magnetic virtue, which on trial he found to be the caſe; and therefore he employed them to impregnate his bars, inſtead of having recourſe to the natural loadſtone.

ſtate of electricity. Dr. Franklin, much about the ſame time, made the like diſcovery in America. This circumſtance, together with our author's conſtant defence of the Doctor's hypotheſis, induced that excellent philoſopher, immediately on his arrival in England, to pay Mr. Canton a viſit, and gave riſe to a friendſhip which ever after continued without interruption or diminution. On the 14th of November, 1754, was read at the Royal Society, 'A letter to the Right Honourable the Earl of Macclesfield, 'concerning ſome new electrical experiments.' Till the publication of this letter, the ſame electricity had always been produced by the ſame electric. The friction of glaſs had always produced a poſitive, and the friction of ſealing-wax, &c. a negative electricity. Theſe were thought to be eſſential and unchangeable properties of thoſe ſubſtances. But Mr. Canton diſcovered, that it depended wholly on the rubber, and the ſurface of the electric, whether the electricity produced ſhould be poſitive or negative [C]. On St. Andrew's day, 1754, he was a ſecond time elected one of the Council of the Royal Society for the year enſuing. In the Lady's Diary for 1756, our author anſwered the prize queſtion that had been propoſed in the preceding year. The queſtion was, 'How can what we call the ſhooting of ſtars be beſt accounted for; what 'is the ſubſtance of this phænomenon; and in what ſtate of the atmoſphere doth it 'moſt frequently ſhew itſelf?' The ſolution, though anonymous, was ſo ſatisfactory to his friend, Mr. Thomas Simpſon, who then conducted that work, that he ſent Mr. Canton the prize, accompanied with a note, in which he ſaid, he was ſure that he was not miſtaken in the author of it, as no one beſides, that he knew of, could have anſwered the queſtion. Our philoſopher's next communication to the public, was a letter in the Gentleman's Magazine for September, 1759, on the electrical properties of the tourmalin, in which the laws of that wonderful ſtone are laid down in a very conciſe and elegant manner [D]. On the 13th of December, in the ſame year, was read, at the Royal Society, 'An Attempt to account for the regular diurnal variation of the 'Horizontal Magnetic Needle; and alſo for its irregular variation at the time of an 'Aurora Borealis.' In this paper, Mr. Canton proves, by experiments, that the attractive power of the magnet (whether natural or artificial) will decreaſe while the magnet is heating, and increaſe while it is cooling [E]. A complete year's obſervations of the [C] Whether the electricity produced ſhould be poſitive or negative.] Having rubbed a glaſs tube with a piece of thin ſheet lead, and flour of emery mixed with water, till its tranſparency was entirely deſtroyed, he excited it (when made perfectly clean and dry) with new flannel, and found it act in all reſpects like excited ſulphur or ſealing-wax. The electric fire ſeemed to iſſue from the knuckle, or end of the finger, and to ſpread itſelf on the ſurface of the tube in the moſt beautiful manner. If this rough or unpoliſhed tube, was excited by a piece of dry oiled ſilk (eſpecially when rubbed over with a little chalk or whiting) it would act like a glaſs tube with its natural poliſh. In this caſe the electric fire appeared only at the knuckle, or end of the finger, where it ſeemed very much condenſed before it entered. But if the rough tube was greaſed all over with tallow from a candle, and as much as poſſible of it wiped off with a napkin, then the oiled ſilk would receive a kind of poliſh by rubbing it, and after a few ſtrokes would make the tube act in the ſame manner as when excited at firſt by flannel. The oiled ſilk, when covered with chalk or whiting, would make the greaſed rough tube act again like a poliſhed one; but if the friction was continued till the rubber became ſmooth, the electric power would be changed to that of ſulphur, ſealing-wax, &c.

Thus may the poſitive and negative powers of electricity be produced at pleaſure, by altering the ſurfaces of the tube and rubber, according as the one or the other is moſt affected by the friction between them. For if the poliſh be taken off one half of a tube, the different powers may be excited with the ſame rubber at a ſingle ſtroke.

That air was capable of receiving electricity by communication, and of retaining it when received, had not been diſcovered before: but by means of one of his exquiſite contrivances (which was a pair of balls turned out of pith of elder, and hung to a wire by linen threads of ſix inches long) he was able to aſcertain that delicate circumſtance, and even to meaſure the degree of it, if it was in the leaſt conſiderable.

[D] In which the laws of that wonderful ſtone are laid down in a very conciſe and elegant manner.] Theſe laws are as follows: 1. When the tourmalin is not electrical, or attractive, heating it, without friction, will make it ſo; and the electricity of one ſide of it (diſtinguiſhed by A) will be poſitive, and that of the other ſide (B) will be negative.

2. The tourmalin not being electrical, will become ſo by cooling; but with this difference, that the ſide A will be negative, and the ſide B poſitive.

3. If the tourmalin in a non-electrical ſtate, be heated and ſuffered to cool again, without either of its ſides being touched, A will be poſitive and B negative, the whole time of the increaſe and decreaſe of its heat.

4. Either ſide of the tourmalin will be poſitive by friction, and both may be made ſo at the ſame time.

[E] Will decreaſe while the magnet is heating, and increaſe while it is cooling.] If the eaſtern magnetic parts of the earth are heated faſter by the ſun in the morning than the weſtern, the needle will move weſtward, and the abſolute variation will increaſe. When the attracting parts of the earth, on each ſide the magnetic meridian, have their heat increaſing equally, the needle will be ſtationary, and the abſolute variation will then be greateſt; but when the weſtern magnetic parts are either heating faſter or cooling ſlower than the eaſtern, the needle will move eaſtward, or the abſolute variation will decreaſe; and when the eaſtern and weſtern magnetic parts are cooling equally faſt, the needle will again be ſtationary, and the abſolute variation will then be leaſt. The irregular diurnal variation muſt ariſe from ſome other cauſe than that of heat communicated by the ſun: and here our author has recourſe to ſubterranean heat, which is generated without any regularity as to time, and which will, when it happens in the north, affect the attractive power of the magnetic parts of the earth on the north end of the needle.

The aurora borealis which happens at the time the needle is diſturbed by the heat of the earth, is ſuppoſed to be the electricity of the heated air above it; and this will appear chiefly in the northern regions, as the alteration in the heat of the air in thoſe parts will be greateſt. This hypotheſis will not ſeem

the diurnal variations of the needle are annexed to the paper. On the 5th of November, 1761, our author communicated to the Royal Society an account of the Tranſit of Venus, June the 6th, 1761. His obſervations were made in Spital Square, and the apparent time of the firſt contact, was 8 h. 18 m. 41 ſ. of the laſt contact, 8 h. 37 m. 4 ſ. Mr. Canton's next communication to the Society, was a letter addreſſed to Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and read February 4, 1762, containing ſome remarks on Mr. Delaval's electrical experiments [F]. On the 16th of December, in the ſame year, another curious addition was made by him to philoſophical knowledge, in a paper, entitled, 'Experiments to prove that water is not incompreſſible.' Theſe experiments are a complete refutation of the famous Florentine experiment, which ſo many philoſophers have mentioned as a proof of the incompreſſibility of water [G]. On St. Andrew's day, 1763, our author was the third time elected one of the Council of the Royal Society; and on the 8th of November, in the following year, were read, before that learned body, his farther 'experiments and obſervations on the compreſſibility of water, and 'ſome other fluids [H].' The eſtabliſhment of this fact, in oppoſition to the received opinion, formed on the haſty deciſion of the Florentine academy, was thought to be deſerving of the ſociety's gold medal. It was accordingly moved for in the council of the year 1764. But many verbal objections having been made by ſome members of the ſociety, whoſe wiſh it was to overturn, if poſſible, the theory Mr. Canton meant to eſtabliſh, the council came to a reſolution, that the experiments ſhould be repeated, in the preſence of a Committee appointed for that purpoſe. It conſiſted of the following noblemen and gentlemen, viz. The Earl of Morton, the Preſident; Lord Charles improbable, if it be conſidered, that electricity is now known to be the cauſe of thunder and lightning; that it has been extracted from the air at the time of an aurora borealis; that the inhabitants of the northern countries obſerve the aurora to be remarkably ſtrong, when a ſudden thaw happens after ſevere cold weather; and that the curious in theſe matters are now acquainted with a ſubſtance (the tourmalin) that will, without friction, both emit and abſorb the electrical fluid, only by the increaſe or diminution of its heat.

[F] Some remarks on Mr. Delaval's electrical experiments.] Notwithſtanding Mr. Canton had clearly proved that the production of either of the two electricities depends entirely upon the ſurface of the excited electric with reſpect to the rubber, and ſhewed that the very ſame glaſs tube, would produce either of them at pleaſure, yet Mr. Delaval ſeveral years afterwards propoſed another theory of the two electricities, which went upon the old ſuppoſition of the different powers depending entirely upon the different ſubſtances themſelves. The account of this theory was read at the Royal Society, March 22, 1759, and is publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, vol. li. p. 83. From the experiments there related, Mr. Delaval inferred, that ſtones and other earthy ſubſtances were convertible, by ſeveral methods, and particularly by different degrees of heat, from non-electrics to electrics. Mr. Canton in the above letter, in accounting for Mr. Delaval's experiments, apprehends that ſtone, tobacco-pipe, wood, &c. conduct the electrical fluid when cold, by the moiſture they contain: when their moiſture is evaporated by heat, they become non-conductors; and when they are made very hot, the hot air at, or near their ſurfaces, will conduct, and the bodies themſelves appear to be conductors again. To prove this, he relates ſeveral experiments made with theſe ſubſtances.

In a note to the above paper, Mr. Canton mentions his amalgama of mercury and tin, with a very little whiting, which being rubbed on the cuſhion of a globe, or on the oiled ſilk rubber of a tube, will excite them to a great degree with very little friction. This was the greateſt improvement he made for increaſing the power of electricity; and the amalgama has continued ever ſince to be of ſingular uſe to the electrician.

[G] Theſe experiments are a complete refutation of the famous Florentine experiment, which ſo many philoſophical writers have mentioned as a proof of the incompreſſibility of water.] Our author having procured a ſmall glaſs tube, of about two feet in length, with a ball at one end of it, he filled the ball and part of the tube with mercury; and the place where the mercury, which ſtood in the tube in the heat of 50 degrees, was carefully marked. The mercury was then raiſed by heat to the top of the tube, and the tube ſealed hermetically; and when the mercury was brought to the ſame degree of heat as before, it ſtood in the tube $\frac{32}{100}$ of an inch higher than the mark.

The ſame ball and part of the tube was afterwards filled with water exhauſted of air inſtead of mercury; and treated exactly in the ſame manner as the mercury: and when the water was brought to its firſt degree of heat, it ſtood in the tube $\frac{43}{100}$ of an inch above the mark.

Now the weight of the atmoſphere preſſing on the outſide of the ball, and not on the inſide, will ſqueeze it into leſs compaſs; and by this compreſſion of the ball, the mercury and the water will be equally raiſed in the tube: but the water is found by the experiments above related to riſe $\frac{11}{100}$ of an inch more than the mercury: and therefore the water muſt expand ſo much more than the mercury, by removing the weight of the atmoſphere. From other experiments he found (by repeated trials) that when the heat of the air has been about 50 degrees, and the mercury at a mean height in the barometer, the water will expand one part in 21740, by removing the weight of the atmoſphere; and will be as much compreſſed under the weight of an additional atmoſphere.

[H] Experiments and obſervations on the compreſſibility of water, and ſome other fluids.] By ſimilar experiments with thoſe related in the former paper, it appears that water has the remarkable property of being more compreſſible in winter than in ſummer, which is contrary to what Mr. Canton had obſerved both in ſpirit of wine, and oil of olives; theſe fluids being (as one would expect water to be) more compreſſible when expanded by heat, and leſs ſo when contracted by cold. Water he found, when Fahrenheit's thermometer ſtood at 34°, to be compreſſed by the mean weight of the atmoſphere 49 parts in a million of its whole bulk, and ſpirit of wine 60 parts. But when the thermometer has been at 64 degrees, the ſame weight would compreſs the water no more than 44 parts in a million, and the ſpirit of wine no leſs than 71 of the ſame parts.

Theſe fluids are not only compreſſible but alſo elaſtic: and that this does not ariſe from any air they may contain is evident; becauſe their expanſion, by removing the weight of the atmoſphere, is not greater than their compreſſion by an equal additional weight: whereas air will expand twice as much by removing half the weight of the atmoſphere, as it will be compreſſed by adding the whole weight of the atmoſphere.

It may alſo be worth obſerving, that the compreſſions of theſe fluids, by the ſame weight, are not in the inverſe ratio of their denſities or ſpecific gravities, as might be ſuppoſed. The compreſſion of ſpirit of wine, for inſtance, being compared with that of rain-water, is greater than in this proportion, and the compreſſion of ſea-water is leſs.

ſtate of electricity. Dr. Franklin, much about the ſame time, made the like diſcovery in America. This circumſtance, together with our author's conſtant defence of the Doctor's hypotheſis, induced that excellent philoſopher, immediately on his arrival in England, to pay Mr. Canton a viſit, and gave riſe to a friendſhip which ever after continued without interruption or diminution. On the 14th of November, 1754, was read at the Royal Society, 'A letter to the Right Honourable the Earl of Macclesfield, 'concerning ſome new electrical experiments.' Till the publication of this letter, the ſame electricity had always been produced by the ſame electric. The friction of glaſs had always produced a poſitive, and the friction of ſealing-wax, &c. a negative electricity. Theſe were thought to be eſſential and unchangeable properties of thoſe ſubſtances. But Mr. Canton diſcovered, that it depended wholly on the rubber, and the ſurface of the electric, whether the electricity produced ſhould be poſitive or negative [C]. On St. Andrew's day, 1754, he was a ſecond time elected one of the Council of the Royal Society for the year enſuing. In the Lady's Diary for 1756, our author anſwered the prize queſtion that had been propoſed in the preceding year. The queſtion was, 'How can what we call the ſhooting of ſtars be beſt accounted for; what 'is the ſubſtance of this phænomenon; and in what ſtate of the atmoſphere doth it 'moſt frequently ſhew itſelf?' The ſolution, though anonymous, was ſo ſatisfactory to his friend, Mr. Thomas Simpſon, who then conducted that work, that he ſent Mr. Canton the prize, accompanied with a note, in which he ſaid, he was ſure that he was not miſtaken in the author of it, as no one beſides, that he knew of, could have anſwered the queſtion. Our philoſopher's next communication to the public, was a letter in the Gentleman's Magazine for September, 1759, on the electrical properties of the tourmalin, in which the laws of that wonderful ſtone are laid down in a very conciſe and elegant manner [D]. On the 13th of December, in the ſame year, was read, at the Royal Society, 'An Attempt to account for the regular diurnal variation of the 'Horizontal Magnetic Needle; and alſo for its irregular variation at the time of an 'Aurora Borealis.' In this paper, Mr. Canton proves, by experiments, that the attractive power of the magnet (whether natural or artificial) will decreaſe while the magnet is heating, and increaſe while it is cooling [E]. A complete year's obſervations of the [C] Whether the electricity produced ſhould be poſitive or negative.] Having rubbed a glaſs tube with a piece of thin ſheet lead, and flour of emery mixed with water, till its tranſparency was entirely deſtroyed, he excited it (when made perfectly clean and dry) with new flannel, and found it act in all reſpects like excited ſulphur or ſealing-wax. The electric fire ſeemed to iſſue from the knuckle, or end of the finger, and to ſpread itſelf on the ſurface of the tube in the moſt beautiful manner. If this rough or unpoliſhed tube, was excited by a piece of dry oiled ſilk (eſpecially when rubbed over with a little chalk or whiting) it would act like a glaſs tube with its natural poliſh. In this caſe the electric fire appeared only at the knuckle, or end of the finger, where it ſeemed very much condenſed before it entered. But if the rough tube was greaſed all over with tallow from a candle, and as much as poſſible of it wiped off with a napkin, then the oiled ſilk would receive a kind of poliſh by rubbing it, and after a few ſtrokes would make the tube act in the ſame manner as when excited at firſt by flannel. The oiled ſilk, when covered with chalk or whiting, would make the greaſed rough tube act again like a poliſhed one; but if the friction was continued till the rubber became ſmooth, the electric power would be changed to that of ſulphur, ſealing-wax, &c.

Thus may the poſitive and negative powers of electricity be produced at pleaſure, by altering the ſurfaces of the tube and rubber, according as the one or the other is moſt affected by the friction between them. For if the poliſh be taken off one half of a tube, the different powers may be excited with the ſame rubber at a ſingle ſtroke.

That air was capable of receiving electricity by communication, and of retaining it when received, had not been diſcovered before: but by means of one of his exquiſite contrivances (which was a pair of balls turned out of pith of elder, and hung to a wire by linen threads of ſix inches long) he was able to aſcertain that delicate circumſtance, and even to meaſure the degree of it, if it was in the leaſt conſiderable.

[D] In which the laws of that wonderful ſtone are laid down in a very conciſe and elegant manner.] Theſe laws are as follows: 1. When the tourmalin is not electrical, or attractive, heating it, without friction, will make it ſo; and the electricity of one ſide of it (diſtinguiſhed by A) will be poſitive, and that of the other ſide (B) will be negative.

2. The tourmalin not being electrical, will become ſo by cooling; but with this difference, that the ſide A will be negative, and the ſide B poſitive.

3. If the tourmalin in a non-electrical ſtate, be heated and ſuffered to cool again, without either of its ſides being touched, A will be poſitive and B negative, the whole time of the increaſe and decreaſe of its heat.

4. Either ſide of the tourmalin will be poſitive by friction, and both may be made ſo at the ſame time.

[E] Will decreaſe while the magnet is heating, and increaſe while it is cooling.] If the eaſtern magnetic parts of the earth are heated faſter by the ſun in the morning than the weſtern, the needle will move weſtward, and the abſolute variation will increaſe. When the attracting parts of the earth, on each ſide the magnetic meridian, have their heat increaſing equally, the needle will be ſtationary, and the abſolute variation will then be greateſt; but when the weſtern magnetic parts are either heating faſter or cooling ſlower than the eaſtern, the needle will move eaſtward, or the abſolute variation will decreaſe; and when the eaſtern and weſtern magnetic parts are cooling equally faſt, the needle will again be ſtationary, and the abſolute variation will then be leaſt. The irregular diurnal variation muſt ariſe from ſome other cauſe than that of heat communicated by the ſun: and here our author has recourſe to ſubterranean heat, which is generated without any regularity as to time, and which will, when it happens in the north, affect the attractive power of the magnetic parts of the earth on the north end of the needle.

The aurora borealis which happens at the time the needle is diſturbed by the heat of the earth, is ſuppoſed to be the electricity of the heated air above it; and this will appear chiefly in the northern regions, as the alteration in the heat of the air in thoſe parts will be greateſt. This hypotheſis will not ſeem

the diurnal variations of the needle are annexed to the paper. On the 5th of November, 1761, our author communicated to the Royal Society an account of the Tranſit of Venus, June the 6th, 1761. His obſervations were made in Spital Square, and the apparent time of the firſt contact, was 8 h. 18 m. 41 ſ. of the laſt contact, 8 h. 37 m. 4 ſ. Mr. Canton's next communication to the Society, was a letter addreſſed to Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and read February 4, 1762, containing ſome remarks on Mr. Delaval's electrical experiments [F]. On the 16th of December, in the ſame year, another curious addition was made by him to philoſophical knowledge, in a paper, entitled, 'Experiments to prove that water is not incompreſſible.' Theſe experiments are a complete refutation of the famous Florentine experiment, which ſo many philoſophers have mentioned as a proof of the incompreſſibility of water [G]. On St. Andrew's day, 1763, our author was the third time elected one of the Council of the Royal Society; and on the 8th of November, in the following year, were read, before that learned body, his farther 'experiments and obſervations on the compreſſibility of water, and 'ſome other fluids [H].' The eſtabliſhment of this fact, in oppoſition to the received opinion, formed on the haſty deciſion of the Florentine academy, was thought to be deſerving of the ſociety's gold medal. It was accordingly moved for in the council of the year 1764. But many verbal objections having been made by ſome members of the ſociety, whoſe wiſh it was to overturn, if poſſible, the theory Mr. Canton meant to eſtabliſh, the council came to a reſolution, that the experiments ſhould be repeated, in the preſence of a Committee appointed for that purpoſe. It conſiſted of the following noblemen and gentlemen, viz. The Earl of Morton, the Preſident; Lord Charles Cavendiſh, Iſrael Mauduit, Eſq; Matthew Raper, Eſq; Mr. John Ellicott, Dr. William Watſon, Dr. Charles Morton, Mr. James Short, Dr. Benjamin Franklin, George Lewis Scott, Eſq; Edward Delaval, Eſq; and Francis Blake, Eſq. The Committee, than which a more reſpectable one could not eaſily have been choſen, were to report the reſult of their trials, together with their opinions, to the Council. The Council, at the ſame time, deſired the Preſident to requeſt, that thoſe members who had any objections to offer againſt Mr. Canton's experiments on the compreſſibility of water, or the theory deduced from them, would deliver ſuch objections in writing. The experiments were ſhewn by our philoſopher, at his own houſe, to the Committee. To Lord Morton they were exhibited ſeveral times; his Lordſhip having conſtantly ſome new objection to make, though he always expreſſed himſelf ſatisfied with them at the period of exhibition. But a ball, filled with mercury, having accidentally fallen upon, and hurt the foot of Mr. Mauduit, who accompanied the Earl of Morton, Mr. Canton took that opportunity of informing his Lordſhip, that if, after having ſeen the experiments repeated ſo often, he ſtill doubted of the fact, he deſpaired of convincing him; and ſhould, therefore, give himſelf no farther concern about the matter, but would leave the paper to ſhift for itſelf. It met, however, with a moſt able defender in Lord Charles Cavendiſh, who intereſted himſelf greatly in the affair. His Lordſhip attended all the meetings of the Committee; and gave a very accurate account of their proceedings in a paper delivered to the Council, in which he anſwered, with great perſpicuity, every difficulty that had been raiſed with regard to the doctrine of the compreſſibility. Notwithſtanding the requeſt of the Council, none but verbal objections were made. The Committee came, therefore, to the following reſolution: That in forming their opinion on the merits of Mr. Canton's experiments, they could pay no regard to any objections that were not delivered in writing. Having met ſeveral times, from the 6th of July 1765, to the 21ſt of November in the ſame year, they made their report in the three ſubſequent articles. 1. The Committee, from repeated trials, find Mr. Canton's experiments verified. 2. The hypotheſis of the compreſſibility of water will account for the phænomena in Mr. Canton's experiments. 3. It does not appear, from any reaſoning or experiments hitherto produced to the Committee, that the phænomena in Mr. Canton's experiments can be accounted for from any other cauſe. In conſequence of this report, the Council unanimouſly voted him the gold medal, which was accordingly delivered to him on the 30th of November, 1765.

The next communication of our ingenious author to the Royal Society, which we ſhall take notice of in this place, was on the 22d of December, 1768, being 'An 'eaſy method of making a Phoſphorus, that will imbibe and emit light like the 'Bolognian ſtone; with experiments and obſervations [I].' When he firſt ſhewed

[I] An eaſy method of making a Phoſphorus, that will imbibe and emit light like the Bolognian ſtone; with experiments and obſervations.] The Phoſphorus is thus made. Calcine ſome common oyſter-ſhells, by keeping them in a good coal fire for half an hour; let the pureſt part of the calx be pulverized and ſifted; mix with three parts of this powder one part of the flowers of ſulphur; let this mixture be rammed into a crucible of about an inch and a half in depth, till it be almoſt full; and let it be placed in the middle of the fire, where it muſt be kept red hot for one hour at leaſt, and then ſet by to cool: when cold, turn it out of the crucible, and cutting, or breaking it to pieces, ſcrape off, upon trial, the brighteſt parts; which, if good phoſphorus, will be a white powder; and may be preſerved by keeping it in a dry phial with a ground ſtopple. The quantity of light a little of this phoſphorus gives, when firſt brought into a dark room, after it has been expoſed for a few ſeconds, on the outſide of a window to the common light of the day, is ſufficient to diſcover the time by a watch, if the eyes have been ſhut, or in the dark for two or three minutes before.

According to Dr. Lemery, the expoſing the Bolognian ſtone to the ſun wears it out; but by experiments made with this phoſphorus, it appears probable that what the Doctor imputes to the light of the ſun was cauſed by the moiſture of the air. Lemery and Muſſchenbroek likewiſe aſſert, that the phoſphorus will imbibe leſs light when hot than when cold, as it appears leſs bright when carried into a dark room. But this appearance is proved to be cauſed by its parting with the light it has received faſter when in the former ſtate than when in the latter. For if two glaſs balls, containing phoſphorus, be illuminated at the ſame time, and to the ſame degree, and carried into a dark room, and one of them be put into a baſon of boiling water, it will become much brighter than the other, and part with its light ſo faſt, as to be quite dark in leſs than ten minutes; whereas the other would be viſible for more than two hours, when even the heat of the hand would plainly increaſe its light. But if the phoſphorus, which had parted with its light in boiling water, be expoſed to a greater degree of heat, it will become again luminous, but will be entirely exhauſted of it in leſs than a minute; and then will ſhine no more by the ſame treatment, till after it has been expoſed to the light again. Phoſphorus, which had been kept in darkneſs more than ſix months, will, by this treatment, be found to give a conſiderable degree of light. From theſe experiments Mr. Canton is of opinion with Sir Iſaac Newton, that the rays of light are very ſmall bodies emitted from ſhining ſubſtances, and not motion propagated through a fluid medium. For, that a ſubſtance ſhould either give light or not, when its parts are agitated by the ſame degree of heat, according as it has, or has not, been expoſed to light, for a few ſeconds of time, more than ſix months before, ſeems plainly to indicate a ſtrong attraction between that ſubſtance and the particles of light; by which it keeps many of them, in the common heat of the air, a long time, if not always: for the light the phoſphorus gives by being heated to a certain degree, appears to be cauſed by its throwing off adventitious particles, and not by any of its own; ſince its light will decreaſe, and be entirely gone, before the phoſphorus will be hot enough to ſhine of itſelf, or to emit particles of light from its own body.

to Dr. Franklin the inſtantaneous light acquired by ſome of this phoſphorus from the near diſcharge of an electrified bottle, the Doctor immediately exclaimed, "And God "ſaid, let there be light, and there was light." The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's having, in a letter to the Preſident, dated March the 6th, 1769, requeſted the opinion of the Royal Society relative to the beſt and moſt effectual method of fixing electrical conductors to preſerve that Cathedral from damage by lightning, Mr. Canton was one of the Committee appointed to take the letter into conſideration, and to report their opinion upon it. The gentlemen joined with him in this buſineſs were Dr. Watſon, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Delaval, and Mr. Wilſon. Their report was made on the 8th of June following; and the mode recommended by them has been carried into execution. This will probably contribute, in the moſt effectual manner, to preſerve the noble fabric of St. Paul's from being injured by lightning. The laſt paper of our author's, which was read before the Royal Society, was on the 21ſt of December, 1769; and contained 'Experiments to prove that the luminouſneſs of the ſea ariſes from the 'putrefaction of its animal ſubſtances.' In this paper, Mr. Canton, without entering into the conſideration of the ſeveral opinions of philoſophers concerning this luminous appearance, contents himſelf with relating a few experiments, which any perſon may eaſily make, and which he thinks will point out its true cauſe [K]. In the account now given of his communications to the public, we have chiefly confined ourſelves to ſuch as were the moſt important, and which threw new and diſtinguiſhed light on various objects in the philoſophical world. Beſides theſe, he wrote a number of papers, both in earlier and in later life, which appeared in ſeveral different publications, and ſhall be mentioned in the note below [L]. We may add, that he was very particular with [K] And which he thinks will point out its true cauſe.] Into a gallon of ſea-water, in a pan about fourteen inches in diameter, he put in the evening a ſmall freſh whiting, and took notice that neither the whiting, nor the water, when agitated, gave any light. The next night that part of the fiſh which was even with the ſurface of the water was luminous, but the water itſelf was dark. The end of a ſtick being drawn through the water, it appeared luminous all the way behind it, but gave light only where diſturbed. When all the water was ſtirred, the whole became luminous, and appeared like milk. The water was moſt luminous when the fiſh had been in it about twenty-eight hours, but could not give any light by being ſtirred after it had been in three days.

Having put a gallon of freſh water into one pan, and a gallon of ſea-water into another, a freſh herring was put into each; the next night the whole ſurface of the ſea-water was luminous without being ſtirred, but much more ſo when put in motion; and the upper part of the herring, which lay conſiderably below the ſurface of the water, was very bright. The freſh water, and the fiſh in it, were both dark. There were ſeveral very bright luminous ſpots on different parts of the ſurface of the ſea water; and the whole, when viewed by the light of a candle, ſeemed covered with a greaſy ſcum. The light of the ſea water was not quite gone before the ſeventh night; but the freſh water, and fiſh in it, were perfectly during the whole time. The thermometer was generally above ſixty.

Into a gallon of freſh water common or ſea ſalt was put, till by an hydrometer it was found to be of the ſame ſpecific gravity with ſea water. In another gallon of freſh water two pounds of ſalt were diſſolved: and into each of theſe a ſmall freſh Herring was put. The artificial ſea water appeared exactly like the real in the preceding experiment; its light laſted about the ſame time, and went off in the ſame manner. The other water never gave any light; and the Herring, which was taken out of it the ſeventh night, and waſhed from its ſalt, was found firm and ſweet; but the other Herring was very ſoft and putrid: much more ſo than one which had been kept as long in freſh water. From theſe experiments, it is evident that the quantity of ſalt in ſea water haſtens putrefaction, as the fiſh which had been kept in water of that degree of ſaltneſs, was found to be much more putrid than that which had been kept the ſame time in freſh water. It may be worth remarking, that, though the greateſt ſummer heat is well known to promote putrefaction, yet twenty degrees more than that of the human blood ſeem to hinder it: for the heat of one hundred and eighteen degrees was found to deſtroy the luminouſneſs of fiſh in leſs than half a minute. The paper concludes with ſome circumſtantial accounts of the ſea's luminous appearance.

The cloſe and ſedentary life of Mr. Canton, ariſing from an unremitted attention to the duties of his profeſſion, and to the proſecution of his philoſophical enquiries and experiments, probably contributed to ſhorten his days. The diſorder into which he fell, and which carried him off, was a dropſy. It was ſuppoſed, by his friend Dr. Milner, to be a dropſy in the thorax. His death was on the 22d of March, 1772, in the 54th year of his age, to the great regret of his family, and of his literary and other acquaintance. Nor was his deceaſe a ſmall loſs to the intereſts of knowledge; ſince from the time of life in which he died, and his happy and ſucceſsful genius in philoſophical purſuits, he might have been expected to have enriched the world of ſcience with new diſcoveries. Mr. Canton was a man of very amiable character and manners. In converſation he was calm, mild, and rather ſparing than redundant: what he did ſay was remarkably ſenſible and judicious. He had much pleaſure in attending the meetings of the Royal Society, and ſome voluntary private ſocieties, of learned and intelligent perſons, to which he belonged. Among the reſt of his friends whom he frequently met at one or other of theſe ſocieties, may be mentioned Dr. Bradley, Mr. Thomas Simpſon, Dr. Pemberton, the Rev. Dr. Owen, the Rev. Mr. Thoreſby, Dr. Franklin, Dr. Price, Dr. Prieſtley, Dr. Savage, Mr. Burgh, Mr. Roſe, Dr. Amory, Dr. Jeffries, Dr. Furneaux, Mr. Radcliff, Mr. Denſham, Mr. Collings, and Dr. Rees. At moſt of theſe agreeable and literary converſations, the writer of the preſent article had many years the happineſs of knowing and eſteeming the underſtanding and the virtues of Mr. Canton. By his wife, who ſurvived him, he left ſeveral children. His eldeſt ſon, Mr. William Canton, ſucceeded him in the academy at Spital-Square, which he carries on with great reputation; and he alſo purſues with advantage, the ſame philoſophical ſtudies to which his ingenious and worthy father was ſo eminently devoted.] K.

When Dr. Prieſtley wrote his Hiſtory of Electricity, Mr. Canton communicated to him ſeveral new experiments and obſervations, which are inſerted in that very valuable work. They are as follows: 1. On electric atmoſpheres, with a figure, p. 246. 2. On glaſs-balls hermetically ſealed, p. 279. 3. Obſervations on Mr. Wilſon's experiment concerning light in vacuo, p. 289. 4. All the priſmatic colours produced by electrical exploſions of fine wire of different metals, extended over the ſurface of glaſs, p. 679. See alſo the Philoſophical Tranſactions, vol. lviii. p. 73. In Dr. Prieſtley's hiſtory of viſion, &c. p. 434, are obſervations, by our author, on light tranſmitted through thick and thin ſubſtances. We might add, that Mr. Canton, in early life, wrote ſeveral enigmas and poems in the London and Gentleman's Magazines. But ſuch productions, though ſometimes the amuſements of the moſt ingenious minds when young, ſcarce deſerve to be particularly marked out.

CAPEL (ARTHUR) created Baron Capel of Hadham in 1641, was the ſon of Sir Henry Capel, Knight [A], and Theodoſia, ſiſter to Edward Lord Montagu, of Boughton, and to Henry Earl of Mancheſter (a). What ſchool and Univerſity he was educated in, is no where mentioned; but there is reaſon to think, that he had an education ſuitable to his quality and fortune. At his firſt appearance into the world, he became very eminent for his piety [B], hoſpitality to his neighbours, and great charity to the poor; which ſo endeared him to the people, that he was choſen one of the Knights for Hertfordſhire (b), in the Parliament which met at Weſtminſter, April 13, 1640 (c). The ſixteenth of that month, he delivered a petition from the Freeholders of the county of Hertford, complaining of ſhip-money, projects, monopolies, Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion-Courts, &c. being the firſt of that kind which was preſented to the Houſe (d): from whence it may be inferred, that he was a true lover of his country, and an enemy to oppreſſions of all ſorts. This Parliament being ſoon after (e) abruptly diſſolved, Mr. Capel was unanimouſly choſen again one of the Knights for the county of Hertford, in the Long Parliament, which began November 3, 1640 (f).

[A] Was the ſon of Sir Henry Capel, Knight.] The firſt that laid the foundation of riches, for ſupporting the honour of this family, was, William Capel, of London, Draper, knighted in 1485, Sheriff in 1489, and Lord Mayor of London in 1503 (1); being the ſecond ſon of John Capel, of Stoke-Neyland, in the county of Suffolk, Eſq; deſcended from an ancient family, who were Lords of the Manor of Capel in that town for ſeveral ages. Sir William ſuffered, among others, from the extortions of Empſon and Dudley, to whom he was forced to pay 2000l. and refuſing to pay them 1000l. more, was committed to the Tower, but ſoon after releaſed upon the death of King Henry VII. He died, immenſely rich, September 6, 1515, and was buried in a chapel built by him on the ſouth-ſide of St. Bartholomew's church, near the Royal-Exchange, in London (2). His deſcendants were, Sir Giles Capel, Knight, who reſided at Raines-hall, in Eſſex, and was a brave warrior: Sir Henry Capel, Sir Edward, Knights; Sir Henry, Knight, who had ten children: Sir Arthur, Knight, who had nineteen. The eldeſt of them was Sir Henry, Knight, father of Arthur Lord Capel, who is the ſubject of this article. Sir Giles, Sir Edward, Sir Henry, and Sir Arthur, were ſucceſſively Sheriffs of Hertfordſhire (3).

When

When the city of London promiſed to advance an hundred thouſand pounds, for the payment of the Engliſh and Scotch armies, and wanted ſecurity for that ſum, till an Act was paſſed for the raiſing of it; he ſtood up in the Houſe, and offered his ſecurity for one thouſand pounds, and above a hundred more of the Houſe did the like (g). He was one of thoſe who voted for the Earl of Strafford's attainder, April 21, 1641 (h); of which he very much repented afterwards [C]. Hitherto, he had acted againſt the Court; but now he began to alter his inclinations, and to act in favour of it: either becauſe he was gained by the King, or could not come into all the violent meaſures which the Houſe of Commons were running into. In conſequence of this change, he was, on the ſixth of Auguſt 1641, advanced to the dignity of a Baron of this realm, by the title of Lord Capel of Hadham (i). On the fifteenth of June 1642, he ſubſcribed, at York, among ſeveral other Lords, a Declaration, wherein they teſtified, they were fully perſuaded that his Majeſty had no intention to make war upon his Parliament (k). Two days after, he entered into an engagement, to raiſe a hundred Horſe [D] for his Majeſty's uſe (l). In 1643, the King ſent him to Shrewſbury, with a Commiſſion of Lieutenant-General of Shropſhire, Cheſhire, and North-Wales; and his Lordſhip quickly brought thoſe parts into an Aſſociation, and raiſed a body of horſe and foot, which gave Sir William Brereton great trouble at Nantwich (m). The ſame year, he was named one of the Counſellors to the Prince of Wales; being deſigned to attend his perſon, with a regiment of horſe, and one of foot, which the Lord Capel was to raiſe upon his own credit and intereſt, and to have the command of (n). In 1644-5 he was one of the Commiſſioners for the King at the treaty of Uxbridge (o). The ſummer following, he was employed in the King's and Prince's ſervice in the Weſt of England, chiefly at Briſtol and Exeter, and about the ſiege of Taunton (p). He prevented a deſign that was formed, of ſeizing the Prince (q); and was very inſtrumental in preſerving and ſecuring his perſon in Pendennis-caſtle, and afterwards in Scilly-iſland (r): where he waited upon his Highneſs, on the eleventh of April 1646 (s), and the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth of that month, ſailed along with him to Jerſey (t). From thence he was ſent with the Lord Colepeper to Paris, to diſſuade the Queen from ſending for her ſon, the Prince of Wales, out of Jerſey (u). And ſo bent was he againſt that Prince's going to France, that he offered to take a journey himſelf to Newcaſtle (where King Charles then was in the hands of the Scots) to receive the King's poſitive commands about that affair (w): But, notwithſtanding the very material reaſons he gave againſt his Highneſs's going to France [E], the Queen's and Lord Digby's arguments prevailed (x). After the Prince's departure to France, Lord Capel remained in Jerſey, to expect the King's pleaſure, and to wait for an opportunity of appearing again in his Majeſty's ſervice (y). In the mean time the Houſe of Commons voted, that his eſtate ſhould be ſold to raiſe money for Ireland (z). In the year 1647 he left Jerſey, and made a journey to Paris to the Prince, that he might receive his Highneſs's approbation of his going for England: which having obtained, he came to Zealand, his friends having adviſed him to be in thoſe parts before they endeavoured to procure a paſs for him, which they eaſily did as ſoon as he came thither (a). Upon this he croſſed over into England, and having made his compoſition with the uſurping powers, retired to his manor of Hadham, in Hertfordſhire (b), where he was exceedingly beloved, and hated no where (c). Some time after, he took an opportunity to wait upon the King at Hampton-Court; and gave him a particular account of all that had paſſed at Jerſey, before the Prince's remove from thence, and of the reaſons which induced thoſe of the Council to remain ſtill there, and of many other particulars, of which his Majeſty had never before been thoroughly informed. The King imparted to him all his hopes and all his fears; and what great overtures the Scots had made to him:

'——I do 'here profeſs to you, that truly I did give my vote 'to that bill of the Earl of Strafford; I doubt not 'but God Almighty hath waſhed that away with 'more precious blood, and that is, with the blood 'of his own ſon, and my dear Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; '——truly this I may ſay, I had not the leaſt part, 'nor the leaſt degree of malice, in the doing of it; 'but I muſt confeſs again to God's glory, and the 'accuſation of mine own frailty, and the frailty of 'my nature, that truly it was an unworthy cowardice, not to reſiſt ſo great a torrent as carried that 'buſineſs at that time. And truly, this I think I 'am moſt guilty of, of not courage enough in it, 'but malice I had none——(5).'

[E] He gave material reaſons againſt the Prince's going to France.] In the firſt place he thought it adviſable, to take no final reſolution, till farther notice was received of the King's pleaſure. Next, he obſerved, that if the Court of France had ſo great a deſire, as was pretended, that the Prince of Wales ſhould repair thither, it was a wonder, in the two months his Highneſs had been in Jerſey, they had never ſent a gentleman to ſee him, and invite him to come over; nor had thoſe who came to him from the Queen, brought ſo much as a paſs for him to come into France: That all they had hitherto propoſed to themſelves from France, had proved in no degree anſwerable to expectation; as the five thouſand foot which the French had promiſed to ſend into the Weſt of England, before the Prince's departure from thence: That they had more reaſon to be jealous than ever, ſince it had been by the advice of France, that the King had put himſelf into the hands of the Scots; and therefore they ought to be more watchful in diſpoſing of the perſon of the Prince, by their advice, likewiſe (7).

him: that he did really believe, it could not be long before there would be a war between the two nations; in which the Scots promiſed themſelves an univerſal concurrence from all the Preſbyterians in England; and that, in ſuch a conjuncture, he wiſhed his own party would put themſelves in arms, without which he could not expect great benefit by the ſucceſs of the other; and therefore deſired Lord Capel to watch ſuch a conjuncture, and draw his friends together, which he promiſed to do effectually (d). Accordingly that Lord was, from the firſt, made privy to the Scots deſigns, of entering England with a powerful army, in order to ſet the King at liberty, and reſtore him to his throne (e); being entirely truſted by thoſe who would not truſt any of the Preſbyterians, nor communicate their purpoſes to them (f). When he thought the project was in good forwardneſs, he wrote in the beginning of May 1648, to Sir Edward Hyde, to ſend for the Prince of Wales to Jerſey, that he might be in a readineſs to paſs over to England (g). At the ſame time he was very active in Hertfordſhire, in raiſing forces for the King's ſervice (h), with which he joined the Earl of Norwich, and Sir Charles Lucas, in Eſſex (i). Thoſe brave gentlemen having gathered together a body of about four thouſand men, went and ſhut themſelves up with them in Colcheſter (k), where they endured a long and cloſe ſiege from the twelfth of June to the twenty-eighth of Auguſt (l); during which, the Lord Capel was one of the moſt reſolute [F], and indefatigable in the defence of that place (m). Upon the ſurrender of it, he was forced to yield himſelf to the mercy of the Lord General [G], and afterwards was aſſured of quarter (n). Upon this he was remitted to the Parliament for farther public juſtice and mercy, to be uſed as they ſhould ſee cauſe (o). But not behaving with ſo much condeſcenſion as was expected from a man in his circumſtances [H], he was, on that account chiefly, ſacrificed to his enemies paſſion and revenge (p). From Colcheſter he was ſent priſoner to Windſor-caſtle (q); where whilſt he remained (on the twenty-fifth of September, 1648) an Act of Attainder was ordered by the Houſe of Commons to be brought in againſt him (r). Hearing of it, he ſent and informed the Houſe, that quarter was given him by the General, who had written to the Houſe to that purpoſe (s). Hereupon, the Lord Fairfax being called upon by the Commons, to explain his letter of the twenty-ninth of Auguſt to them, as to that point; anſwered, That it did not extend to any other but the military power, and that they were, notwithſtanding, liable to trial and judgment by the Civil Power (t). The tenth of November following, the Houſe voted, That he, and ſome others, ſhould be baniſhed out of the kingdom (u). But that puniſhment not being thought ſevere enough, he was removed to the Tower of London (w); and on the firſt of February 1648-9, it was voted, that he, the Lord Goring, and ſome others, ſhould be the next perſons to be proceeded againſt for juſtice (x). That ſame evening he eſcaped out of the Tower [I]: But ſtrict ſearch being [F] The Lord Capel was one of the moſt reſolute.] Mr. Whitelock informs us (8), That he, and the Lord Goring, carried things very high: And that once, General Fairfax having ſent a ſummons to them, to ſurrender the town to the ſervice of the Parliament, they returned for anſwer, That if any more letters of that kind were ſent to them, they would hang up the meſſenger (9). The Lord Capel in particular, during the ſiege, marched himſelf a-foot, with a halberd on his ſhoulder, in the head of his company to the guard, that none might make any ſcruple or exception againſt the ſervice (10).

However, a mutiny, and great diſcontents, ariſing among the beſieged, as if the officers, and the reſt of the gentlemen, were reſolved to break through the beſiegers, and leave the private ſoldiers behind, expoſed to the fury of their incenſed enemies (12); the commanding officers were at length forced to ſubmit to thoſe hard terms, which they had at firſt ſo ſcornfully rejected. Though, as appears, by the ſequel, they expected, and thought they had reaſon to expect, that their lives would be ſafe.

But the Lord Capel telling them with ſome roughneſs, 'That they 'ſhould do well to finiſh their work, and execute the 'ſame rigour to the reſt;' there paſſed two or three ſuch ſharp and bitter replies between him and Ireton, as coſt him his life in few months after (13).

(13) Clarendon, vol. iii. Part i. p. 178, 179.

[I] That ſame evening he eſcaped out of the Tower.] Having a cord, and all things neceſſary conveyed to him, he let himſelf down out of the window of his chamber in the night, over the wall of the Tower; and had been directed through what part of the ditch he might beſt wade. Whether he hit upon the right place, or there was none ſafer, he found the water and the mud ſo deep, that, if he had not been by the head taller than other men, he muſt have periſhed, ſince the water came up to his chin. The way was ſo long to the other ſide, and the fatigue of drawing himſelf out of the mud ſo intolerable, that his ſpirits were near ſpent, and he was once ready to call out for help. But he got at laſt to the other ſide, where his friends expected him, and carried him to a chamber in the Temple, where he remained two or three nights ſecure from any diſcovery. At length, a friend whom he truſted much, conceiving he might be more ſecure in a place to which there was leſs reſort, and not ſo many harboured that were every day ſought after, provided a lodging for him in a private-houſe in Lambeth-marſh. Calling upon him in an evening, when it was dark, to go thither, they choſe rather to take any boat they found ready at the Temple-ſtairs, than to truſt one of that people with the ſecret; and it was ſo late, that there was only one boat left. In that the Lord Capel (as well diſguiſed as he thought neceſſary) and his friend, put themſelves, and bid the waterman row them to Lambeth. Whether, in their paſſage thither, the other gentleman being made after him, and a hundred pounds reward offered for re-taking him; he was discovered and apprehended, two days after, at Lambeth, and committed again to the Tower (y). The tenth day of that month, he was brought before a High Court of Justice in Westminster-Hall (z), to be tried for treason and other high crimes (a). And though he strenuously insisted, that he was a prisoner to the Lord General, that he had conditions given him, and was to have fair quarter for his life [K], so that if all the magistrates in Christendom were combined together, they could not call him in question (b); yet his plea was over-ruled. The thirteenth he was brought again before the Court [L], when the Council moved, that he should be hanged, drawn, and quartered (c). However, on the sixth of March being brought a fifth time before the Court [M], he was condemned only to be beheaded (d). After his condemnation his Lady petitioned the Parliament, which occasioned a long debate (e), but at length it was voted [N], That he should not be reprieved (f). Accordingly, on the ninth of March, the day appointed for his execution, he was carried from St. James's (†) in a sedan, with a guard, to Sir Thomas Cotton's house at Westminster; where he continued about two hours, which he spent mostly in religious conference with Dr. Morley, who attended him (g). Then being brought to the scaffold erected before Westminster-hall, he made a speech to the people [O]: After which, submitting to the block, as Duke gentleman called him My Lord, as was confidently reported, or whether the waterman had any jealousy who he was, or knew him; when they were landed, the waterman, undiscerned, followed them till he saw into what house they went; and then he went to an officer, and demanded, 'What he would give 'him, to bring him to the place where the Lord 'Capel lay.' The officer promising to give him ten pounds, he led him presently to the house, where his Lordship was seized upon, and the next day carried to the Tower (14). Mr. Whitelock says (15), that it was two watermen who discovered and apprehended him, for which they received forty pounds.

[K] Was to have fair quarter for his life.] The articles were, 'That the Lords, and all Captaines, 'and superiour officers, should render themselves to 'the mercy of the Lord General:' Which was thus explained at that time, 'That they be rendered, or 'render themselves, to the Lord General, or whom 'he shall appoint, without certaine assurance of quarter, so as the Lord General may be free to put 'some immediately to the sword, if he see cause, 'although he intends chiefly, and for the generality 'of those under that condition, to surrender them to 'the mercy of the Parliament and General (16).' The Lord Capel had afterwards quarter granted him. See above.

[L] The 13*th he was brought again before the Court.*] And then it was made appear, by General Fairfax's letter to the Parliament upon the surrender of Colchester, and the articles with the explanation of that surrender; as also by the testimony of Lord Fairfax himself, and of Ireton, Whaley, and Barksted, then present, 'That the Lord Capel was to have fair 'quarter for his life,' which was explained to be, 'a 'freedom from any execution of the sword, but not 'any protection from the judicial proceedings of a 'Civil Court;' and 'Mercy was explained to be 'only from the promiscuous execution of the sword, 'but that he might be tried by a Council of War.' But of this Learning, as Mr. Whitelock there rightly observes, I hope none of this nation will have use hereafter. It was also proved, 'That the articles were 'only to free him from the present power of the 'sword to take away his life.' And Colonel Barksted swore, 'That he told him, the day after the 'articles, that he believed the Parliament would 'proceed against them that were taken at Colchester, 'as traitors (17).'

[M] Being brought a fifth time before the Court.] He was brought before it, for the third time, February 17, when he was questioned for his escape out of the Tower; and then he pleaded, 'That he did 'not escape as he was a prisoner of war, but as he 'was sent to the Tower in another condition.' The fourth time of his appearance before it, was the 21st of the same month, when he pleaded, 'That he was 'to be comprehended wholly in the martial law; and 'urged the articles again, which excepted trial after 'by Parliament: That divers that were in Colchester in his condition, had compounded: That 'breaking prison for Treason, by Common Law, 'was but Felony, and benefit of Clergy might be 'had.' When he could not be allowed to be tried by Martial Law, then he moved, 'That he might not 'be barred of additional defence; and that, if he 'must be judged by the Common Law, he hoped he 'might have the full benefit of it.' He recommended to the Court Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, &c. Moreover, he desired to see his Jury, and that they might see him, and to be tried by his Peers, and said, 'He believed, that a pre-'cedent could not be given, of a subject tried for 'his life, but either by bill in Parliament, or by a 'Jury.' But all he could say, was disregarded and rejected (18).

(18) Whitelock, p. 383.

[N] His Lady's petition occasioned a long debate, &c.] When it was read, many gentlemen spoke on his behalf, and mentioned the great virtues which were in him; 'that he had never deceived them, or 'pretended to be of their party; but always reso-'lutely declared himself for the King.' Cromwell, who had known him very well, spoke so much good of him, and professed to have so much kindness and respect for him, that all men thought he was now safe;—but then he concluded——'That his affection 'to the public so much weighed down his private 'friendship, that he could not but tell them, that 'the question was now, whether they would preserve 'the most bitter and most implacable enemy they 'had: that he knew the Lord Capel very well, and 'knew that he would be the last man in England, 'that would forsake the royal interest; that he had 'great courage, industry, and generosity; that he 'had many friends who would always adhere to him; 'and that as long as he lived, what condition soever 'he was in, he would be a thorn in their sides, and 'therefore, for the good of the Commonwealth, he 'should give his vote against the petition.' Ireton's hatred was immortal: he spake of him, and against him, as of a man of whom he was heartily afraid. And so, after a long debate, though there was not a man who had not a value for him, and very few, who had a particular malice, or prejudice against him, he was cast (19).

(19) Clarendon, vol. iii. Part i. p. 270.

[O] He made a speech to the people.] In this he first prays the God of all mercies, that those who were the cause of his violent death, might be partakers of his inestimable and boundless mercies in Jesus Christ, and beseeches the God of Heaven, to forgive any injury they had done to him: 'From my soul, 'says he, I wish it.' Then he declares, 'That he 'was a Protestant, and very much in love with the 'profession of it, after the manner as it was esta-'blished in England by the XXXIX Articles; a 'blessed way of profession, and such a one, as truly, 'says he, I never knew none so good.'—Soon after he says, 'Something I shall say to you as a citizen

Duke Hamilton and the Earl of Holland had done immediately before, he ſuffered death with great reſolution (b). His body being carried to Little-Hadham in Hertfordſhire, where he had a ſeat and eſtate, was buried in the chancel of that church (i); and a black marble was ſoon after laid over his grave, with an inſcription [P]. He married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Charles Moryſon, Knt. of Caiſhiobury in Watford, Hertfordſhire, by whom he had four ſons; Arthur, of whom we ſhall give an account in the next article; Henry created Baron of Tewkſbury in 1692, and who died Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1696; Edward; and Charles: and four daughters (k). His character is thus given by the Earl of Clarendon (l). He was a man in whom the malice of his enemies could diſcover but very few faults, and whom his friends could not wiſh better accompliſhed; whom Cromwell's own character well deſcribed (m), and who indeed would never have been contented to have lived under that government. His memory all men loved and reverenced, though few followed his example. He had always lived in a ſtate of great plenty and general eſtimation, having a very noble fortune of his own by deſcent, and a fair addition to it by his marriage with an excellent wife, a Lady of very worthy extraction, of great virtue and beauty, by whom he had a numerous iſſue of both ſexes, in which he took great joy and comfort: ſo that no man was more happy in all his domeſtic affairs; and he was ſo much the more happy, in that he thought himſelf moſt bleſſed in them. And yet the King's honour was no ſooner violated, and his juſt power invaded, than he threw all thoſe bleſſings behind him; and having no other obligations to the Crown, than thoſe which his own honour and conſcience ſuggeſted to him, he frankly engaged his perſon and his fortune from the beginning of the troubles, in all actions and enterprizes of the greateſt hazard and danger; and continued to the end, without ever making one falſe ſtep. In a word, he was a man, that whoever ſhall, after him, deſerve beſt of the Engliſh nation, he can never think himſelf undervalued, when he ſhall hear, that his courage, virtue, and fidelity, are laid in the ballance with, and compared to, that of the Lord Capel.

(b) Ibid. He ſeemed rather to fright death than to be frighted with it, as Fuller obſerves. Worthies in Hertfordſhire, p. 29.

After this, he gives a very great character of King Charles II. and beſeeches God to give him much happineſs, and to his ſubjects. He concludes, as he had begun, by praying, That God Almighty would confer of his infinite and ineſtimable grace and mercy, to thoſe that were the cauſers of his coming thither, and give them as much mercy as their own hearts could wiſh. ' Truly, ' ſays he, for my part, I will not accuſe any one of ' them of malice, truly I will not; nay, I will not ' think there was any malice in them: what other ' ends there is, I know not, nor I will not examine; ' but let it be what it will, from my very ſoul I forgive them every one: And ſo the Lord of Heaven ' bleſs you all,' &c. Dr. Smollet, ſpeaking of Lord Capel's execution, obſerves, that he died a ſhining example of worth, valour, and fidelity (23). Mrs. Macauley, on the other hand, hath treated his Lordſhip's memory with no ſmall degree of contempt. ' The Lord Capel, ' ſays ſhe, though once diſtinguiſhed as a friend of ' liberty, yet as a title had immutably fixed him to ' the intereſts of the Crown, was in high renown ' with the cavaliers, who, miſtaking inſolence for ' magnanimity, ſuperſtition for religion, and an obſtinate adherence to particular intereſts for patriotiſm, have handed him down to poſterity, ' adorned with all the epithets of heroiſm (24). We believe, however, that the greater part of thoſe who differ the moſt in political ſentiments from Lord Capel, will be ready to do juſtice to his integrity and fortitude.

CAPEL (ARTHUR) eldeſt ſon of Arthur Lord Capel, mentioned in the laſt article, ſucceeded his father in his honour; and, after the reſtoration of King Charles II. on account, both of his father's loyalty and ſufferings, and his own perſonal merit, was advanced to the dignity of Viſcount Maldon, and Earl of Eſſex, April 20, 1661 (a), with with remainder of the ſame honour, for want of iſſue male, to Henry Capel, Eſq; his brother, and the heirs male of his body; and, for want of ſuch iſſue, to Edward Capel, Eſq; his younger brother (b). He was alſo made Cuſtos Rotulorum, and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Hertford; and, ſome time after, of the county of Wilts, during the minority of the Duke of Somerſet (c). In his younger years, his education was neglected, by reaſon of the civil wars; but, when he came to man's age, he learned the Latin tongue, and made a great progreſs in Mathematics, and in all the other parts of learning. He knew our law and conſtitution well, and was a very thoughtful man. As he appeared early againſt the Court, King Charles, imputing it to his reſentments, reſolved to make uſe of him; and accordingly, in 1670, ſent him Embaſſador to Denmark (d), where his behaviour in the affair of the Flag gained him great reputation [A]. At his return, in 1672, he was ſworn of the Privy-Council (e), and made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. How he came to be raiſed to this poſt he could never underſtand; for he had not pretended to it; and he was a violent enemy to Popery, not ſo much from any fixed principle in religion, in which he was too looſe, as becauſe he looked on it as an invaſion made on the freedom of human nature (f). He began his journey towards Ireland July 22, with a very noble equipage, and arriving at Dublin, had, on Auguſt 5, the Sword of State delivered to him (g). In his government of that kingdom, he exceeded all that had gone before him, and was a pattern to all that ſhould come after. He ſtudied to underſtand well the conſtitution and intereſt of the nation. He read over all their council-books, and made large abſtracts out of them, to guide him, ſo as to advance every thing that had been at any time ſet on foot for the good of the kingdom. He made ſeveral volumes of tables of the ſtate, and perſons that were in every county and town; and got true characters of all that were capable to ſerve the public. And he preferred men always upon merit, without any application from themſelves; and watched over all about him, that there ſhould be no bribes going among his ſervants (h). But notwithſtanding theſe noble qualifications, and his great ſervices, he was recalled in 1677 (i), for complaining that payments were not regularly made in Ireland [B], and refuſing to paſs the accounts of the Earl of Ranelagh, who had the management of the revenue in that kingdom (k). Upon his return to England, he became one of the leading men in the Houſe of Lords (l); and one of thoſe that declared againſt the Earl of Danby (m). That Lord being ſoon after diſplaced, the Earl of Eſſex was admitted into the new Privy-Council, which was formed upon Danby's diſgrace, and was one of thoſe four leading members of it, who had the direction of affairs: the treaſury likewiſe being put in commiſſion, he was appointed firſt and chief Commiſſioner of it [C], on the twenty-firſt of April 1679 (n). He reſigned that office [D] the nineteenth of November following (o), but continued however ſtill of the Privy-Council (p). When the excluſion of the Duke of York was debated

[A] His behaviour in the affair of the Flag gained him great reputation.] The King of Denmark had ordered the Governor of Croonenburgh to make all ſhips that paſſed ſtrike to him. So when Lord Eſſex was ſailing by, the Governor ſent to him, either to ſtrike to him, or to ſail by in the night, or to keep out of his reach: otherwiſe he muſt ſhoot, firſt with powder, but next with ball. Lord Eſſex ſent him a reſolute anſwer, 'That the Kings of England made 'others ſtrike to them, but their ſhips ſtruck to none: 'He would not ſteal through in the dark, nor keep 'out of his reach; and if he ſhot at him he would 'defend himſelf.' The Governor did ſhoot at him, but on deſign ſhot over him: Or, according to ſome (1), tore his rigging. This was thought great bravery in his Lordſhip: Yet he reckoned, it was impoſſible the Governor would endeavour to ſink a ſhip that brought an Embaſſador. Lord Eſſex's firſt buſineſs was to juſtify his behaviour in refuſing to ſtrike. Now, at his going from England, Sir John Cotton had deſired him to take ſome volumes of his library that related to Daniſh affairs; which he took, without apprehending that he ſhould have great occaſion to uſe them: But this accident made him ſearch into them. And he found very good materials to juſtify his conduct; ſince by formal treaties it had been expreſsly ſtipulated, that the Engliſh ſhips of war ſhould not ſtrike in the Daniſh ſeas. This raiſed his character ſo high at Court, that it was written over to him, he might expect every thing he ſhould pretend to at his return (2). The Governor of Croonenburgh was ordered to beg his pardon upon his knees in the open ſtreet, which he did, the Earl ſtanding in a balcony of his lodgings (3).

[B] He was recalled——for complaining that payments were not regularly made in Ireland.] The Earl of Ranelagh, who then managed the revenue of that kingdom, had undertaken to furniſh the King with money, for the building of Windſor, out of the revenue of Ireland: and it was believed, the Ducheſs of Portſmouth had a great yearly penſion out of his office. By this means, payments in Ireland were not regularly made, of which the Earl of Eſſex complained. The King would not own how much he had from Lord Ranelagh, but preſſed Lord Eſſex to paſs his accounts. He anſwered, He could not paſs them as accounts: But if the King would forgive Lord Ranelagh, he would paſs a diſcharge, but not an ill account. The King was not pleaſed with this, nor with his exactneſs in that government; it reproached his own too much. So he took a reſolution about this time to diſplace the Earl of Eſſex, and to put the Duke of Ormond again in his room (4).

(5) Burnet, Hiſt. ubi ſupra, p. 456.

[D] He reſigned that office.] Upon the diſcovery of the Meal-Tub plot, he and the Earl of Halifax preſſed the King vehemently to call a Parliament immediately. But the King thought, that if a Parliament ſhould meet while all mens ſpirits were ſharpened by this new diſcovery, he would find them in a worſe temper than ever: When the King could not be prevailed on to do that, the Earl of Eſſex left the Treaſury. The King was very uneaſy at this. But Lord Eſſex was firm in his reſolution, not to meddle with that poſt more, ſince a Parliament was not called: Yet, at the King's earneſt deſire, he continued, for ſome time, to go to Council (6).

in the Houſe of Lords, the Earl of Eſſex appeared againſt it; and he, and the Earl of Halifax, propoſed ſuch limitations of the Duke's authority, when the crown ſhould devolve on him [E], as would diſable him from doing any harm in Church or State (q). He was alſo thus far ſubſervient to the Court, as to be for the diſſolution, rather than the prorogation, of the Parliament, in July 1679 (r); and was one of the chief perſons that occaſioned the Duke of Monmouth's, and the Earl of Shafteſbury's, diſgrace (s). But ſeeing what violent meaſures were going on, and particularly being named as an accomplice in the meal-tub-plot (t), he reſigned his place, and turned againſt the Court. Accordingly, when the Bill of Excluſion was brought a ſecond time into the Houſe of Lords, he argued vehemently for it (u): and made an extraordinary propoſal (w), for ſecuring the expedients offered in the room of that bill [F]. In February 1680-1, attended by fifteen Peers, he preſented to the King a petition (x), ſubſcribed by himſelf and them, wherein they requeſted, that the Parliament might not ſit at Oxford, but at Weſtminſter [G]. Alſo, he had an interview with the Earl of Shafteſbury, before he ſet out for Holland (y): and generally converſed with him, and the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Ruſſel, Algernoon Sidney, and other perſons that were thought diſaffected (z); all which ſteps rendered him ſo obnoxious to the Court, that he was ſtruck out of the liſt of the Privy-Counſellors (a). In June 1683, being accuſed by the Lord Howard of Eſcrick, of being concerned in the Rye-houſe conſpiracy, called otherwiſe the Fanatic or Proteſtant-plot (b), he was committed to the Tower [H]. On the thirteenth of July following, he was found in a cloſet in his lodgings there, about nine o'clock in the morning, with his throat miſerably cut (c). The Coroner's Jury brought in their verdict, the next day, that he had voluntarily and felonioufly killed and murthered himſelf (d); but it was then, and hath ſince been, thought, that he was murdered by Paul Bomeney, a French ſervant who attended him [I]. [E] He propoſed——limitations of the Duke of York's authority.] Such as, The taking out of his hand all power in eccleſiaſtical matters; the diſpoſal of the public money; with the power of peace and war, and the lodging theſe in both Houſes of Parliament; and that whatever Parliament was in being, or the laſt that had been in being at the King's death, ſhould meet without a new ſummons, upon it, and aſſume the adminiſtration of affairs. The Lords Eſſex, Sunderland, and Halifax, three of the leading members in the new Privy-Council, were for theſe limitations; but the Earl of Shafteſbury, the fourth of the managers, declared highly againſt any limitations: which occaſioned a breach between thoſe Lords; and the three firſt, joining together, were called the Triumvirate (7).

(7) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 455, 456.

[F] And made an extraordinary propoſal, for ſecuring the expedients, &c.] He moved in the Houſe of Lords, That an aſſociation ſhould be entered into to maintain thoſe expedients, and that ſome cautionary towns ſhould be put into the hands of the Aſſociators during the King's life, to make them good after his death. But though this was agreed to, in a thin houſe, it came to nothing; the King looking upon it as a depoſing of himſelf (8).

(8) Idem, p. 486.

[G] He preſented a petition, &c.] At the preſenting of it, he made a ſpeech to the King, in the name of himſelf, and the Lords by whom it was ſubſcribed; wherein he declares, That obſerving from hiſtory and records, how unfortunate many aſſemblies had been, when called at a place remote from the capital city [of which he brings inſtances], and conſidering the preſent poſture of affairs, the many jealouſies and diſcontents that were among people, they had great cauſe to apprehend, that the conſequences of a Parliament at Oxford might be as fatal to his Majeſty and the nation, as thoſe he had mentioned.—— The grounds and reaſons which they gave for their opinions in the petition itſelf, were, That the Lords and Commons could not be in ſafety at Oxford, but would be daily expoſed to the ſwords of the Papiſts, and their adherents, of whom too many were crept into his Majeſty's guards: The liberty of ſpeaking, according to their conſciences, would be thereby deſtroyed; and the validity of all their acts and proceedings, concerning it, left diſputable: The ſtreightneſs of the place did no way admit of ſuch a concourſe of perſons as now follows every Parliament: The witneſſes that were neceſſary to give evidence againſt the Popiſh Lords, Judges, and others, whom the Commons had impeached, or had reſolved to impeach, could neither bear the charge of going thither, nor truſt themſelves under the protection of a Parliament, that was itſelf evidently under the power of guards and ſoldiers (9).

(9) Kennet, ubi ſupra, p. 383, 384.

[H] Being accuſed——of being concerned in the Rye-houſe conſpiracy——he was committed to the Tower.] Before he was impeached, he ſtaid for ſome time at his houſe in the country, and ſeemed ſo little apprehenſive of danger, that his own lady did not imagine he had any concern on his mind. He was offered to be conveyed away very ſafely; but he would not ſtir. His tenderneſs for Lord Ruſſel was the cauſe of it: For he thought his going out of the way might incline the Jury to believe the evidence the more, for his abſconding. He ſeemed reſolved, as ſoon as he ſaw how that went, to take care of himſelf. When a party of horſe, that was ſent to fetch him up, came to his houſe, he was at firſt in ſome diſorder, yet he recovered himſelf. But when he came before the Council, he was in much confuſion. He was ſent to the Tower; and there he fell under ſo great a depreſſion of ſpirit, that he could not ſleep at all. He had fallen before that twice under great fits of the ſpleen, which returned now upon him with more violence. He ſent by a ſervant, whom he had long truſted, a very melancholy meſſage to his wife; 'That what he was charged with was true: He was 'ſorry he had ruined her, and her children.'—— But when he found, how ſhe took his condition to heart, without ſeeming concerned for her own ſhare in it, he was much calmer (10). As to this plot, very few now believe that the Earl of Eſſex, Lord Ruſſel, &c. had ſo great a ſhare in it, as the Court then affirmed. 'Tis very poſſible, that the evident violations of Liberty and Property, improved by the nearer proſpects of Popery, might provoke many of the Nobility and Gentry to enter into ſome meaſures for ſtopping the torrent of the Court, and providing for the enjoyment of their eſtabliſhed Laws and Religion; but ſtill without having recourſe to thoſe violent and bloody means, into which a few raſh and inconſiderate deſperadoes perhaps ran headlong.

[I] It was then, and has ſince been, thought, that he was murdered, &c.] The world was very much divided about this Lord's murder, at the time when it happened, and hath been ſo ever ſince. One ſide maintained, That he murdered himſelf; and ſo the Coroner's Inqueſt found it. The information given by Bomeney in favour of this opinion, was as follows:

to the family, in the pariſh church of Watford (e). As to his character, he was a perſon of an agreeable ſtature, ſlender in body, adorned with a comely countenance, mixed with gravity and ſweetneſs, and was eaſy of acceſs: his mind was ſedate, but his diſcourſes were generally free and pleaſant, and his demeanour very civil; his promiſes were real and ſincere; his reprimands ſmart and ingenious, having a quick apprehenſion, good elocution, ſound judgment, great courage, and reſolution unalterable. He was always wary and circumſpect in Council, where he endeavoured to obſtruct all arbitrary power, and the increaſe of the Popiſh intereſt; having a particular regard for the eſtabliſhed religion of his country (f): tho' others affirm, that he was too looſe in point of religion (g); and that he had an odd ſet of ſome ſtrange principles (h). With regard to his political notions, he thought, the obligation between Prince and Subject was lows (11): 'That when my Lord Eſſex came to the 'Tower, which was the 11th of July, he aſked him '(Bomeney) for a penknife to pare his nails as he was 'wont to do; to which Bomeney anſwered, Being 'come in haſte he had not brought it, but he would 'ſend for one; and accordingly ſent the footman 'with a note for ſeveral things for my Lord, amongſt 'which the penknife was inſerted; and the footman 'went, and gave the bill to my Lord's ſteward, who 'ſent the proviſions, but not the penknife, and told 'the footman he would get one next day.——Ac-'cordingly, on the 12th in the morning, before my 'Lord was up, Bomeney ſent the footman home 'with a note to the ſteward, in which, amongſt 'other things, he aſked for a penknife for my Lord: 'When the footman was gone, about, or a little after 'eight o'clock, my Lord ſent Mr. Ruſſel, his 'warder, to Bomeney, who came, and then he aſked 'him, If the penknife was come? Bomeney ſaid, 'No, my Lord, but I ſhall have it by and by;" 'to which my Lord ſaid, "That he ſhould bring "him one of his razors, it would do as well:" And 'then Bomeney went and fetched one, and gave it 'my Lord; who began to pare his nails, and then 'Bomeney went out of the room into the paſſage by 'the door, on Friday the 13th, and began to talk 'with the warder, and a little while after he went 'down ſtairs; and ſoon after came the footman with 'the proviſions, and brought alſo a penknife, which 'Bomeney put upon his bed, and thought my Lord 'had no more need of it, becauſe he thought he had 'pared his nails; and then Bomeney came up to my 'Lord's chamber, about eight or nine in the fore-'noon on Friday the 13th, with a little note from 'the ſteward; but not finding his Lordſhip in the 'chamber, went to the cloſe-ſtool cloſet door, and 'found it ſhut; and he thinking his Lord was buſy 'there, went down and ſtaid a little, and came up 'again, thinking his Lord had been come out of 'the cloſet; and finding him not in the chamber, 'he knocked at the door with his finger, thrice, and 'ſaid, "My Lord?" But nobody anſwering, he 'took up the hanging, and looking through the 'chink, he ſaw blood, and a part of the razor; 'whereupon he called the warder, Ruſſel, and went 'down to call for help; and the ſaid Ruſſel puſhed 'the door open, and there they ſaw my Lord of 'Eſſex all along the floor, without a peruke, and 'all full of blood, and the razor by him.'——Thomas Ruſſel's information, printed at the end of this, is to the ſame purpoſe, excepting, that it mentions only the 13th of July. To render this account the more probable, it is ſaid, That Lord Eſſex had got into an odd ſet of ſome ſtrange principles: And in particular he thought, a man was the maſter of his own life; and ſeemed to approve of what his wife's great grandfather, the Earl of Northumberland, did, who ſhot himſelf in the Tower after he was arraigned. He had alſo very black fits of the ſpleen (12).

(12) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 553, 570.

But, on the other hand, in order to prove, That the Earl of Eſſex did not murder himſelf, it is alledged, 1. That he was a Nobleman of moſt virtuous and religious principles; of the greateſt ſedateneſs of mind, leaſt ſubject to the undue agitation of unruly paſſions, and moſt under the conduct of a calm, ſteady, ſtrong, clear, and well-poiſed reaſon, of any man: That the perſons, who were reported to have heard him ſay what is mentioned above, concerning his great-grandfather, being aſked about it, declared, They never heard any ſuch thing from him: That his Lady in particular affirmed, That he uſed to ſpeak againſt ſelf-murder with an emotion beyond what was cuſtomary to him; and that he often declared, That no circumſtances whatſoever could extenuate the guilt, or leſſen the infamy, of ſo unnatural and wicked a fact (13). 2. That he could have no ſuch premeditated deſign. For, the day before his murder, he had ordered his ſervants to bring up out of the country ſeveral veſſels of ſilver, neceſſary for dreſſing his victuals; and had laid in a conſiderable quantity of the beſt of wines. Moreover, that he had given private directions to his ſteward, to place himſelf as conveniently as he could at the Lord Ruſſel's trial, the better to take the evidence againſt him in ſhort-hand, and convey it to him (14). 3. That the news of the Earl of Eſſex's murder was publicly talked of at ſeveral diſtant places, before it was perpetrated; namely, two days before, at Andover in Hampſhire; the day before, at Warminſter in Wiltſhire: and the ſame day it was committed, at Frome in Somerſetſhire, ninety miles from London (15). And, therefore, that it was contrived and done by others. 4. That Jane Lodeman, a young woman about thirteen; and William Edwards, a youth between thirteen and fourteen years of age, being at the Tower that morning the Earl of Eſſex was found murdered, they ſaw a bloody razor thrown out of his chamber-window: Which the boy going to take up, a ſhort woman, in a white hood, came out of Captain Hawley's houſe, where the Earl lodged, and ſnatching up the razor, carried it in; immediately after which, murder was cried out. The boy denied this afterwards, but is ſaid to have been terrified by one of his ſiſters, who told him, that he would ruin his father (who had a place in the Cuſtom-houſe) and the reſt of the family, if he perſiſted in it, and would bring both himſelf and his father to be hanged (16). The prevarication of Chief Juſtice Jefferies and Captain Hawley was very glaring upon this point (17). For they inſiſted, That nothing could be well thrown out of the cloſet-window where the Earl was found murdered; whereas the boy and girl both ſpoke of the chamber, not of the cloſet, window. 5. That the print of a bloody foot appeared upon one of my Lord's ſtockings. 6. That the neck, or middle of his cravat, was cut in four pieces; and tied ſo hard, that there was reaſon to gueſs, an attempt had been made to ſtrangle him with it (18). 6. That his Lordſhip's body was taken out of the cloſet, where it was found; ſtripped, and waſhed, and the cloaths carried away; and, alſo, the cloſet and room were waſhed, before the Coroner's Inqueſt was permitted to ſit upon the body: which was not till the day after the murder was committed. One of the Jury deſiring to ſee the clothes, the Coroner told him, 'They were called to ſit upon my Lord's body, and 'not on his clothes; and that it was ſufficient they 'had ſeen the body, and received an account upon 'oath how it was found (19).' 7. That it was impoſſible the Earl ſhould cut his own throat in the manner it was found done. The two Chirurgions, who viewed the body with the Coroner, depoſed, 'That the throat was cut from one jugular to the 'other, and through the wind-pipe and gullet, unto 'the vertebres of the neck, both jugular veins being 'alſo quite divided (20).' Now, the razor where-with was ſo equally mutual, that upon a breach on the one ſide, the other was free (i). He was very temperate in his diet, ſtrict in his juſtice, tender of his honour, and conſtant to his friend: he delighted much in his library, which enabled him to ſpeak on all occaſions with great applauſe, and would ſpend his vacant hours in viewing of Records, and learning the Mathematics: theſe were his diverſions, together with recreating himſelf in his fine gardens, and pleaſant groves, which were of his own plantation (k). He married Elizabeth, daughter of Algernon Earl of Northumberland, by whom he had ſix ſons, and two daughters. But, only Algernon, the fifth ſon, and the youngeſt daughter, ſurvived him. with he was ſaid to have killed himſelf, being a ſmall French razor, about four inches and a half long at moſt, without ſpill or tongue at the end of the blade, it could not be held with ſtrength and ſteadineſs ſufficient to make ſuch a wound, a wound eight inches long and four inches deep, unleſs the hand and fingers graſped two inches of it at leaſt; and how the other two inches and a half of the razor could make ſuch a long and deep wound, as deſcribed by the Chirurgions, is incredible (21). 8. In ſhort, it is ſaid, That this murder was committed by the Duke of York's contrivance and direction, and perpetrated by the Earl of Sunderland, Lord Feverſham, and Paul Bomeney, my Lord's valet de chambre (22). In proof of this it is obſerved, 9. That the King and Duke of York were that morning in the Tower, from ſix o'clock till nine, where they had not been for twelve years before. 10. That the centinels, which uſed to be changed every two hours, continued upon duty from four to ten o'clock in the morning (23); being, probably, perſons that could beſt be truſted. However, that the day but one after the murder, they were called together, and ſtrictly charged not to ſpeak of what they had ſeen or heard (24). But Captain Hawley, having whiſpered ſomething about it, was found murdered (25): And Robert Meak, one of the centinels, not having been ſo ſilent as deſired, was murdered, and thrown into the Tower-ditch (26). 11. That a gate, at the lower-end of thoſe apartments where my Lord Eſſex was confined, which uſed to ſtand open from morning till night, was all that morning kept ſhut, by a ſpecial order, till his Lordſhip was dead. 12. That the King and Duke having been at the Lieutenant's houſe, about the middle of the alley where the Earl was impriſoned, the Duke did, ſoon after, with ſeveral waiting upon him, withdraw from the King, down into the alley, the gate whereof was ſtill kept ſhut. 13. That the Duke having withdrawn from the King, ſeveral perſons were immediately ſent from his ſide towards the Earl of Eſſex's lodgings, which returned not till after his death (27). 14. That P. Bomeney was juſtly ſuſpected by the reſt of my Lord's ſervants, by the laſt Earl of Eſſex, and many other perſons, to be the author of his maſter's death. Upon that ſuſpicion, the Counteſs diſmiſſed him out of her family. But he was, thereupon, cheriſhed and entertained by the Court, and made one of the Life-guards (28). As an evidence of his guilt, he was extremely frightened at the enquiry that was made into his maſter's death. 15. But that the Court was alſo acceſſary to this murder, is ſtrongly ſuſpected; becauſe they ſo earneſtly diſcouraged all manner of enquiry into it (29). For one Mr. Laurence Braddon, who was very active in diſcovering the true authors of this barbarous murder, was fined 2000l. in the King's-Bench; and Mr. Hugh Speke 1000l. (30). After all, by whom it was committed, is one of thoſe ſecrets, which cannot be fully revealed till the laſt great day of accounts. M.

 [The following obſervations on the arguments here produced in ſupport of the Earl of Eſſex's having been murdered, have been communicated to us by a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed eminence in a judicial capacity; and, as they tend to throw freſh light on an event which hath ſo much divided the opinions of men, we doubt not of their being very acceptable to our readers.

1. This proves nothing. The Earl of Eſſex's fits of madneſs may have been ſudden. I knew a man intended for the Church: He never wrote but one ſermon; it was againſt Self-Murder, and yet he murdered himſelf. 2. Had the Earl formed a premeditated deſign, he would have acted preciſely in the ſame manner, in order to prevent ſuſpicion. 3. Theſe reports, if true, only prove, what is now univerſally acknowledged, that there were great ſuſpicions of the men in power, as men who would ſtick at nothing to get rid of an enemy. 4. The declarations of the children, though laughed at by party-men, prove, in my apprehenſion, this fact: "That "a bloody razor was thrown from a window of Lord "Eſſex's lodging much about the time of the Earl's "death." Obſerve: Two children, unknown to each other, report this circumſtance immediately after the time at which, if true, it muſt have happened. They could not have been ſuborned at that time. The girl had ſo little idea of the conſequences drawn from the circumſtances ſhe related, that ſhe reported it as a proof that Eſſex had murdered himſelf. This ſurely is the language of nature, not of artifice. But it is ſaid, that the boy departed from his evidence. True; when Jefferies examined him he firſt aſſerted the truth of the circumſtance, and then denied it: But what then? It appears, from the trial of Braddon and Speke, that the boy was intimidated even before he appeared in Court. Beſides, a boy, examined in Court, may contradict what he had before declared in a more private manner, and yet his firſt aſſertion may be true, and his latter denial falſe. I ſaw a boy, in the trial of Andrew Wilſon for poiſoning his wife, who had given a diſtinct evidence before perſons in the country; and yet when he came to be examined in the Court of Juſticiary by other ſort of Judges than Jefferies, he would ſay nothing. Yet it was proved that what he had formerly ſaid was true; and there was no ſuſpicion of any foul play. Here the boy Edwards aſſerted a fact, and he afterwards denied it; his denial will not make it leſs true in itſelf, though it may derogate from the credit of his teſtimony. The great queſtion is, if Edwards did not ſee the razor, how came he to ſay that he did? How came he to make ſuch a lye? How was it poſſible for the girl Lodeman to make the ſame lye? It was ſaid that Edwards, when he played the truant, uſed to tell lies to excuſe himſelf; that on the 13th of July he had played the truant; and it muſt be preſumed that he told this lye to excuſe himſelf. But how could ſuch a lye excuſe him, or how could he think that it would? Such, however, was the logic of the Courts in the days of Charles the Second. 5. This might have happened by ſome one engaged in lifting the dead body from the place where it lay weltering in blood. 6. This proves imprudence, if true. 8, 9. The King and Duke of York's being at the Tower, ſeems to me a proof of their innocence, rather than of their guilt. For if they had meant to order Lord Eſſex to be murdered, what occaſion was there for their preſence in the Tower? 10. At the trial of Braddon and Speke, only one centinel made his appearance, Lewis, and he ſaid that he was the centinel on that day; and it would ſeem it was underſtood that there was no other centinel there at the time. 11, 12, 13. All theſe are circumſtances of no ſort of moment, although they were proved to be true. 14. Lady Eſſex's ſuſpicions are nothing to the purpoſe. If Bomeney was diſmiſſed from her ſervice, it was natural for the Court to provide for him. The office

Algernon Earl of Eſſex, was Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to King William, Colonel of a regiment of dragoons, ſerved under him in Flanders, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Landen, and attended at the great Congreſs in 1690. In the reign of Queen Anne, he was Conſtable of the Tower of London, Lieutenant-General of her armies, and Colonel of Dragoons. He was alſo, in both reigns, Lord Lieutenant, and beſtowed on him could ſcarcely be conſiderable enough, had it been intended as the reward of his villainy. 15. The Earl of Eſſex's murdering himſelf was uſed by the Court partly as a proof of the conſpiracy, which was very poorly proved, againſt Lord Ruſſel and Col. Sidney. I blame this; but ſtill it was conſiſtent in the Court to aſſert that Lord Eſſex killed himſelf, and to puniſh thoſe who induſtriouſly reported the contrary, and endeavoured to collect evidence to that effect.

Mr. Hume treats the ſuſpicion of the Earl of Eſſex's having been murdered as very frivolous; and it is certain that moſt of Speke's arguments in ſupport of that ſuſpicion, have little ſolidity. But our learned correſpondent, at the ſame time, obſerves, that the writer of the Earl's article acted with much judgment and candour in leaving the queſtion undecided.

In the year 1770 were publiſhed, in one volume, quarto, "Letters written by his Excellency Arthur "Capel, Earl of Eſſex, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, "in the year 1675. To which is prefixed, An "hiſtorical account of his life." The hiſtorical account of the Earl's life, prefixed to theſe letters, is entirely taken from the BIOGRAPHIA, without any acknowledgment of the obligation owing to our learned predeceſſor. Neither has the editor otherwiſe been willing to impoſe much labour upon himſelf: for he has not added an index, or even a table of contents, to his publication; nor ſo much as acquainted us where his materials were preſerved, or by whom communicated. There is, however, no reaſon to doubt of their authenticity. The letters are generally written with eaſe, and are not deſtitute of elegance. They ſhew, likewiſe, the noble author's integrity, good ſenſe, and capacity for buſineſs. At the ſame time, we agree, with a periodical critic, that the work does not throw any conſiderable light on the period to which it refers. Many of the letters are of little importance, and regard matters which the public is no wiſe intereſted to know. A very ſmall volume would have been ſufficient to have contained thoſe of them which are of real value (31).

(31) Monthly Review, vol. xliii. p. 121.

In 1675, the Earl of Eſſex was deſirous of obtaining leave to come over to England, to lay before his Majeſty the ſtate of affairs in Ireland. The following letter, written whilſt he was urging this requeſt (which he obtained) will afford a ſpecimen of his manner of compoſition, and do honour to his character and views:

'To Sir HENRY CAPEL.

'DEAR BROTHER, Dublin Caſtle, June 12, 1675.

'I HAD not leiſure to write to you by the laſt, and 'therefore I directed Mr. Harbord to acknowledge the receipt of your letters. The various conjectures that men have of my coming over, and 'their gueſſes at the reaſons why I ſhould propoſe it, 'are as ridiculous as any thing I have ever met with. 'The truth is, this age is ſo ſubtle, that it is hard 'for any man living in it to believe there is one 'plain-dealing man left in the world. I never 'conſulted any one in England whatever, concerning 'my going; and there is but one ſingle perſon on 'this ſide the water who knew it, till I had diſpatched Mr. Godolphin (wherefore I would be 'glad that yourſelf and Mr. Harbord would enquire 'out who were the authors of that report of my 'being ſent for, four days before Mr. Godolphin 'reached London); I debated the matter calmly 'with myſelf, at leaſt, one month before I took the 'reſolution; and finding clearly, that there will be 'now an opportunity of ſettling this poor country in 'quiet and eaſe, if the King ſo think fit, I thought 'it worthy the offering my ſenſe upon that ſubject, 'and the propoſing my coming over, in order to a 'great and good end. I have ſpent now almoſt 'three years here, to inform myſelf of the true ſtate 'of this kingdom, and the ſeveral intereſts therein; 'and I hope I have not been an unprofitable obſerver of all matters relating to the conſtitutions of 'this government. When I entered upon my charge, 'I came from a retired life, and never had any thing 'of this nature committed to my truſt; and it was a 'hazard whether I would be able to perform it, ſo 'as might be for his Majeſty's ſervice. If there were 'nothing more than this in the caſe, that his Majeſty, having put a man unexperienced in government, into the greateſt command he has to give, 'where he has reſided near three years, and his 'Majeſty ſhould think fit to diſcourſe with him, and 'try if in this time he underſtands thoſe affairs which 'have been under his charge, and would hear him 'upon ſome debates at the committee for Iriſh buſineſs, to ſatisfy himſelf whether he be a man that 'has uſed diligence in his employment, and endeavoured to make himſelf maſter in the knowledge of 'that country, and has parts and capacity thereunto: 'if, upon theſe trials, the King ſhould find this 'perſon ignorant, and not able to ſpeak ſenſe in the 'concerns of that kingdom, it were doubtleſs reaſonable he be immediately removed, and another 'ſent that would ſerve better. But if his Majeſty 'ſhould find, that his chief governor has been induſtrious to inform himſelf of the ſtate of all things 'under his command, and has been virtuous and 'true to him in the diſcharge of his duty, this may 'confirm his Majeſty in his choice, and he may with 'honour be ſent back again to the government, as 'being capable to do his Majeſty more ſervice in that 'poſt, than any other. If there were, I ſay, no 'more than this in the caſe, it were ground ſufficient 'for his Majeſty to deſire to ſpeak with him. But 'if over and above all this, there is now an article 'of time approaching, wherein great good may be 'done to this country, and I have prepared myſelf 'to make propoſals thereunto, it ſeems a moſt wonderful thing to me, what ſhould be the reaſon that 'his Majeſty ſhould ſcruple the ſending for me over; 'and as ſtrange that men ſhould conjecture and have 'wild notions, as if I were put upon this journey by 'ſome or other who intend to miſchief me, and that 'I had over-reached myſelf therein: the plain truth 'being no more than this, that I find conſiderable 'matters may be done, and the ſeaſon of putting 'them into execution draws near; therefore I have 'offered my ſervice to his Majeſty, to be preſent at 'the debates of them. And if the King like of my 'coming, I am ready; and if not, having diſcharged 'my duty, I have no more to ſay. As to Mr. 'Godolphin's diſcourſing with you or Mr. Harbord 'upon this ſubject, he was not at all forbidden: 'and, I confeſs, I am much at eaſe now that my 'letters are delivered; for if I be commanded to 'come, I know it may conduce to the good of the 'kingdom; and if I do not go over, and any miſchief or irregularities happen to be done, let them 'bear the blame who take upon them to eſtabliſh 'rules for the government of this kingdom. By the 'next I ſhall return you the writings you ſent over, 'as alſo a particular of my brother Ned's eſtate, the 'latter of which I thought I had ſent long ago.

'I am your moſt affectionate brother,

'ESSEX (32).'

Dr. Leland, ſpeaking of the Earl of Eſſex's adminiſtration in Ireland, obſerves, that neither King Charles nor his brother ſeem to have been ſatisfied with a Lord Lieutenant whoſe integrity was more rigid than their own, who objected to ſeveral exceptionable and clandeſtine meaſures, however authoriſed, and even refuſed obedience to the royal orders, when not exactly conformable to law (33).] K.

CAREW. The ſurname of an ancient family in Devonſhire and Cornwall, which hath produced ſeveral illuſtrious and eminent perſons. Some (a) fetch the original of that family from the Dukes or Kings of Suevia, now Schwabia, in High Germany: But others (b) with more probability, derive it from France[A], and think they came into England with William the Conqueror; that name occurring in Battle-Abbey-roll (c), though that roll is of little authority. The firſt of this line in England, was Walter de Windſor, ſo called from his being Caſtellan or Governor of the caſtle of Windſor: He had two ſons, William, from whom the Lords Windſors are deſcended; and Gerald, from whom the Carews and Fitzgeralds. This Gerald was Caſtellan or Governor of the caſtle of Pembroke in Wales; and in great favour with King Henry I. who granted him the lordſhip of Mullesford in Berkſhire (†). He married Neſta, daughter of Rees, Prince of South-Wales; whoſe dowry was the caſtle of Carew in thoſe parts[B]. By this Lady he had three ſons, William, Maurice, and David. David, the youngeſt, was Biſhop of St. David's. From Maurice Fitz-gerald, the ſecond ſon, are iſſued the noble families of Kildare and Deſmond in Ireland. William, the eldeſt, Lord of Carrio, had iſſue Raymond who died without iſſue, Otho, and others. Otho had iſſue William, the firſt that took the ſurname of de Carrio, or Carru (d). His ſucceſſors, for ſome generations, were, William; Nicolas; William; Sir Nicolas, Knt; and Sir Nicolas, Baron of Carru and Mullesford, ſummoned by writ to Parliament, in the reign of King Edward I. This Sir Nicolas married the ſiſter and heir of Sir John Peverel, of Weſton-Peverel near Plymouth, by whom he had a large eſtate in thoſe parts, as Weſton-Peverel, Aſhford-Peverel, Manhead, and other places. He had iſſue by this Lady four ſons, Sir John, Thomas, Nicolas, and William. From Nicolas deſcended the family of Carew, of Beddington in Surrey. Sir John, the eldeſt ſon, married firſt, Eleanor, daughter and heir of Sir William Mohun, of Mohun's-Ottery, Knt. by whom he had Nicolas: he married, to his ſecond wife, Joan, daughter of Gilbert Lord Talbot, by which he had Sir John, to whom his brother Nicolas, dying without iſſue, left his eſtate (e). On this Sir John I ſhall enlarge a little in the next article.

Which of the two it was, cannot eaſily be determined at this diſtance of time. Mr. Camden inclines to the latter opinion (1), and affirms, that it 'gave both name and original to the illuſtrious family 'of Carew.' So doth alſo Mr. Wood (2), A Carew caſtro in agro Pembrochienſi Cognomen ſortitus eſt, viz. Georgius Carew. i. e. He took his ſurname from Carew-caſtle in Pembrokeſhire. M.

CAREW (Sir JOHN) Knt. Baron of Carew and Mullesford, was born at Mohuns-Ottery, ſo called from its Lords the Mohuns (a); and which paſſed unto the Carews in the manner above-mentioned. He was a great ſoldier, and valiantly ſerved King Edward III. in his wars in France (b). Very probably, he was preſent at the ever-memorable battle of Creſſy; in which was ſlain his brave ſon, Sir John Carew, whoſe courage and conduct had preferred him to the honour of knighthood (c). In the year 1348, John, Baron of Carew, was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, and after having continued in that honourable poſt about two years, returned to England (d). He died May the 16th, 1363 (e). Beſides his ſon, who was ſlain as is above related, he had another, named Leonard, who had iſſue Sir Thomas Carew, of whom in the next article. M.

CAREW (Sir THOMAS.) This Sir Thomas was alſo a brave ſoldier. He had the charge of the navy, and three thouſand Engliſh ſoldiers committed to him, for ſecuring the Emperor Sigiſmund, during his abode in England (a). In the beginning of the reign of King Henry V. he valiantly ſerved that heroic Prince in his wars in France, and was undoubtedly at the battle of Agincourt (b). In the year 1418, he was appointed to keep and defend the paſſage over the river Seine, and was made Captain of Harfleur (c). He died January 25, 1430-1, leaving iſſue Sir Nicolas, Baron Carew: who married Joan, daughter of Sir Hugh Courtenay, of Haccombe, Knight, by Philippa his wife, daughter, and one of the heirs of Sir Warren Ercedecon, or Archdeacon (d), of that place, Knight. Sir Nicolas had, by his ſaid Lady Joan, three ſons; Sir Thomas, Knight, Nicolas, Hugh, Alexander (e). Sir Thomas happening pening to diſoblige his mother in a very high degree, ſhe ſettled ſeventeen manors on her younger ſons, which proved the foundation of three great families, that have flouriſhed ever ſince. Haccombe [A], with four manors, ſhe ſettled on Nicolas her ſecond ſon, to whom fell, by entail, the third brother's inheritance. To Hugh, ſhe gave Biry; from whom is deſcended Carew of Stodelegh. And to Alexander, ſhe gave Anthony in Cornwal (f). Sir Thomas above-mentioned, was the father of Sir Nicolas Carew; who married Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Sir John Dinham, Knight, ſiſter and one of the heirs of John, Lord Dinham, of Nutwel, in Devonſhire, Lord High-Treaſurer of England; and left iſſue, Sir Edmund Carew, Knight (g), who was a brave ſoldier. Among other children, he had Thomas Carew, of whom in the next article.

[A] Haccombe.] Mr. Prince informs us (1), That, as to number of dwellings, this pariſh of Haccombe is the ſmalleſt in England; conſiſting but of two dwellings, the Manſion or Manor-houſe, and the Parſonage. But it enjoys privileges beyond the greateſt: for it is out of any hundred, and beyond the precincts of any officer, civil or military, to take cognizance of any proceedings therein. And, by a royal grant from the Crown, is exempted from all duties and taxes, for ſome noble ſervices done by ſome of the anceſtors of this family, towards its ſupport. The Rector of that Church hath alſo great privileges; namely, a ſinecure in Cornwal of good value; and, as Rector of Haccombe, he is Archprieſt; and, it is ſaid, may claim the privilege of wearing lawn-ſleeves, and of ſitting next the Biſhop; and is under the viſitation only of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

CAREW (Thomas) his ſecond ſon; and the firſt of the name of Carew, who ſettled at Bicklegh, in the county of Devon (a). He was born at Mohuns-Ottery, and became poſſeſſed of Bicklegh, by marrying the only daughter and heir of Humphrey Courtenay, Eſquire [A]. He was like his father, a perſon of a martial ſpirit, and got great honour and renown in the wars. In the year 1513, he attended, Thomas, Earl of Surrey in his expedition againſt Scotland; and was at the battle of Floddenfield, fought the 9th of September the ſame year, wherein the Scots were defeated, and their King James IV. ſlain (b). Before this battle, a Scottiſh Knight, having made a challenge to any Engliſh gentleman to fight with him for the honour of his country, Mr. Carew deſired to anſwer the challenge (c), and conquered his bragging adverſary; which brought him into great favour with his General, the Earl of Surrey. But, after the battle, he had another opportunity of gaining farther his eſteem and affection. For his Lordſhip taking Mr. Carew along with him, as he rode out upon ſervice, deſcried a band of Scots coming towards them. Having a very ſtrait paſſage over a bridge to croſs, the Earl was in great danger of being there entrapped and taken. To prevent that, Carew perſuaded him to exchange armour and dreſs with him, that he might, if occaſion were, make his eſcape the more eaſily, which the General readily conſented to. The enemy coming on to this narrow paſs, Mr. Carew, in his rich habit, well mounted, croſſed the bridge with his horſe; and for a time ſo valiantly defended it, that no man could paſs; by which means he gained time, and provided for his General's eſcape. However, Mr. Carew himſelf was at laſt taken priſoner, to the great joy of the enemy, who imagined they had taken the General himſelf. But finding themſelves diſappointed, they carried him to the Caſtle of Dunbar, where he remained a priſoner for ſome time. At length he was redeemed, and the Earl of Surrey never forgot the noble ſervices he had done him, but entertained him, ever after, with all courteſy and friendſhip; made him his Vice-Admiral, and aſſiſted him in all his affairs (d). The time of this Mr. Carew's death is unknown (e). He out-lived his firſt wife, the heir of Courtenay, who ſettled on him and his heirs for ever, all her eſtate (f). For his ſecond wife, he had the daughter of ——— Smart, by whom he had iſſue, Humphrey Carew, Eſquire. He left a ſon, named Peter, who, by the daughter of George Cary, of Clovelly, Eſq; had iſſue, Sir Henry Carew, the laſt heir male of this line. He married one of the daughters of Sir Reginald Mohun, of Cornwal, Knight, by whom he had iſſue, two daughters and heirs; the eldeſt of which was married to Sir Thomas Carew, of Haccombe, Baronet, and ſo theſe two houſes of Bicklegh and Haccombe came to be united (g). This honourable family hath flouriſhed in thoſe parts ever ſince.

[A] He became poſſeſſed of Bicklegh, by marrying the only daughter and heir of Humphrey Courtenay, Eſq;] Bicklegh was formerly the inheritance of the honourable family of the Courtenays, of Powderham-caſtle (1), and uſed to be a portion for a younger ſon of that houſe. At length it came to be ſettled upon Humphrey, the youngeſt ſon of Sir Philip Courtenay; which Humphrey dying before his father, left his only daughter and heir under Sir Philip's care. Sir Philip intruſted her to Sir William Carew (eldeſt brother to this Thomas whom we are now about) who had married his eldeſt ſon's daughter, couſin-german to this Lady. Mr. Thomas Carew living with his brother, became very familiar with this young fortune, courted her, and having obtained her good-will, carried her away ſecretly by night, and married her. This being highly reſented by Sir Philip, the young Lady's grandfather, and alſo by Sir William, Mr. Thomas Carew's brother, Mr. Carew to avoid the effects of their indignation, and to give them time to cool, reſolved to go into the wars; and ſo entered himſelf into the army, that was then preparing to march againſt the Scots (2).

CAREW (George) afterwards Earl of Totnes (deſcended from an ancient family in the Weſt of England, originally ſo named from Carew-Caſtle (a) in Pembrokeſhire) was born in 1557 (b). His mother was Anne, daughter of Sir Nicolas Harvey, Knight (c), and his father, George, Archdeacon of Totnes, and ſucceſſively Dean of Briſtol, of the Queen's Chapel, of Windſor, of Chriſt-Church Oxon, and of Exeter; beſides ſeveral other preferments (d), moſt of which he reſigned before his deceaſe. Mr. George Carew, in 1572, at the age of fifteen, was admitted Gentleman Commoner of Broadgate-Hall (now Pembroke-College) in Oxford; where he made a good proficiency in learning, particularly in the ſtudy of Antiquities (e). But being of an activ temper, he left the Univerſity without a degree; and applying himſelf to military affairs, went and ſerved in Ireland againſt the Earl of Deſmond (f). In the year 1580, he was made Governor of Aſketten-Caſtle (g). In 1589, he was created Maſter of Arts at Oxford, being then a Knight (h). Some time after, being conſtituted Lieutenant-General of the Artillery, or Maſter of the Ordnance in Ireland, he was one of the Commanders at the expedition to Cadiz, in 1596; and again, the next year, in the intended expedition againſt Spain (i). Having in 1599, been appointed Preſident of Munſter (k), he was in 1600, made Treaſurer of the army, and one of the Lords Juſtices of Ireland (l). When he entered upon his government, he found every thing in a deplorable condition; all the country being in open and actual rebellion, excepting a few of the better ſort, and himſelf having for his defence but three thouſand foot and two hundred and fifty horſe. However, he behaved with ſo much conduct and bravery, that he reduced to the Queen's obedience the Caſtles and Forts of Loghguyre, Cahir, Ballitrarſnie, Crome, Glyn, Carrigfoyle, Lixnaw, Rathowin, Tralee, Mayne, Ardart, Liſtoell, Dingle, &c. took James Fitz Thomas, the titular Earl of Deſmond, and Oconnor, priſoners; and brought the Bourkes, Obriens, and many other Iriſh rebels, to ſubmiſſion (m). He did alſo very good ſervice againſt thoſe ſix thouſand Spaniards, who landed at Kinſale, October 1, 1601, and had ſo well eſtabliſhed the province of which he was Preſident, by apprehending the chief of thoſe he miſtruſted, and taking pledges of the reſt, that not any one perſon of conſideration joined the Spaniards (n). In 1602, he made himſelf Maſter of the Caſtle of Donboy, which was a very difficult undertaking, and reckoned almoſt impracticable. But the taking of it was of great conſequence; for it ſtopped the coming of an army of Spaniards, which were ready to ſail for Ireland (o). He had for ſome time been deſirous of quitting his burdenſome office of Preſident of Munſter [A], but he could not obtain permiſſion to do it till the beginning of the year 1603, when, leaving that province in a firm and univerſal peace, he arrived in England the 21ſt of March, three days before his miſtreſs, Queen Elizabeth's death (p). His merit was ſo great, that he was taken notice of by the new King, and made by him, in the firſt year of his reign, Governor of the Iſle of Guernſey, and Caſtle Cornet (q): and having married Joyce, the daughter and heir of William Clopton, of Clopton, in the county of Warwick, Eſq; he was, on the 4th of June 1605, advanced to the degree of a Baron, by the title of Lord Carew, of Clopton (r). Afterwards he was made Vice-Chamberlain and Treaſurer to King James's Queen; and in 1608, conſtituted Maſter of the Ordnance throughout England for life; and ſworn of the Privy-Council to the King, as he had before been to Queen Elizabeth (s). Upon King Charles Iſt's acceſſion to the Crown, he was by him created, on February 1, 1625, Earl of Totnes. At length, being full of years and honours, he departed this life at the Savoy in London, March 27, 1629, aged ſeventy-three years and ten months; and was buried at Stratford upon Avon, near Clopton above-mentioned: leaving behind him the character (t) of a faithful ſubject, a valiant and prudent Commander, an honeſt Counſellor, a genteel Scholar, a lover of Antiquities, and a great Patron of Learning [B]. A ſtately monument was erected to his memory, by his widow (u), with a long inſcription reciting his actions above-mentioned.

CAREW (Sir ALEXANDER) of Anthony in Cornwal, beheaded for endeavouring to deliver Plymouth to King Charles I. was born at Anthony. He had a very good education (a); and being a gentleman of a conſiderable fortune, was choſen one of the Knights for the county of Cornwal, in the Parliament, which met at Weſtminſter, November 3, 1640 (b). In this Parliament, he ſided with thoſe Members who oppoſed the Court-meaſures; and was one of the moſt violent amongſt them (c); and afterwards very active in ſettling the militia in Cornwal (d). He voted for the Earl of Strafford's attainder, in 1641, tho' he was preſſed to the contrary by Sir Bevil Greenville [A], the other Knight of the ſhire for Cornwal (e). When Plymouth was ſecured by the Parliament, Mr. Carew was intruſted with the cuſtody and government of St. Nicolas's iſland and fort, which command the harbour, and were looked upon as the ſecurity of the town, eſpecially as they had a ſufficient garriſon (f). But, after the battle of Stratton, when the forces of King Charles I. prevailed ſo far over the Weſt, that Briſtol was taken by them, and Exeter cloſely beſieged, Sir Alexander Carew [B] began to think, his iſland and fort would hardly ſecure his own eſtate in Cornwal; and underſtood the law ſo well, as to know, that the ſide he had choſen, would be no longer the better, than whilſt it ſhould continue the ſtronger: and having originally followed no other motives, than of popularity and intereſt, reſolved now to redeem his errors. So, he found means to correſpond with ſome of his old friends and neighbours in Cornwal, and by them to make a direct overture to ſurrender that fort and iſland to the King, upon the aſſurance of his Majeſty's pardon, and a full remiſſion of his offences (g). Sir John Berkley, who then lay before Exeter, was the next ſupreme officer, qualified to entertain ſuch a treaty; and he, inſtantly, by the ſame conveyance, returned him as ample aſſurance of his own conditions as could be; with advice, That he ſhould not upon any defect of forms (which, upon his engagement, ſhould be ſupplied with all poſſible expedition, to his own ſatisfaction) defer conſummating the work, which hereafter, poſſibly, might not be in his power to effect. But Sir Alexander was ſo careful of his own ſecurity, that he would not proceed, till he was ſufficiently aſſured, that his pardon had paſſed the great ſeal. Before this time, though all imaginable haſte was made, by the treachery of a ſervant whom he truſted (h), or elſe by his own ſoldiers (i), his treaty and deſign were diſcovered to the Mayor of Plymouth, and the reſt of the Committee there: whereupon, he was ſuddenly, and without reſiſtance, ſurprized in his fort, and carried priſoner to Plymouth (k); in which place the women were ſo enraged with him, that it was difficult to reſcue him from their execution (l). From Plymouth, he was ſent by ſea to London (m); where the Houſe of Commons voted him diſabled from being a member (n): and being tried at Guildhall, by a Court-Martial (o), or Council of War (p) [C], he was beheaded on Tower-hill, the twenty-third day of December 1644 (q); on purpoſe to deter others from attempts of the like nature.

And it ſeems he was afterwards beheaded with the ſame ax (1). But by Sir William Dugdale, and Sir Roger Manley (4), he is named from the firſt, Sir Alexander Carew, even when he voted againſt the Earl of Strafford. So great is the negligence and inaccuracy of Hiſtorians! His father, Richard Carew, Eſq; was created a Baronet, Auguſt 9, 1641 (5), and in all likelihood was dead before 1644. CAREW (THOMAS) a celebrated Poet of the laſt Century, famed, as Anthony Wood expreſſes it (a), for the charming ſweetneſs of his Lyric odes and amorous ſonnets, was younger brother of Sir Matthew Carew, a great Royaliſt in the time of the civil war, of the family of the Carews in Glouceſterſhire, but deſcended from the ancient family of that name in Devonſhire. The year of his birth is not known. He had his academical education at Corpus-Chriſti College, in Oxford, but was not matriculated as a member of that houſe, nor took any degree. Afterwards improving his parts by travelling, and converſation with men of learning and ingenuity at London, he became reckoned among the chiefeſt of his time for delicacy of wit and poetic fancy. His abilities recommending him to the Court, he was made Gentleman of the privy chamber, and Sewer in ordinary to his Majeſty King Charles I. who always eſteemed him as one of the moſt celebrated wits of his Court. He was much reſpected, if not adored, by the Poets of his time, particularly Ben Jonſon and Sir William Davenant.

(a) Athen. Oxon. vol. i. col. 630.

nant [A]. This ingenious gentleman died in the prime of his life, about the year 1639, leaving behind him ſeveral poems, and a maſque called Cœlum Britannicum [B].

[A] He was much reſpected, if not adored, by the poets of his time, particularly Ben Jonſon and Sir William Davenant.] Sir William addreſſed ſome ſtanzas to Mr. Carew, celebrating his wit and talent in poetry, among which are theſe lines (1):

(1) See Langbaine's Account of the Dramatic Poets, Oxf. 1691, p. 45.

Not but thy verſes are as ſmooth and high
As glory, love, and wine from wit can raiſe;
But now the devil take ſuch deſtiny!
What ſhould commend them turns to their diſpraiſe.

Thy wit's chief virtue is become it's vice;
For every beauty thou haſt raiſed ſo high,
That now coarſe faces carry ſuch a price,
As muſt undo a lover that wou'd buy.

Sir John Suckling, that gay wit, who delighted to rally the beſt poets, and ſpared not Ben Jonſon himſelf, has thus played upon our author in his Seſſion of the Poets (2).

(2) See Sir John Suckling's Poems, p. 8.

Tom Carew was next, but he had a fault,
That wou'd not well ſtand with a Laureat:
His muſe was hide-bound, and iſſue of's brain,
Was ſeldom brought forth, but with labour and pain.

All that were there preſent did agree,
That a Laureat Muſe ſhou'd be eaſy and free;
Yet ſure 'twas not that; but 'twas thought that his Grace
Conſider'd he was well, he had a cup-bearer's place.

[B] Several poems, with a maſque called Cœlum Britannicum.] They have been ſeveral times reprinted, the fourth edition being in 8*vo*. Lond. 1670. The maſque was performed at Whitehall on Shrove-Tueſday night, the 18th of February 1633, by the King's Majeſty, the Duke of Lenox, the Earls of Devonſhire, Holland, Newport, &c. with ſeveral other young Lords and Noblemen's ſons. Mr. Carew was aſſiſted in the contrivance by Mr. Inigo Jones, the famous Architect; and all the ſongs were ſet to muſic by the celebrated Mr. Henry Lawes, Gentleman of the King's Chapel, and one of the private muſic to King Charles I. As this piece was written by the King's eſpecial command, our author put this diſtich in the front, when printed:

Non habet ingenium; Cæſar ſed juſſit; habebo:
Cur me poſſe negem, poſſe quod ille putat?

This maſque was formerly, through a miſtake, aſcribed to Sir William Davenant, and is therefore not mentioned, either by Mr. Philips or Mr. Winſtanley in their Lives of the Poets (3). B.

(3) Langbaine, ubi ſupra, p. 44.

 [Mr. Carew was one of the gentlemen with whom the great Earl of Clarendon, when a young man, and a ſtudent of the law, was particularly acquainted. Accordingly, in his Life and Continuation, the noble hiſtorian has drawn our poet's character, which is too honourable to his memory to be here omitted. 'Thomas Carew was a younger 'brother of a good family, and of excellent parts, 'and had ſpent many years of his youth in France 'and Italy; and returning from travel followed the 'court; which the modeſty of that time diſpoſed 'men to do ſome time, before they pretended to be 'of it; and he was very much eſteemed by the moſt 'eminent perſons in the court, and well looked upon 'by the King himſelf, ſome years before he could 'obtain to be Sewer to the King; and when the King 'conferred that place upon him, it was not without 'the regret even of the whole Scotch nation, which 'united themſelves in recommending another gentleman to it; of ſo great value were thoſe relations 'held in that age, when Majeſty was beheld with the 'reverence it ought to be. He was a perſon of a 'pleaſant and facetious wit, and made many poems '(eſpecially in the amorous way) which for the 'ſharpneſs of the fancy, and the elegancy of the language, in which that fancy was ſpread, were at 'leaſt equal, if not ſuperior, to any of that time: 'But his glory was, that after fifty years of his life 'ſpent with leſs ſeverity or exactneſs than it ought 'to have been, he died with the greateſt remorſe for 'that licenſe, and with the greateſt manifeſtation of 'chriſtianity, that his beſt friends could deſire (4).' It is evident, from this account, that Mr. Carew's deceaſe did not, as repreſented in the text, take place in the prime of his life. As his works may probably now be little known to many of our readers, we ſhall inſert one of his ſonnets (which have been much admired) as a ſpecimen of his poetical talents:

'BOLDNESS IN LOVE.

'Mark how the baſhful morn in vain
'Courts the amorous marigold
'With ſighing blaſts, and weeping rain;
'Yet ſhe refuſes to unfold.
'But when the planet of the day,
'Approacheth with his powerful ray,
'Then ſhe ſpreads, then ſhe receives

'So ſhalt thou thrive in love, fond boy,
'If thy tears and ſighs diſcover

 [As our learned predeceſſors have thought proper to give a ſhort account of ſo many of the Carews, we ſhall add two other perſons of the ſame name and family, who had an equal right to a place in this work with moſt of thoſe who have already been mentioned.

CAREW (RICHARD), author of the Survey of Cornwal, was the eldeſt ſon of Thomas Carew [A], of Eaſt Anthony, Eſq; by Elizabeth Edgecombe, daughter of Richard Edgecombe, of Edgecombe, Eſq; both in the ſame county, and was born in the year 1555. When very young, he became a Gentleman Commoner of Chriſt-Church College, Oxford; and at fourteen years of age had the honour of diſputing, extempore, with the afterwards famous Sir Philip Sydney, in the preſence of the Earls of Leiceſter, Warwick, and other nobility. After ſpending three years at the Univerſity, he removed to the Middle Temple, where he reſided the ſame length of time, and then travelled into foreign parts. Whilſt he was in France, he applied himſelf diligently to the acquiſition of the French language; and, by reading and converſation, he gained a compleat knowledge of it in three quarters of a year. Not long after his return to England, he married, in 1577, Juliana Arundel, of Trerice. In 1581, Mr. Carew was made Juſtice of the Peace, and in 1586 was appointed High-Sheriff of the county of Cornwal; about which time he was, likewiſe, Queen's Deputy for the Militia. In 1589, he was elected a Member of the College of Antiquaries, a diſtinction to which he was entitled by his literary abilities and purſuits. What particularly engaged his attention was his native county, his Survey of which was publiſhed, in quarto, at London, in 1602 (a). It hath been twice reprinted, firſt in 1723, and next in 1769 (b). Of this work Camden hath ſpoken in high terms, and acknowledges his obligations to the author (c). In the preſent improved ſtate of topographical knowledge, and ſince Dr. Borlaſe's excellent publications relative to the county of Cornwal, the value of Mr. Carew's Survey muſt have been greatly diminiſhed. Mr. Gough remarks, that the hiſtory and monuments of this county were faintly touched by Mr. Carew; but it is added, that he was a perſon extremely capable of deſcribing them, if the infancy of thoſe ſtudies at that time had afforded him light and materials (d). Another work of our author was a tranſlation from the Italian, entitled, 'The Examination of Men's 'Wits. In which, by diſcovering the Variety of Natures, is ſhewed for what Pro-'feſſion each One is apt, and how far He ſhall profit therein.' This was publiſhed at London, in 1594, and afterwards in 1604; and, though Richard Carew's name is prefixed to it, hath been principally aſcribed by ſome perſons to his father. According to Wood, Mr. Carew wrote, alſo, 'The true' and ready Way to learn the Latin 'Tongue,' in anſwer to a query, whether the ordinary method of teaching the Latin by the rules of grammar, be the beſt mode of inſtructing youths in that language. This tract is involved in Mr. Samuel Hartlib's book upon the ſame ſubject, and with the ſame title. It is certain that Mr. Carew was a gentleman of conſiderable abilities and literature, and that he was held in great eſtimation by ſome of the moſt eminent ſcholars of his time. He was particularly intimate with Sir Henry Spelman, who extols him for his ingenuity, virtue, and learning. Amongſt his neighbours, he was celebrated as the moſt excellent manager of bees in Cornwal. He died on the ſixth of November, 1620, and was buried with his anceſtors, in the church of St. Anthony, where a ſplendid monument, with a large inſcription, in Latin, was erected to his memory. In an epigram written upon him, he was ſtiled, 'another Livy, another 'Maro, another Papirian (e).' Such were the abſurd and extravagant encomiums which the learned men of that age often beſtowed upon each other!] K.

 [CAREW (GEORGE), brother to the ſubject of the laſt article, and ſecond ſon of Thomas Carew, Eſq; and Elizabeth his wife, was probably born at his father's ſeat at Eaſt Anthony, but in what particular year we are not able to aſcertain. He was educated in the Univerſity of Oxford, after which he ſtudied the law in the inns of court, and then travelled to foreign countries for farther improvement. On his return to his native country, he was called to the bar, and after ſome time was appointed Secretary to Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, Lord Chancellor of England. This was by the eſpecial recommendation of Queen Elizabeth herſelf, who gave him a Prothonotaryſhip in the Chancery, and conferred upon him the honour of Knighthood (a). In 1597, Sir George Carew, who was then a Maſter in Chancery, was ſent Embaſſador to the King of Poland. In the next reign, he was one of the Commiſſioners for treating with the Scotch concerning an union between the two kingdoms; after which he was appointed Embaſſador to the Court of France, where he continued from the latter end of the year 1605 till 1609. During his reſidence in that country, he was regarded by the French Miniſters as not well affected to their nation, and as giving a preference to the Spaniſh intereſt. What reaſons they had for this opinion, it is not at preſent eaſy to diſcover. Perhaps their diſguſt to him might ariſe from his not being very tractable in ſome points of his negotiation, and particularly in the demand of the debts due to the King his maſter. Whatever might be his political principles, it is certain, that he ſought the converſation of men of letters; and formed an intimacy with Thuanus, to whom he communicated an account of the tranſactions in Poland, whilſt he was employed there, which was of great ſervice to that admirable author in drawing up the 121ſt book of his Hiſtory. After Sir George Carew's return from France, he was advanced to the important poſt of Maſter of the Court of Wards, which honourable ſituation he did not long live to enjoy; for it appears from a letter written by Thuanus to Camden, in the ſpring of the year 1613, that he was then lately deceaſed. In this letter, Thuanus laments his death as a great misfortune to himſelf; for he conſidered Sir George's friendſhip not only as a perſonal honour, but as very uſeful in his work, and eſpecially in removing the calumnies and miſrepreſentations which might be raiſed of him in the Court of England. Sir George Carew married Thomaſine, daughter of Sir Francis Godolphin, great grandfather of the Lord Treaſurer Godolphin, and had by her two ſons and three daughters. Francis, the elder ſon, was created Knight of the Bath, at the coronation of King Charles the Firſt, and attended the Earl of Denbigh in the expedition for the relief of Rochelle, where he acquired great reputation by his courage and conduct; but, being ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs in his voyage homeward, he died in the Iſle of Wight, on the 4th of June, 1628, at the age of twenty-ſeven. Richard, the younger ſon, attained only his ſeventeenth year; and of the three daughters, two died ſingle. Anne, the eldeſt, was married to a gentleman of the name of Rawlins (b).

When Sir George Carew returned, in 1609, from his French embaſſy, he drew up, and addreſſed to King James the Firſt, 'A Relation of the State of France, with the 'Characters of Henry the Fourth, and the principal Perſons of that Court;' which reflects great credit upon his ſagacity and attention as an Embaſſador, and his abilities as a Writer. In this piece are conſidered, 1. The name of France. 2. Its ancient and modern limits. 3. Its quality, ſtrength, and ſituation. 4. Its riches. 5. Its political orders. 6. Its diſorders and dangers. 7. The perſons governing, with thoſe who are likely to ſucceed. 8. In what terms the French live with their bordering neighbours. And laſtly, the ſtate of matters between the King of England's dominions and theirs. Theſe heads are divided, as occaſion requires, into other ſubordinate ones. The characters are drawn from perſonal knowledge and cloſe obſervation, and might be of ſervice to a general hiſtorian of that period. The compoſition is perſpicuous and manly, and entirely free from the pedantry which prevailed in the reign of King James the Firſt: but this is the leſs ſurprizing, as Sir George Carew's taſte had been formed in a better æra, that of Queen Elizabeth. The valuable tract we are ſpeaking of lay for a long time in manuſcript, till happily falling into the hands of the preſent Earl of Hardwicke, it was communicated by him to Dr. Birch, who publiſhed it, in 1749, at the end of his 'Hiſtorical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Bruſſels, from the year 1592 to 1617.' That intelligent and induſtrious writer juſtly obſerves, that it is a model, upon which Embaſſadors may form and digeſt their notions and repreſentations; and the late celebrated Poet, Mr. Gray, hath ſpoken of it as an excellent performance (c).] K.

CARLETON (GEORGE) a learned Biſhop in the XVIIth Century, ſon of Guy, ſecond ſon of Thomas Carleton, of Carleton-hall, in Cumberland (a), was born at Norham, in Northumberland, of whoſe important caſtle his father was then Governor (b). By the care of the moſt eminent Bernard Gilpin, ſtiled the northern Apoſtle, he was educated in Grammar-learning; and, when fit for the Univerſity, ſent by the ſame generous perſon to Edmund-Hall in Oxford, in the beginning of the year 1576, by whoſe liberal hand he was encouraged and chiefly maintained in his ſtudies (c). On the 12th of February 1579-80, he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts; at the compleating of which, he exceeded all that performed their exerciſes at that time (d). The ſame year, namely 1580, he was elected probationer Fellow of Merton-College, and remained in that Society above five years before he proceeded in his faculty, not taking the degree of Maſter of Arts, till June the 14th, 1585 (e). While he remained in that College, he was eſteemed a great Orator and Poet; and in proceſs of time became a better diſputant in Divinity, than he had before been in Philoſophy (f). What preferments he had, is not mentioned any where; nor doth it appear that he was poſſeſſed of any dignity in the Church, till he became a Biſhop (g). After having continued many years in the Univerſity (h), and taken the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, May 16, 1594 (i), and that of Doctor, December 1, 1613 (k), he was advanced to the Biſhoprick of Landaff; to which he was elected, December 23, 1617, confirmed, July 11, 1618, and conſecrated at Lambeth the next day (l). The ſame year he was ſent, by King James I, with three other Engliſh Divines (m), and one from Scotland (n), to the Synod of Dort; where he ſtood up in favour of Epiſcopacy [A], and behaved ſo well in every reſpect, to the credit

I ſhewed, that by Chriſt a 'parity was never inſtituted in the Church: That he 'ordained twelve Apoſtles, as alſo ſeventy Diſciples: 'That the authority of the Twelve was above the 'other: That the Church preſerved this order, left by 'our Saviour. And therefore, when the extraordinary 'power of the Apoſtles ceaſed, yet this ordinary au'thority continued in Biſhops, who ſucceeded them, 'who were by the Apoſtles left in the government of 'the Church, to ordain Miniſters, and to ſee that 'they who were ſo ordained ſhould preach no other 'doctrine: That in an inferior degree the Miniſters, 'who were governed by Biſhops, ſucceeded the ſeventy 'Diſciples: That this order hath been maintained in 'the Church from the times of the Apoſtles. And 'herein I appealed to the judgment of Antiquity, 'and to the judgment of any learned man now living '(2).'——At this learned Biſhop's return to England, the States ſent a letter to King James, wherein they highly extolled him, and the reſt of the Divines, for their virtue, learning, piety, and ardent deſire of peace. In Theologis porro utriuſque Regni veſtri omnibus, & ſingulis, quorum agmen ducit vere Reverendiſſimus Dominus Georgius Landavenſis Epiſcopus, imago, atque expreſſa virtutis effigies; eam eruditionem, pietatem, pacis ſtudium, eumque zelum deprehendimus, ut, cum ipſius beneficii causâ Majeſtati Tuæ multum debeamus, magna pars ipſius beneficii nobis videatur, [q. debeatur] quod ipſi ad nos miſſi ſint (3).

Having at length arrived to the age of ſixty-nine, he departed this life in May 1628; and was buried, the 27th of that month, in the choir of his Cathedral Church at Chicheſter, near the altar (p). He was a perſon of ſolid judgment, and of various reading; well verſed in the Fathers and Schoolmen; wanting nothing that could render him a compleat Divine.  [Mr. Granger, in his character of Biſhop Carleton, informs us, that his parts were ſhining and ſolid, and wore, without any ſenſible diminution, to an advanced age; that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf, whilſt he was at Oxford, as a Logician, an Orator, and a Poet, and ſtill more as a Divine; and that he wrote, perhaps, upon a greater variety of ſubjects than any other Clergyman of his time (8). His treatiſe againſt judicial aſtrology was a proof of his good ſenſe, and of his ſuperiority to ſome of the prejudices of the age in which he lived. By his firſt wife, Anne, daughter of Sir Henry Killegrew, Knight, and widow of Sir Henry Neville, of Billingbere, in Berkſhire, he had a ſon, named Henry, who was choſen repreſentative for Arundel, in Suſſex, in the ſhort Parliament which met at Weſtminſter, on the 13th of April, 1640. Mr. Henry Carleton embraced the cauſe of the Houſe of Commons in the civil war with King Charles the Firſt, accepted a Captain's commiſſion in the parliamentary army, and ſhewed himſelf to be an enemy to the Biſhops (9).

A print of Dr. George Carleton, in quarto, was prefixed to the 4th edition of his "Thankful Remembrance of God's Mercy." This and the other prints of the ſame book were engraved by Frederic Hulſius. There is alſo an engraving of our learned Prelate, in ſmall quarto, in Boiſſard. At his breaſt hangs a medal of the ſynod of Dort (10.) Some farther circumſtances, concerning his conduct at that ſynod, might, we apprehend, be collected from Gerard Brandt's Hiſtory of the Reformation in the Low Countries; but the object is ſcarcely worthy of a particular enquiry. Two of the Biſhop's Letters to Sir Dudley Carleton, dated at Dort, in 1618-9, are inſerted in the Earl of Hardwicke's publication of the latter Gentleman's correſpondence, during his embaſſy in Holland (11).] K

(11) Letters from and to Sir Dudley Carleton, p. 331—333. 340.

 [CARLETON (DUDLEY) an eminent Stateſman in the beginning of the laſt century, was the eldeſt ſurviving ſon of Anthony Carleton, Eſq; of Baldwin Brightwell, near Watlington, in Oxfordſhire; and was born at his father's ſeat on the 10th of March, 1573. His education was the beſt, and moſt complete, which that age, or indeed any other, could have afforded, to qualify a gentleman for the world and for buſineſs. His grammatical learning he received at Weſtminſter School, from whence he was removed to Oxford, where he became a ſtudent of Chriſt-Church College about the year 1591, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a young man of parts, from whom conſiderable things were expected. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts on the

2d of July, 1595, after which he went abroad for improvement (a). According to Lord Clarendon, he became Secretary to Sir Henry Neville, Embaſſador in France; but this we apprehend to be doubtful (b). Upon his return from his travels, he was created Maſter of Arts, at Oxford, on the 12th of July, 1600 (c). In the ſame year, he was received into the family of Sir Thomas Parry, Embaſſador in France, as his Secretary; in which ſituation he was not happy, the manners of the Embaſſador (who was much governed, likewiſe, by another Secretary, one St. Sauveur, a Hugonot) being preciſe and formal. In 1603, Mr. Carleton was taken, in the ſame capacity, into the houſe of Henry Earl of Northumberland. What ſhare he had in the Earl's confidence, or for what reaſons he quitted his ſervice, cannot now be aſcertained: but as that nobleman had no intereſt with Cecil, who had been engaged in a correſpondence with King James before his acceſſion, in oppoſition to Northumberland, it is probable that Mr. Carleton did not think a connection with him the road to preferment (d). It ſeems, from a paſſage in one of his letters to Mr. Winwood, that, about this time, he had a place of Gentleman Uſher quarterly Waiter: for he there ſays, "In Mr. Cham-"berlain's abſence, I come in quarter, and have waited ſo diligently at court this "Chriſtmas, that I have matter enough, if the report of maſks and mummings can "pleaſe you (e)." In the firſt parliament of King James, he repreſented the borough of St. Mawes in Cornwal, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf both as an active member and an able ſpeaker. The figure which he made in the Houſe of Commons, is thought to have been the principal thing that firſt recommended him to the notice and favour of that admirable judge of men, the Lord Treaſurer Saliſbury. In the beginning of April, 1605, he accompanied the Lord Norris into Spain, upon the terms of fifty pounds in hand, an hundred pounds at his return, and forty pounds a year after his arrival in England. The beſt judgment he could make of Spain, during the ſhort time of his ſtay there, was expreſſed in theſe words, ſuperba miſeria. On his return homewards, through France, he was detained ſome months at Paris, upon account of Lord Norris's indiſpoſition. In the latter end of the year 1605, he was ſummoned to England, by a letter from the Lords of the Council, which gave him great apprehenſions, upon hearing that his former patron, the Earl of Northumberland, had been taken into cuſtody, on the diſcovery of the Gun-powder Plot. Mr. Carleton himſelf, on his arrival in London, was put under confinement; but his innocence being ſoon manifeſted, he was honourably diſcharged (f). In 1607, he married a niece of Sir Maurice Cary, with whom he reſided ſome time in Chancery-lane; after which he took a houſe in Little St. Bartholomew's, near Weſt-Smithfield. Whilſt he here continued, in expectation of preferment, he thus deſcribes his ſituation, in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood: "You "may well think, that unleſs I were under the protection of ſome little ſaint, I would "not ſo venturouſly ſet up for myſelf, with ſuch an army of difficulties, as a dear year, "a plaguy town, a growing wife, and a poor purſe. But of hard beginnings many "times enſue good effects; and of the two parts of happineſs which the philoſopher "required in patrifamilias, the maſter of a family, (that is, quies & abundantia, quiet "and plenty) the defects of the one are ſupplied with the overplus of the other (g)." At length, by the favour of the Earl of Saliſbury, he was deſigned, in 1610, for a poſt in Ireland; but that reſolution being changed, he was appointed in May, the ſame year, to ſucceed his intimate friend, Sir Thomas Edmondes, as Embaſſador to the court of Bruſſels. He had begun to make preparations for that employment, and an hour was even fixed for his taking leave of the King: but a reaſon of ſtate intervened, and ſtopped his journey; for as the Archduke Albert had recalled his Embaſſador here, it was thought proper that he ſhould ſend another in the ſame character, before his court was honoured with one from England (h). Mr. Carleton, however, did not loſe his deſtination to a foreign ſervice, having been immediately nominated to the embaſſy at Venice; and before he ſet out, which he did in September 1610, he received from King James the honour of Knighthood. On his arrival at the place of his reſidence, which was in the November following, he immediately applied himſelf to a diligent and able diſcharge of his miniſterial functions; and he muſt ſoon have convinced his ſuperiors, that he was equal to any negotiation, however difficult or delicate, in which he might happen to be engaged. This is evident from his diſpatches, a complete ſeries of which is preſerved in the Paper Office, and from ſeveral of his Venetian letters, that are printed in Winwood's Memorials During Sir Dudley Carleton's Embaſſy at Venice, he was a principal agent in concluding a treaty between the King of Spain and the Duke of Savoy [A]. Not long after this event, Sir Dudley had inſtructions from his Court, to invite

[A] A principal agent in concluding a treaty between the King of Spain and the Duke of Savoy.] Of this treaty the following account is given, by the noble editor of Sir Dudley Carleton's Letters. "Whilſt he reſided in Italy, the war broke out between Charles Duke of Savoy, a Prince of great ſpirit and ambition, and Ferdinand Duke of Mantua, on account of the former's pretenſions, in right of his daughter, to Montferrat. The prudent Republic of Venice was greatly alarmed at theſe differences; being unwilling on the one hand, that the Duke of Savoy ſhould aggrandize himſelf, at the expence of a weak neighbour; and apprehenſive on the other, that the council of Spain, though at that time directed by an indolent and rapacious Miniſter, the Duke of Lerma, ſhould build ſome ſcheme of farther acquiſitions or invite the Republic of Venice to accede to the league between the King of Great-Britain and the Proteſtant Princes of the union in Germany. His propoſal, however, received only a civil and courteous anſwer, importing rather the embracing of the thing, than the name; and, indeed, the conjuncture was, on ſeveral accounts, wholly unfavourable to the affair (i). Towards the end of the year 1615, Sir Dudley Carleton was relieved in his Venetian employments by Sir Henry Wotton, and returned to England, where he found things in a very different ſtate from that in which he had left them. The great Earl of Saliſbury had been dead above three years: the power of Somerſet was entirely overſet by the diſcovery of the infamous murder of Sir Thomas Overbury; and a new court meteor, Sir George Villiers, was ariſen, who ſoon engroſſed to himſelf all the dependance, which perſonal favour, miniſterial power, and an accumulation of offices, could beſtow. The two Secretaries of State were Sir Ralph Winwood and Sir Thomas Lake, who had both of them been educated in the ſchools of Cecil and Walſingham. Whilſt Sir Dudley was engaged in foreign ſervices, the Secretaries of State were often changed; and, in fact, were all of them Miniſters of the ſecond order, who only executed the directions of the King himſelf, or of his favourite Buckingham. Soon after Sir Dudley Carleton's arrival in England from Venice, he was appointed to one of the moſt important embaſſies in the diſpoſal of the crown, that to the States General, which was then vacant. For this appointment he was indebted to the recommendation of Sir Ralph Winwood, a worthy and ſincere man, but who, in conſequence of a harſhneſs of temper, and roughneſs of behaviour, had not an agreeable manner of conferring a favour. Of this Sir Dudley complained, in a letter to his intimate correſpondent, Sir Thomas Edmondes. "From a hand, ſays he, where I promiſed myſelf much contentment, I had my ſhare of mortification; which notwithſtanding was well tempered betwixt four looks, curſt words, and good deeds, ſo as I have the leſs cauſe to complain." It does not, however, appear, that Carleton, during the courſe of the correſpondence ariſing from his new employment, received any ill uſage from Sir Ralph Winwood; and the death of the latter, in 1617, was a real loſs to the public (k). It was in his embaſſy to the States General, that Sir Dudley Carleton ſpent the moſt active part of his life; for he continued in it, excepting the interval of one year, from 1616 to 1628. He was the laſt Engliſh Miniſter, who had the honour of ſitting in the Council of State for the United Provinces; a privilege that Queen Elizabeth had wiſely obtained, when ſhe undertook the protection of theſe provinces, and which was annexed to the poſſeſſion of the cautionary towns. After the towns themſelves were given up, this privilege was ſtill granted to Carleton, as a matter of courteſy, during his reſidence at the Hague. Upon his arrival in Holland, he was ſoon involved in the diſputes which then raged with great violence in that country, between the Arminians and the Calviniſts; of which religion was made the pretence, though the real ſources of them were influence in Italy, on the ſpecious pretence of defending the rights of a diſtreſſed ally and vaſſal. For which reaſons, the Venetians readily interpoſed their good offices, in conjunction with the courts of Rome, England, and France, to accommodate this quarrel. Sir Dudley Carleton was ſent from Venice to Turin, with an offer of his maſter's mediation in June 1615. He found the Duke of Savoy entrenched under the walls of Aſti; and the Spaniſh army encamped on the plain, and endeavouring to force his quarters. After ſome conferences and journies between the two camps, an accommodation was concluded, which was called the treaty of Aſti; by which Charles Emanuel obliged himſelf to diſarm, and to refer his pretenſions to the judgment of the Emperor, with other conditions not neceſſary to be mentioned here. One of the inſtruments of this treaty was made out in the names of the Nuncio and the French Embaſſador, with a ſeparate article of guaranty to the Duke, ſigned by the Venetian Miniſter; and another was copied from it verbatim, in which Sir Dudley's name was inſerted, inſtead of the Nuncio's, and an engagement was annexed on the part of the King of Great-Britain, to take the perſon and ſtate of Charles under his royal protection, in caſe the Spaniards ſhould fail in the performance of their conditions. We find Carleton returned to Venice in Auguſt; from which place he gives the following account to Sir Thomas Edmondes, at Paris, of the Piedmonteſe negotiation. 'It ſeems you are 'no better ſatisfied with our peace in Piedmont, 'than they are in other parts, Italy and England 'only excepted. His Majeſty has approved the 'ſame, and ratified what was promiſed on his behalf; 'and over all this country, there continues a general 'jubilee. Spain, they ſay, takes exceptions againſt 'the form of the peace, as too much to the honour 'and advantage of the Duke of Savoy. Our friends 'in Germany and the Low Countries condemn the 'ſubſtance as diſadvantageous to their affairs; and 'out of Switzerland, from the Proteſtant Cantons, 'I have received letters of the ſame tenor, they 'marvelling much at the Duke of Savoy's conſenting to peace, ſince they were reſolved to give him 'ſuccours of men to a conſiderable number. But 'both your's in France, and theirs, were but in project, when they ſhould have been in action; and 'by that time they could have appeared in Piedmont, all they could do, would but have ſerved to 'ſupply thoſe which the war and ſickneſs would have 'conſumed in the mean time; ſo as the right uſe, 'to which they were intended, which was to enter 'by ſome other way into the ſtate of Milan, whereby 'to make a diverſion, could not have been effected; 'and the ſeat of the war would ſtill have been in the 'Duke's ſtate. Money there was none, to give theſe 'new ſupplies contentment, nor none to be expected 'from any place, this ſtate being cloſe-handed; 'and other Princes, who wiſhed well to the cauſe, 'empty-handed. Thoſe forces the Duke had at Aſti 'were in this reſpect, for want of pay, hardly induced to do their ordinary duties; and when they 'were in guard, there was no aſſurance of them. 'Other neceſſities were great; but nothing, I muſt 'confeſs, in compariſon of the enemy, who ſuffered 'much more: but they had Genoa near, which furniſhed them with money; and having all Italy to 'friend, I ſee not how they could want men, beſides 'the levies they might ſtill make amongſt the Tudeſchi and the Catholic Cantons. Theſe, with the 'continual danger of the Duke's perſon, were the 'conſiderations that perſuaded the peace (1).'

the mutual jealouſies, and the conteſts for power between thoſe two great perſons, Prince Maurice and Penſionary Barnevelt. As the French ſupported the latter in the ſtrongeſt manner, the Engliſh Embaſſador was of courſe engaged in the oppoſite intereſt (l). Beſides the diſtinguiſhed part which Sir Dudley Carleton took in the affairs of the Synod of Dort, and in the politics which had given riſe to that famous Eccleſiaſtical Aſſembly, it appears, from his diſpatches, that he was a zealous well-wiſher to the Palatine cauſe, and the public liberty of Germany, and recommended theſe objects at home as far as was conſiſtent with his own ſafety. His ſentiments in this reſpect were, for ſome time, but little regarded; ſo that partly owing to the inactivity of the Court of England abroad, and partly in conſequence of our commercial diſputes with the Dutch, his ſituation at the Hague was not very agreeable from 1620 to 1623. In that year, the Duke of Buckingham, influenced by the diſguſt he had conceived againſt Count Olivares, and by a ſudden deſire of popularity, broke through, at once, all that ſcheme of friendſhip which his maſter had been building with the Houſe of Auſtria. The firſt ſtep naturally taken on this change of political views, was the renewal of a good underſtanding with our neighbours, the Dutch; and in a long converſation between Sir Dudley and the Prince of Orange on that ſubject, the Prince uſed theſe remarkable words to him, 'That when the King would be to their Republic as Queen 'Elizabeth was, their Republic would be to him as they were to Queen Elizabeth.' Theſe overtures being well improved by our Embaſſador, an extraordinary embaſſy was diſpatched the next ſpring to England, and a defenſive alliance concluded in June 1624; by which an aid was granted to the States of 6000 foot, to be paid by Great-Britain. It was in the courſe of this ſummer, that the account was brought to Europe of the inhuman maſſacre at Amboyna; the conſequence of which was the total loſs to the Engliſh of their ſhare in the ſpice trade, which great pains had been taken to regulate in 1620, by an amicable convention between the two Eaſt-India Companies of England and Holland. This unhappy affair had very nearly overturned our reviving friendſhip with the Dutch, at a juncture when it was equally neceſſary to both nations; and it was, therefore, the moſt diſagreeable incident that had ever attended Sir Dudley Carleton in his negotiations. His firſt memorial upon it to the States was preſented in Auguſt 1624, and was followed with ſeveral others on his part, and with many replies and counter-propoſitions from their High Mightineſſes. Through all the turns of this long controverſy, the Embaſſador conducted himſelf with great firmneſs and prudence. He never gave up the juſt claim which his country had to juſtice and ſatisfaction on the authors of that ſhocking ſcene of barbarity, but enforced our proofs of it with dignity and ſpirit; and yet he did not manage the cauſe with ſo much heat and vic ence, as to involve the two nations in an unſeaſonable rupture in Europe. 'In ſhort,' ſays the noble Hiſtorian to whom we are almoſt wholly indebted for the preſent article, 'he 'acted up to his inſtructions; and neither went beyond, nor fell ſhort of them (m).'

Sir Dudley Carleton began now to think, that he had an equitable title to ſome extraordinary recompence for his ſervices; and as nothing could be done at Court without the intereſt of the Duke of Buckingham, he addreſſed himſelf to his Grace on the ſubject in that language of ſervility and adulation, which, whilſt it receives conſiderable extenuation from the manners of the age, cannot be read without diminiſhing, in a certain degree, our eſteem of the writer. Though the reaſons urged by the Embaſſador in favour of his ſuit (n) appear to have been deſerving of attention, they were not productive of any immediate effect. The importance of our tranſactions with the United Provinces at that criſis, and perhaps the difficulty of providing for Sir Dudley in the manner he expected, kept him fixed to his poſt for ſome months longer. In 1625 ſeveral remarkable events happened; the deaths of King James and the Prince of Orange; the loſs of Breda, after an obſtinate and bloody defence; and a fruitleſs attempt made to relieve it by the new Stadtholder Prince Frederick Henry, in which the Engliſh troops under the command of Sir Horace Vere and the Earl of Oxford gained immortal honour. During theſe tranſactions, Sir Dudley Carleton was laborioufly and uſefully employed at the Hague in ſupplying Count Mansfield's army, which, by unſkilful management on the part of our Court, was reduced to the laſt extremity; and in ſettling with the States General the proportion of ſhips and landmen, with which they were to join the Engliſh fleet in any enterprize againſt the King of Spain. Our Embaſſador was aſſiſted in his conferences upon theſe points by Sir William Leger and Mr. Secretary Morton, who had been ſent expreſsly from England; and the reſult of the negotiations was, that their High Mightineſſes agreed to ſend an auxiliary ſquadron of twenty ſhips to the general rendezvous at Plymouth, and gave leave of abſence to ſeveral officers, and ſome draughts from the old Engliſh corps in the ſervice of the States. All theſe were afterwards employed in the unſucceſsful expedition to Cadiz, the failure of which could not derogate from the merit of our Miniſters abroad. A treaty offenſive and defenſive having been ſigned with the Embaſſadors of the United Provinces at Southampton, in September the ſame year, the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland were ſent over, in November, to the Hague, to improve the foundations laid by it into a grand alliance againſt the Houſe of Auſtria, for the recovery of the Palatinate, and the reſtoration of the liberty of Germany. Sir Dudley was joined in commiſſion with theſe two great noblemen, and appears to have worked himſelf into a large degree of confidence with the former of them. He drew up the ſpeech made by the Duke to the States at his public audience, and accompanied his Grace to England on the concluſion of their negotiation; the conſequence of which was, the framing of a league between the Kings of Great-Britain and Denmark, and the States General, for the ends above-mentioned. France declined openly engaging againſt the Houſe of Auſtria; and the King of Sweden, who was expected to have ſent a plenipotentiary to this Congreſs, was prevented by his wars in Poland. Much was not to be expected from a confederacy, which, though right in its principles, was unequal to the effects it was intended to produce; and nothing contributed ſo much to the diſſolution of it, as the conſtant miſunderſtanding between King Charles and his Parliaments, who, from diſlike to the favourite Miniſter, and his method of conducting the war, refuſed to contribute towards the ſupport of a great foreign meaſure, in which they had unanimouſly adviſed the Crown to engage (o).

In December, 1725, ſoon after Sir Dudley Carleton's return to England, he was appointed Vice Chamberlain of his Majeſty's Houſhold; and, at the ſame time, had an opportunity offered him of diſplaying his talents for negotiation in France. In this Commiſſion he was joined with the Earl of Holland, one of the moſt inſinuating Courtiers and fineſt Gentlemen of the age; and who was thought to be particularly acceptable to the French Court, where, in concert with the Earl of Carliſle, he had concluded the marriage of Queen Henrietta Maria with King Charles the Firſt. The object and ſucceſs of the Earl's and Sir Dudley's embaſſy, will be related in the note below [B]. When the two Plenipotentiaries returned to England, in the month of March, 1725-6, they found the Parliament ſitting, and inflamed to the higheſt degree at the miſmanagement of public affairs. At this criſis, Sir Dudley Carleton was elected, upon a vacancy, repreſentative for the Borough of Haſtings in Suſſex; and, during the height of the proſecution of the Duke of Buckingham, his patron, he endeavoured to bring the Commons into a better temper. The topics on which he chiefly inſiſted, in a ſpeech made by him, on the [B] The object and ſucceſs of the Earl's and Sir Dudley's embaſſy, will be related in the note below.] "The points on which theſe two Embaſſadors extraordinary received their inſtructions, which bear date the laſt of December 1625, were, firſt, to preſs earneſtly for the reſtitution of the ſhips, which had been lent to Lewis XIII. and were employed againſt the Rochellers. This tranſaction had raiſed a great clamour in England, and was made, in the next ſeſſion of Parliament, one of the articles of impeachment againſt the Duke. Secondly, to interpoſe the good offices of King Charles to obtain a peace for the French Proteſtants agreeably to former edicts; and, thirdly, to ſupport the inſtances of the Miniſters of the allies, viz. the States General, Duke of Savoy, and the King of Denmark, for obtaining the French acceſſion to the treaty of the Hague. Our Embaſſadors arrived at Paris about the middle of January 162⅝, and immediately entered upon their negotiation, in a long conference with the Cardinal de Richelieu, who had then, in concert with Mary of Medicis, Queen mother, the principal ſhare in the French councils. They choſe to invert the order of their inſtructions, and 'to begin with deſiring to know, 'how far the French King would concur towards the 'reſtitution of the German liberties, of which ſome 'of his royal anceſtors had declared themſelves the 'protectors. Next, as a conſequence of what they 'hoped would be the public-ſpirited reſolution of 'his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, they begged leave to 'recommend to him the peace of his own kingdom, 'by leaving thoſe of the religion to the liberty of 'their conſciences, and ſafety of their lives and 'goods, according to the edicts. And, thirdly, as 'a dependence on both the former points, they demanded the reſtitution of our ſhips, the better to 'enable the King their maſter to carry on the war by 'ſea; which was the more neceſſary, as the Spaniſh 'navy was greater than it had been, and therefore 'none of ours could be ſpared to any other ſervice.'

"The plan of negotiation was judiciouſly laid, and diſcreetly and diligently purſued by the Engliſh Embaſſadors; but met with obſtructions from different quarters. Blainville, the French Embaſſador here, was on very ill terms with our Court, and aggravated every thing by his diſpatches. Several French ſhips had been condemned in our Admiralty Courts, for having Spaniſh goods on board; and the French council of ſtate, not admitting the captures to be juſt, made repriſals on the Engliſh veſſels which came into their harbours. The reſult of many private and public conferences between our Embaſſadors and the French Miniſters was, that the French King abſolutely refuſed to enter into any offenſive meaſures againſt the Houſe of Auſtria, but promiſed ſubſidies to the King of Denmark.

"Richelieu was ſo far from thinking it a proper juncture to proſecute the war againſt Spain, that he actually concluded a private convention with that Court about the Valteline, at the ſame time that the Prince of Piedmont and the Venetian Embaſſador at Paris were preſſing for, and expecting a more vigorous ſupport of, the war in Italy. With regard to a peace with the Proteſtants, the French Miniſters conſented, that our Embaſſadors ſhould interpoſe, not a formal mediation, but their good offices with the deputies of the religion, to bring about an accommodation. This was attended with ſucceſs; and an agreement was ſoon concluded, in oppoſition to the endeavours and offers of the Clergy, with the Cardinal Rochefoucault at their head, more advantageous to the Proteſtants (as the Earl and Sir Dudley affirm) than the treaty of Montpelier; for which they received the particular thanks of the Queen-mother on one hand, and of all the Proteſtant deputies on the other. They gave to the latter an act, in both their names, containing a more favourable interpretation of ſome general words in one of the articles relating to the town of Rochelle; which ſerved as a proof at the ſame time, that they were authorized by the French Miniſters to interpoſe in this treaty.

"The Embaſſadors, before they took their leave, had the good fortune to obtain a general releaſe of all our merchants ſhips and goods, which had been embargoed in France; but on condition, as the edict expreſſed it, that reſtitution ſhould be made in England, within a limited time, of ſuch effects and merchandiſe, as ſhould be proved to be French property. With regard to our ſhips, which had ſerved againſt Rochelle, they were immediately ſent home on the ſigning of the peace. One of them was the Vanguard belonging to the royal navy, and lent as an act of friendſhip from King to King. The reſt were merchants veſſels taken up here on contract (2)."

twelfth of May, 1626, were not ſuch as were calculated to give ſatisfaction to the Houſe; nor, indeed, were ſome of them proper for a Member of Parliament, and a true patriot, to argue from at any time. He forewarned the Commons 'not to make too 'free with the King's prerogative, leſt they put him out of love with Parliaments;' and obſerved, 'That other Countries had ſuch aſſemblies formerly, till Monarchs, ſeeing 'their turbulent ſpirit, and finding out their own ſtrength, at laſt ſuppreſſed them.' He remarked from his own experience, 'the condition of the ſubjects in foreign ſtates, 'where they looked like ghoſts, not men, and could neither eat good meat, nor wear 'good clothes, without paying heavy taxes for it. Let us (ſaid Sir Dudley) preſerve the 'King's good opinion of Parliaments, leſt we loſe the repute of a free-born nation by 'turbulency in Parliament.' He concluded with aſſigning reaſons for the King's commitment of Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, two of the managers againſt the Duke; the firſt of whom was impriſoned for ſaying, 'that he forbore to ſpeak farther of 'the giving the plaiſter to King James on his death-bed, in regard to the King's ho-'nour;' and the other for uſing what were thought indecent and violent expreſſions againſt the Duke's perſon, ſtiling him the Man, and comparing him to ſo deteſtable a character as Sejanus. A few days after (p), when Sir John Elliot was diſcharged, Sir Dudley Carleton took occaſion to make a ſpeech in explanation of his former one; and Sir John, in anſwer to Sir Dudley, treated him with reſpect. Elliot, at the ſame time, in reply to certain objections propoſed to him by the Speaker, defended himſelf in a manner ſo entirely ſatisfactory to the Commons, that they came to an unanimous reſolution, that neither he nor Digges had, as managers, exceeded the commiſſion which they received from the Houſe (q). The Vice Chamberlain's conduct, though diſpleaſing to the friends and ſupporters of liberty in Parliament, was very acceptable to an arbitrary Court, and immediately procured him one of the rewards which he had probably in view. On the twenty-ſecond of May, two days after the vote before mentioned, he was called up to the Houſe of Peers, by the ſtile and title of Baron Carleton of Imbercourt in the County of Surry. The new Baron was ſoon employed in buſineſs better adapted to his talents, than that in which he had laſt been engaged; for in Auguſt he was ſent Embaſſador extraordinary to France, though upon a very diſagreeable commiſſion; namely, to excuſe and juſtify the ſending away of the Queen of England's French ſervants. In this unpleaſant negotiation, he conducted himſelf with great prudence and good ſenſe; and, notwithſtanding the unfavourable reception he met with from a Court which was highly exaſperated, he had the ſkill to ward off any impertinent uſage. His Lordſhip was in a ſhort time recalled by the King his Maſter, to ſhew his reſentment at the refuſal of the French Miniſters to admit Mr. Montagu to an audience, who carried letters of congratulation to the Duke of Orleans, on his marriage; and at the delays of that Crown, in reſtoring the effects belonging to the Engliſh ſubjects (r).

During Lord Carleton's ſtay in England, he appears to have been much conſulted on the executive parts of foreign buſineſs; beſides which, he made ſeveral draughts of public papers, and had a large ſhare of the Duke of Buckingham's confidence. But as ſeveral incidents had ariſen, ſince his departure from the Hague, which produced ſome coldneſs between the Dutch Adminiſtration and ours, and the States began to be very uneaſy at the proſpect of a war between France and England, his Lordſhip was ordered, in March 1626-7, to reſume his character of Embaſſador in Holland. When he arrived there, which was not till the middle of June, he found our intereſt declining apace; and all his experience in buſineſs and knowledge of the country were requiſite, to preſerve it on a tolerable footing. He had not the ſame admittance as before into the Councils of the States General; and, by a particular reſolution, from which they would never recede, he had, during his abſence, been deprived of his ſeat in the Council of State. The Dutch Miniſters, and eſpecially the Prince of Orange, were much diſſatisfied at our precipitate breach with France; and all the reaſons alledged by the Engliſh Embaſſador, could never bring them to approve of ſo imprudent a meaſure. Being apprehenſive of offending one or other of the two Kings, who were ſupporting them againſt the power of Spain, and to the ſervice of whoſe troops in their armies they owed moſt of their ſucceſſes in the field, they were determined to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. The Prince of Orange was ſuſpected to have rather a bias towards France, which was imputed to the influence, which Hautrive, one of the French Colonels, had gained over him. The States, at the requeſt of Charles the Firſt, had taken up conſiderable ſums of money for the payment of Count Mansfield's troops; and Lord Carleton had brought over with him neither principal nor intereſt for the diſcharge of the debt. Two of the points which he had to negotiate with them, on his firſt arrival, were not of a very acceptable nature: one of them, was to obtain the revocation of Coen, who was appointed Governor-general of their ſettlements in the Eaſt-Indies; and who, on account of his former conduct in that part of the world, was particularly obnoxious in England. The other point was to prevail with the States, to grant a farther leave of abſence to ſeveral Engliſh officers in their ſervice, who were then preparing to attend the Duke of Buckingham in his expedition to the Iſle of Rhé; and who had been indulged with that leave, only with a view of being employed againſt Spain. There was another affair, of ſtill ſuperior importance, which gave Lord Carleton a great deal of trouble. The French were at that time beginning, not only to purchaſe large quantities of naval and military ſtores, but even to buy and build ſhips in the Dutch ports. Four of conſiderable ſtrength were then almoſt ready in the Texel, and their agents had contracted for fourteen more. Againſt this proceeding our Embaſſador remonſtrated, as ſoon as he came over; but though he endeavoured to alarm the fears of the States General with an apprehenſion (for which there were ſufficient grounds) that Cardinal Richlieu and the Count d'Olivares were concerting a treaty for the junction of the French and Spaniſh fleets, the immediate object of which was to be the ſhutting up the port of Rochelle, he was not ſucceſsful in exciting the jealouſies of the Hollanders with regard to the deſigns of the Court of France. His Lordſhip was equally unſucceſsful in his application to the Prince of Orange upon the ſame ſubjects: but he was more fortunate in preventing the ratification of a new ſubſidy treaty, which Langerac, the Dutch Embaſſador at Paris, had concluded in that city, without ſufficient inſtructions from his ſuperiors. About this time (s), the States appointed an extraordinary commiſſion, for the trial of the Amboyna Judges; and the Lord Carleton ſeemed to think, that they were fairly choſen. Several circumſtances, however, and particularly the ſeizure of three Dutch Eaſt-India ſhips at Portſmouth, put a ſtop to the progreſs of the affair. Lord Carleton, finding that a categorical anſwer to his memorials was ſtill delayed, under the pretence of the Prince of Orange's abſence, grew very uneaſy at his ſtay in Holland, and earneſtly preſſed to be recalled. Whilſt he continued to reſide in Holland, an incident happened, which made a great noiſe in that country. Sir Sackville Trevor, with an Engliſh ſquadron, entered the Texel, and attacked the French ſhips which lay there, ready to come out. One of the largeſt of them, called the St. Eſprit, of 46 guns, was taken; but the reſt eſcaped, by throwing their cannon overboard, and getting over the flats into the Zuyder-Zee. The States immediately ſent deputies to the Engliſh Embaſſador, to complain of this breach of the neutrality of their ports; and the French Embaſſador, Monſieur d'Eſpeſſes, talked in a very high ſtile of the reſentment which his maſter would ſhew, if he did not receive compleat ſatisfaction: and, in the mean while, he detained in his hands a remittance of money from France, which was due upon the treaty of Compeigne. The Prince of Orange behaved in this affair with particular moderation, and ſuggeſted an expedient, by which both the Engliſh and Dutch men of war, that lay in the Texel after Sir Sackville's attempt, might come off with honour. The expedient was, that the former ſhould immediately put to ſea, and the latter make a feint of oppoſing them. This was accordingly carried into execution, and the punctilio of the two nations was ſatisfied, at the expence of throwing away a few rounds of powder. In the beginning of November (t), an alarm having been brought to the Hague, that the Dunkirk ſquadron was got out, and were ſailed down the Channel, to join the French ſhips in the ports of Britanny, Lord Carleton ſeized the opportunity of preſſing the States to ſend orders to Dorp, their Admiral, to follow and attack the Spaniſh ſhips, wherever he met them, though joined by the French; declaring, that if this was refuſed to him, his Maſter would conſider the treaty of Southampton as broken on the part of Holland. Although their High Mightineſſes were very unwilling to take any ſtep which might embroil themſelves with France, they could not avoid ſending orders to Dorp, to join the King of England's fleet, in oppoſition to any attempts from the Spaniards, and to do all in his power for the ſecurity of the Britiſh dominions. Dorp, however, had left the purſuit of the Dunkirkers, and returned to the Hague, before he received theſe laſt inſtructions; and the intelligence that the latter had gone down the Channel, turned out to be groundleſs. Soon after, intelligence came to the Hague, from all quarters, of the Duke of Buckingham's ill ſucceſs at Rhé. By private accounts among Lord Carleton's papers, it doth not appear that our loſs of men in that unfortunate expedition, was nearly ſo great as is commonly repreſented; and the French, after the attack on our rear, were repulſed, our works regained, and the troops re-embarked without moleſtation. The return of the Duke with diſgrace, and the confuſion in the domeſtic affairs of England, kept our Embaſſador for ſome weeks without any full or explicit inſtructions. When they were ſent, which was not till the third of February, 1627-8, he received with them, in the diſpatch from Lord Conway, the following ſtrong approbation of his conduct: "The "paſſage from all foreign parts is ſo ſhut up, that the greateſt and beſt informations "which his Majeſty hath, come from you, and are acceptable to him; and ſo are your "judicious and diligent negotiations and remonſtrances with that State, well vouchſafed "and eſteemed by his Majeſty; and I am right glad, I can with ſo much truth give you "the knowledge and aſſurance of it." In purſuance of the orders which came to his hands by this expreſs, Lord Carleton preſented a memorial to the States General, complaining of their conduct with regard to the French, and requiring their quota of ſhips, to join with the fleet of the King his Maſter, againſt the common enemy. His Lordſhip was directed, likewiſe, to prevail with their High Mightineſſes to favour the levy of a thouſand German horſe, intended to ſerve in England, under the command of Colonel
